MABILLON, Jean, b. at St. Pierremont, in the diocese of Rheims, Nov. 23, 1632; d. in Paris, Dec. 27, 1707. In 1653 he entered the Congregation of St. Maur; and in 1664 he settled in the abbey of St. Germain-des-Près in Paris, as the assistant of D'Achery. His first independent work was his edition of the Opera omnia S. Bernardi, 1667, the first and also the model of the celebrated St. Maur editions of the Fathers; but his great life-work was his history of the Benedictine order. In 1668 appeared the first volume of his Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti, which contained many striking proofs of his great critical talent. But just the cutting criticism which he exercised caused him trouble. He was accused by members of his own order, and had to defend himself before the chapter-general, in which, however, he succeeded completely. The ninth and last volume of the work appeared in 1701. In 1703 followed the first volume of his Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, of which he finished four volumes before he died. The fifth was completed by Massuet (1713); the sixth, by Martène (1739). His most celebrated work, however, is, perhaps, his De re diplomatica, libri vi., written against Papebroch in 1681, and setting forth in an exhaustive manner and in a truly classical form the principles on which that whole science is based, and the rules after which it proceeds. From his travels, which he undertook on the instance of Colbert, to Burgundy in 1682, to Germany in 1683, and to Italy in 1685-86, he published Museum Italicum (Paris, 1687-89, 2 vols.) and Vetera Analecta (Paris, 1675-85, 4 vols.). Against Rancé, the founder of the order of the Trappists, who forbade his monks to read any thing but the Bible and a few ascetical books, he wrote Traité des études monastiques (1691), in which he proved study and learning to be a necessary element of monastic life. Among his minor works are De liturgia Gallicana (1685), La mort chrétienne (1707), etc. Parts of his comprehensive correspondence have been published in his Ouvrages posthumes, and by Valéry, Paris, 1846, 3 vols.

LIT. — The life of Mabillon has been written by RUINART (Paris, 1709), ÉMILE CHAVIN DE MALAN (Paris, 1843), HENRI JADART (Rheims, 1879).

MACARIANS. See MACARIUS (IV.).

MACARIUS is the name of several prominent characters in the ancient church. — I. Macarius the Elder, also called the Great, or the Egyptian; b. about 300, in Upper Egypt; d. 391, in the desert of Scetis; grew up as a pupil of Antonius; was ordained priest in 340, and directed the monastic community of Scetis for half a century. He is commemorated in the Western Church on Jan. 15, in the Eastern on Jan. 19; and several monasteries in the Libyan Desert still bear his name. He left fifty homilies, which have been edited by J. G. Pritius, Leipzig, 1698, also some Apophthegmata and letters, edited by H. J. Floss, Cologne, 1850; while the Opuscula ascetica are later extracts from his homilies. See BR. LINDNER: De Maca- rio, Leipzig, 1846, and TH. FÖRSTER, in Jahrbücher f. d. Theologie, 1873. — II. Macarius the Younger, or the Alexandrian, was a somewhat younger contemporary of the preceding, and stood at the head of five thousand monks in the Nitrian Desert. A tradition fixes the date of his death at Jan. 2; but he is commemorated on the same days as Macarius the Elder, with whom he is often confounded. A monastic rule (HOLSTENIUS: Cod. regul., i. 18) is ascribed to him, also a homily and some apophthegmata (MIGNE: Pratr. Græca, xxxiv.). — III. Macarius Magnes, probably identical with that Macarius (Bishop of Magnesia), who, at the Synod of the Oak (403), denounced the Bishop of Ephesus, the friend of Chrysostom. An apology of Christianity, directed against some Neo-Platonic adversary, discovered at Athens in 1867, and edited by C. Blondel (Paris, 1876), probably belongs to him. See L. DUCHESNE: De Macario Magne et scriptis ejus, Paris, 1877. [IV. Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch in the seventh century; present at second council of Constantinople (680); was a Monothelite, and leader of a sect known as Macarions. See MONOTHELITES.] ZÖCKLER.

MACBRIDE, John David, D.C.L., F.S.A., eminent Orientalist; b. at Norfolk, Eng., 1788; d. at Oxford, Jan. 24, 1868. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, where he took a fellowship. In 1813 he was appointed principal of Magdalen Hall, and Lord Almoner's professor of Arabic in his university, and for the rest of his life retained these positions. He published anonymously, Diatessaron, or the History of our Lord Jesus Christ, compiled from the Four Gospels according to the Authorized Version, Oxford, 1837; Lectures explanatory of the Diatessaron, 1835, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1854; Lectures on the Articles of the United Church of England and Ireland, 1853; Lectures on the Epistles, 1858; also a work upon Mohammedanism. His Diatessaron was for some time a university text-book at Oxford.

MACCABEES, the name given in later times to the Asmonæans, a family of Jewish patriots who rose to celebrity in the reign of Antiochus (IV.) Epiphanes. It placed itself at the head of a popular revolt, which finally led, after terrible struggles, and many bloody vicissitudes of fortune, to a period of freedom and glory for Israel. The derivation of the name "Asmonæan" is a matter of doubt. According to Josephus, it is to be looked for in a certain Asamonæus, who, he says, was an ancestor of the priest Mattathias. But it has such a singularly foreign appearance as to make it seem not improbable that it was a title of honor. [Professor Curtiss, in his brochure on The Name Maccabæe, advocates the meaning "extinguisher."]]

The authorities for the history of the Asmonæans are, (1) the so-called "Books of the Maccabees," which found their place in the Greek appendix of the Old Testament. The first book goes down to the death of Simon: the second does not extend to the death of Judas. (2) Josephus gives in his Antiquities (12-14) the most extensive account, and, in many parts of the history, the only account. In the beginning of his narrative he is evidently dependent on the First Book of the Maccabees. For the later periods he perhaps drew his materials from family records, as he boasted of having been related to the Maccabees. (3) Much valuable material is to be derived from the classic authors when we come to the close of the period.

The first principle in the politics of the Macedonian states of the East was the Hellenizing of the native populations. Antiochus IV. also followed it. Amongst all his subjects, the Israelites were the ones whose spirit and culture were the most bitterly antagonistic to Greek customs. But it was this very people, whom on account of their relations with foreign states, their wealth, and the importance of their geographical position, it was the most necessary for him to subject. It does not surprise us that some of the Jews should have regarded the introduction of foreign customs as something unavoidable, and offered no resistance. The zeal, however, of the strict advocates of the ancestral religion became intense under the oppression. They liked to call themselves the "Oppressed" (עֲבֻדֵי), the "Poor" (עֲבֵיטִים), and the "Pious" (חֲסִידִים). Indignant at this moral resistance, Antiochus finally inaugurated a religious persecution, which began with underhand restrictions. These measures induced an open revolt, whose leader was the priest and patriot Mattathias of Modin. His bold deed of the public murder of a royal official was the sign for the beginning of the revolt. Fleeing to the mountains, he, with the co-operation of his five heroic sons, organized war on a small scale. He died 165 B.C.

Judas, one of the younger sons, who had taken the most prominent part in the plans of his father, was appointed his successor. For six years he led the party with almost superhuman effort and varying success. Decisive battles he had to avoid. But in innumerable skirmishes he defeated the hated foreigners; and his enthusiastic followers called him "Maccabi," or the "Hammerer," from which his family has received the appellation "Maccabees." It is apparent that this conflict had more of a religious than of a national character; for Judas had many enemies among the Israelites, and the indications of a civil war are not wanting at this period. The finest triumph of this hero was his taking of the temple, which he re-dedicated with solemn festivities after the abominations of the heathen desolation. Judas is said to have entered into relations with the Roman Senate. But the armies of Demetrius flooded the land, Jerusalem was taken, and Judas killed 161 B.C., leaving to his followers a name and example which counterbalanced many victories. He is the sole fanatic whose character stands out in a clear light in history, which forgot the horrors of the war in the infinite blessing of the rescue and continuance of ancient Judaism, with its precious hopes, down to the time of the fulfilment.

The Asmonæans did not despair. The astute Jonathan [fifth son of Mattathias] took the place of his heroic brother Judas, retreated to the morasses and ravines of the Lower Jordan, and carried on a destructive guerilla warfare against the Syrians and Arabs. Demetrius, the nephew and legitimate heir of Antiochus IV., at this time occupied the throne. But a pretender (Alexander Bala) arose in the year 152 B.C., who gave himself out to be the son of Antiochus. This rivalry was favorable to the success of Jonathan's cause. Both parties sought his aid; and Demetrius not only restored the hostages he had taken from Jonathan, but withdrew most of the garrisons from the Jewish fortress, so that the latter became master once more of the temple, and without drawing the sword. Alexander, on the other hand, appointed him high priest; and the Jew, reaching out with both hands, united in his person the civil and spiritual power. At the death (150 B.C.) of Demetrius, Jonathan was master of Judæa, and a powerful vassal of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ. In 146 B.C. Demetrius the younger asserted his claims against the pretender. Jonathan defeated him, and secured the Philistine kingdom as the reward of the victory. Although Demetrius was afterwards successful, he preferred to have Jonathan for his friend, and granted to Judæa immunities of much value. At a later period, a son of the pretender Alexander Bala arose against Demetrius II. Jonathan espoused his cause, but was, with Alexander himself, treacherously murdered by Alexander's ambitious minister, Tryphon, 143 B.C. Jonathan did not play as brilliant a part as either Judas or his successor Simon. He was a politician, and yet it was he who laid the foundation of the complete freedom of the Jews.

One more son [the second] of Mattathias still remained, Simon,—a man tried in counsel and deed, and distinguished at once for prudence, mildness, and strength, and enjoying the full confidence of the people. He was the statesman of the house, as Jonathan was its diplomatist, and Judas its hero. In 142 B.C. he declared his nation independent, and united in his person the functions of high priest, prince, and military leader of the Jews. His rule marks an epoch in Jewish history. Priestly institutions had become the burden of the nation. Schools were now erected at the side of the temple, and soon the pulpit became more prominent than the altar. Simon was advanced in years when he came into power. He was murdered 135 B.C. Respected by foreign nations, he was regarded by his own with affection. A noteworthy mark of its love and devotion was embodied in a brazen tablet commemorating his virtues, and placed upon the wall of the temple. In 139 B.C. Simon struck off the first national Jewish money.

The further fortunes of the house of the Maccabees (Asmonæans) has been given under the names of Simon's successors. It will be sufficient here to give a brief survey. John, or Hyrcanus I., Simon's son, was his immediate successor. With his death (107 B.C.) the glory of Israel descended to the grave, and the house of the Maccabees advanced rapidly to its destruction. Hyrcanus, anticipating nothing good from his five sons, left his kingdom to his widow. Aristobulus I., however, pushed his way into power, but died (106 B.C.), after allowing his mother to perish of hunger, and throwing three of his brothers into prison. He was the first to assume the title of king. His widow Alexandra, not yet weary of the new dignity, and worthy of it, offered her hand and her crown to one of her brothers-in-law, Alexander Jannæus I., whose reign was longer than that of any other member of his family. He desired to shine, like his father, as a conqueror, without possessing his father's qualities. His widow succeeded to power at his death (79 B.C.), and was followed, after a prudent and powerful reign, by her son Hyrcanus II. (70 B.C.). He united the offices of king and high priest, but was soon deprived of both by his brilliant and daring brother, Aristobulus II. Thenceforth the fortunes of the family were intimately associated with the ambitious and successes of the Herodian house. Its history was a series of tragedies. The land was deprived of the royal title by Pompey, 63 B.C. Aristobulus was murdered, and subsequently Hyrcanus II. (31 B.C.), in the eightieth year of his age, and by the ambitious hand of Herod the Great, who had married his beautiful grand-daughter Mariamne. The same ambition put to death Mariamne's brother Aristobulus, in his eighteenth year (31 B.C.). In a moment of jealousy Herod took the life of Mariamne herself, and consummated the bloody tragedy of the Maccabæan house by the ghastly murder of his own two sons by Mariamne, — Alexander and Aristobulus. MACCABEES, Festival of the. The seven brothers, who with their mother were martyred at Antioch under Antiochus (see 2 Macc. vii.), were commemorated Aug. 1. The festival dates from the fourteenth century. Panegyrics upon the martyrs were uttered by Gregory Nazianzen, Augustine, Chrysostom, and Leo the Great.

MACCOVIUS (Makowsky), Johannes, Reformed theologian of Polish descent; b. at Lobzenic in 1588; studied at various German universities, and was in 1615 appointed professor of theology at Franeker, where he died in 1644. He was famous as a disputant; but, in his treatment of the Reformed dogmatics, he introduced the scholastic method, — Collegia theologica, Amsterdam, 1623; Loci communes, Franeker, 1626; Distinctiones theologice (published after his death by N. Arnold), Amsterdam, 1656. This circumstance caused him to be denounced as a heretic; and, though the synod of Dort (1618) acquitted him of heresy, it censured his method, which, nevertheless, continued to be applied by his disciples, Maresius of Groningen and Voetius of Utrecht. See N. ARNOLD: Maccovius redivivus, Francfort, 1651. L. HELLER.

MACEDO is the name of two Portuguese Jesuits of note. — I. Antonio Macedo, b. at Coimbra, 1612; d. in Lisbon, 1693; was active in the conversion of Queen Christina of Sweden; taught in the colleges of Elvora and Lisbon, and wrote, among other works, Lusitania infulata et purpurata (Paris, 1663) and Descriptio coronationis regineæ Christiane (Stockholm, 1650). — II. Francisco Ma- cedo, b. at Coimbra, 1596; d. at Padua, 1680; an elder brother of the preceding; left the Jesuits, and entered the order of the Cordeliers; was implicated in the political disturbances under John of Braganza, and became famous as a kind of walking encyclopædia, travelling from place to place, and holding disputations everywhere and about every thing. He wrote several works to show the perfect harmony between the doctrines of Augustine and those of the Church of Rome; several others, to show the perfect harmony between Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus, etc. A complete list of the works of the two brothers Macedo is found in N. ANTONIO: Bibliotheca Hispana Nova, i.

MACEDONIA, the kingdom of Philip and Alexander the Great, comprised the middle part of the Balkan peninsula, — from Thessaly and Epirus to Illyria and Mæsia; from Thrace and the Ægean to the Adriatic. It was conquered by the Romans in 168 B.C., and divided into four provinces; but after the conquest of Greece, in 142 B.C., Macedonia appears as one single province besides Achaia. It is spoken of in the Apocrypha of the Old Testament (Esth. xiv. 14, xvi. 10; 1 Macc. i. 1, vi. 2, viii. 5; 2 Macc. viii. 20). But it has acquired a much greater interest by being the first part of Europe which received Christianity. Paul visited the country, probably three times (Acts xvi. 10–xvii. 15, xx. 1–6; 1 Tim. i. 3), and founded the churches of Thessalonica and Philippi. Other cities of Macedonia mentioned in the New Testament are Neapolis, Amphipolis, Apollonia, and Berea.

MACEDONIUS. When Bishop Alexander of Constantinople died, in 336, two candidates for his chair presented themselves, — Macedonius, an elderly man, and the young Paulus. The Athanasian party succeeded in carrying the election in favor of Paulus; but Eusebius of Nicomedia, and Theodore of Heraclea, induced the emperor to banish him. After the death of Constantine, however, he returned; but he was unable to maintain himself. Deposed by the synod of Constantinople in 338 or 339, he was banished to Mesopotamia by Constantius; and Eusebius was himself made bishop of the metropolis. After his death, the rivalry between Macedonius and Paulus began anew; and Macedonius was consecrated bishop by the anti-Nicæan party. The emperor sent his general, Hermogenes, to drive Paulus out of the city; but Hermogenes was killed by a fanatical mob. The emperor then came in person. Paulus was expelled, the refractory city was punished, and Macedonius was finally installed by force. Some years later on, however, Macedonius was once more compelled to retire before his rival on account of the general re-action which took place in favor of Athanasius; but shortly after the death of Constantius, in 350, he returned, and succeeded in maintaining himself for about ten years. His position was difficult, however. The semi-Arians, whose leader he was, had gradually approached the Athanasians, and seemed willing to accept the Nicæan definition of the divinity of Christ, when exactly the same question arose with respect to the divinity of the Holy Spirit, separating the semi-Arians once more from the Nicæans, and drawing them nearer towards the Arians. At a synod of Constantinople, in 360, his enemies actually succeeded in having him deposed, and he seems to have died shortly after. But his adherents in Constantinople and the adjacent dioceses were for a long time known under his name, as the "Macedonians," and offered a stubborn opposition to the orthodox definition of the deity of the Holy Spirit. W. MÖLLER.

MACHÆRUS (a strong fortress in Peræa, nine miles east of the northern end of the Dead Sea) was built by Alexander, the son of Hyrcanus I., and dismantled by Gabinius. It is not mentioned in the Bible; but Josephus (Ant., XVIII. 5, 2) points it out as the place in which the beheading of John the Baptist took place.

MacHALE, John, D.D., Roman-Catholic Irish prelate; b. early in the spring of 1789 (or March 15, 1791, according to the college register) at Tubern-na-Fian, Mayo, Ireland; d. at Tuam, Monday, Nov. 7, 1881. He was graduated with high honors at St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, 1814; ordained priest, and appointed lecturer on theology to his alma mater, the same year; and, on the death of the professor in that department, was unanimously elected his successor (1820). In 1825 he was appointed coadjutor bishop of Killala, and was consecrated with the title of Bishop of Maronia in partibus. In 1829 he laid the foundation of the Killala Cathedral. In May, 1834, by the death of the bishop, he became (titular) bishop of Killala; but in July of that year he was elected archbishop of Tuam, and metropolitan. He was present in Rome at the proclamation of the dogma of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary (Dec. 8, 1851), and also, in 1869-70, in attendance upon the Vatican Council. He was not in favor of the dogma of infallibility, but submitted as soon as it was defined. His long life was a very busy one. He was a devoted Roman Catholic, and Irish patriot. He battled for Catholic Emancipation (see art.) and the Repeal, side by side with O'Connell, and for the establishment of separate schools for Roman Catholics, maintaining that the schools of the National Board were really undermining the Roman-Catholic Church in Ireland. He was also a foe to the Queen's colleges in that country, and made a journey to Rome (1848) to insure the papal confirmation of their condemnation by the propaganda (October, 1847). Dr. MacHale was a scholarly man, and also wrote for publication. He translated twelve books of Homer's Iliad (1810-75), of which he published eight (Dublin, 1861). He made an Irish-Gallic translation of about sixty of Moore's Melodies in the original metres; published a Catechism of the Christian Doctrine in English and Irish, Evidences and Doctrines of the Catholic Church (1827, which passed through two editions), a Book of Prayers, revised (1863) an Irish version of the Pentateuch made two hundred years ago, besides polemical and political pamphlets and letters. See U. J. BOURKE: Life and Times of the Most Rev. John MacHale, New York, 1882.

MACHPE'LAH (double cave) is the name of the cave (situated in the field of Hebron) which Abraham bought of Ephron the Hittite, for a family sepulchre. According to Gen. xxiii. 19, xxv. 9, xlix. 29-32, 1. 12, 13, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah, lie buried there. The cave is surrounded with a wall, a hundred and ninety-four feet long and fifty-eight feet high, constructed of huge stones, and reminding one, both in design and workmanship, of the foundation of the temple in Jerusalem. Within this enclosure (which by most archaeologists is considered to be of Hebrew origin, and to date back to the time of Solomon) is a Mohammedan mosque; and strangers, that is, non-Mohammedans, are rigidly excluded from the building. In 1862 the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Dean Stanley, visited Hebron; and, on special orders from Constantinople, the mosque was opened to them. An account of the visit is found in STANLEY: Jewish Church (first series, Appendix ii.). See also SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, New York, 1878, pp. 212 sqq. (with a plan of the mosque).

MACKENZIE, Charles Frederiok, a devoted foreign missionary of the Anglican Church; b. in Portmore, Peeblesshire, April 10, 1825; d. Jan. 31, 1862, of fever, in Africa, on an island at the confluence of the Shiré and Ruo Rivers. He graduated with distinction at Cambridge, and was made fellow of Caius College. Fired with missionary zeal, he went out in 1855, with Bishop Colenso, to Natal, as archdeacon of Pieter-Maritzburg. In 1859 he returned to England, to arouse an interest in African missions. He was subsequently sent out, under the Universities' Mission, to Africa, and was consecrated its first bishop Jan. 1, 1861, his diocese covering territory bordering on Lake Nyanza. Bishop Mackenzie's death was premature; but his life was sufficiently long to enable him to develop a missionary enthusiasm and devotion which place him in the front rank of the foreign missionaries of the Anglican Church. See DEAN GOODWIN: Memoir of Bishop Mackenzie, Cambridge, 1864.

MACKNIGHT, James, D.D., Scotch divine; b. at Irvine, Argyleshire, Sept. 17, 1721; d. at Edinburgh, Jan. 13, 1800. He was educated at Glasgow and Leyden; pastor at Maybole, Ayrshire, 1753-69; at Jedburgh, 1769-72; at Edinburgh, 1772, until his death. He prepared A Harmony of the Gospels, in which the natural order of each is preserved, with a Paraphrase and Notes, London, 1756, 2 vols, 7th ed., 1822, Latin trans. by A. F. Ruckersfelder, Bremen, 1772-79, 3 vols. (the notes are so copious, that the work amounts to a complete Life of Christ: it has long been a standard); The Truth of Gospel History, 1763 (a work upon the external and internal evidences of the Gospels); A New Literal Translation, from the Original Greek, of all the Apostolical Epistles, with a Commentary and Notes, 1795, 4 vols., several subsequent editions in varying number of volumes (the work has been very severely condemned for heretical teaching and defective scholarship, and, on the other hand, as highly praised for learning and ability). See his Life, by his son, prefaced to editions of the Epistles since 1806.

MACLAURIN, John, Scotch divine; b. at Glendarnel, Argyleshire, October, 1693; d. at Glasgow, Sept. 8, 1751. He was educated at Glasgow and Leyden, licensed 1717, and pastor in Glasgow 1723. His Works were edited by W. H. Gould, Edinburgh, 1860, 2 vols. The most admired of his publications are An Essay on the Prophecies relating to the Messiah, with an Inquiry into Happi- ness, and Three Sermons (1773), and a sermon upon Glorying in the Cross of Christ.

MACLEOD, Norman, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Church of Scotland, but even more widely known as the original editor of Good Words, and as the author of various standard works in popular literature; was b. at Campbelton, Argyllshire, June 3, 1812; and d. in Glasgow, June 16, 1872. In his own Reminiscences of a Highland Parish will be found an animated account of the old Highland family—especially as represented by his grandfather, the patriarchal minister of Morven—from which he was proud to be descended, as well as graphic descriptions of the wild scenery, and free, out-of-door life, in the midst of which some of the happiest days of a happy boyhood were spent. It was, however, chiefly with the seaport town of Campbelton and its seafaring associations, that the boy was familiar. On his singularly impressible and sympathetic nature all the circumstances of those early years appear to have exercised a lasting influence. Among the circumstances in question, his biographer attaches prominent importance to the character of his father and mother; the former, Dr. Norman Macleod (minister successively of Campbelton, Campsie, and St. Columba, Glasgow), being “in many ways the prototype of Norman.” Young Macleod never made any pretensions to scholarship; and at the University of Glasgow, which, after an irregular classical training, he entered in 1827, he shone more in the students’ social and political meetings than in the classrooms. Of general literature, however, he appears to have read much in those days; his favorite author in poetry being Wordsworth. In 1831 he removed to the University of Edinburgh, that he might take his theological course under the celebrated Dr. Thomas Chalmers, then professor of divinity in that university. Before receiving license, he spent three years in the family of a Yorkshire gentleman, Mr. Preston of Moreby, as tutor to his son; during most of the time residing at Weimar, or elsewhere on the continent of Europe. This first of many visits abroad seems to have had an important influence on the development of the character of the young man. “His views were widened, his opinions matured, his human sympathies vastly enriched; and, while all that was of the essence of his early faith had become doubly precious, he had gained increased catholicity of sentiment, and a knowledge of the world” (Memoir, vol. i. p. 49). His first charge was London, in Ayrshire, a parish partly agricultural, but with a considerable weaving population. There he seems to have given himself up, with all the ardor of his nature and the enthusiasm of youth, to his parochial duties, especially among the working-classes of the population. It was, however, in the large and important parish of the Barony, Glasgow, embracing at that time eighty-seven thousand souls, to which (after thirteen years passed in Loudon, and in his second charge, Dalkeith) he was called in the year 1851, that though multiplied public engagements, as he often complained, prevented him from overtaking greatly extended parochial duties, as fully as he would himself have desired, he showed in a pre-eminent degree his remarkable gifts as a parish minister; above all, his powers of organization, his large-hearted sympathy with all classes of his parishioners, and his eloquence as a preacher. One of his special aims at the Barony was to reclaim the non-churchgoing population; for which purpose, he, amongst other schemes, introduced, with some success, Sunday services open exclusively to working-people in their working-clothes. Dr. Macleod’s enormous parish duties did not prevent a man of so much energy, and of such varied powers, from engaging in literary work. It was in 1860 that he undertook the editorship of one of the ablest and most successful of the religious magazines of the day,—Good Words. About the same time, some of the more popular of his contributions to general literature were written; the greater number of them, indeed, originally appearing in Good Words. These works include The Earnest Student, The Old Lieutenant and His Son, The Gold Thread, Character Sketches, The Starling, Eastward, and Peeps at the Far East. One of the most exquisite pieces of religious fiction in the language is his Wee Davie, which belongs to this period. During the last ten or fifteen years of his life, Dr. Macleod took an active part in the general work of the church, including labors connected with some of the chief posts of honor to which Scottish churchmen are eligible. In 1845 he was one of a deputation to visit the Scottish churches in Canada. From 1864 to 1872 (the year of his death) he undertook the arduous duties of the chairmanship of the foreign missions committee of the church; in this capacity paying also a visit to India as a deputy from the church,—an occasion, it may be added, on which he was received, both by Anglo-Indians and by the natives of India, with the utmost enthusiasm. He also, for many years, held the High Court appointments of Dean of the Thistle, Dean of the Chapel Royal, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen for Scotland. Nor were these empty honors; for personally he enjoyed in an eminent degree the favor and confidence of his sovereign. In the year 1869 he was raised by a unanimous vote to the presidency, or moderatorship as it is called, of the General Assembly, the Supreme Court of the Church of Scotland.

WILLIAM LEE.

MACNEILE, Hugh, D.D., b. at Ballycastle near Belfast, county Antrim, Ireland, 1795; d. at Bournemouth, Eng., Jan. 28, 1879. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; studied law, but afterwards took orders in 1820; and from 1834 to 1868 was rector in Liverpool, where he acquired great popularity. In 1868 he was, on the recommendation of Mr. Disraeli, appointed Dean of Ripon; but in October, 1875, he resigned, on account of failing health. He was an eloquent man, noted for his vehement attacks upon the Roman-Catholic Church. His publications were mostly Sermons and Lectures, which passed through several editions, and controversial tracts upon Romanism, Unitarianism, Tractarianism, etc.

MÁCON, a city of Burgundy, in which three councils were held (Concilia Mabisconensia). One, in 581 (twenty-one bishops being present), issued nineteen canons, of which the seventh threatens with excommunication any civil judge who should dare to proceed against a clerk, except in criminal cases. Another, in 585 (forty-three bishops being present in person, and twenty represented by deputies), issued twenty canons, of which the eighth forbade any one who had sought refuge in the sanctuary to be touched without the consent of the priest; while the ninth and tenth forbade the civil power to proceed against a bishop, except through his metropolitan, or against a priest or deacon, except through his bishop. The third was held in 621. See MANSI: Conc. Coll., ix.

MADAGASCAR (an island off the eastern coast of Africa, eighteen hundred miles from the Cape of Good Hope) has been a distinguished scene of the success of modern missions among the heathen, and the steadfast perseverance of native Christians under violent and prolonged persecutions. The island is nine hundred miles long, and four hundred miles wide at its widest point. It was discovered, and made known to Europe, by Marco Polo, in the latter part of the thirteenth century. The natives, or Magalasy, seem to be Malaysians, with an admixture of negro blood. They are a well-built race. The native religion consisted of the worship of a supreme God (whom they called "The Fragrant Prince"), idolatry, sacrifices, sorcery, and divination. Infanticide was practised till the arrival of the missionaries, and polygamy and slavery prevailed. Thousands of the population were shipped away by slave-dealers. The present population is estimated at two millions and a half.

Christian missions were established in Madagascar, in 1818, by the arrival of Messrs. Jones and Bevan, under appointment of the London Missionary Society. Mr. Bevan died soon after his arrival. In 1816 the first embassy of friendship had arrived on the island from England. Radama, who was king at the time of the missionaries' arrival, was an enlightened prince, and seconded their efforts in establishing schools. They invented an alphabet for the native language, and reduced it to writing. The London Society sent out two printing-presses; and a version of the New Testament was prepared, textbooks for the schools, a translation of the Pilgrim's Progress, and other books. The death of the king, in 1828, checked the progress of missionary extension. One of his wives was crowned in 1829, and with her coronation the sky changed for the Christian population. Hostile to Christian institutions, she gave notice to the missionaries to quit the land; and the last two left in 1836. From that time on, till 1857, violent persecutions were conducted against the Christians, who, with heroic faith and constancy, suffered death and all manner of violence, rather than deny Christ. The annals of these sufferings, and the perseverance of the Christians, form a most thrilling chapter in the history of modern missions. Many of the Christians were sold into slavery; others were stoned to death; others speared while kneeling in prayer; others — bound hand and foot, or chained together — thrown over a steep precipice looking out upon the sea upon the rocks; and still others imprisoned, or shackled with iron fetters, and condemned to wear an iron chain on their necks. One of these chains which Mr. Ellis carried back with him to England weighed fifty-six pounds, and had been carried by the unhappy sufferer for four years. Rasalama, the first of these martyrs, suffered Aug. 14, 1837. In the last persecution, in 1857, two hundred were executed. In spite of these persecutions, the number of the Christians increased; and nowhere, since the first three centuries, has the truth of Tertullian's words been more signally verified, that blood is the seed of the church.

Radama II., the queen's successor, favored Christianity; and again the missionaries entered the country; and the Rev. Mr. Ellis again in 1861 visited it as the agent of the London Missionary Society. The sufferings of the Christians were now recognized, and their constancy commemorated in a number of martyrs' memorial churches. In 1866 there were 75 churches on the island, with 95 native and foreign pastors, and 4,374 communicants. The London Society in 1882 had 71,585 communicants connected with its missions. In 1867 the Friends established a mission, with which, in 1881, 3,250 members and 26,000 Christians were connected. The Norwegian Missionary Society (Norske Missions Selskap zu Stavanger) also prosecutes missionary work on the island, and in 1880 had 1,200 communicants. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel entered Madagascar in 1874, and has one bishop, Dr. Kestell-Cornish. Under the reigns of Radama's successors, the missionaries have not only been recognized, but the work of extending the church has engaged the active sympathies of the government. The prime minister, on July 11, 1878, and on other occasions, has presided at meetings held in the Martyrs' Memorial Church in Antananarivo, the capital, for the despatch of missionaries to the unevangelized portions of the island. A royal decree emancipating all slaves was issued June 20, 1877.

MAFFEI, Francesco Scipione, b. at Verona, June 1, 1675; d. there Feb. 11, 1755. He was educated in the Jesuit college of Parma, devoted himself to literature, became a member of the Arcadian Society in Rome, made several campaigns in the Spanish war of succession, and settled finally in his native city, where he founded a literary society. He wrote against the Jansenists, Jansenismo nuovo dimostrato (Venice, 1752), and Storia teologica, etc. (Trent, 1742). His De teatri antiche e moderni (Verona, 1753) is a defence of the theatre as a moral institution. His collected works appeared in Venice, 1790, in 18 vols.

MAFFEI, Giovanni Pietro, b. at Bergamo, 1535; d. at Tivoli, 1605. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1565, lived most of his time in Genoa, and wrote, De vita et moribus S. Ignatii Loyolæ, Venice, 1585; Historiarum indicarum Libri XVI., Florence, 1588; a History of Gregory XIII., not published until 1743, by Carlo Coquelines, Rome, 2 vols. All his Latin works appeared at Verona, 1747, 2 vols. quarto.

MAFFEI, Vegio, b. at Lodi, 1406; d. in Rome, 1458. He devoted himself entirely to literature; and his Tractatus de educatione (published in Paris, 1511, and afterwards often) was considered in its time the most important work on the subject.

MACARITA, MARGARITES, a name given by some writers of the middle ages to apostates from the Christian religion, particularly those who went over to Mohammedanism. The derivation of the term is unknown.

MAC'DALA (tower), from which Mary Magdalene came, was probably the Migdal-el of Josh. xix. 38, to-day called el-Mejdel, on the west shore of the Lake of Galilee, at the south-east corner of the plain of Genessaret. The word "Magdala" occurs only once in the textus receptus of the New Testament (Matt. xv. 39); but there Westcott and Hort read "Magadan."

MACDALEN, Order of. During the last centuries of the middle ages there arose in various places, and, as it would seem, without any connection with each other, associations of women under the patronage of St. Mary Magdalene, and for the purpose of converting prostitutes. The oldest of these associations seem to have originated in Germany, more especially at Worms and Metz, though it is no doubt an exaggeration when the latter claims to date back to the year 1005. It is certain, however, that, in the middle of the thirteenth century, the Popes Gregory IX. and Innocent IV. issued bulls confirming such female associations in Germany, and conferring various privileges on them. Similar institutions were founded at Marseilles, 1272; at Naples, 1324, by Queen Sancia of Aragon; in Prague, 1372, by Johann Milicz; in Paris, 1492, by Bishop Jean Sigismond V.; in Rome, 1520, by Leo X.; in Seville, 1530; in Rouen and Bordeaux, 1618, etc. Though the rules of these associations of penitents were rather severe, the discipline, nevertheless, soon degenerated; and in 1637 the associations at Marseilles and Bordeaux, as well as other houses of Madalonnettes, were re-organized by St. Vincent de Paula. The associations were divided into three classes: (1) The order of St. Mary Magdalene, the members of which made a solemn vow, and lived according to very severe rules; (2) The order of St. Martha, the members of which made no vows, but were allowed to return to the world, and marry; and (3) The order of St. Lazarus, the members of which were detained by force, in order to be redeemed from vice. MAQEE, William D.D., b. in County Fermagh, Ireland, March 18, 1766; d. in Dublin, Aug. 18, 1831. He was graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, 1785, with the highest honors, elected fellow 1788, entered holy orders 1790, left the university 1812 for the regular ministry, and in 1814 was appointed dean of Cork, in 1819 bishop of Raphoe, and in 1822 archbishop of Dublin. His most famous work is Discourses and Dissertations on the Scriptural Doctrines of Atonement and Sacrifice, expanded from two sermons delivered on these themes in 1798 and 1799. The volume was first issued 1801; the eighth edition appeared 1856, and it still is a standard. Archbishop Magee was a determined foe to Romanism and Unitarianism. See his Works with Memoir, London, 1842, 2 vols.

MA'GI. The Greeks designated the Persian priests simply as magi, and the Persian state religion, the doctrinal system of Zoroaster, simply as magianism, or even as magic. From the Greek this designation was generally adopted, though it is not quite correct. Magianism was a foreign element in the Zend religion. Originally, in its home in Bactria, on the north-western confines of India, the Zend religion knew nothing about magism. The word "magi" does not occur in the Zend Avesta,—the only authentic representation of the Zend religion. The priests are there always called Atharva, that is, those provided with fire, or providing for the fire; and the institution of the Atharva priesthood is dated back to the time before Zoroaster, to the time when the law was not yet written, and the popular religion was a mere nature-worship. Magianism came to the Persians from the Medes.

It must be noticed, that, during the first kings of the house of the Achaemenides, the Greeks often make a sharp distinction between Magians and Persians, identifying the former with the Medes. Thus the reign of Pseudo-Smerdis is represented as an attempt of the Magians to substitute Median for Persian rule (Herodotus, III. 30, 62); and Herodotus expressly calls the Magians a Median tribe (1, 101; 107; 120; 128; 7, 19; 37), describing them as experts in astrology and oneiromancy. To this must be added that the Persians instituted a festival, the Magiophonia, in commemoration of the defeat and massacre of the magi,—a circumstance which could not possibly have occurred if magism had been an original Persian institution. It was, however, not an original Median institution either. In their home, the Medes adhered to the pure Zend religion of Zoroaster. Berosus even calls Zoroaster king of the Medes. The magi they adopted from Babylonia.

Still earlier than among the Persians and Medes, the magi are found among the Chaldeans. They appear there as contemporaries of the Hebrew prophets, who describe them as the wise men and scholars of the Chaldeans, though with a smack of the soothsayer, the conjurer, the sorcerer, etc. (Isa. xlv. 25; Jer. l. 35; Dan. ii. 2, iv. 7). They were, indeed, so intimately connected with the Chaldeans that the names became interchangeable; a Chaldean meaning a magian or magician, just as a Canaanite meant a merchant. The name is, nevertheless, not of Chaldean origin. There is no Shemitic root from which it could be derived. Nor does it seem to be of Arian origin, though there are Sanscrit roots from which it might be derived without violence. Most probably, the name descended, together with the whole institution, to the Chaldeans, from that Turanian people, the Accadians, whom we know as the first settlers in the Valley of the Euphrates. Originally an Accadian institution, magianism was successively introduced among the Chaldeans, Medes, and Persians, and was finally completely incorporated with the Zend religion.

According to Xenophon (Cyrop., VIII. 1, 9, 23), it was Cyrus who first established magianism in Persia; and from that time the Persian priests were called magi, both in the cuneiform inscriptions and by the Greeks. As above mentioned, magianism met with some resistance in Persia during the first kings of the house of the Achæmenides; but gradually its spirit pervaded the whole religious life of the Persian people, and threw even the most prominent doctrines of the Zend religion into the shade. The influence which the Greeks exercised on the Persians after the death of Alexander was by no means unfavorable to the further development of magianism. The Greek felt a natural aversion to the somewhat vain and completely shapeless abstractions of the old religion of light, and a natural affinity for the half-mystical, half-scientific artifices of magianism. While in the Parthian Empire magianism reached its acme of power, — the king belonging to the order, and the senate being composed exclusively of magi, — it reached, at the same time, its greatest extension in the Greek-speaking world. The name "magian" there gradually became synonymous with sorcerer, sometimes in a milder and more dignified sense (as, for instance, in Matt. ii. 1-12, where the wise men from the East are represented as possessed of some prophetic insight derived from astrology, and enabling them to arrive in due time to do homage to the new-born Christ, just as they had done in former time to the new-born Plato), but generally in a more odious sense, as, for instance, in Acts viii. 9, where Simon Magus is spoken of, and xiii. 6, where "magian" is explained by "false prophet."

MAGIC, as a means by which to obtain control of such natural or mystical powers as are ordinarily beyond the reach of man, was, from an early date, connected with the idea of evil spirits. Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans agreed in ascribing it to the demons and the Devil. But besides this diabolical magic, or "black art," there arose, principally stimulated by the new departure of natural science, a so-called "white," or "lower" magic, which operated by the aid of the good spirit, or simply by cunning physical tricks. The latter kind of magic was widely propagated by J. B. Porta's Magia naturalis (Naples, 1558), which was translated into many European languages. But unfortunately, just at the same time, and supported both by the Roman Inquisition and the Protestant orthodoxy, the "black art" threw itself into prominence under the form of witchcraft. During the reign of rationalism in the latter part of the eighteenth century, both the black and the white magic were, so far as they depended on spirits, set aside as idle nonsense; and those forms of magic which have afterwards arisen — such as Mesmerism, Spiritualism, Hypnotism, etc. — have no theological interest: they belong to psychology and natural science.

MAGISTER SACRI PALATII. The first incumbent of this at one time very influential office at the papal court, was St. Dominic. He and the first members of his order were, by Honorius III., installed in the papal palace; and, noticing the idle and frivolous life led by the servants of the cardinals and the humbler members of the papal household, he advised the Pope to appoint some one to instruct those people in Christian doctrine and life. He was himself appointed, and in course of time the office grew in importance. Many duties and many privileges were heaped upon the Master of the Sacred Palace. He was a member of the Inquisition and the Congregation on the Index. He exercised supreme supervision over the service in the chapel of the Pope, and the censorship over all books printed in or imported to Rome, and, later on, the Papal States. Several persons of reputation have held the office, such as Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas. But, with the heavy changes which have come over the whole papal institution, the office has shrunk into insignificance. See ECHARD: Scriptores Ora. Prædicat., ii.; ZACCARIA: Corte di Roma, ii. MAGNIFICAT, the opening word, and the general liturgical designation, of the hymn of Mary, — Magnificat anima mea Dominum, "my soul magnifies the Lord" (Luke i. 46), — which, like the hymn of Zachariah, of Simeon, etc., belongs to the so-called psalmi majores, and dates back to a very early time. It was generally introduced in the Western Church by Cæsarius of Arles; and at the time of Gregory the Great it was sung every day in Rome at vesper. It has been translated into most modern languages, and retained by the Reformed churches.

MAGNUS is the name of several saints, of whom especially two have attracted the attention of church historians; namely, one from St. Gall, in the seventh century, and another from Füssen-on-the-Lech, in the eighth century. The lives of these two saints have been so blunderingly and fraudulently mixed up with each other and with other extraneous matter, that several church historians, such as Rettberg (ii. p. 146) and Wattenbach (Deutsche Geschichtsquellen, i. p. 231), have completely rejected the legends.

MAHAN, Milo, D.D., b. at Suffolk, Nansemond County, Va., May 24, 1819; d. in Baltimore, Sept. 3, 1870. He was educated at St. Paul's College, Flushing, L.I.; entered the Episcopal ministry, 1815; from 1851 to 1861 was professor of ecclesiastical history in the General Seminary of his denomination, New-York City. From the latter year till his death he was rector of St. Paul's Church. Besides minor works, he published a Church History of the First Seven Centuries, New York, 1860; new edition, 1872. His Collected Works were edited, with Memoir, by Rev. J. H. HORKINS, Jun., New York, 1872-73, 3 volumes.

MAHANA'IM (two camps), a town named by Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2), allotted to the Levites (Josh. xiii. 26, 30, xxi. 38; 1 Chron. vi. 80), and situated in the territory of Gad, near the River Jabbok. It was the residence of Ishbosheth (2 Sam. ii. 8, 12), and the refuge of David on his flight before Absalom (xvii. 24, 27; 1 Kings ii. 8). The place has not yet been identified with certainty.

MAI, Angelo, b. at Schilpario, in the province of Bergamo, March 7, 1782; d. at Albano, Sept. 9, 1851. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1799; studied at Naples and Rome, and was in 1813 appointed custos at the Ambrosian Library in Milan. Possessed of competent philological learning, extraordinary critical acumen, and great skill in paleography, more especially as a reader of palimpsests, he published, from manuscripts discovered in the library, a speech by Isokrates, some fragments of a Gothic translation of the Epistles of Paul, several works of Philo Judæus, a book of Porphyrius, the Antiquities of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, some letters of Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius, etc. The celebrity he attained by these publications led to his appointment as librarian at the Vatican, in which position he developed a still greater activity. In 1838 he was made a cardinal. The various works he edited were collected in the four following series: Scriptorum veterum nova collectio, Rome, 1825-38, 10 vols.; Classici auctores, Rome, 1828-38, 10 vols.; Spicilegium Romanum, 1839-44, 8 vols.; Nova patrum bibliotheca, 1844-71, 8 vols.; and an Appendix, Rome, 1879. KLÜPFEL.

MAILLARD, Olivier, d. at Toulouse, June 13, 1502; belonged to the order of the Cordeliers; was professor of theology at the Sorbonne, court-preacher to Louis XI., confessor to Charles VIII., and enjoyed a great fame as a preacher. His sermons, both in French (Sermons, Lyons, 1498) and in Latin (Sermones dominicales, 1500; Sermones de sanctis, 1518, etc.), are a curious mixture of scurrility and sublimity. He also wrote La confession générale du frère Olivier Maillard, Lyons, 1526.

MAIMBOURG, Louis, b. at Nancy in 1610; d. in Paris, Aug. 13, 1686. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1626, and was for some years professor of rhetoric at Rouen; but, as he took the side of the king against the Pope in a rather pronounced manner, he was compelled to leave the order, and retired to the abbey of St. Victor in Paris. In his time he enjoyed a great reputation as a church historian; but he wrote his books chiefly for the purpose of harassing his enemies, or flattering his friends, and nobody reads them any more. In his Histoire de l'Arianisme he teases the Jansenists; in his Histoire des Iconoclastes he coaxes Louis XIV.; in his Histoire du Schisme des Grecs he tries to reconcile Innocent XII.; and so on. His Histoire du Calvinisme and Histoire du Luthéranisme were severely castigated by Bayle, Jariou, and Seckendorf.

C. PFENDEL.

MAIMONIDES (i.e., son of Maimon), Moses, called by the Arabians Abu Amran Musa ibn Abdallah ibn Maimon Alkortobi, was b. at Cordova, March 30, 1135. When the Almohades took Cordova, in 1148, his father, on account of the then existing religious fanaticism, fled to Fez with his family. In 1165 he went to Fostat (ancient Cairo) in Egypt, where he d. in 1166. In spite of the unsettled affairs of his family, Moses had acquired a great knowledge in Talmudic lore. He had also studied natural sciences, medicine, and more especially philosophy, under Mohammedan teachers. In 1177 he was made rabbi at Cairo, and finally spiritual head (reus, or najid) over the Jewish communities in Egypt. His great learning not only attracted very many young men, who came to attend his lectures, but also soon acquired for him an authority in matters of religion.

When only twenty-three years of age (1158), he composed for a friend a treatise on the Jewish calendar (Cheshbon ha-ibbur). Two years later he composed his Iggeret ho-shemad [i.e., "A Letter on Religious Persecution," also entitled Maamar kid-dush ha-shem, i.e., a "Treatise on Glorifying God;" viz., by suffering martyrdom], a most ingenious plea for those who have not the courage to lay down life for their religion, and who, having outwardly renounced their faith, continue secretly to practise it; which was provoked by the attack of a zealous co-religionist against Moses' public profession of Mohammedanism and private devotion to Judaism. In a second letter (iggeret ha-teman) he instructs his co-religionists, who outwardly professed Mohammedanism, to bear in mind that the enmity of the Gentiles was predicted long ago by the prophet Daniel, but also the final victory of Judaism over the other religions. He also shows the folly of pointing out the Messianic time, since the Messianic expectations had always brought misery over the house of Jacob. But according to a family tradition, prophecy, as a forerunner of the Messiah, will commence in 1216.

The works, however, which have immortalized his name throughout Judaism, are (1) his Commentary on the Mishna, — a work which he commenced in 1158, at the age of twenty-three, and which he completed in 1168, at Fostat. This remarkable production is preceded by a general elaborate introduction, in which he discourses on the true nature of prophecy, interspersed with sentences from natural sciences and philosophy. In the special introduction to the treatise Saphe-drin, he for the first time defined and formally laid down the Jewish creed: (1) That there is one God, a perfect being, creator and preserver of all things; (2) That he is the sole cause of all existing things, and consequently one, and that such a unity as is in him can be found in none other; (3) He is not corporeal; (4) He is eternal; (5) That he alone is to be worshipped without any mediator; (6) That God had appointed prophets; (7) That Moses was the greatest prophet, to whom revelation was delivered in a most complete manner; (8) That the law and tradition were from God; (9) That both can never be changed; (10) That God is omniscient, always beholding the acts of men; (11) That he rewards and punishes the acts of men; (12) That Messiah shall come out of the house of David; and (13) That the dead shall rise again. [This creed, which is found in the Jewish ritual, is repeated every morning by the orthodox Jew.]

His second great work was (11) his Mishne-Thora, a gigantic work, also called Yad Hachezaka [i.e., "The Mighty Hand"], which he completed in 1180, and divided into fourteen books, subdivided again into eighty-two treatises, of which the work, written in very clear and easy Hebrew, consists; thus forming a cyclopaedia comprising every department of biblical and Jewish literature. As an appendix to the Mishne-Thora, he wrote Kitab Aschariah, in Hebrew Sefer ha-mizrot, on the six hundred and thirteen precepts. His third and most important work was (12) Dalulat al-Ha'irim, written in Arabic, and known by its Hebrew title, Moreh Nebuchim [i.e., "The Guide of the Perplexed"]. It consists of three parts. The first part is especially devoted to the explanation of all sensuous expressions which are made use of in the Bible in regard to God. The second part speaks of the Jewish religion, the contents of which are also those of true philosophy. The third part speaks of the first vision of the prophet Ezekiel, with the intention to encourage the more intelligent to a more thorough investigation of the text of the Bible. But while, on the one hand, the Moreh Nebuchim contributed more than any other work to the progress of rational development in Judaism, it, on the other hand, also provoked a long and bitter strife between orthodoxy and science; and Judaism was soon divided into the Maimonidians and anti-Maimonidians. Anathemas and counter-anathemas were issued by both camps. In the midst of the conflict, which was begun by Samuel ben Ali at Bagdad, Maimonides died, in 1201, at the age of seventy. Whilst his adherents eulogized him by the saying, "From Moses to Moses no one has arisen like Moses," his opponents wrote on his tomb, "Here lies Moses, the anathematized heretic."

Maimuni's Mishna-commentary is to be found in all Mishna editions, and translated also into Latin by Surenhusius. The Mishne-Thora was published at Soncino in 1590: a beautiful edition is that of Amsterdam, 1740, 4 vols. folio. [Portions of this work have been translated into English by H. H. Bernard: Main Principles of the Creed and Ethics of the Jews, exhibited in Selections from the Yad-Hachezaka of Maimonides, Cambridge, 1832.] The More Nebuchim was translated into Hebrew by Samuel ibn Tibbon, about 1180, published in Venice 1551 and often; it was translated into Latin [by Justinian, Bishop of Nebio], Paris, 1520, and by John Buxtorf, Basle, 1629. The first part was translated into German by R. Fürstenthal, Krotoschin, 1838; the second, by Stern [Vienna, 1861]; and the third, by Scheyer, Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1838. [Part iii., 26-49, has been translated into English by Townley: The Reasons of the Laws of Moses, London, 1827.] In Arabic and French the work was published by Munk, Le guide des égarés, Paris, 1856-66, 3 vols.

MAISTRE, Count Marie Joseph de, b. at Chambery, in Savoy, April 1, 1754; d. in Paris, Feb. 26, 1821. He was educated by the Jesuits, studied law in Turin, and was a member of the Piedmontese Senate, but was twice compelled by the French armies to flee from the country (in 1792 and in 1798), and accompanied Charles Emmanuel IV. to Sardinia in 1800. From 1803 to 1814 he resided in Paris as representative of the king of Sardinia. In the latter year he removed to St. Petersburg; but, dissatisfied with the expulsion of the Jesuits, he left Russia in 1818, and settled once more in Paris. He was the founder of the so-called "theological school in philosophy," the leader of the Ultramontanist party in the church, and one of the great heroes of the political re-action. The germ of his whole system, which is no more nor less than a revival of the middle ages in their coarsest form, is found in his Considérations sur la Révolution française 1796. The full development followed in Da pape (1819), De l'Eglise Gallicane dans ses rapports avec le souverain pontife (1821), and Les soirées de St. Pétersbourg (1821). Now his works have only historical interest, but their influence on their time was very great. His Correspondance was published by his son, Paris, 1829, 2 vols. See SALETTE-BEUVE: Portraits littéraires, vol. ii.

MAITLAND, Samuel Roffey, D.D., F.R.S., F.S.A., b. in London, 1792; d. at Gloucester, Jan. 19, 1866. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; was called to the bar 1816, but took holy orders 1821, and was appointed perpetual curate at Gloucester 1823. In 1838 he was made, by Archbishop Howley, librarian, and keeper of the manuscripts, in Lambeth Palace; resigned in 1848, on the death of his patron, and settled at Gloucester. He was a voluminous writer and accomplished bibliographer. His earliest works were upon Scripture prophecy (The Prophetic Period in Daniel and St. John, Lond., 1829). But of more permanent value are his historical works: Facts and Documents illustrative of the History, Doc- trine, and Rites of the Ancient Abbigenses and Waldenses, 1832; The Dark Ages, 1844; Essays on Subjects connected with the Reformation in England, 1849. He also prepared an (unpublished, though printed) index to all the books in the Lambeth Library printed prior to 1600.

MAJOR and the MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY. Georg Major, b. at Nuremberg 1502, was appointed rector at Magdeburg 1529, pastor at Eisleben 1535, professor in Wittenberg 1536, pastor at Merseburg 1547, and superintendent at Eisenach 1551, whence he removed to Wittenberg 1556, where he died, Nov. 28, 1574. As one of the subscribers to the Leipzig Interim of December, 1548, he was suspected of having deviated from the straight line of orthodoxy with respect to the doctrine of justification by faith, and was vehemently attacked by Amsdorf in 1551. His first answer (Antwort auf des ehrwürdigen Herrn Amsdorfs Schrift, 1552) was moderate and cautious. But in the course of the controversy extreme views developed, Major declaring good works necessary to salvation, while Amsdorf declared them detrimental to salvation. The Formula Concordia occupies the happy middle between those extremes, defining good works as the necessary consequence of faith, but not as a necessary condition of justification. MAKEMIE, Francis, the founder of the Presbyterian Church in the United States; b. near Rathmelton, Donegal County, Ireland (date unknown); d. in Accomac County, Va., in the summer of 1708. Licensed by the presbytery of Laggan in 1681, he went to Barbadoes in answer to an appeal from Capt. Johnson for a minister. He soon afterwards came to Maryland, and in 1684 organized the first Presbyterian church in the United States, at Snow Hill, on the narrow neck of land between the Chesapeake and the ocean. Makemie itinerated through Virginia and South Carolina. He married a Virginian lady of wealth. On a visit to England (1704) he succeeded in securing two ministers for the work in America, — John Hampton and George Macnish. While in London, he published A plain and loving Persuasion to the inhabitants of Virginia and Maryland for promoting towns and cohabitation. He was a member of the first American presbytery, — that of Philadelphia, — and its moderator in 1706. In 1707, while on a preaching tour, he was apprehended at Newtown, L.I., by Lord Cornbury, and thrown into prison for preaching without a proper license in the State of New York. He was subsequently acquitted, but obliged by the court to pay the expenses of his trial (eighty pounds). Mr. Makemie also published a Catechism (which is lost), and An Answer to George Keith's Libel on the Catechism published by F. Makemie (Boston, 1692), two copies of which are preserved in Boston. See WEBSTER: History of the Presbyterian Church in America, pp. 297-311; SPRAGUE'S Annals, vol. iii.; and GILLET: History of the Presbyterian Church.

MAKRINA, a saintly woman of the fourth Christian century, the sister of Basil the Great and Gregory of Nyssa; belonged to a wealthy and distinguished family in Pontus and Cappadocia, but retired after the death of her father, together with her mother and a number of virgins, to an estate on the Iris in Pontus, where she founded a monastic institution, and spent the rest of her life in the severest ascetic practices. She is commemorated on July 19; her grandmother, the elder Makrina, on Jan. 14. Her life was written by her brother GREGORY: De vita M., in Opp. ii. (MIGNE: Patrolog. Græca, iii.). MAL'ACHI, the prophet who gives his name to the last book of the Minor Prophets and to the last book of the Old Testament. Some (e.g., Hengstenberg) deny that there ever was a prophet of this name, and for the following reasons: (1) The superscription gives no information respecting his antecedents; (2) The oldest Jewish tradition appears to know nothing about him; (3) The form of the name is peculiar. It means "my messenger," in reference to iii. 1. But such a nomenclature is unparalleled, since it is evident that it could not be given by men, but by God alone. Hengstenberg, therefore, considers the name as either ideal, or an official title. In answer it may be said, (1) Among the sixteen prophets whose writings are contained in the Old Testament, the fathers of only eight are known; of three only (Amos, Micah, and Nahum) is the birthplace given; while to only two (Habakkuk and Haggai) is the appellation "prophet" added; and, finally, of two prophets (Malachi and Obadiah) we know nothing more than the names. The first argument is, therefore, extremely weak. (2) In order to put much stress upon the second, we must first determine the time of Malachi's prophecy. This was, as Vittinga (Observ. sacr., tom. ii. l. vi. pp. 331 sq.) has indubitably shown, during the second residence of Nehemiah in Jerusalem, i.e., about the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. The proof is derived from a comparison of Mal. ii. 8 with Neh. xiii. 15, 29; Mal. ii. 10 with Neh. xiii. 23-27; and Mal. iii. 7-12 with Neh. xiii. 10. These comparisons show that the very sins the prophet denounced were those Nehemiah legislated against. See art. NEHEMIAH. It cannot be maintained that Malachi came shortly after Nehemiah, for then his denunciations would be against extirpated sins; nor much time after, for then Malachi would not be included among the later prophets, but at the most among the Hagiographa. The conclusion is therefore to be drawn, that Malachi seconded Nehemiah (as Isaiah did Hezekiah, and Jeremiah Josiah), and began his prophetic activity when Nehemiah returned the second time. But the determination of the time answers the objection that Malachi is not mentioned in the early Jewish tradition, for the only document of that period is Neh. xiii.; and that is so short and supplementary in its character, that no mention would be expected. In the absence of authentic information, fancy had full play. The name was first seized upon; and the "messenger of God" became an angel. So the LXX. and many of the Fathers understand it: Jerome, however, dissents. Again: since the historical Malachi was personally unknown, while the word comes prominently out in iii. 1, others have considered it symbolical, and supposed that under this name another prophet was concealed; and naturally the claims of Ezra were urged. So first the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel, then in the Talmud; and so many rabbins and Christian theologians. But, since prophecy is a piece of history, there is no prophecy the name of whose author is not put in the forefront, for the real name must be known: therefore, if Ezra really wrote the Book of Malachi, he was in duty bound to sign it with his real name, since a symbolical signature is as good as none. (3) The name מלאכי (Malachi) can be a contraction of מלאכיה (Malachiah), "servant of Jehovah;" the yod being, not a suffix, but yod compaginis. In proof may be quoted the transcription of the LXX., Μαλαχίας, which shows that they considered the name a contraction of מלאכיה.

Upon the contents and form of the book there remains little to say. The prophet takes in at a glance past, present, and future. Starting with the past, he sets plainly before his hearers the love which led Jehovah to choose Jacob, while he rejected Esau. In contrast to this love from long ago, the prophet sets the present conduct of the people. People and priest have sinned, in that they have brought diseased offerings, treacherously reduced the temple revenues, and disgraced the divine name by mixed marriages. For these things comes the judgment, which is to be ushered in by a great, extraordinary messenger, whom Jehovah calls emphatically "my messenger," but who, in turn, is only the forerunner of a still greater one, the angel of the covenant, with whom Jehovah himself will appear, and who, as the counterpart of Moses, will reveal the new law to God's people. The prophet determines yet more closely the time of the coming of the forerunner, when he says that he is the prophet Elijah, who will come to convert young and old. Then comes the Lord to his temple, and the great and terrible day of judgment begins. But the judgment has two sides, — the destruction of the ungodly, and the elimination and purification of the righteous. In what this last prophet says of Elijah, he prophesies of the forerunner of God as revealed to his people, who is more than a prophet, in that his appearance belongs to the breaking of the day of Jehovah (Matt. xi. 9, 10).

It may seem strange that Malachi's minatory sermon is strenuous upon mere externals, — the outward observance of the law. But in reality he cites the cases of disobedience as examples, in order to exhort the people to such conduct as betrays those in the presence of the day of final reckoning. Israel's duty — this is his exhortation — is, up to the final fulfilment of the promise, in general and in particular, to conscientiously obey the law.

The form of the book (in which the sections are i. 2-5; i. 6-ii. 9; ii. 10-16; ii. 17-iii. 24) is dialogistic, — an assertion of the prophet, followed by an excuse of the people, which, in turn, is refuted in a longer or shorter speech (i. 2, 6, 7; ii. 14, 17; iii. 7, 8, 13-16). The influence of the lecture of the rabbinic school upon the prophetic style is unmistakable. The diction of Malachi is of striking purity and choiceness in that late time.

[Tradition says that the name "my angel" was given to Malachi on account of his personal beauty and blameless life. Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Proph.) relates that he was born in Sopha (Saphir?), in the tribe of Zebulun, died young, and was buried with his fathers in his native land.]

MALACHY, St. Though the Normans, after conquering the south-eastern part of Ireland, placed themselves under the authority of the Archbishop of Armagh, and received two bishops from him. — Patricius of Dublin, and Malchus of Waterford, — the plan of Gregory VII., of bringing the whole Irish Church under the authority of the see of Rome, could not be carried out. Bishop Gilbert of Limerick, another Norman city, was appointed papal legate; but his negotiations with the Irish had no effect. It was St. Malachy who finally succeeded in bringing about the annexation. He was born at Armagh in 1093, and belonged to a noble family. While still a youth, he retired from the world, and devoted himself to a life of the severest asceticism under the supervision of Abbot Inar of Armagh. In 1120 he was ordained a priest, and soon after he became the assistant of Archbishop Celsus of Armagh. This position he used, not only to introduce a better administration of justice, and a severer church discipline in the diocese, but also to establish there various Roman institutions, — the canon law, the confession, the confirmation, the canonical hours, the psalmody, etc. In order to make himself better acquainted with the organization of the Church of Rome, he spent some time with Bishop Malchus of Waterford; and after his return he was successively made Abbot of Bangor, Bishop of Connor, and, finally, Archbishop of Armagh (1134). In 1139 he went to Rome in order to procure the pallium for the see of Armagh, and thereby give his reforms their final sanction, and stability for the future. Innocent II. received him most graciously, though he did not grant him the pallium. He demanded that the petition should be made by a national Irish synod, representing the whole Irish Church. He hastened home; but it was not until 1148 that he succeeded in assembling the national synod, and he died before the papal answer to the petition arrived, — the pallium, and the official recognition of the Irish Church as a member of the Church of Rome. On his voyage to and from Rome, he visited Clairveaux, and it became a passionate desire with him to die there. Immediately after the close of the national synod, he consequently set out for Clairveaux; and, a few days after his arrival there, he expired in the arms of St. Bernard. The latter wrote his life, and he became the first Irish saint canonized by a pope. The gift of prophecy which was ascribed to him gave rise, in the sixteenth century, to a curious fraud,—the so-called Prophecies of St. Malachy concerning the Popes. They were first published by the Benedictine, A. Wion, in his Lignum vite (1595), and made a great sensation. They are still believed in by many (see C. D. O'KELLY: Le prophète de Rome, Paris, 1849), though the Jesuit Menestrier has long ago uncovered the whole fraud: Traité sur les prophéties attribuées à S. Malachie, Paris, 1686. MALAKANES, a Russian sect which originated in the middle of the eighteenth century, and derived its name from Malako, "milk," the food they took upon fast days. They had a confession of faith, in which baptism was defined as consisting not only in the use of water, but in a spiritual cleansing of the soul from sin; and the sole priesthood of Christ and parity of believers were maintained. In 1833 they were misled by a certain Tarenti Belioreff, who, pretending to be Elijah, announced "the coming of the millennium within thirty months, the immediate cessation of all business, and the community of goods." He further attempted to mount to heaven; but he fell into the hands of the police, and died in prison. The members of the sect were poor and illiterate. Many, to avoid persecution, emigrated to Georgia, Asia. See Haxthausen (Studien über Russland, Hanover, 1847) and art. Malakanes, in BLUNT'S Dictionary of Sects.

MALAN, César Henri Abraham, b at Geneva, July 7, 1787; d. there May 18, 1864. He studied theology in his native city, and was ordained in 1810; but, having grown up in an atmosphere pregnant with the ideas of Voltaire and Rousseau, his conversion did not take place until 1817. It immediately brought him in conflict with his surroundings. An order from the Venerable Association of Pastors forbade to preach on hereditary sin, predestination, and other debatable doctrines; and, as Malan disobeyed the order, he was forbidden the pulpits of the city, and even discharged as a teacher in the Latin school. Without separating from the Established Church, he gathered his adherents (Les Mômiers) to devotion, first in his own house, afterwards in the small Chapelle du Témoignage, which he built. After 1830, when a part of his congregation left him, and formed an independent congregation, he also made long missionary journeys to other parts of Switzerland, to Germany, France, the Netherlands, and Scotland; and the impression he produced as a revival preacher was often very deep. He was a man of striking appearance and many accomplishments. Among his numerous works, mostly consisting of minor treatises, may be mentioned, Quatrevingt jours d'un missionnaire (Geneva, 1842), Le véritable ami des enfants (1851), and Chants de Sion, a collection of three hundred hymns, often reprinted, and of great charm. His life was written by one of his sons (1868).

MALAY ARCHIPELAGO, or Indian Archipelago, a large group of islands broken off from the south-eastern extremity of the mainland of Asia, and reaching down towards Australia. For the salubrioness of their climate, and fertility of soil, they have been deemed a rich prize since the discoveries of the Spanish and Portuguese navigators. The largest of these islands are Sumatra (1,200 miles in length by 200 in breadth), Java (700 miles in length by 100 in breadth), Borneo (1,000 miles in length by 750 in breadth), Celebes, the Moluccas, and Philippine Islands. The population is composed of mixed races, some of whom are amongst the most degenerate specimens of the human family. Mohammedanism and Buddhism prevail side by side with the native religion, consisting of the worship of mountains and other works of nature, and magical arts. Many of the islands were originally under the dominion of Portugal, but passed, in the seventeenth century, over to the Dutch, who still hold them. The Dutch soon developed a vigorous proselyting activity among the natives. The Handelsmaatschappij, founded in 1602, declared it to be one of its first aims to plant the Reformed faith in the Dutch colonies. But marvellous were the measures pursued. Baptism was finally made, by some of the Dutch governors (as on Ceylon), the condition of holding even the most subordinate office, yea, of the protection of the laws. All were received who could prove that they knew the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments. In Java alone 100,000 were baptized, and in Amboyna, 30,000. Very little fruit remains of this wholesale system. At present the Dutch, the Rhenish Missionary Society, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, support some missions on the islands. It deserves to be remarked, that Holland has not only been guilty of a shameful neglect of its Christian duty towards the natives of these its possessions, but has also, up to a recent date, shown favor to the Mohammedan religion. The Minahassa Mission on Celebes, founded in 1826, has been successful in gathering 80,000 of the natives in 200 congregations. In Java, with its population of 18,000,000, there are only 4,000 Christians; and the island has been under the Dutch crown for more than two centuries and a half. In Borneo the Rhenish Society labors among the Dyaks, and has 500 native Christians under its control. Its efforts were inaugurated by the blood of seven of its missionaries (four men and three women) in 1859. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel supports a mission in the north-western portion of the island, with about 1,600 native and Chinese communicants. On Sumatra the Rhenish Society supports a mission among the Battas, which includes 5,000 native converts, and has fine prospects ahead. The American Board, in 1833, sent Messrs. Munson and Lyman on a tour of inquiry to this island, both of whom were murdered. MALCOM, Howard, D.D., LL.D., b. in Philadelphia, Jan. 19, 1799; d. there March 25, 1879. He was educated at Dickinson College, Penn., and Princeton Seminary; was Baptist pastor in Hudson (N. Y.), Boston, and Philadelphia; was president of Georgetown (Ky.) College, 1840-49, and of Lewisburg (Penn.) University, 1851-57, when he retired to devote himself to literary pursuits. As deputy of the Baptist Missionary Society, he visited Hindostan, Burmah, Siam, China, and stations in Africa. He was one of the founders of the American Tract Society and of the American Sunday School Union. His literary activity and popularity were very great. Besides editions of LAW's Serious Call (abridged), 1830, KEACH'S Travels of True Godliness, 1831, HENRY'S Communicant's Companion, and BUTLER'S Analogy of Religion, 1857, he issued a Dictionary of the Bible, Boston, 1828, new ed., 1853 (more than 130,000 copies of this book have been sold); The Extent and Efficacy of the Atonement, Philadelphia, 1829; The Christian Rule of Marriage, Boston, 1830; Travels in South-eastern Asia, Boston, 1839, 2 vols. MALDONATUS, Joannes, b. at Las Casas in Estremadura, Spain, 1533; d. in Rome, Jan. 5, 1583. He studied at Salamanca, and was in 1556 appointed professor of theology there, but resigned his position in 1562, went to Italy, and entered the Society of Jesus. In 1563 the general of his order sent him to Paris, where a chair of theology was established for him in the college of Clermont. He remained there, with a few interruptions, until 1576, and taught theology with the most extraordinary success. Since the days of Abelard, no professor had made such a sensation: even Protestants came to hear his lectures on exegesis. But this success roused the jealousy of the professors of the Sorbonne; and he was twice accused of holding heretical views, — first with respect to the doctrine of the immaculate conception, then with respect to the doctrine of purgatory. On the first point he proved himself in perfect agreement with the canons of the Council of Trent, and was acquitted by the Archbishop of Paris; on the latter, Pope Gregory XIII. declared his views correct. Nevertheless, in 1576 he was removed to Bourges; and in 1578 he was appointed visitor of his order in the Province of France, in which position he devoted much energy to the development of the university of Pont-à-Mousson, founded in 1573 by Cardinal Guise, and given in charge to the Jesuits. In 1580 he was called to Rome, where he taught in the Collegium Romanum. Of his works, it is especially his Commentarii in quatuor evangelia which deserves attention. It was first published at Pont-à-Mousson in 1596, afterwards often. The best edition is that by Sausen (Mayence, 1810, 5 vols.), of which a condensation was made by K. Martin (Mayence, 1850, 2 vols.). He also wrote Commentaries on the Old Testament, and a number of treatises, of which some were collected, and published by Dubois and Faure: Maldonati opera varia theologica, Paris, 1677, 3 vols. See I. M. PRAT: Maldonat et l'Université de Paris au XVII^e siècle, Paris, 1856.

MANGOLD.

MALEBRANCHE, Nicolas, b. in Paris, Aug 6, 1638; d. there Oct. 13, 1715. He was from birth so very feeble, on account of a deformity of the spine, that he could not frequent a public school, but received instruction at home; and, after studying theology in the Sorbonne, he entered the congregation of the Oratory, and spent the rest of his life in quiet seclusion. For some time he vacillated between the study of church history and that of Oriental languages, until a book by Cartesius, which incidentally fell into his hands, decided the matter; and he determined to devote himself exclusively to the study of philosophy and to philosophical meditation. In the history of philosophy he stands as the most prominent disciple of Cartesius: at some points he even carried farther the ideas of his master. He is the father of the so-called "Occasionalism." He adopted the absolute distinction which Cartesius made between spirit and matter, soul and body. But the relation between these two opposites, which Cartesius left unexplained, or only vaguely explained by postulating a perpetual divine mediation between them, Malebranche made the subject of his deepest meditation; and hence resulted his peculiar doctrine, that events taking place in the one sphere occasioned God to effect corresponding re-adjustments in the other, so that nothing could be truly understood unless "seen in God." The principal representation of his system is found in his first work, De la recherche de la vérité (Paris, 1674); but further developments are found in his Conversations chrétiennes (1677), De la nature et de la grace (1680), Méditations chrétiennes et métaphysiques (1683), Traité de morale (1684), and especially in his Entretiens sur la Métaphysique et sur la Religion (1688). His De la nature et de la grace deprived him of the favor of Bossuet, and implicated him in a long and sometimes very bitter controversy with Arnauld. His doctrines were often said to incline towards Spinozism, but on this point he found a warm defender in Leibnitz. His metaphysics have now only very little interest; but the noble piety of his works still makes impression, and the elegance of the representation still exercises its charm. His works were collected by Genoude and Lourdoux (Paris, 1837, 2 vols. in quarto); but the collection is not complete. See BLAMPIGNON: Étude sur Malebranche, 1862; and OLLÉ-LAPRUNE: Philosophie de Malebranche, 1870, 2 vols.

MALMESBURY, William of. See WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY.

MALVENDA, Thomas, b. 1566; d. 1628; a Spaniard by birth, and member of the Dominican order; first attracted attention by his criticism of some points in the Annales ecclesiastici and the Martyrologium Romanum. Called to Rome, he was charged with a revision of the breviary, missal, and martyrology of his order, and of La Bigne's Bibliotheca Patrum, and also with writing the Annales ordinis fratrum predicatorum, of which, however, he only finished four volumes folio, comprising the first thirty years of the history of the Dominican order. Recalled to Spain in 1610, he drew up the Spanish Index librorum prohibitorum, and commenced a literal translation of the Bible, of which, however, only five volumes were completed, reaching Ezek. xvi. Among his other works (a complete list of which is found in QUETIF and ECHARD: Scriptores ordinis prædicatorum, ii. 454) is a book, De Antichristo, a collection of all that has been said at various times about Antichrist.

MAMACHI, Thomas Maria, b. in 1713; d. in 1792. He was a native of the Island of Scio, but was educated in Italy; entered the order of the Dominicans; was ordained a priest in 1736, and held various positions, as professor of theology, secretary to the Congregation of the Index, etc. In the first work he published (Epist. ad J. D. Mansium, Rome, 1748) he refuted Mansi's computation of the date of the synod of Sardica and of the return of Athanasius to Alexandria. Of much greater importance are his Originum et antiquitatum christianorum libri X.X. (Rome, 1749-55), written with steady reference to Bingham's Origines ecclesiasticæ, and his Dei costumi dei primitivi Christiani (Rome, 1753). His participation, however, in the Febronian controversy (Ep. ad Justinum Febronium, Rome, 1776) showed that he was not a match for Nontheim.

MAM'MON, a Chaldaean word signifying "wealth" or "riches" (Luke xvi. 9, 11), and used, according to Augustine, in Punic, and, according to Jerome, in Syriac, in exactly the same sense. When Christ uses the word as a proper name (Matt. vi. 24; Luke xvi. 13), he simply employs a figure of speech, the personification, without referring to any special idol worshipped under that name.

MAM'RE, near Hebron, identified by the British Palestine explorers with Ballatet Sella, the "oak of rest." Mamre was an Ammonite chief (Gen. xiv. 13); but he seems to have given his name to a certain spot, so that it was called Mamre (Gen. xiv. 24). The "plain" of Mamre, in the Authorized Version, should be oaks. It is expressly described as near Machpelah (Gen. xxiii. 17).

MAN has both a physical and a spiritual nature. In him the physical realm finds the culmination of its development; and at the same time a new kingdom of spirit, of humanity, begins in him. The race as a whole is conscious of this double nature, and the Scriptures corroborate it. They place man in close connection with the preceding works of creation, and at the same time represent him as the product of a new creative thought and act (Gen. i. 26, ii. 7). He is called, on the one hand, to enjoy communion with God, and, on the other, to exercise dominion over the other works of creation (Ps. viii.). We shall in this article only consider man from his physical side, leaving his spiritual nature to be discussed in the arts. IMAGE OF GOD, IMMORTALITY, SOUL, etc.

I. ORIGIN OF THE HUMAN RACE.—Man was created in God's image. The race as a whole (consensus gentium) has given abundant testimony to the truth of this biblical statement. The majority of Pagan myths of the creation regard man as the creature of God. It is true, as Hæckel likes to emphasize, that traditions exist in some of the natural religions (India, Thibet), that man is a descendant of the ape; but the number of the traditions is greater (West African, South Arabian, Ancient Mexican) which represent the ape as a degenerated descendant of man. (See Tylor: Anthropology, an Introduction to the Study of Man and Civilization, London, 1881.) But more important are the traditions of the civilized nations of antiquity, which almost unanimously agree that man is the creature of God. Of these may be mentioned the Chinese tradition about Fo-hi or Pao-hi; the Babylonian, with its many points of agreement with the biblical account: the Egyptian Book of the Dead, with its praise of the "Divine Architect, who made the world to be the home of man, the image of the Creator;" Hesiod's poems, etc.

The philosophies of ancient and modern times have also been pretty well agreed that man is not simply the product of nature, but is a spiritual being. It is only since the middle of the last century (Lametrie, Holbach, Helvetius, etc.) that that materialistic philosophy has gained much of a following which degrades man to a level with the beast, or makes him a mere machine. But Linné (d. 1778) classified man at the side of the ape as the highest representative of the vertebrates, but at the same time pronounced him to have been "created with an immortal soul, after the divine image," and called him "the only one among the creatures blessed with a rational soul for the praise of God" (Systema Naturæ, 6th ed., 1748). And Blumenbach (d. 1840), the real founder of anthropology as a department of natural science, never doubted that man was distinguished from all the other terrene creatures by his (1) upright person, (2) perfect hands, (3) protruding chin, and (4) articulate speech. On the other hand, the modern theories of natural descent and biological transmutation (from primordial cells, etc.), using certain results of the study of embryology, palæontology, the practices of breeding and selection of animals and plants, come to the conclusion that man is the result of a process of development; the ape being his immediate ancestor. This hypothesis of apish ancestry, which Lamarek (Philosophie zoologique, 1809), Lord Monboddo, etc., represented, has been bolstered up with facts by Darwin, Huxley, Lubbock, E. B. Tylor, Ernst Hæckel (Natürl. Schöpfungsgesch., 1868; Anthropogenie, 1874), Oscar Schmidt, Schaaffhausen, etc. The facts these scientists have brought out have seemed to make the hypothesis plausible. However, they do not hold that man is a descendant of any of the families of apes now living, but of a family now extinct.

The arguments used in favor of this view are to be regarded as insufficient, and for the following reasons among others. (1) The anatomical differences—especially in the conformation of the skull, and weight of the brain—between the highest types of the ape family (gorilla, chimpanzee) and the lowest types of the human family (Australian, negro) are so great as to make the supposition of a common origin very difficult of belief. According to the investigations of Eby, Bischoff, R. Owen, and others, the capacity of the lowest human skull (the natives of New Holland) is seventy-five cubic inches; while the largest capacity of the gorilla is thirty-four cubic inches. The average weight of the brain of a European is fifty-seven ounces; that of the negro, from thirty-eight to fifty-one ounces; but that of the gorilla, only from seventeen to nineteen ounces. (2) The so-called "embryological argument," consisting in the alleged identity of the fetal development of man and the higher vertebrates, especially the ape family, has been much used by Hæckel. But the very discoverer and exponent of the law of the development before birth (von Baer, d. 1876) denied this identity; and Kölliker and others have followed him. (3) The palæontological argument is also lacking in conclusiveness. The assumed anthropoid apes, man's immediate ancestors, have no living representatives, nor have the remains of any been discovered. None of the various skulls of the so-called original man (the Neanderthal, Engis, Cro-magnon, and other skulls), nor the fossil remains of men, have shown any approach to the ape type. The gap which now exists between the skulls of man and the ape has always existed, so far as palæontological discoveries enable us to speak. (4) The doctrine of man's descent appeals to genealogical changes in the organism: but no single case of a definite and abiding change of an organic nature has been proved. It assumes a process of natural selection such as a gardener or a breeder pursues; but, so far as our observation goes, the great family types of animals and plants have from time immemorial had a fixed character. In order to substantiate this view, its advocates postulate thousands and millions of years. But leaving aside the doubt still existing among geologists, whether such a long period is required to account for the changes in the earth's surface, it may with perfect confidence be stated, that, so far as our knowledge goes, the great families in the animal and vegetable worlds have always been as distinct as they are to-day. The biblical account still remains true, that God created "every thing after its kind." (5) The Darwinian system ignores the salient features which distinguish man from the other creation. Man as a spiritual being, endowed with intellect and a moral nature, represents an entirely new stage of being. The whole history of the brotherhood of man and the ape—the former, in the progress of many centuries, having outstripped the latter—really deserves the name which the distinguished investigators, Agassiz, Rudolf Wagner, Wigand, Dubois-Reymond, and others, have given to it, of a romance of natural philosophy. Quatrefages, the representative of one of the most influential medical schools of the day, insists upon the distinction of the human and animal kingdoms; and Wallace, who with Darwin is the author of the theory of natural selection, holds, that, in the case of man, the natural selection was the work of God.

II. UNITY OF THE HUMAN RACE. — The human family has descended from a single pair (Gen. i. 27), and all men are of one blood (Acts xvii. 26). The traditions of many nations confirm these biblical statements. (See Lipschutz: De communis et simplici humani generis origine, Hamburg, 1861). It is true, however, on the other hand, that some peoples regarded themselves as autochthonous (the Greeks). This view, that there were more than one family from which the race descended, has been more recently revived, some holding to a co-Adamite theory (Paraælsus, Posmann, etc.), and others to the pre-Adamite (Zanini of Soleia, 1459, Isaac la Peyrère, 1655, Schelling, McCausland, etc.). According to the first theory, others were created at the same time Adam was: according to the second, Adam was not the first man on the earth. Prichard, John Herschel, the Humboldts, Blumenbach (De generis humani varietate nativa, 1795), and others have asserted the possibility of the descent of all the human families from one pair. Since the Darwinian theory of development has gained currency, this view has received confirmation; and many of the best representatives of this school, if they do not hold that the race has descended from a single pair, affirm that the human family started at one common hearth (Darwin, Huxley, Wallace, etc.).

The strict biblical view, that the human family is descended from a single pair, Adam and Eve, has the following considerations in its favor. (1) The different races of men do not lose their power of procreation by intermarriage. Blumenbach, Buffon (Œuvres, iv. pp. 386 sq.), and many modern physiologists, such as Johann Müller, Rudolf Wagner, and Quatrefages, have emphasized this fact in this connection. (2) They have many physiological features in common; as the identity of vertebrate formation, length of pregnancy, temperature of the body, average length of years, etc. (3) The differences of color, conformation of the skull, etc., may largely be accounted for by climatic influences. (4) The present differences of language can also be accounted for. Cases can be pointed to, for example, where a people has exchanged its native tongue for the language of a neighboring people. This was the case in antiquity with the Hamitic Phœnicians, and in modern times with the Longobards, Bulgarians, the Berbers of Morocco, etc. (See on this general subject Whitney: The Life and Growth of Language, pp. 275 sq.). (5) The religious differences of different peoples do not militate with the theory of their original unity: on the contrary, religious traditions are found among peoples separated the most widely, which bespeak an original unity of religion and dwelling-place: and A. von Humboldt, Chevalier (Le Mexique ancien et moderne, 1863), Shields (The Final Philosophy, p. 184), and others derive the American races and their original culture from Asia. (6) A final evidence for the unity of the race is to be found in the ethical and spiritual features common to all nations and quarters of the globe. The labors of Christian missionaries among the cannibals of the Fiji Islands, the Kolhs of India, the negroes of Sierra Leone, etc., have proved conclusively the truth of this assumption, which used to be frequently denied.

III. ANTIQUITY OF THE HUMAN RACE. — The usual system of biblical chronology makes out the period from Adam to Christ to cover 4,000 years (Ussher and Ideler, 4,004; Calvisius, 3,950; Kepler and Patavius, 3,981, etc.). Such a short period seems to be inconsistent with the alleged unity of the race. However, the developing effects of sin must not be left out of account in determining this question. There is much in the chronological tables of the Old Testament to make any calculation based upon them of questionable accuracy. There is at any rate some truth in the words of Chalmers, that "the sacred writings do not fix the antiquity of the globe," and those of Le Hir and De Saey, "Il n'y a pas de chronologie biblique." It is quite possible that the lists of the patriarchs in Gen. v. and xi. are incomplete. The Bible, in fact, seems to allow for a longer duration of the human race by several thousands of years than the usually accepted chronology makes out.

The records of Egyptian history seem to make an extension of the chronology necessary. Even if Egypt's first sovereign, Menes, did not live 4000 B.C., as many Egyptologists affirm, and if he lived, as Lipsius says, 3890 B.C., or, as Bunsen, 3600 B.C., or Wilkinson, 2700 B.C., it would be difficult to harmonize the chronology of Egypt with the usually accepted biblical chronology. Every new discovery of monuments in Egypt only goes to confirm Manetho's statement of thirty royal Egyptian dynasties, beginning with Menes.

Of much less value in this connection are the arguments based upon geological calculations. There is as yet no reliable geological chronometer. It is true that the remains of man have been found in caves with the remains of mammoths, the cave-bear, etc., and must have lived at the close of the great ice-period, that is, during the great geological deluge; but when this period began and when it ended, remains still a matter of uncertainty. In general, we may, with Quatrefages, complain of the lavish extravagance with which many Darwinians make free with time, and recall that even Lyell was obliged, in the later edition of his Geological Evidences of the Antiquity of Man, to modify his earlier statements. (See ZÖCKLER: Geschichte d. Beziehungen zwischen Theologie u. Naturwissenschaft, and Lehre v. Urstand d. Menschen.) See arts. EVOLUTION, CREATION, etc. ZÖCKLER.

MANASSEH, son and successor of Hezekiah, king of Judah B.C. 698-643, or 695-641 [Ewald and Bunsen]. His history is told in 2 Kings xxi. 1-18, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1-20. He was only twelve years old when he began to reign, and, unhappily for him, headed, rather than opposed, the reaction from the legitimate Jehovah-worship of his father. In consequence of the ensuing excesses in idolatry, God brought the land into trouble, and Manasseh was carried to Babylon as a prisoner by the Assyrian king. His afflictions had a salutary effect upon him; and, in answer to his prayer to God, he was ultimately released and restored. Returned to his own, he vigorously entered upon the work of increasing the defences of Jerusalem, cleansing the city of idolatry, and restoring the Jehovah-worship. He was buried in "the garden of his own house" (2 Kings xxi. 18), and not among the kings. There is an undeniable difference between the accounts in Kings and Chronicles respecting his reign, in that the former does not relate his conversion; but then Manasseh and Amon are treated in Kings as briefly as possible; and, besides, it may be that the writer there did not regard Manasseh's conversion as more than half-hearted. Tradition puts the martyrdom of Isaiah in the first half of this reign. On the basis of the expression, "Manasseh shed innocent blood very much, till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another" (2 Kings xxi. 16), it has been reasonably conjectured that he persecuted the adherents, and particularly the prophets, of the true religion. In the Apocrypha is found a Prayer of Manasses, supposed to have been uttered by him in Babylon (see art. APOCRYPHA, p. 102). Upon the cuneiform inscriptions Manasseh appears as a tributary vassal of Esarhaddon and Asurbanipal. Compare art. Manasse, by Rüetschi, in Herzog, vol. ix. 203-205.

MANDEVILLE, Bernard de, b. at Dort in 1670; d. in London, Jan. 21, 1733. He studied medicine in Holland, and practised as a physician in London. In 1706 he published The Fable of the Bees, a poem in which he tries to show that all human progress and happiness depend upon fraud and crime, while virtue necessarily leads to barbarism and misery. The poem attracted attention; and he reprinted it several times, accompanied with long notes and discourses, in which he openly attacked the morals of Christianity from the stand-point of deism. He also wrote Free Thoughts on Religion, the Church, and National Happiness, and An Inquiry into the Origin of Honor, and the Usefulness of Christianity in War.

MANDRAKE, probably the Atropa mandragora, a member of the potato family. In Palestine it is found in Galilee, upon the slopes of Carmel and Tabor, and also south of Jerusalem, but not immediately about the city. It blossoms in the early spring, and bears in May and June the famous "love-apples," which are popularly presumed to excite love, and induce conception (Gen. xxx. 14-16). The plant itself is stemless with broad leaves, and small, reddish-white blossoms, which develop into dirty-yellow, round "apples" about the size of plums. The plant in all its parts has a pungent and unpleasant odor. Compare the monograph by BARTOLOMI: Commentar. de Mandragoris, Bologna, 1835. RÜETSCHI.

MANDYAS, a Greek ecclesiastical vestment worn by monks, and occasionally by bishops, because these are usually monks, resembling the cope, and reaching almost to the feet.

MANETHO, an Egyptian historian, and priest of Sebennytus, of the third century B.C. He wrote two works, Τῶν Φυσικῶν Ἐπιτομή ("Epitome of the Physical") and Αἰγυπτιακά ("Egyptology"); the former treating of the religion, and the latter of the history, of his country. Unhappily we have only fragments of them preserved in Josephus, Julius Africanus, and Eusebius. They will be found collected by Friun (Leyden, 1847) and Müller, in his Fragmenta historicorum Græcorum, Paris, 1848, vol. ii. Manetho's list of dynasties, covering about thirty-five hundred years, has been disputed by Egyptologists, but is now generally accepted as correct. Indeed, recent discoveries have confirmed Egyptologists in the opinion that Manetho has used reliable sources, and is trustworthy. He has been credited with an astrological poem, Ἀποτέλεσματικά ("Relating to Astrology").

MANGEY, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., b. at Leeds, 1684; d. at Ealing, Middlesex, March 6, 1755. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and was successively rector in London, prebendary of Durham, and vicar of Ealing. He was editor of the best edition of Philo, Philonis Judæi omnia Gr. et Lat. notis et observ. illustravit, THOMAS MANGEY, S.T.P., London, 1742, 2 vols. folio.

MANI. See MANICHÆISM.

MANICHÆISM. Mani (Greek, Μάνης, or Μανιχαῖος; Latin, Manes, or Manichæus), the founder of Manichæism, descended from a distinguished Persian family which had emigrated from Ecbatana in Bactria, and settled at Çtesiphon in Babylonia: and was b. in Mardinû, on the upper part of the Cûthâ canal, in 215 A.D. At the time of his birth, his father, Fâtâk, retired from public life, and joined the Mughtasilahs, or Baptizers, a religious sect which flourished in the province of Mesene, on the Lower Tigris, near the Arabian frontier, and may be considered the true ancestors of the Mandæans. There young Mani was educated until his thirteenth year; at which time he separated from the sect, and adopted that scheme of asceticism which he afterwards prescribed for the Perfect among his own followers, and which he seems to have borrowed from his father. The next eleven years he spent in travelling, elaborating the theoretical part of his system, which, indeed, is nothing but a dialectical combination of elements derived from the various religious systems with which he came in contact. The materials he used he borrowed, but in any other sense of the word he does not seem to have had any precursors. The stories commonly accepted by the Occidental tradition, of Scythianus and Terebinthus as his predecessors, are simple misunderstandings of the real facts of his own life, hugely deformed with legendary embellishments. When he was twenty-four years old, his system was completed, and four years later on, at the coronation of King Sapor I. (March 20, 242), he first presented himself to the people of Persia as the founder of a new religion. He claimed to be a messenger from the true God. "What Buddha was to India, Zoroaster to Persia, Jesus to the lands of the West, I am to the country of Babylonia." The moment of his appearance was well chosen. Multitudes of people had gathered together, and the solemnity of the occasion heightened the general sentiment. But his success was small. The favor of the king he did not win, and for many years he lived and labored outside of the Persian dominion. His missionary tours were directed to the countries north and east of Persia: the Christian countries to the west he hardly visited. When speaking to Christians, he may have proclaimed himself the Paraclete promised by Christ (John xiv. 16), and, like Christ, he surrounded himself with twelve apostles; but otherwise he was so far from recognizing Jesus as a messenger from the true God, that, on the contrary, according to Mohammedan sources (see Flügel: Mani, p. 100), he declared him to be a devil. The religion he founded was not originally intended to defeat Christianity, but simply to supersede the old religion of Persia, the religion of Zoroaster. When he finally returned to Persia, he found not a few adherents; and even the brother of King Sapor I. was converted. But the Sassanides needed the support of the Persian priests, and any connection with the new religion was consequently a delicate affair. Nevertheless, in a personal meeting between King Sapor and Mani, the former is said to have been so deeply impressed by the latter, that he not only gave his adherents full religious liberty, but even promised to embrace the new religion himself. The cordial relation, however, does not seem to have been of long duration. Mani was once more compelled to go into exile: and though he again returned, and enjoyed the full favor of Sapor's successor, Hormisdas I., the priest party, now roused to fury while fighting for their very existence, proved too powerful when King Bahrâm I. ascended the throne. In 276 Mani was seized and crucified; and his corpse was flayed, stuffed with hay, and nailed to that gate of the city which afterwards bore his name.

As above hinted, Manichæism was by no means the mere deviation of a Christian sect. It was an independent religion in exactly the same sense as Mohammedanism; and, during the whole course of its history, Christianity has had no more dangerous enemy to encounter. Its theoretical part, its metaphysics, was chiefly derived from the old Parsism; its practical part, its morals, chiefly from the neighboring Buddhism. From Christianity it took only some few loose ideas; but the whole method of combining all those materials, and fusing them into one coherent system, it borrowed from Gnosticism. Indeed, Manichæism may most properly be designated as a Gnostic system, as the most complete system of Gnosticism. It did not, like Christianity, present itself to man as a power to save him by cleansing his heart from sin; but, like Gnosticism, it simply proposed to gratify man's craving for knowledge by explaining the very problem of his existence. The fundamental principle of this explanation is in Manichæism dualistic, and the dualism is carried out with rigorous consistency. The world began from an accidental mixing of two absolutely contrasting elements, — one radically good, and one radically bad, — but both eternal, and both evincing the same formal character, at once spiritual and material. The good element, the light, is God; and his personality comprises five spiritual and five material sub-elements. But God is not alone in the light: its fulness comprehends also an air of light, an earth of light, and numberless glories and magnificences. Upwards and sidewise this realm of light is unbounded; but from below, it is met by the realm of darkness. The bad element, the darkness, is also personality; but that personality is not by Mani called God: and strictly speaking it cannot be said that Manichæism taught two gods. The bad element is in Manichæism simply a personification of the ancient Babylonian idea of chaos. The first movement towards an intermingling of the two different elements took place through the development of Satan within the realm of darkness. The type of that character is another loan from the ancient Babylonian mythology, — the dragon with the head of a lion, the tail of a fish, the wings of a great bird, and the feet of a reptile. Moving restlessly about in the darkness, Satan suddenly discovers a gleam from the realm of light, and with instinctive hatred he flies towards it to attack it and disturb it. To meet the attack, the god of light creates the typical man, the homo primus; and clad in the soft breezes of heaven, and robed in light, man goes to the encounter with the gale in his one hand, and the fire in the other; while Satan rushes towards him, armed with all the pains and qualms of darkness and dulness. Of course we have here only the prologue, but a prologue which gives the essence of the whole drama. What follows — the course of the universe, the history of the human race, the life of the individual soul, etc. — is nothing but a consistent evolution of this first encounter, often painted with a glow of fancy, a power of pathos, a sublimity of vision, which make it easy to understand how Manichæism could strike the imagination of such a man as Augustine, and keep its hold on him for several years, though at last it failed utterly in satisfying the deeper wants of his mind.

The dualistic principle which governs the whole metaphysics of Manichæism is no less apparent in its morals. The Perfect were enjoined to abstain from any thing in which the elements of darkness were considered to be predominant. The prohibitions were generally arranged under three heads (tria signacula), — the signaculum oris, which forbade to tell a lie, to utter a falsehood, to eat meat, to drink wine, etc.; the signaculum manus, which forbade to kill, to steal, to engage in any kind of occupation which might interfere with the progress of the realm of light, etc.; and the signaculum sinus, which forbade all kinds of sensual enjoyment, marriage, etc. The morals of the Hearers, the second and lower class of Manichæans, were much easier. Still they forbade not only to kill, lie, steal, etc., but also to plant a tree, to build a house, to engage in any kind of manufacturing industry, etc. Nevertheless, as the Hearers were allowed to enjoy meat and wine, to live in marriage and have children, to carry on trade, and hold public offices, they could live in society without attracting any special attention. A curious feature in Manichæan life was the relation between the two classes, — the extreme veneration with which the Hearers looked up to the Perfect. They considered them as immaterial beings, and not only supported and defended them, but handed them their food in a kneeling position. Common to both classes were the fasts and the prayers. — the two principal features of Manichæan worship. Seven days in each month were fast-days, kept in honor of the sun and the moon. Four prayers were said every day, — at noon, in the afternoon before sunset, in the evening after sunset, and in the first night-watch. When preparing for prayer, the Manichæan washed himself, standing erect, with running water: he then turned towards the sun or the moon, or, if neither of the great heavenly bodies were visible, towards the north, as the abode of the King of Light, and, prostrating himself on the ground, he said the prescribed prayer. The text, however, of those prayers, preserved in Arabic, shows that the Manichæans did not worship the sun and the moon, but simply addressed them as the symbols and visible representatives of the Great Light. The one great Manichæan festival was the so-called Bema (βήμα), "the pulpit," celebrated on the anniversary of the crucifixion of Mani. In his honor a pulpit was raised on five steps in the midst of the temple, and adorned with flowers; but it remained unoccupied. In other respects the whole Manichæan worship was very simple. The man who prays is the true temple of God, they said. They had no priests, properly speaking, though within the class of the Perfect there was a minor group of select persons, whom Augustine designates as bishops, presbyters, and magistrates. The final result of life on earth, the goal towards which Manichæan morals proposed to lead, was somewhat dim. It seems that Mani in this point followed very closely in the track of the old Parsism. The Perfect was immediately transferred to paradise; the Hearer was put into a kind of purgatory; and the non-Manichæan was surrendered to Satan.

In spite of the severe persecution which King Bahrām I. instituted against the Manichæans after the death of their leader, they spread rapidly in all directions. It is uncertain whether Mani himself ever visited India; but he wrote an epistle to the Indians, and, at the close of the third century, there was a Manichæan settlement on the coast of Malabar, which became the centre of a considerable missionary activity. It is probable that the old Thomas-Christians of India were Manichæans; and it is a significant fact with respect to the spread of Manichæism towards the East, that, in the first half of the tenth century, there lived near the frontier of China a powerful Turkish tribe, which professed Manichæism, and, by their threats of revenge, induced the prince of Samarcand to desist from the persecutions which he had raised against the Manichæans in that region. At the same period, however, their number is said to have been small in Bagdad, and only a little larger in the surrounding country. On its way towards the West, Manichæism first penetrated into Syria and Palestine, where it was encountered and vehemently attacked by Bishop Titus of Bostra. Nevertheless, according to Euty chius, most of the Egyptian metropolitans, bishops, and monks, were Manichæans at the time when Timotheus was Patriarch of Alexandria; and in Northern Africa, the so-called Africa proconsularis, Manichæism founded one of its most flourishing establishments. Tolerated, like all other religions, during the reign of Constantine, it was afterwards treated as a heresy, and very severe edicts were issued against its adherents. But Augustine's writings bear witness to its power and extension. In Italy it succeeded in getting a foothold, even in the city of Rome. Leo the Great (Serm. 41 de quadragesima. Ep. ad Tarribium Asturicensem episcopum) felt great anxiety on account of its progress, and asked for the support of the civil authorities in order to extirpate it. In Spain it was connected with Priscillianism; in Southern France, with the movement of the Cathari (the Manichæans were themselves at one time called Cathariste); and in the Eastern Empire, with the Paulicians and the Bogomiles.

Sources. — Mani was himself a prolific writer. Besides seven large doctrinal works (one in Persian, and six in Syriac), he wrote a number of circular letters (seventy-six); but nothing has come down to us except the titles and some stray quotations. Sources of second rank, however, are numerous, both Eastern (Arabic and Persian) and Western (Greek and Latin). — Of Eastern sources the most important is the Arabic Fihrist, a literary history by AN-NADIM, finished in 988, of which the chapter on Mani has been edited by Gustav Flügel, Leipzig, 1862, text, German translation, and commentary. Very important is also the work on religious and philosophical sects, by ABUL FATH (d. 1153), edited by William Cureton, London, 1842, and translated into German by Th. Haarbrucker, Halle, 1851. Furthermore, some shorter notices in various Arabic chronicles, by AL-BIRUNI (1000), edited by E. Sachau, Leipzig, 1878; by EUTYCHIUS PATRICIDES, Patriarch of Alexandria, 916; and by BARNÉBRÉUS, 1286, both the latter edited by Pococke, Oxford, 1628. Of special interest for the biography of Mani are the Persian works by FIRDAUSI (edited by Jul. Mohl, Paris, 1866, v. pp. 472-475) and MIRCHOND (translated by De Sacy, in Mémoires sur diverses antiquités de la Perse, Paris, 1793, p. 294). — Of Western sources the most important is the so-called Acta Archelai, a Latin translation of a Greek translation of a Syriac report of a disputation between Bishop Archelans of Cascar in Mesopotamia, and Mani, printed by Gallandi, in Bibl. Patrum, iii., and by Routh, in Reliquiæ Sacre, v. Very important are also the books which Augustine wrote against the Manichæans: Contra epistolam Manichæi quum vocant fundamenti, Contra Faustum; Contra Fortunatum, Contra Adimantum. De actis cum Felice, Contra Secundinum; De natura homi; De duabus animis, De utilitate credendi; De Moribus Manichæorum; De Hæresibus, xlvii. Among the Greek writers on heresy the most important with respect to Mani are EPIPHANIUS (66), THEODORET (26) PHOTIUS (179), etc.

MANIPLE was originally a linen handkerchief, carried upon the left arm; but it is not until the eighth or ninth century that it appears as a sacred vestment. It symbolizes the fruit of good works, which can be won only through the sweat of the apostolic labors.

MAN'NA. When the Israelites, in the second month after the exodus from Egypt, arrived at the Desert of Sin, starving, and grumbling at Moses and Aaron, God gave them the manna as a substitute for bread, and continued to furnish it, from day to day, for forty years, until they entered the land of Canaan, and needed it no more. It is fully described in Exod. xvi., — "a small round thing," as small as "the hoar-frost on the ground," "like coriander-seed," "of the color of bdellium," "and the taste of it like wafers made with honey." It was gathered — a certain measure for each person, no more, no less — every morning, except sabbath mornings, when nothing was found. But a double measure could be gathered on the day preceding the sabbath. And while the manna gathered on ordinary days bred worms, and became offensive, when kept over for the next day, that which was gathered for sabbath use continued sound and sweet. It was pounded or crushed in a hand-mill, and then made into cakes with honey and sweet oil. In other places in Scripture it is referred to as "the corn of heaven," "angels' food," etc. The product which at present is gathered in those localities, and used by the Arabs, under the name of manna, is a sweetish exudation of the tamarisk, which has nothing to do with the bread furnished by the Lord to the Israelites, — as little as the drug sold under the name of manna, and extracted from the ash-tree in Sicily and in Southern Italy.

MANNING, James, D.D., b. in Elizabethtown, N.J., Oct. 22, 1738; d. at Providence, R.I., July 24, 1791. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, Princeton, Sept. 29, 1762; went to Rhode Island in July, 1763, and started "a seminary of polite literature subject to the government of the Baptists." It was chartered (1764) as the Rhode Island College, and was first located at Warren; but in 1770 it was removed to Providence. Dr. Manning, besides being president of the college, was pastor of the Baptist Church of Warren and Providence successively, and in both capacities rendered efficient service. During the Revolutionary War the college was closed, and the building used for military purposes. In 1786 Dr. Manning sat in Congress. His death was due to a stroke of apoplexy while engaged in prayer. For an appreciative sketch of this prominent Baptist minister and able college professor, see Lives of the Leaders of our Church Universal, edited by Dr. H. M. Maccracken, pp. 608-614.

MANSE, the Scottish equivalent for parsonage. "In unendowed churches the manse is the property of the church, erected and maintained by it; in the Established Church it is built and maintained by law, and belongs to the heritors." See article in Eadie, Ecclesiastical Cyclopædia.

MANSEL, Henry Longueville, Dean of St. Paul's; b. Oct. 6, 1820, at Cosgrove, Northamptonshire, Eng., where his father was rector in the Church of England; d. in London, July 13, 1871. He was educated at Oxford University, where he afterwards became fellow and tutor. In 1855 he was appointed reader in moral and mental philosophy in Magdalene College. In 1859 he was appointed Waynflete professor of moral and mental philosophy, and in 1867 regius professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford. In the Church of England he became Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, London.

Mansel was an eminent logician, and won undisputed distinction both as a teacher and an author in the department of logic. From this field he passed into that of metaphysics, attracted thither in the interest of apologetic theology. That he commanded a large degree of attention in this region also admits of no doubt, though he did not make an impression as a metaphysician equal to that he had made as a logician. His transition was by the pathway of psychology, to which he uniformly and consistently assigned an essential place. His Prolegomena Logica, an Inquiry into the Psychological Character of Logical Processes (1851; 2d ed., 1860), gives a clear and valuable discussion of the relation of psychological distinctions to logic and ethics. His most noted effort in the department of metaphysics was the Bampton Lecture of 1858, preached in Oxford, and published under the title of The Limits of Religious Thought. His object in these lectures is to interpret and apply Sir W. Hamilton's Philosophy of the Conditioned as a metaphysical theory, affording a powerful apologetic in theology. In substance the argument is this: on metaphysical grounds it is shown to be impossible to attain a knowledge of the absolute and infinite. All arguments against theological doctrines, on the ground of mystery, are thus demonstrated to be futile; and theology is unassailable as matter of faith, not matter of knowledge. There was nothing new in this, except the novel use of the special lines of argument pursued by Hamilton. The value of the defence of mystery in religious belief was generally recognized, as also of the assault upon the arrogance of a self-satisfied rationalism. But the defence of dogmatic theology was not inspiring, and failed to command general approval. To lower theology to the level where such defence could prove valuable was to give it an appearance of insignificance, and assign to it feebleness of practical result, which made the defence too costly. The historic significance of the combined effort of Hamilton and Mansel became apparent in the readiness with which the doctrine of ignorance was accepted by the sensational school of thinkers, who desired to make all knowledge depend on sensation, and were specially disturbed by the affirmation of transcendent being. To relegate the Infinite and Absolute to the region of the unknown and unknowable was to the sensationalist a deliverance, to the theologian a disaster. Agnosticism received an unexpected stimulus from the theological camp: hence the majority of theologians were the reverse of grateful for the proffered apologetic. Theology was not so little a matter of rationalized thought that it could be defended by being excluded from the sphere of the rational and a divorce being proclaimed between reason and faith: consequently the marked sensation produced by publication of The Limits of Religious Thought passed away, and was succeeded by a general conviction that the limits of religious thought were not as Dean Mansel described them, and consequently his apologetic was not available.

The metaphysical argument borrowed from Hamilton was this: the unconditioned is independent of all relation. To think is to condition: therefore the unconditioned cannot be the object of thought. On this ground, Mansel maintained that the whole circle of revealed truth concerning the Deity was beyond the range of logical tests, as incapable of being included within the forms of thought. Creation as a beginning in time; created existence as distinct from the divine existence; the attributes of God, such as holiness and justice, implying personality, — all these involve relation, which is inconsistent with the absolute. But assaults against these are hopeless. Are not arguments for them equally so? The defence is complete, only it seems to leave nothing to defend.

When Mr. John S. Mill assailed the whole philosophy of Hamilton, Mansel felt it needful to appear in defence; but this he did in a fragmentary form, offering only a defence of Hamilton's philosophic position as to the unconditioned. This appeared first as a review article in the Contemporary Review, and was afterwards (1866) published, under the title of The Philosophy of the Conditioned, in a somewhat extended form. The book is only a restatement, in a cursory way, of the arguments of the more important work.

A very clear and concise treatment of psychological problems, including the theory of causality and ethical problems, is given in his Metaphysics; or, the Phenomena of Consciousness, Phenomenal and Real (1860), — a reprint of article in the Encyclopædia Britannica. Mansel's review articles and separate lectures (including lecture on the philosophy of Kant) are republished in a single volume, — Letters, Lectures, and Reviews, 1873. He wrote also Gnostic Heresies of the First and Second Centuries, ed. by Lightfoot, 1875; and the Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew for the Speaker's Commentary, but died before it was finished.

H. CALDERWOOD.

MANSI, Giovanni Domenico, b. at Lucca, Feb. 16, 1692; d. there Sept. 27, 1769. He entered early the Congregatio Matris Dei, became archbishop of his native city, and developed an astonishing literary activity. He published new and valuable critical editions of the works of Baronius, Baluze, Fabricius, and others. He continued the collection of councils by Labbe-Cossart-Coleti, adding six volumes folio, Lucca, 1748-52, and made his own celebrated collection, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Florence and Venice, 1759-98, 31 vols. folio), reaching to the middle of the fifteenth century. See his Life, by ZATTA, in vol. xix. of the latter work.

MANT, Richard, D.D., Bishop of Down, Connor, and Dromore; b. at Southampton, Feb. 12, 1776; d. at Ballemoney, Ireland, Nov. 2, 1818. He was educated at Oxford; entered holy orders; served first as curate at Southampton 1802; was rector in London 1816; was created bishop of Killaloe and Kilfenora, Ireland, 1820; translated to the see of Down and Connor 1828, to which Dromore was added 1832. He is best known by the Commentary on the whole Bible, which he issued in connection with Rev. Dr. George D'Oyly (see D'Oyly). But he also edited the Book of Common Prayer, with Notes (1820, 6th ed., 1850), and wrote a History of the Church of Ireland (1839-41, 2 vols.). Bishop Mant early evinced poetical gifts, and published The Book of Psalms in an English Metrical Version (1842), and several volumes of poems. See MILLER: Singers and Songs of the Church, pp. 356-358.

MANTON, Thomas, D.D., a nonconformist; b. at Lawrence Lydiard, Somersetshire, 1626; d. in London, Oct. 18, 1677. He was educated at Oxford; admitted to deacon's orders by Bishop Hall, and never took priest's, because "it was his judgment that he was properly ordained to the ministerial office." He was first settled at Stoke Newington, near London; then in London, at Covent Garden. During the Commonwealth he was one of Cromwell's chaplains; made the prayer at Cromwell's installation, June 26, 1657; was one of the "tryers," i.e., examiners of candidates for the ministry; and preached frequently before Parliament. He welcomed Charles II. in 1660, was chosen a royal chaplain, refused the deanery of Rochester, took part in the Savoy Conference, but in 1662 was deprived of his living by the Act of Uniformity. He then preached in his own rooms, and suffered arrest in consequence. Dr. Manton was one of the ablest Puritan preachers and theologians, and is still read. Archbishop Ussher called him a "voluminous preacher," i.e., one who could reduce volumes of divinity into small compass. But he was voluminous in the modern sense. Among his admired productions are CXC. Sermons on the CXLIX. Psalm, London, 1681, 3d ed., with Life of the author, 1841, 3 vols:

Expositions of James (1651), Jule (1658), The Lord's Prayer (1684), and The 53d Chapter of Isaiah (1703). His Works were first printed in a collected edition, 1681-1701, 5 vols. folio, reprinted edition by Rev. J. C. Ryle, 1870-75, 22 vols.

MANUEL, Niklaus, b. at Bern, 1484; d. there April 30, 1530; played in the Swiss Reformation a part somewhat similar to that of Ulrich von Hutten in Germany. Originally he devoted himself to art,—painted, carved, and constructed buildings. But he was also a politician, held various offices in the administration and government of Bern, and made in 1522 a campaign in Italy at the head of the Swiss mercenaries under Francis I. Most influence, however, he exercised as a poet, in the service of the Reformation. His two moralities (Vom Papst und seiner Priesterschaft and Von Papsts und Christi Gegensatz), performed at Bern in 1522, completely destroyed there the authority of the Bishop of Lausanne. No less effect had his satires,—Ablasskrämer; Ecks und Fabers Badenfahrt; Testament der Messe, etc. His works have been edited by Dr. Jakob Bächtold, Frauenfeld, 1878. See GRÜNEISEN: Niclaus Manuel, Stuttgart, 1837. DR. LIST.

MAPPA denotes the linen cloth with which the communion-table, and afterwards the altar, was covered. That the cloth should be of linen depended upon a reference to the linen cloth in which the corpse of Christ was wrapped, though such a reference would apply better to the corporale. Optatus of Mileve, in his De schismate Donatistarum, speaks of the custom as generally prevailing.

MARAH (bitterness), a place in the wilderness, three days from the place at which the Israelites crossed the Red Sea, with a spring whose water was so bitter that none could drink it, but which was sweetened by the casting-in of a tree which the Lord showed to Moses (Exod. xv. 23, 24; Num. xxxiii. 8, 9). It may be identical with the present Ayun Hawarah, forty-seven miles distant from Ayun Mousa, and also noted for its springs of better water.

MARAN-ATH'A, an Aramaic expression meaning "Our Lord cometh," used by Paul in 1 Cor. xvi. 22, in warning that the approaching advent of Christ would see the cursing of those who did not accept Jesus.

MARANOS, a name for the "New Christians" of Spain, because these included not only Jews, but Moors. See SPAIN.

MARANUS, Prudentius, b. Oct. 14, 1683; entered the Congregation of St. Maur in 1703; resided for many years in the abbey of St. Germain des Prés, but was expelled in 1731 on account of his opposition to the bull Unigenitus; returned afterwards to Paris, and died there April 2, 1762. He finished Touttée's edition of the works of Cyril of Jerusalem (1720), Baluze's edition of the works of Cyprian (1726), Garnier's edition of the works of Basil (1730), and edited himself the works of Justin: (Paris, 1742), accompanying the edition with some very elaborate prolegomena on Justin, Tatian, Athenagoras, etc. He also wrote Dissertation sur les Semiariens, Paris, 1722; Divinitas Jesu Christi, Paris, 1746; La doc- trine de l'écriture sur les guérisons miraculeuses, Paris, 1754, etc. See TASSIN: Hist. lit. de la Congrég. de Saint-Maur, 741-749. G. LAUBMANN.

MARBACH, Johann, b. at Lindau, on the Lake of Constance, Aug. 24, 1521; d. in Strassburg, March 17, 1581. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was in 1546 appointed pastor of the Church of St. Nicholas in Strassburg, afterwards, also professor of theology, and director of the church convention. In Strassburg the Swiss Reformation prevailed, and Butzer had worked there through many years for a reconciliation between Calvinism and Lutheranism. Marbach was an ardent adherent of the German Reformation, and labored unintermittingly for the introduction of Lutheranism in Strassburg. He partly succeeded. The Reformed hymns disappeared from the hymn-book. Butzer's catechism was supplanted by Luther's. Some of the Reformed pastors and professors left the city, and others were compelled to subscribe to the Confessio Augustana, etc. But his exclusiveness produced much haggling and disturbance. See TRENS: Situation intérieure de l'église Luthérienne de Strassbourg sous la direction de Marbach, Strassburg, 1857. He wrote a couple of pamphlets on the Lord's Supper, etc. C. SCHMIDT.

MARBURG BIBLE, The, appeared in 1712 at Marburg, in quarto, under the title Mystische und prophetische Bibel, etc. The text is that of Luther's translation, but revised and improved by Professor Horche, Inspector Scheffer of Berleburg, and others; and to this text are added introductions and explanations, generally after Cocejus, but, in some cases (the Song of Songs and the Revelation according to St. John), after Madame Guyon. The work was highly praised by the theologians of that time, and much used, especially by the mystics. It is, indeed, a precursor of the so-called Berleburg Bible. M. GOEBEL.

MARBURG, Conference of. Luther and Zwingli opened the battle with the Pope almost at the same moment, but independently of each other. From the very beginning, the German and the Swiss Reformation followed different tracks; and from 1521 a clash between the two movements became unavoidable. The point at issue was the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. A series of controversial pamphlets were exchanged between the Reformers. Others also participated in the contest, and the breach in the Protestant camp became a glaring fact. In the evangelical world this state of affairs caused much anxiety; and landgrave Philipp of Hesse was especially active in order to bring about a reconciliation. In the spring of 1529 he first broached the idea of a conference between the leaders of the two parties, to Melancthon on the one side, and Oecolampadius on the other; and both received it favorably. Zwingli also declared himself willing to accept the proposition. But Luther was from the very first disinclined. Nevertheless, when in September the landgrave sent out his invitations to Wittenberg, Basel, Zurich, and Strassburg, Luther accepted it; and Sept. 30 he arrived at Marburg, together with Melancthon, Jonas, Cruciger, Myconius from Gotha, Menius from Eisenach, and others. The day before, the Swiss had arrived,—Zwingli and Ulrich Funk from Zurich, Oecolampadius and Rudolf Frey from Basel, Butzer, Hedio, and Jacob Sturm from Strassburg. On Saturday, Oct. 2, arrived the South-Germans, — Osiander from Nuremberg, Brenz from Swabian Hall, Agricola from Augsburg, and others, — and the conference began. It lasted for three days. Luther was the spokesman of the Germans; Zwingli and Ecolampadius spoke in behalf of the Swiss. But no agreement was arrived at; though Zwingli declared, with tears in his eyes, that there were none with whom he should like better to make common cause than the men of Wittenberg. Luther was hard and unyielding. "You are of another spirit than we," he said. Fifteen articles of agreement were drawn up, however, and subscribed to by all present. But they refer only to the general principles of Protestantism in their opposition to Romanism, not to the special point in question. Afterwards, these Marburg Articles were made the basis of the Confessio Augustana.

LIT. — Rich sources of information concerning this notable event are found in the works of Luther, Zwingli, Melancthon, Jonas, Osiander, etc. See L. J. K. SCHMITT: Das Religionsgespräch zu Marburg, Marburg, 1840; H. HEPPE: Die 15 Marburger Artikel nach dem wieder aufgefundenen Autographen, Kassel, 1854; and J. KRADOLFER: Das Marburger Religionsgespräch, Berlin, 1871. [A. ERICSON: Das Marburger Religionsgespräch in J. 1529 nach ungedruckten Strassburger Urkunden, Strassburg, 1880, only 57 pp., but important for its new matter.] OSWALD SCHMIDT.

MARBURY, Edward, a minister of the Church of England, and rector in London; sequestered during the Rebellion; d. about 1655. He wrote two admirable commentaries, — one on Obadiah (London, 1649), and the other on Habakkuk (1650); the two reprinted in the Nichol's series, 1865.

MARCA, Petrus de, b. at Gant, Béarn, Jan. 24, 1594; d. in Paris, June 29, 1662. He studied law at Toulouse, and was in 1621 appointed president of the Parliament of Pau. In 1639 he was called to Paris as councillor of state. On the instance of Richelieu he wrote De concordia sacerdotii et imperii seu de libertatibus ecclesie gallicane, an exposition of the liberties of the Gallican Church (1641). But the book was put on the Index; and when, in 1643, the king appointed him bishop of Conserans, the Pope withheld the confirmation until he recanted (1651). In 1652 he was made archbishop of Toulouse, and in 1661 archbishop of Paris. Among his other works are, De Eucharistia (1624), De Constantinopolitana Patriarchata (1630), Histoire de Béarn (1640), Dissertationes posthumæ (edited by De Faget, Paris, 1669), and Opuscula (edited by Baluze, Paris, 1688). Both De Faget and Baluze have written biographies of him in their editions. MEJER.

MARCELLIANS and MARCELLINISTS, two heretical sects from the latter part of the second century, of which the first consisted of the followers of Marcellus of Ancyra (which article see); and the second, of the adherents of Marcellina, a pupil of Carpocrates, whose system of Gnosticism she taught with much success in Rome while Anicetus was bishop. See ORIGEN. Contra Celsum, v.

MARCELLINUS, Bishop of Rome from June 30, 296, to Oct. 25, 304. The latter date, however, is uncertain. See LIPSIVS: Chronologie der Römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1869. The Liber Pontificalis states, that, during the persecution, Marcellinus became a thurificatus; i. e., a Christian who offered incense on an idol's altar in order to escape persecution; and there is no reason for doubting the fact. Even Roman-Catholic writers accept it, though probably on account of the moral of the story, — that the Pope can be judged by no man (prima sedes non judicatur a quoquam). His martyrdom, however, seems to be a fiction, and the acts of the synod of Sinnessa (MANSI: Collection of Councils, i. 1250) are a later fabrication. See PAPERROCH: Acta Sanctorum, in Propyl. Maji, viii. ADOLF HARNACK.

MARCELLUS is the name of two popes. — Marcellus I. is left entirely out by Eusebius and Jerome, but succeeded Marcellinus (according to the Catal. Liberianus) after a vacancy of seven years. Lipsius, however, in his Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe (Kiel, 1869), fixes his reign with great probability from May 24, 307, to Jan. 15, 309. His martyrdom (Acta Sancti, Jan., ii.) seems to be a fiction; but it is a fact (De Rossi: Roma Sotteran., ii. 204; KRAUS: Roma Sotter., p. 171), that Maxentius banished him from the city, not because he was a Christian, but on account of the furious riots, which, between 306 and 309, took place within the Christian congregation. — Marcellus II. was elected Pope, April 10, 1555, and ascended the throne under great expectations, but died May 1, same year. See POLIDORUS: De vita, et moribus M., ii. 1744. ADOLF HARNACK.

MARCELLUS is the name of five martyrs recorded by the martyrologies, besides Marcellus I., Bishop of Rome. — I. One Marcellus was during the persecution of Antoninus Philosophus, about 140, sunk into the ground to the waist, and left to die in that position at Chalons-sur-Saone, because he refused to participate in an entertainment given by the prefect Priseus. He expired after the lapse of three days, and is commemorated on Sept. 4. Whether or not there is any historical fact at the bottom of this legend cannot be made out. See GREGORY OF TOURS: Liber de gloria martyrum, c. 53; and RUINART: Acta primorum martyrum, p. 73. — II. Marcellus, captain of the Trojan legion, was beheaded at Tingis in 270, on the order of Aurelianus Agricola, prefect of Mauritania, because he refused to participate in the heathen festivals and sacrifices. He is commemorated on Oct. 30. See RUINART: l. c., p. 302. — III. Marcellus who suffered martyrdom at Argenton in Gaul, during the reign of Aurelian (270-275), was born in Rome, and educated a Christian. When the persecution broke out in the metropolis, he fled to Argenton: but there he attracted the attention of the prefect Heraclius, by miraculously curing a cripple, a deaf man, and a mute; and, as he openly confessed himself a Christian, he was ordered by the prefect to be whipped, roasted, burnt alive, etc. The tortures, however, took no effect upon him; and he was finally beheaded. He is commemorated on June 29. See GREGORY OF TOURS: l. c., chap. 52. The legend seems, however, to be a mere fiction. See GÖRRES, in Jahrbücher für protest. Theologie, 1880, iv. 449-494. — IV. Marcellus, Bishop of Apamea in Syria, fell, during the reign of Theodosius the Great (379-395), a victim to the fanaticism of the Pagans, which, however, he himself had roused by destroying Pagan temples, at the head of a gang of gladiators and soldiers. He was burnt. See SOZOMEN: Hist. Eccl., vii. 15. — V. MARCELLUS, Bishop of Die in France, in the beginning of the sixth century, was thrown into prison by the Arians, and died there. He is commemorated on April 9. See GREGORY OF TOURS: Lib. de gloria confess., c. 70.

MARCELLUS, Bishop of Ancyra in Galatia, appeared as a zealous adherent of the homoousian doctrine at the synods of Nicaea (325), where he met Athanasius, Tyre and Jerusalem (335), but fell, by his work De subjectione Domini Christi, written against the Arians, under the suspicion of Sabellianism, and was deposed, by the Council of Constantinople, 336. Eusebius of Caesarea wrote against him, Contra Marcellum and De ecclesiastica theologia; and the copious quotations in the books of Eusebius give a tolerably clear idea of his peculiar theology. After the death of Constantine the Great, he was able to resume his see. Nevertheless, he was again deposed, probably at the same time as Bishop Paulus of Constantinople, and sought refuge in the West. Bishop Julius of Rome recognized him as orthodox; and so did the synod of Sardica, 343. It does not seem, however, that he ever returned to Ancyra; and when, under Constantius, the Arians came into ascendancy, he was condemned, together with Athanasius, by the synods of Arles (353) and Milan (355). Even his relation with Athanasius was disturbed by his Sabellianism, though the confession which the Marcellians of Ancyra sent to Athanasius was by him accepted as satisfactory. See Eugenii legatio ad Athanasium, in MONTFAUCON: Nova Coll. Veterum Patrum, ii.; MANSI: Coll. Conc., iii.; and RETTBERG: Marcelliana. After the rupture with Athanasius, he seems to have lived in retirement; and, according to Epiphanius, he died two years before the publication of Ad. Har., that is, in 373 or 374. See ZAHN: Marcellus von Ancyra, Gotha, 1867. W. MÖLLER.

MARCHETTI, Giovanni, b. at Empoli, near Florence, in 1753; d. in Rome, Nov. 15, 1829. He studied law in his native city, and theology in Rome; and was ordained a priest in 1777. His Saggio, etc. (1780), and Critica, etc. (1782), a sharp criticism, in Ultramontanist spirit, of the Histoire eccl. of Fleury, attracted the attention of Pius VI., who gave him a pension. Suspected of having exercised a decisive influence on Pius VII. on the occasion of the excommunication of Napoleon, he was imprisoned, and banished to Elba, but afterwards allowed to live in his native city. After 1815 he returned to Rome, was made archbishop of Ancyra, in partibus, etc. He was a very prolific writer, and for some time a steady contributor to the Giornale Ecclesiastico di Roma.

MARCION and his School played, in the second century, the same part in the history of the Church as the Manichæans in the period from the third to the sixth century. The two sects are, indeed, agreed in many points. Both of them are dualistic, doctetic, ascetic, and critically reserved with respect to the canon of the New Testament. And the difference between them is one of form and construction, rather than one of contents and character. While Manichæism at every point dissolves the ethical processes of history and life into metaphysical speculations, the metaphysical principles on which Marcionism rests are twisted around so as to obtain a moral bearing on practical life; but in both cases the speculative foundation is nearly the same.

Marcion was born at Sinope in Pontus, in the first half of the second century, and came to Rome between 140 and 150. His severe asceticism made a deep impression there, and at first his relation to the congregation was very friendly. But it changed after he made the acquaintance of Cerdo, a Syrian Gnostic, whose doctrines he adopted and further developed. In Cerdo's system he found the speculative foundation for his own dualistic conceptions, and the speculative arguments for his personal hatred of Judaism. About ten years after the time of Valentine, he began to expound his system in Rome. His idea was not simply to gather around himself, as other Gnostic teachers had done, a circle of such as were perfect, — perfect in knowledge, and perfect in asceticism. On the contrary, he proposed to reform the whole Church by eliminating from her doctrines all those elements which were due to Judaism, and had crept stealthily into Christianity by way of tradition. His success may be estimated from the number and violence of his adversaries. Justin wrote against him, also Rhodon, Theophilus of Antioch, Philippus, and others; and Irenæus intended to devote a separate work to the refutation of his doctrines. Marcionite bishops and presbyters are often mentioned. Epiphanius says that Marcion had adherents in Rome and Italy, in Egypt and Pontus, in Arabia and Syria, in Cyprus and in the Thebaid; and Theodoret tells us, that, in Syria alone, he had converted more than one thousand Marcionists (Ep. 113). [Waddington found in Syria the ruins of a Marcionite temple. See No. 2518 in his Inscriptions grecques et latines, Paris, 1871.] It was, however, not so much the speculative part of the system which fascinated people: on the contrary, the history of the sect shows that to have become its ruin. But the practical part of the system, its ethics, impressed even men like Tertullian. The complete separation from the ἐλθ (see Gnosticism, p. 879), and the complete absorption in the love of God, was the principle of that ethics. Not only the theatre and the circus were abhorred; but every thing ornamental, even the elegance of refined social forms, was despised. Flesh and wine were forbidden. Marriage was rejected, and martyrdom was looked upon as the crown of human life. Under Constantine the Great the persecutions against the sect began, and they were continued under his successors. But the final disappearance of the sect was not due to those persecutions, but to internal dissensions on speculative reasons.

As the common gnostical, allegorical interpretation did not suffice to bring the Marcionite system in harmony with the New Testament, Marcion formed a canon of his own, consisting of the Pauline Letters (though in an altered form), and of one Gospel, most closely resembling that of Luke. The relation between this Gospel of Marcion and the four canonical Gospels has in the present century been the subject of very minute investigations. Down to the time of Semler, biblical critics generally contented themselves with the statements of the Fathers; but he, the true precursor of the Tübingen school, always anxious to find the traces of Judaism in the ancient church, thought, that, in the Gospel of Marcion, he had found a remnant of that original Christianity which Judaism had tried to destroy. Eichhorn and others further developed the hypothesis; but its true scientific basis it did not obtain until Balm undertook to restore the text of Marcion's Gospel from the notices of Tertullian and Epiphanius. Das Evangelium Marcions, Königsberg, 1823. Balm, however, came to the conclusion, that, in their relation to the primitive Gospel from which both the Gospel of Luke and that of Marcion must be considered as derivations, it is Marcion, and not Luke, who has made arbitrary changes from dogmatical reasons. Otherwise, F. C. BAUR: Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanon. Evang., Tübingen, 1847. He returned to the hypothesis of Semler, and even went so far as to try to separate the original Pauline elements in the Gospel of Luke from the later Judaizing additions. This gave rise to further hypotheses. See HILGENFELD: Kritische Untersuchungen über die Evang. Justin, der element. Homilien, und Marcions, Halle, 1850; and VOLKMAR: *Das Evang. MARCUS AURELIUS, Roman emperor from March 7, 161, to March 17, 180; was b. in Rome, April 26, 121; a son of Annianus Verus; and was in 138 adopted by Antoninus Pius, whose daughter Faustina he married in 146. His reign was an almost uninterrupted series of campaigns in the East and in the North; and he died, from the plague, in his camp in Pannonia. Nevertheless, he found time, not only to reform the legislation, and watch the administration, of the empire, but also to cultivate philosophy, of which he had been a devoted student from early youth: indeed, he was the philosopher on the throne. His standpoint was that of eclectic stoicism,—a kind of moral rationalism enlivened by a deep faith in an all-pervading and all-governing reason. His works—a Dialogue, twelve books of Meditations, Letters, etc., written in Greek—represent him as a pious and substantial character, equally averse to the vulgar and to the hollow, and intent upon avoiding silliness in religion, and sophistry in philosophy. How far he knew Christianity cannot be decided. The view he took of the contempt of death, so common among the Christians (Med., xi. 3), is that generally prevailing among the philosophers of that period. The conditions of the Christian Church were the same under him as under his predecessors, Antoninus Pius, Hadrian, and Trajan; but local persecutions, caused by popular fanaticism, became more and more frequent. There exists on this point a double tradition. The older, which originated from the apologists, was inclined to shut the eyes to what the Christians actually suffered under Marcus Aurelius, and produced such fabrications as the Decretum ad commune Asiæ, and the Letter of 171 from the emperor to the Senate, referring to the legend of the Legio fulminatrix, and ascribing the victory to the prayers of the Christians. The later tradition, which was not restrained by any regard to the powers that be, represented the reign of Marcus Aurelius as the fifth period of persecution. The principal sources of information concerning the true state of the Christian Church during that period are, the acts of the martyrdom of Justin, in his Opera, iii. (ed. Otto), dating between 163 and 167; the Peregrinus Proteus of Lucian, written a few years after 165; the works of Melito of Sardis (Eusebius: Hist. eccl., IV. 23); the works of the apologists; and the authentic report of the persecution in Lyons and Vienne (Eusebius, l. c., V. 1), which show that persecutions took place, though not instigated by the government, which, on the contrary, seems to have taken pains to enforce the laws of Hadrian and Trajan.

MARCUS EREMITA, an Egyptian hermit, who, according to Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., vi. 29) and Palladius (Hist. Laus., 20), lived in the desert of Scetis, towards the close of the fourth and in the beginning of the fifth century; a contemporary of Chrysostom and the younger Macarius. Many wonderful stories are told about him; but in some cases the same stories are told also about Macarius; and the resemblance of the two names seems to have produced a good deal of confusion. (See TILLEMONT: Mem., viii. 226, 811; FLOSS: Macarii Æg. Epistolæ, Cologne, 1850, p. 73; OUDIN: De Script. Eccles., i. 902.) Marcus is said to have died 410, more than a hundred years old. He is commemorated in the Greek Church on March 25. (See Act. Sanct., M. 5, p. 367.) A Vita Marci, in manuscript, is mentioned by Montfauçon, in his Palæogr. Gr., p. 323; and a short Hist. de S. M. Abbate has been published by Floss, in his edition of the works of Macarius.

As Marcus is a frequently occurring name among the monks, it is difficult to decide whether the notices extant refer to one person or to several. Nicéphorus (xi. 35, xiv. 30, 54) seems to make a distinction between an older and a younger Marcus, of whom the latter lived during the reign of Theodosius (408-450), was a pupil of Chrysostom, and a contemporary of Isidore of Pelusium, Nilus, and Theodoret, and wrote forty treatises on asceticism. There are also mentioned a monk of the name Marcus, from the ninth century (the reign of Leo VI.), and a Briton, Marcus Eremita, or Anachoreta, from the tenth century. Nevertheless, the supposition of Bellarmin, that the nine treatises which have come down to us under the name of Marcus Eremita do not belong to the celebrated saint from the fourth century, but to some obscure monk from the ninth century, is entirely unwarranted: both internal and external evidences speak against it. Photius (Bibl. Cod., 200, p. 162 ed. Bekker, p. 667 ed. Migne) mentions nine treatises identical with those we possess. In the seventh century, Maximus Confessor gives extracts from a work of Marcus (Op., i. 702, ed. Combefis). In the sixth century, Dorotheus quotes six passages from him. (Comp. Tillemont, l. c., x. 801.) Finally, the general resemblance between the ideas and views of the nine treatises, and those of the works of Chrysostom, Macarius, Nilus, and Isidore of Pelusium, is so striking, that the authors must be considered as contemporaries. But it may be questioned whether the author of the treatises is identical with the Marcus Eremita of Sozomen and Palladius, or whether, with Nicephorus, a distinction should be made between an elder and a younger Marcus. See GALLANDI: Prolegom.; DU PIN: Nouv. Bibl., iii. 8; OUDIN, l. c., i. 902; CELLIER: Auteurs eccles., xvii. 300; CAVE: Script. eccl., i. 372; TILLEMONT, l. c., viii. and x.; FICKER, in Zeitschrift f. hist. Theologie, 1868, i. 402.

The nine treatises are, On the Spiritual Law, Useful to such as embrace an Ascetic Life; On Justification by Faith, and not by Good Works; On the Penitence necessary to All; On Baptism; On the Subjugation of Anger and Lust; On Enthusiasm and Ecstasy; On General Moral Questions; A Dialogue between the Soul and the Spirit; and, On the Relation between Christ and Melchisedec with Reference to Heb. vii. 3. They were published in Latin and Greek by Fronto Duceus, in Auct. Patr. (Paris, 1624, i. 871), but more complete by Gallandi (tom. viii.) and Migne (tom. 65). By the Roman-Catholic Church they were put on the Index as caute legenda ("to be read with caution"). Bellarmin and other Roman-Catholic writers have tried to represent them as fabrications of some modern heretic; but by most Roman-Catholic historians they have been persistently ignored.

MARCUS EUGENICUS, Archbishop of Ephesus, acted as one of the representatives of the Greek Church at the Council of Ferrara-Florence, 1438, and distinguished himself by his unyielding resistance to the papal pretensions. The doctrines of purgatory, the procession of the Holy Spirit, the use of unleavened bread in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and the primacy of the Pope, were the principal points of difference; and the debate was long and bitter. A formula of concord was finally found, however; and both the Latins and the Greeks subscribed to it, July 6, 1439. Only Marcus refused to sign; and when summoned before a papal court, composed of cardinals and bishops, and presided over by the Pope himself, he came, took his seat among the bishops, and began discussing the matter without condescending to defend himself. After his return to his diocese, he continued to work against the union; and on his death-bed (1447) he took an oath of Gennadius, afterwards patriarch of Constantinople, that he would oppose any such scheme to the last. A list of his works is found in LABBE: Con. Coll., xiii. 677; and in FABRICIUS: Bib. Græc., x. 530. See literature under art. FERRARA-FLORENCE. COUNCIL OF. GASS.

MARGOLIOUTH, Moses, Ph.D., LL.D., Hebraist: b. in London, Dec. 3, 1820; d. at Little Linford, Feb. 25, 1881. He was of Jewish parentage, but was early converted to Christianity; entered Trinity College, Dublin; took orders in 1844, and held various positions in the Church of England, being at his death vicar of Little Linford, near Newport Pagnell, Bucks. He was the author of very many works upon Hebrew and Jewish topics, among which may be mentioned The Poetry of the Pentateuch (1871), The Lord's Prayer no Adaptation of existing Jewish Petitions (1876). For list, see Men of the Time, 10th ed., London, 1879, s. v.

MARHEINEKE, Philipp Konrad, one of the most brilliant and positive theologians of the first half of the nineteenth century; b. at Hildesheim, May 1, 1780; d. at Berlin, May 31, 1846. In 1798 he entered the university of Göttingen, where he came more especially under the influence of Ammon, Planck, and Stäudlin; became repetent there in 1804, and in 1805 professor of theology, and second university preacher, at Erlangen. His more important literary publications were inaugurated in 1806 by the issue of the first part of a universal church history, the prosecution of which, however, was subsequently abandoned. His next work was an Allgemeine Darstellung d. theol. Geistes d. kirchl. Verfassung u. kanonischen Rechtswissenschaft in Bezug auf d. Moral d. Christenthums u. d. ethische Denkart d. Mittelalters (Nürnberg, 1806), which was designed to be the first part of a history of ethics in the centuries just before the Reformation. The work was never completed. These writings, however, betrayed a vigorous mind; and in 1807 their author was called to Heidelberg, where he came into intimate contact with Daub, to whose Studien he contributed valuable articles. At this period he published his System d. Katholizismus in seiner symbolischen Entwicklung ("The Development of Catholicism as displayed in its Symbols"), 3 vols., Heidelberg, 1810-13, whose thorough treatment of the Roman-Catholic system made it of fundamental importance for the science of symbolics. In 1812 he published a compendium of Symbolics under the title Inst. symbol. doctrinarum Cathol., Protest., Socin. Eccles., etc. In usum lectionum, ed. iii., etc., Berlin, 1830. In 1818 his lectures on Symbolics appeared at Berlin.

In 1811 Marheineke followed a call to the recently founded university of Berlin, and continued to labor there as professor, and (after 1820) as the colleague of Schleiermacher, in the pulpit of Trinity Church, until his death. His principal writings during this period were his History of the German Reformation (Gesch. d. deutschen Reformation, 2 vols., Berlin, 1816, and 4 vols., Berlin, 1831-34), extending to the year 1555, and characterized by a thorough acquaintance with the sources, and a desire to make them speak for themselves; and his System of Theology (Dogmatik) which appeared in a triple form in 1819, 1827, and 1847. He became a pronounced follower of Hegel, over whose grave he uttered a glowing eulogy, and came to be recognized as the leader of the so-called "right wing" of that philosopher's disciples, who affirmed that Hegelianism can be reconciled with positive Christianity. Marheineke's Dogmatics has historical value, because it was written from this philosophical stand-point. In 1835 he lectured on the significance of the Hegelian philosophy for Christian theology, and assisted in editing Hegel's works (Vorlesungen über d. Philos. d. Relig., etc., herausgegeben v. Prof. Marheineke, Berlin, 1832). But it was this very relation to Hegelianism which involved him in his latter years in many conflicts, and occasioned not a little bitterness. Two of his pupils and friends, Matthies and Vatke, edited a part of his theological lectures in 4 vols., Berlin, 1847-49 (vol. i., Moral.; ii., Dogmatik; iii., Symbolik; iv., Dogmengeschichte). A sketch of Marheineke's life was prefixed to vol. i. WAGENMANN.

MARIAMNE (the Greek form of the Hebrew Miriam) was the daughter of Alexander, and the wife of Herod the Great, to whom she bore two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, and two daughters, Salampso and Cypros. In a fit of jealousy her husband had her put to death. See art. HEROD.

MARIANA, Juan, b. at Talavera, in the diocese of Toledo, 1537; d. at Toledo, 1624; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1554; taught theology in Rome (1561), Sicily (1565), Paris (1569), and returned to Spain in 1574. He was a prolific writer, and several of his books produced a sensation. His De rege et regis institutione was written at the instance of Garcia de Loaysa, the tutor of Philip III., and was published at Toledo 1598. It contains the famous proposition, that a king, when he tries to overthrow the Church, may be justly killed when he cannot be deposed; and, in harmony with this maxim, Clement was openly praised for his assassination of Henry III. In France the book was burnt, after the order of the Parliament of Paris; and it contributed not a little to rouse a feeling of suspicion and hatred against the Jesuits. With the same audacity with which he revealed the secret moral springs in the policy of his order, he also uncovered its weaknesses, and attacked its faults. By some indiscretion, his De las enfermedades de la Compañia de Jesus fell into the hands of a French bookseller; and he at once published it in French, Italian, Spanish, and Latin (Bordeaux, 1625). The general of the order caused it to be condemned by Urban VIII. A work which was well accepted by all was his History of Spain, written in Latin, and then translated by himself into Spanish. It consists of thirty books, and reaches to 1516. The first twenty books were published at Toledo, in 1592;

and the ten last, in 1605. See P. ALEGAMBRE: Bibl. Script. Soc. Jesu, p. 258. HERZOG.

MARIANISTS (Knights of the Holy Virgin, Fratri godenti, Frères joyeux) was the name of an order of knights, consisting of noblemen, which was formed at Bologna about 1233, for the purpose of protecting widows and orphans during the general insecurity and violence caused by the contest between the Guelfs and the Ghibelines. It was founded by Bartolomeo, a Dominican monk, who afterwards became bishop of Vicenza, and was confirmed by Urban IV. As the members were allowed to marry, hold private property, etc., they were generally called Fratres gaudentes. Commanderies were founded at Modena, Mantua, Treviso, and other cities in Northern Italy. Towards the close of the sixteenth century the order disappeared. In 1589 Sixtus V. transferred its property to the college of Mantalto. See GUCCI: Iconografia storica degli ordini religiosi e cavallereschi, Rome, 1836, i. pp. 128-130. ZÖCKLER.

MARIAZELL, a village of Styria in Austria, with about one thousand inhabitants; has a beautiful church, built in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and containing a celebrated image of the Holy Virgin, brought thither in the twelfth century, and reputed as miracle-working. The place is annually visited by more than a hundred thousand pilgrims.

MARIE À LA COQUE, b. at Lauthecourt, in the diocese of Autun, July 22, 1617; d. Oct. 17, 1690. She entered the order of the Salesian nuns, as novice, Aug. 27, 1671; took the vow Nov. 6, 1672; and attained great celebrity by the visions she pretended to have, and the miracles which were ascribed to her. She wrote La dévotion au cœur de Jésus, and some other mystical treatises. Her life was written by J. Joseph Lanquet, Paris, 1729, and by Daras, Paris, 1875. Her memory has chiefly been kept up by the four songs, Pervert, in the Œuvres de M. Gresset, Amsterdam, 1748, i. 9-45.

MARINUS is the name of two popes. — Marinus I. (882-884) was the son of a presbyter, Palumbo, and a native of Gaul. Before his accession he was three times sent to Constantinople as papal legate, — in 866 by Nicholas I., in 869 by Adrian II., and in 880 by John VIII.; and every time his errand was the controversy with Photius. His first official act after his accession was to condemn Photius; and as he was bishop of Caere when he was elected bishop of Rome, and such a removal from one see to another was canonically illegal, Photius answered by protesting against the validity of his election. On account of the great similarity between the two names Marinus and Martinus, they have often been confounded; and Marinus I. is, indeed, in the papal catalogues, recorded under the name Martinus II. His letters are found in BOUQUET: Recueil des historiens des Gaules et de la France, ix. 198. The sources of his life are given by MURATORI: Rer. Ital. Script., iii. p. 269; WATTERICH: Pontif. Rom. Vita, i. p. 29; and JAFFÉ: Regista Pontif. Rom., p. 292. — Marinus II. (942-946) owed his elevation to Alberic, "the prince and senator of all the Romans," and was nothing but a tool in his hands. The same confusion with respect to the name has taken place with him as with Marinus I. See WATTERICH: l. c., i. p. 34. R. ZÖPFEL.

MARIUS OF AVENTICUM descended from a noble family of Autun, and was in 574 elected Bishop of Avenches, in the present canton of Vaud, Switzerland. He afterwards removed the see from Avenches to Lausanne, and d. there Dec. 31, 593. He continued the Chronicle of Prosper Aquitanus from 455 to 581, published in the Collections of Duchesne and Dom Bouquet, but best by Rickly, in Mémoires et documents publiés par la société d'histoire de la Suisse Romande, xiii. The principal source of his life is the Cartular. Lausann. See also ARNDT: Bischof Marius v. Aventicum, Leipzig, 1875. E. F. GELPKE.

MARIUS MERCATOR, an ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, who played an important part in the Pelagian and Nestorian controversies. He is mentioned only by Augustine (Ep., 193; Quæst. ad Dulcit., 3) and Posidius (Indic. Libr. Augustini 4), and very little is known of his personal life: thus it is doubtful whether he was a priest, or a monk, or a layman. His spiritual character and dogmatical views, his style, his connection with Augustine, and his acquaintance with African affairs, seem to indicate that he was a native of North Africa. In 418 he must have lived in Rome. There he became acquainted with the chief representatives of Pelagianism, and wrote a book against them, which he sent to Augustine for examination. Augustine was, by a journey to Mauritania, prevented from reading the book immediately; and, when he returned to Hippo, he found a new work by Marius in the same line. He received both books with great kindness, exhorted the author to continue as he had begun, and recommended him to his friends in Rome. Later on, but before 429, Marius went to Constantinople, where he spent a part of his life, as it would seem, in some kind of an official position; perhaps as the agent of Cœlestine I. (422-432) and Sixtus III. (432-440). He spoke with authority; and his sole object was to defend the papal see against the Pelagians, and effect their condemnation. For this purpose he drew up, in the Greek language, a Commonitorium, which he presented to the Emperor Theodosius II., and translated into Latin. The result of this memoir was the banishment from Constantinople of Julian of Eclanum, Cœlestius, and other Pelagian leaders, and their condemnation by the synod of Ephesus (431). In the same year he wrote against Julian, and translated into Latin, the Anathemata of Cyril, and other documents pertaining to the Pelagian and Nestorian controversies. The last of his translations dates from 449. After 451 all information of him ceases.

As a translator, Marius is literal and often awkward: his style is rough and uncouth. As a polemic, he is violent and often unjust, his own views being very narrow. But he was a staunch champion of orthodoxy, and his writings contain much valuable information about his contemporaries. They fall into two groups; referring partly to the Pelagian, and partly to the Nestorian controversy. The first group comprises the above-mentioned Adversus novos hæreticos, written in Rome 417 or 418, and sent to Augustine for examination and approbation (it is lost, unless it be identical with the Hypomnesticon formerly ascribed to Augustine, and generally printed among his works); the Commonitorium, also mentioned above; another Commonitorium against Julian; and translations of Nestorius' Epistle to Cœlestine, four Sermons by him, the Symbolum Theodori Mops., and extracts from his work against Augustine. The second group comprises translations of five Sermons by Nestorius, four Epistles by Cyril, Cyril's Apologeticus adv. Orientales, his Apologeticus adv. Theodoretum, his Scholia de incarnatione Verbi Unigeniti, fragments of Theodoret, Theodore, Diodorus, Ibas, etc. The works of Marius Mercator were for a long time not known at all; though they were evidently used in the ninth century, during the Gottschalk controversy and the Pseudo-Isidorian fabrication, which gave rise to the peculiar fable of an Isidorus Mercator. A collected edition of them was first published by J. Garnier, Paris, 1673, 2 vols. folio, and then by Baluze, Paris, 1684. The latter is the best, and has been reprinted in Gallandi, Bibl. Patrum., viii.: while Migne has adopted the former in his Patrol. Latin., 48.

WAGENMANN.

MARK, one of the four evangelists, whose name has passed over to the Gospel by his hand. 1. THE MAN. — John, surnamed Mark, a born Jew (Col. iv. 10, 11), comes to view, in the history of the apostolic church, in company with Barnabas and Paul, about the year 45. There is no tenable ground for denying, as Grotius and Schleiermacher did, the identity of John Mark and Mark. He is not only referred to by both these names, but also by the simple name of John (Acts xiii. 5, 13). John was his Hebrew name, Mark his Latin surname. His mother's (Mary's) house in Jerusalem was a resort for the believers (Acts xii. 12). He is called by Peter "his son" (1 Pet. v. 13), which makes it probable that he had been brought to the faith by Peter. He was a cousin of Barnabas (Col. iv. 10), and accompanied him and Paul on their missionary tour as far as Perga in Pamphylia (Acts xiii. 5, 13), whence he returned, against their will (Acts xv. 38), to Jerusalem. For this reason Paul refused to take him as his companion on his second missionary journey. This was the occasion of a separation between him and Barnabas, who took Mark to Cyprus (Acts xv. 36-39). Ten years later, Paul and Mark stand in friendly relations, and Paul calls him his co-laborer (Col. iv. 10; Philem. 21). Paul subsequently requested Timothy to send him to Rome (2 Tim. iv. 11). The last biblical notice connects his name with Peter in the vicinity of Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13). [Olshausen, Lange, Archbishop Thomson, and others, hold it probable that the nameless young man who followed Christ on the night of his betrayal (Mark xiv. 51, 52) was John Mark.] According to the testimony of the early church, the relation between Mark and Peter was a very intimate one. Papias (Euseb. 3, 39), who leans upon the presbyter John as his authority, informs us that he was Peter's interpreter. He says, "Mark was the interpreter of Peter, and wrote down accurately what he remembered; . . . for he neither heard the Lord himself, nor followed him, but at a later time he followed Peter" (Μάρκος μὲν ἑρμηνεύτης Πέτρον γενόμενος, ὅσα ἑμαρμόνευσεν, ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν . . . οὔτε γὰρ ἴκοντο τοῦ κυρίου οὔτε παρακολούθησεν αὐτῷ, ὕστερον δὲ Πέτρον). A later tradition, that he resided with Peter in Rome, is less reliable, as it is open to the suspicion of being founded on the interpretation of Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13) as Rome (Euseb., 2, 15; JEROME: Catal., 8). Further traditions state, that, after Peter's death, he went to Alexandria, established a congregation, became its first bishop, and suffered a martyr's death.

II. THE GOSPEL.—The early church placed the second Gospel of the canon in a very intimate relation to Peter, as it did the Gospel of Luke to Paul. Papias relates that Mark wrote down the things he heard from Peter, but did not observe any definite arrangement (οὐ μέντοι τάξει τὰ ὑπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἢ λεχθέντα ἢ πραχθέντα). At a later time, Justin (c. Tryph., 106) calls the Gospel the "Reminiscences of Peter" (τὰ ἀπομνημονεύματα Πέτρου); and Tertullian (c. Marc., 4, 5) says it is "called Mark because he edited the Gospel of Peter" (evangelium Petri). Irenæus (Her., iii. 1) adds, that Mark wrote it after the death (ἔξοδόν) of Peter and Paul; and at the time of Eusebius (iii. 15) the opinion was universal, that Peter sustained a close relation to the Gospel; while Jerome says (Catal., 8, etc.) that the "Gospel was composed, Peter narrating, and Mark writing." Against this universal testimony to the influence of Peter upon the second Gospel, no tenable objection can be urged. Some (Baur, Hilgenfeld, Köstlin) have argued, from the notice of Papias, that there was an original document by Mark, which contained aphoristic utterances of Peter, but has been lost. But this theory goes upon the arbitrary supposition that Papias, in the words οὐ τάξει ("did not follow a definite arrangement") meant a haphazard collection of sayings; but this cannot be made out to be his meaning. Another theory was set on foot by Griesbach, according to which Mark is a mere epitome of, or compilation from, Matthew and Luke. This view, with some modifications, has been advocated by Fritzsche, De Wette, Bleek, Delitzsch, [Davidson], and others, and looks for its confirmation to the contents (by far the largest portion of which is contained in Matthew and Luke) and to the arrangement of the contents; the compiler using Matthew and Luke alternately (Mark i. 1-20, comp. Matt. iii. 4; Mark i. 21 sqq., comp. Luke iv. 31-vi. 17; Mark iii. 23-35, comp. Matt. xii.; Mark iv., v., comp. Luke viii., etc.). Another argument is, that the Gospel shows its secondary origin by the prosaic reflections and additions which the author inserts in his narrative (comp. viii. 3, xi. 13), etc. But this theory likewise lacks all sound foundation. The arguments are deceptive. The first thing to be brought against it is the wide belief of the early church (Melito, Irenæus, Origen, Jerome, etc.) that the Gospels were arranged according to the date of their composition, Luke consequently following Mark. It cannot be shown that Mark had any partisan purpose in writing his Gospel; and, in the absence of this, no reasons can be given why he should have passed by the infancy of Jesus, the Sermon on the Mount, the raising of the widow of Nain's son, the great discourse against the Pharisees, and other narratives, if he was a mere compiler from Matthew and Luke. Again: the theory is made most improbable by the circumstance that Mark does not contain any of the characteristic peculiarities or excellences of Matthew and Luke.

No: the picturesque freshness and vividness of detail, especially in the sections which are peculiar to this Gospel, betray the hand of an original author. He preserves striking Hebrew expressions (iii. 17; v. 41; vii. 11-31), adds numerous details (i. 20; iv. 38 sqq.; vii. 2, 5, 6, 17; viii. 11; xiv. 3, 5, etc.), and represents Christ's rebukes of his disciples as sharper than the other Gospels (iv. 13, 40; vi. 52; viii. 17 sq., etc.). But the main point is, that the sections which Matthew and Luke have in common, Mark has; whereas sections which are peculiar to them he has not. This circumstance would rather prove Mark to be the original from which the other two synoptists drew, than vice versa.

There remains only one more question in this connection: Is our canonical Mark identical with the Mark spoken of by Papias? Holtzmann (D. synopt. Evangelien) and Bernhard Weiss (D. Marcusevangelium, and also D. Matthäusevangelium), the representatives of the two principal classes of views, both accord to Mark much originality, but hold that this is not the original Gospel. Holtzmann thinks the Mark of Papias was the original from which our canonical Mark was derived, after the destruction of Jerusalem, and for the Church in Rome. Weiss, on the other hand, regards the λόγια ("discourses") of Matthew (see MATTHEW) as the original source of our Gospels, and derives our Mark partly from them, and partly from the reminiscences of Peter. That Weiss's modification of the so-called "Mark-theory" (Marcus-Hypothese) involves more intricate complications than that of Holtzmann, there can be no doubt; and for this reason it has found less acceptance than the labor and skill that have been spent upon it would otherwise seem to warrant.

The purpose of the Gospel of Mark is best expressed in its first words, "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." It brings out the divine glory of the person of Christ, its divine individuality and sublimity, with which his incomparable and superhuman deeds impressed an astonished world. The discourses of our Lord are not ignored, but it is the daily deeds of healing and power which the second Gospel emphasizes. A school of critics, denying this purely historical aim, claim that Mark was written for a partisan purpose. Baur affirms his purpose was to preserve a position of studied neutrality between the Judaizing and Gentile types of Christianity. Hilgenfeld held that it leaned towards Petrinism; Volkmar, towards Paulinism, etc. Most strange! These critics come, with their fixed theories of apostolic Christianity, to the Bible, and there pick out the arguments for their positions. There is only one possible conclusion: if Mark serves neither the Gentile nor the Judaizing type of Christianity, and shows no polemical leaning to either, it follows that he was not led to write by any partisan purpose.

The Gospel was written for Gentile Christians, more especially for Roman readers, as is evident from the absence of appeals to the Old Testament, except in chap. i. 2 (xv. 28 being of very doubtful authenticity), and of those passages which would be of more especial interest to Jewish readers. The genealogies, passages referring to Christ's being sent to Israel, the continued efficacy of the law, etc., are all wanting. On the other hand, explanatory observations are added, which were unnecessary for Jewish readers (vii. 3, 4, 34; xii. 42; xv. 42). Christ brought the gospel (i. 15), whose destination is a universal one; and the temple itself was to be a house of prayer for all the nations (xi. 17).

The date of the Gospel has been put down by some (Keim, Hilgenfeld) to the latter part of the first century: Holtzmann says, shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem; Weiss, about the year 70. The Gospel itself contains no details which enable us to fix the date with certainty, not even the eschatological discourses of chap. xiii. The testimonies of the early church writers have already been given. Irenæus says it was written after the deaths of Peter and Paul; but, from Clement of Alexandria on, the tendency was to seek an earlier date, until Eusebius at last fixed it at 43. Every thing points to a date prior to the destruction of Jerusalem: [Meyer, Hitzig, 55-57; Archbishop Thomson and Dean Alford, 63-70; Lange, 68-70; Riddle, 64, etc.]

The place of composition was, according to the ancient testimonies of Clement, Irenæus, Eusebius, and Jerome, the city of Rome; and there is no good ground for disputing them. On the other hand, this view is favored by the explanation of Greek by Roman expressions (ii. 4; v. 9, 15, 23; vi. 27, 37; vii. 4, 8; xii. 14, 42; xiv. 5; xv. 15, 39, 44), and is held by Gieseler, Tholuck, Schwegler, Hilgenfeld, Meyer, etc. The isolated notice of Chrysostom (Hom. 1., in Matth.), that it was written in Alexandria, is unsupported by any of the Alexandrian Fathers.

Among Mark's peculiarities of style are the use of hapazlogomena, of diminutives, double negatives, the word εὐθείως ("straightway") forty-two times, the repetition of καί ("and"), the tautologies, etc. Hitzig's investigation of Mark's language brought him to the conclusion that it is closely related to that of the Apocalypse, and the author of the former the author of the latter [a view which he had the honor of being alone in holding]. Mark wrote in Greek. Baronius, on the basis of a notice at the foot of a copy of the Peshito and some Latin manuscripts, started the theory that he wrote in Latin; and even the Latin autograph was said to have been discovered in Venice; but the latter proved to be a fragment of a copy of the four Gospels, containing a preface by Jerome.

The genuineness of Mark has been left unquestioned, except xvi. 9-20. This passage seems to be more than suspicious. Not that the style is so different from the rest of the Gospel, as some have urged, but because the passage is wanting in the Sinaitic and Vatican manuscripts, because Eusebius, Jerome, Gregory of Nyssa, and others say the Gospel closed with the words εφοβοῦντο γὰρ ("for they were afraid," verse 8), and the repetition of the first verse, which is found in the eighth. The passage, however, is very old; for Irenæus refers to it (iii. 10, 6). Perhaps the original conclusion of the Gospel was lost: perhaps it remained unfinished. [The genuineness is denied by Griesbach, Lachmann, Frogelles, Tischendorf, Westcott and Hort (in their Greek text), also by Fritzsche, Ewald, Reuss, Meyer, Archbishop Thomson, Riddle, but affirmed by Mill, Hug, Scholz, Olshausen, Ebrard, Lange, Burgon, Scrivener, and Morison.]

MARK'S DAY, St., the 25th of April; celebrated in the Roman Church by a solemn supplicatory procession, — the so-called Litania major. The ceremony is mentioned by Gregory the Great. In those churches where Mark is patron, the priest wears blue at mass upon this day.

MARLORAT, Augustin, surnamed Du Pasquier; b. at Bar-le-duc in Lorraine, 1506; hanged at Rouen, Oct. 31, 1562. After the death of his parents, he was educated in an Augustine convent; entered the order in 1524; was ordained a priest, and became in 1533 prior of a monastery at Bourges. He enjoyed a great reputation as a preacher; but his connection with the Reformation soon became apparent, and in 1535 he was compelled to flee. He sought refuge in Geneva; was appointed preacher at Cressier, near Lausanne; married; removed to Vevay; and was appointed preacher to the Reformed congregation in Paris, in 1559, and in the following year to that of Rouen. Rouen was in that period the second city of France, the centre of great commercial and industrial interests. The Reformation had spread widely among its inhabitants; and, after the massacre of Vassy (March 1, 1562), the Reformed citizens took possession of the city (April 16), and established a government in accordance with their religious principles. Some outbursts of fanaticism took place May 3; and, though the Reformed pastors were entirely innocent of those excesses, they were made to suffer for them, when, on Oct. 26, the city was recaptured by the Roman Catholics. Marlorat was condemned to death, and executed in front of his own church. [Of his works, parts of his Novi Testamenti catholica expositio, Geneva, 1561, were translated into English by Thomas Tymme, London, 1570 (St. Matthew), and by others (John) 1574 (Mark), 1583, etc.] THEODOR SCHIOTT.

MARNIX, Philipp van (Sieur de St. Aldegonde), b. at Brussels in 1538; d. at Leyden, Dec. 15, 1598; one of the most prominent leaders of the Dutch rising in the sixteenth century. He was very carefully educated, and throughout life a zealous student. He understood Dutch, German, French, Spanish, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He was a good classical scholar, a learned theologian, and well versed in jurisprudence. His principal studies he made at Geneva, and there he became not only fully converted to the Reformation, but also deeply imbued with the political elements of Calvinism. After returning home in 1560, he lived for several years in domestic retirement, until the whirlwind of events carried him to the front. He drew up the so-called "compromise," by which the Dutch noblemen bound themselves to resist to the last the introduction of the Inquisition; and also the petition of April 5, 1566, to the regent, Margaretha of Parma, concerning the Inquisition. After the occurrence of the iconoclastic riots at Antwerp, in August, 1566, he published Van de beelden afgeworpen en de Nederlanden (1566), and Vraege narration et apologie des choses passées aux Pays-Bas (1567). But it was not with the pen alone he served the cause he had espoused. Valenciennes was heavily pressed by the Spaniards, and Marnix and Brederode undertook to re-enforce it. But they were defeated at Austravel, March 13, 1567. Marnix escaped first to Breda, then to Germany; but all his property was confiscated, Aug. 17, 1568. He entered the service of the elector-palatine, Friedrich III., and for several years he was deeply engaged in theological affairs. Meanwhile he had made the acquaintance of William of Orange. An intimate friendship sprang up between the two men; and in 1569 Marnix composed the famous William's Lay, which contributed more than anything else to concentrate the sympathy of the Dutch on William the Silent. Between 1572 and 1585 falls the great political and diplomatical period of Marnix's life. He headed the embassy which tarried in London from December, 1575, to April, 1576, in order to induce Elizabeth to accept the sovereignty over the Dutch republic; and he also headed the embassy which (1580) went to France to offer the crown of the Netherlands to the Duke of Anjou. The latter mission was successful; and Marnix drew up the Acte de déchéance de Philippe II. de sa seigneurie des Pays-Bas: see also his Rapport fait au prince d'Orange et aux États Généraux. But the foolish attempt of the duke (Jan. 15-17, 1583) to break the compact, and establish himself at Antwerp by a coup d'état, threw suspicion even on Marnix; and when, as burgo-master of Antwerp, he surrendered the city to Alexander of Parma (Aug. 17, 1585), after a siege of nearly two years, he fell a victim to calumny. He retired to his estate at Westsonburg, near Vliessingen, and lived for several years in deep retirement. As a kind of reparation, the states-general charged him in 1596 with the translation of the Bible; and he moved the following year to Leyden. But he succeeded only in finishing the translation of Genesis before death overtook him. His principal theological work is De Biencorfs der helige roomsche keerke, a satire on the Church of Rome, her organization, her institutions, and her practices, inspired, no doubt, by the Epistole obscurorum virorum, and often very striking and pointed. It was published in 1569, often reprinted, and translated into many foreign languages. His stand-point was that of strict Calvinism. It was due to his influence, that, at the synod of Antwerp (Aug. 20, 1566), the Wittenberg concordia was rejected; and in the same spirit he was active at the synods of Wesel (1568) and Emden (1571). A Traité du sacrement de la sainte cène du Seigneur, which was published after his death (Leyden, 1599), is very precise and definite in fixing the stand-point from which it is written; and so are his Réponse apologétique (1598), Ondersoekinghe ende grondelijke wederlegging der Geestdrijvische Leere (1595), Tableau des différends de la religion (1601), etc. A complete edition of his works does not exist. A selection has been published by Edgar Quinet: Œuvres de P. van M., Brussels, 1857-60, 8 vols. His theological writings have been published by J. J. van Toorenbergen, St. Gravenhage, 1871. Many of his letters are found in the Werken der Marnixvereeniging.

MARONITES is the name of a Syrian tribe, which, within the Christian Church, forms a peculiar, half-independent community, or, to speak more correctly, a sect. Members of this sect live scattered all over Syria; larger congregations are gathered in Aleppo, Damascus, and the Island of Cyprus; but the proper home of the community is the Lebanon region, from Tripoli in the north, to Tyre and the Lake of Genesareth in the south. Especially the districts of Kefrawân near Beirut, and Bsherre near Tripoli, are inhabited exclusively by Maronites; while in other places Maronites, Jacobites, Druses, etc., live interspersed between each other. The total number of the Maronite inhabitants of Lebanon hardly exceeds two hundred thousand: at all events, the estimate of the Notizia statistica delle Missioni cattoliche (Rome, 1843), five hundred thousand, is much too high. They pursue agriculture and cattle-breeding: the cultivation of the silk-worm is also very flourishing among them. They speak Arabic, and have done so for centuries; but they are of Syrian descent. The liturgy employed in their divine service is in Syriac, though only a very few of them understand that language: the readings from the Gospels, however, are in Arabic. They like to consider themselves a distinct nation; and they have, indeed, always succeeded in vindicating for themselves a certain measure of political independence. They are governed by sheiks, elected from among their own nobility; and to the Ottoman sultan, who appoints a Christian pacha over them, they only pay a variable tribute. At the head of their church (the Ecclesia Maronitarum) stands a patriarch, who is elected by themselves, and wears the title of "Patriarch of Antioch and all the East." He resides during summer in the monastery Kannôbin, at Lebanon, and during winter at Bkerke; and he is always named either Butrus (Petrus), or Bûlus (Paulus). But he receives confirmation from the Pope; for from the latter part of the twelfth century there has existed a certain relation between the see of Rome and the Maronites.

Name. — On the Orontes, between Hamath and Emesa, there lay an old monastery dedicated to St. Maron. In the sixth century it was repaired by Justinian, according to Procopius (De ædific., 5, 9), and is often spoken of as the most prominent among the Syrian monasteries. The Maron after whom the monastery was named is generally considered identical either with the hermit whose life Theodoret has described (Hist. Eccl., 16), or with the monk and presbyter of whom Chrysostom speaks so highly (Ep., 36): both must have lived about 400. But the great age and the celebrity of the monastery make it more probable that it took its name from some saint much older; for instance, from Mârî, who converted Babylon, and died, at the age of eighty-one, in the monastery Deir Mâr Mârî, near Selencia, on the Tigris. From whomsoever it may have taken its name, it is from the monastery that the Maronites themselves derive their name; and it needs only to be mentioned passingly that some scholars derive it from Maronea, a village thirty miles east of Antioch; and others from Johannes Maron, about whom see below. But it must be noticed that the name does not occur until the eighth century, in the writings of John of Damascus, and that it is used there to designate a heretical sect. Exactly in the same manner it occurs later on in the writings of the Christian authors in Egypt (who wrote in Arabic), — Eutychius (Ibn Batrik, from the beginning of the tenth century), Benassalus (Ibn el-Assâl, from the thirteenth century), and others. See RENAUDOT: Hist. Patriarch. Alex., Paris, 1713.

The First Patriarch. — Johannes Maron, whom the Maronites acknowledge as their first patriarch, was born at Sirûn, near Antioch, and was educated in Antioch and the monastery of St. Maron. Later on he studied in Constantinople, became monk in St. Maron, was ordained priest, and wrote against the heretics. Having acquired a great reputation among the Syrians, he was introduced to the papal legate in Antioch, and by him appointed bishop of Botrus in 676. He then converted all the Monophysites and Monothelites in the Lebanon region to the Roman faith, ordained priests and bishops, and gave the Maronites their political and military constitution. When Theophanes, patriarch of Antioch, died, in the second year of the reign of Justinian II., he happened, we are told, to be present in the city, and was unanimously elected patriarch. We are furthermore told that he journeyed to Rome, and was consecrated by Pope Honorius. But Honorius lived nearly a century before that time; and, as no one else but the biographer of Maro knows any thing about a patriarch of Antioch of that name, the whole story of his patriarchate seems to be a fabrication. Renaudot even goes so far as to deny the very existence of Maron; but there is no reason to doubt that he really was elected bishop of Lebanon, and exercised great influence there in steady opposition to the Greeks, though it is apparent that his biography, derived from a so-called Arabic chronicle of the fourteenth or fifteenth century, and first published in a Latin translation by Quaresmius (Elucidatio terre sanctæ, i. 37), and then in the original text by Assemani (Bibl. Or., i. 496), is much mixed up with legendary matter, and the product of some Maronite, converted to Romanism, and anxious to establish an early and intimate connection between Rome and his co-religionists. The Maronites are generally very jealous of their orthodoxy, and employ every means at their disposal in order to slur over the fact — related by William of Tyre in his History of the Crusades, and accepted by Jacob of Vitry, Baronius, Renaudot, and all modern church historians — that they were a heretical sect, Monothelites and Monophysites, until they, in 1182, joined the Church of Rome under the influence of the crusaders, through whom frequent communications took place with the papal see. Their principal defenders are Abraham Ecehellensis (Chronicon orientale, Paris, 1651), Faustus Nairon (De origine Maronitarum, Rome, 1679, and Enoplia judæi, Rome, 1694), I. S. Assemani (Bibl. Orient., Rome, 1719), and Nicolas Murad (Notice historique sur l'origine de la nation Maronite, Paris, 1844).

Relation to Rome. — The great conversion to Romanism in 1182 was not complete. An anti-Roman re-action soon set in, and was punished by a papal interdict, from which the country was not absolved until 1215. Afterwards Rome took great pains to maintain the union. A national council was held in 1596, in the monastery of Kaunobin; and P. Girolamo Dandini, a Jesuit, appeared at the council as papal legate, charged with the revision of all the Maronite affairs. According to his report (Missione apostolica al Patriarca e Maroniti del Monte Libano, Cesena, 1656; translated into French, and accompanied with notes, by Richard Simon: Voyage du mont Liban, Paris, 1685), the council resulted in a complete submission to the Roman see, and an almost complete agreement with respect to doctrines. The exceptions were not a few, however, nor were they unimportant. The Maronites retained the celebration of the Lord's Supper under both kinds, the Syriac liturgy, the marriage of the priests, their own fast-days, their own saints, etc. A new council was held in 1736 in the monastery of Mary, at Luweiza, in the district of Kesrewan. The celebrated Maronite scholar, J. S. Assemani, was sent from Rome as papal legate; and the great object was to enforce among the Maronites the canons of the Council of Trent. Assemani partly succeeded. The Roman Catechism and the Gregorian Calendar were introduced; the Tridentine exposition of the doctrine of transubstantiation was established; the marriage of the clergy was confined to the lower degrees; the name of the Pope was introduced in the prayers, and the mass, etc. The acts of the council were published in Arabic, from the printing-press of the monastery of Mar Hanna, on Lebanon, 1788; and large extracts from those acts have been given by Schmurrer, in his two programmes: De ecclesia Maronitica, Tübingen, 1810-11. See also Nouveaux mémoires des missions de la compagnie de Jésus dans le levant, Paris, 1745, viii. and S. E. Assemani: Bibl. Medic., Florence, 1742, p. 118. In 1584 Gregory XIII.

founded the Collegium Maronitarum in Rome, and from that institution issued a number of celebrated scholars, — Georgius Amira, Gabriel Sionita, Abraham Echellensis, the Assemanis, and others. Meanwhile the people itself, at home on Lebanon, remained in a semi-barbarous state. Two printing-presses were established among them, — at Mar Hanna in 1795, and at Kashiá in 1802; but they awakened no interest in reading. For a long period the Maronites maintained a kind of supremacy over the Druses; but after 1840 their power became greatly weakened, feuds arose between them and the Druses, by which the country was often fearfully devastated. It was an attack by the Maronites on a Druse village, which in 1860 gave the first occasion to the frightful massacre of the Christians by the Druses throughout Syria, especially in Damascus.

MAROT, Clément, the poet; b. at Cahors about 1497; d. at Turin in 1544; led an adventurous life at the courts of Francis I., Marguerite of Valois, and Renata of Este; staid for some time at Geneva in friendly intercourse with Calvin, having been compelled to flee from Paris, suspected of inclining towards the Reformation; and settled finally in Turin. In 1538 he began, with the aid of the learned Vatable, to translate the Psalms into French verses; and his undertaking succeeded so well, that it became fashionable, even at the court, to sing them. The first edition dates from 1541, and contains only thirty psalms; but the second, of 1543, with a preface by Calvin, contains thirty more. MARRIAGE is that union of a male and of a female human being, without which there could be no family, no parental care, no developed political communities, no general society of mankind. It is, in its essence, not only a union of hearts, but a physical union also. In the first book of the Hebrew Scriptures it is written, "For this cause shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall become one flesh." This passage our Lord has sanctioned, as expressive of what his views of marriage are; and he adds to it the words, "What, therefore, God hath joined together, let no man put asunder." It is thus a religious ordinance, contrived and instituted by God, which is to control the whole human race as long as the present laws of earth and man shall continue.

The inferences from the passage of Genesis are very important. One is, that the marriageable man leaves his father and mother, and cleaves (or is glued) to his wife. In other words, marriage is the beginning of a new family, involving a separation from his parents and home, and implying, in the fact that a wife is to be found away from home, a condemnation of the marriage union with near relatives. Another inference is, that the closeness of the tie to the wife prevails over the closeness of the tie to the parents. Another still to be drawn from calling the union "one flesh," is, that neither of the parties can be united at the same time to another person; so that polygamy is condemned by the very nature of marriage. And, still further, the expression "shall cleave" (adhere, or be devoted to) denotes a moral and social union; while "one flesh" implies that they are also bound together in an exclusive sexual fellowship. The permanence also of the union is implied in this closeness.

The apostle Paul, by his parallel comparing the husband and wife with Christ and his church, confers the highest possible honor on marriage, and shows the closeness of the union: "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself up for it." "Even so ought husbands also to love their own wives as their own bodies" (Eph. v. 25, 28).

Polygamy is not only contrary to the earliest idea of marriage, but both the laws of nature and the experience of the world condemn it. As far as statistics reach, the sexes, at the marriageable age, maintain, on the whole, an equality, or a near approach to equality, of numbers; more males being born, and more females surviving the perils of early and middle life. In the higher races polygamy is almost unknown: elsewhere it cannot be indulged in to any great extent, unless men are killed off in war, while women are spared; or unless the rich and powerful have many wives, and the poorer classes of men lead lives of profligacy. Polygamy, again, makes men sensual, and fills the wives of the same man with jealousy and hatred towards each other. The idea of the family cannot be realized in the harem; and its inmates are often all but slaves, being first acquired by war or money.

Yet polygamy, although contrary to the idea of marriage as set forth in Gen. ii. 24, was in the world at an early date. Lamech, of the posterity of Cain, had two wives (Gen. iv. 19), which seems like a record of the first known bigamy; after which polygamy may have soon sprung up. We find it in the family of Abraham: both his grandchildren, Esau and Jacob, had a plurality of wives, — the first, three; the other, four, of whom two may be called, like Hagar, concubines, being given by Leah and Rachel to Jacob, as Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham, to be a substitute for herself. From this it may be conjectured that bigamy depended at first on the original wife's consent. Afterwards it became more common among the men of power and wealth. And yet Nabal had one wife only (I Sam. xxv.); and the same is true of the prophets, where we have any notices of their family relations. Moses also may have lost his first wife when he married the Cushite woman (Num. xii. 1; comp. Knobel in loco). In the last chapter of Proverbs, only one husband and one wife are thought of. No law forbade polygamy, but it faded out of manners without the aid of legislation. All the peoples in the west, of a higher civilization, discarded it, or never had it; and no direct prohibition of it is to be found in the Christian Scriptures.

Marriage, unless begun at too early an age, is shown by modern statistics to be decidedly a healthier, as it is a more moral, condition than that of remaining single. M. Michel Chevalier remarks, that if we compare the deaths of celibates, married persons, widowers, and widows, in their sum total, it is found that there is in France an exceptionally great mortality in the class of persons of either sex, married under the age of twenty; but that, in all succeeding periods of life, the death-rates of the married fall below those of the unmarried. In the French census of 1861 the deaths of celibates for a hundred celibates are given as 6 males and 5.72 females between the ages of twenty and sixty, but, of married persons between the same ages, they are 4.02 per cent of males and 4.40 of females. An increase of marriages in our country, says M. Lagoyt, cited by M. Cadet (Marriage, p. 13), would have for its effect, not only a greater fecundity of legitimate births, but also a greater mean duration of life.

The question here comes up, What persons are forbidden in the Scriptures, or upon ethical grounds, to form marriage unions with one another? It must have been discovered in primeval times, that the children of the same family, and others nearest of kin to one another, needed to have the utmost sexual reserve maintained between them, in order that the family might not become a hot-bed of vice. Everywhere we find laws prohibiting marriages of near relatives under heavy penalties. The word incestus (that is, incastus, unchaste, impure) shows how the Romans branded it in their language. Even a parent and an adopted child could not marry, nor an uncle and a sister's daughter. There could be no conubium there between very near relatives; and the parties to such a union, or the man at least, were visited with penalties such as deportatio. In the Hebrew Scriptures three of the curses to be uttered on Mount Ebal (Deut. xxvii. 15-26) relate to incestuous marriages. Compare for unlawful or incestuous marriages Lev. xviii. 6-17, and, for incestuous intercourse, Lev. xx. 11-21. In a number of cases, death is made the penalty.

Another reason has been assigned for prohibiting marriage between consins; namely, that such unions are unfruitful. Thus Gregory the Great, in 601 A.D., writing to the missionary Augustin in England, makes the remark that Roman law had permitted first cousins to marry, but adds, "We have learned by experience that offspring cannot grow up from such a marriage."

It ought to be added, however, that, in very early times, children of the same father, but not of the same mother, were united in wedlock. This was Abraham's relation to Sarah. Of the strictness of the early Christian church we may have occasion to speak again. Here we mention the tendency of some modern legislation to depart from the standard of church law, and allow quite near relatives to marry. By French law, aunts and nephews, uncles and nieces, first cousins, brothers and sisters in law, can thus intermarry. By the law of the German Empire of Feb. 6, 1875, nearly the same descriptions of persons have liberty of marrying one another opened to them.

The entrance of the daughter into the marriage state depended in great measure upon the will of the father. It was natural that he should make it a condition of parting with his daughter,—who at once was held to be his property, and was his help in the household,—that some compensation should be made to him by a suitor, for his loss of her services. To this mohar, as the Hebrews called it, there are several allusions in the Hebrew Scriptures. Shechem was willing to give any amount of mohar and matthan to Jacob and his sons in exchange for Dinah as a wife (Gen. xxxiv. 12), in which passage the second word may denote a gift made to the betrothed by the suitor. Jacob paid for his wives in labor; David paid for Michal in evidences of having killed a hundred Philistines (1 Sam. xviii. 25; 2 Sam. iii. 14); Hosea, in a symbolical prophecy, gave for a wife fifteen pieces of silver and a quantity of barley,—the usual price for a slave. The price paid to the next of kin for a wife may have, in time, been given by the father to his daughter as her dowry. The very ancient practice of bride-stealing, of which traces remained, in many parts of the world, long after the proper seizing of a wife from another tribe ceased, is not shown by anything in the Old Testament to have been indigenous among the Hebrews. The expedient to supply the Benjamites with wives, in Judg. xxi., seems to have been suggested by the necessity of the case.

The natural feeling that marriage is a most important and a religious institution found expression among the Israelites in a solemn covenant between the man and the woman, to which there are several references. One of these is in Prov. ii. 17, "Who . . . forgetteth the covenant of her God;" and another, in Mal. ii. 14, "Yet she is thy companion, and the wife of thy covenant;" i.e., of thy covenant made with her solemnly before God. Still more full is the expression in Ezek. xvi. 8, where God as a husband enters into a covenant with Jerusalem as a wife, so that she becomes his. Of the other ceremonies of marriage very little is said in the ancient scriptures. At Athens the man made known to the members of his phratia the marriage into which he had entered; and a sacrifice followed, together with a feast. And so, in early patrician times at Rome, a cake of spelt was eaten by the man and his bride, with auspices and offerings, in the presence of twelve witnesses (two of whom were the pontifex maximus and a flamen dialis). And there can scarcely be a doubt that religious rites, with a festival, accompanied marriages among the Hebrews.

The New Testament in its precepts shows a high idea of marriage; and, while it teaches that this state of life is not superior to its opposite, regards it also as a doctrine of false teachers that they place it among forbidden things. Our Lord, in Matt. xix. 11, when the apostles had said that it was not expedient to marry, if divorce was allowed only for one cause, replied that it was not given to all to receive this saying (of theirs) in practice, and that some abstain from marriage for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He shows that he thought individual duties and ethical capacities to be the determining considerations when marriage became a personal question. The apostle Paul lets us know that Peter and the Lord's brethren had wives, and considered his right to marry, if he wished, to be as good as theirs; he wishes the younger widows to marry (1 Tim. v. 14); he makes it essential (iii. 2-4) that the overseers in the churches should live a family life; and he regards forbidding to marry as part of an ascetic heresy (iv. 3). One passage only (Rev. xiv. 4) seems to look upon marriage as a state of life inferior to celibacy. But whether the words, "were not defiled with women," and "for they were virgins," denote absolute chastity in the monastic sense, or absolute purity in the moral sense, and especially freedom from defilements accompanying idolatry, it is not altogether easy to decide. (Comp. Dusterdieck and De Wette in loco).

Want of purity in thought, speech, and action, was the great vice of heathenism, and is especially denounced in a number of places in the New Testament; and, at the time when Christianity was spreading, an ascetic doctrine invaded the western parts of the civilized world, the leading idea of which was that victory over bodily desires was the principal attainment for man. In reference to marriage, Tertullian could say that second marriage is nothing but a species of fornication (stupri). Thus a state of virginity began to be regarded as one of superior sanctity; and what Origen did is well known. At the Council of Nice, opinions were thrown out that bishops, presbyters, and deacons should refrain from sexual communion with their wives. The good judgment of an Egyptian bishop, who was himself unmarried, prevented this rule from being enacted. Ere long, however, the law became stricter, so as to require priests and deacons in the western church, if unmarried, not to marry, and, if married, to live apart from their wives. The eastern church allowed ordination in inferior ranks of the clergy without requiring such separation; but a married bishop was obliged to leave his wife when raised to this dignity. It took a long time for such laws to prevail in the western church, until Gregory VII., partly out of policy, in order to draw a broader line between the lay and the clerical members of the church, threatened excommunication against such laymen as should be present at masses celebrated by married presbyters. An unmarried clergy, thus secured, greatly aided the unity and ascendancy of that order amid all the evils which the rule of celibacy brought about.

The most important points connected with Christian marriage in the mediæval church are the including of it among the sacraments, and the power which the celebration of marriage with religious rites gave to the priests, of determining who could or could not marry according to Scripture and ecclesiastical canons. Upon the power of deciding questions touching the lawfulness of marriage depended the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of bishops, so far as it reached, over legitimaey, succession to inheritances, and the validity of testaments, — an immense power, which could be used to increase the amount of property held by dead hands. Another control which the mediæval church exercised in respect to marriage was that of deciding what impediments ought to prevent its being celebrated. Of these impediments there were various sorts; some from degrees of consanguinity or of affinity; others from special causes, such as fraud, precontract, clerical orders; others from the religion of one of the parties. In process of time, after the rise of Protestantism, when members of the Catholic Church and Protestants lived near one another, the question of mixed marriages arose, which has been a very troublesome one in some parts of Christendom; and still later began the strife between states and the churches, especially the Catholic Church, growing out of the permission of civil marriage, as it is called. Each of these subjects — the early impediments to marriage in the Catholic Church (existing in part, also, in Protestant countries to a small extent), mixed marriages, and civil marriages — will call for some explanation.

1. The Impediments which early law in the western church, or canon law, sanctioned, may be divided into such as rendered marriage null, unless the party injured chose to have the marriage continue, and such as, on public grounds, without taking the wishes of the parties into account, absolutely dissolved it. (a) To the first kind belong force, fraud, error in regard to personal identity or in regard to freedom, antenuptial derangement of mind, crime or pregnancy, concealment of certain matters from the pastor, and seduction (which, however, might be included under force). By free consent all these impediments might cease to be binding, and the marriage thus be without a taint. (b) There were public impediments involving a sentence of nullity: such are differences of religion, one of the parties being a heretic, Jew, or heathen. If the party causing the impediment becomes a Catholic, the difficulty then ceases. (c) A marriage opposing existing obligations, such as a marriage already existing, or a previous vow of chastity. (d) Previous crime, as adultery between the parties, or marriage with a murdered person's wife or husband by the murderer. But a penance could remove this obstacle. (e) Blood-relationship, affinity, and even spiritual affinity, as that of a godfather or godmother. This impediment started from the prohibitory rules of Roman law, and perhaps of Levitical law, until it grew into a prodigious and annoying system, both in the Latin and Greek churches, from the prohibition against first cousins' intermarriage (which was the second degree), onward, until a remedy, in part, was found in the liberative practice of dispensation. The cause may have been, in part, the feeling that such an alliance was something like incest, and in part from the supposed discovery (which Gregory the Great gives as a reason), that marriages between such near relatives are not prolific (601 B.C.). Things went on until sixth consins, or persons in the seventh degree of relationship, could not marry. But Innocent III. brought about a change in the law at the Fourth Lateran Council, so that the prohibition should not thenceforth exceed the fourth degree of consanguinity and affinity; that is, the relation of fourth cousins. Yet a marriage between third and fifth cousins came into use. Affinity extended as far in prohibiting marriage as consanguinity, but in time this was very much abridged in its power. The same is true of the relation created between godfathers and godmothers and their kindred. Dispensations were pretty freely granted. The third canon of the Council of Trent on the sacrament of matrimony is as follows, rendered into English: "If any one shall say that only those degrees of consanguinity and affinity which are expressed in Lev. xviii. 6 sq. can prevent the contracting of marriage, or separate it when contracted, or that the church cannot give a dispensation in regard to some of them, or enact that others besides shall not prevent and separate [marriage], let him be anathema." There is silent reference here to the marriage of Henry VIII. with his deceased brother's wife, which was declared unlawful by some during the controversy on that marriage and his divorce.

II. Mixed Marriages, or those, especially, between Catholics and Protestants. The Reformation, in many respects, substituted the civil power of the State for the old Church power. Laws concerning marriage were thenceforth enacted in all Protestant states. But many states had subjects of different religions, and among the Catholics in such countries the marriage laws still continued. The neighbors of different confessions, occasionally, would desire to form marriage connections with one another. But the Catholic Church forbade the clergy to solemnize such marriages, unless the offspring should be instructed and brought up in the Catholic religion; and for this, before marriage, guaranties were required from the persons concerned. For some time the difference of religions prevented marriage unions between the persons adhering to them; but in the eighteenth century the feeling on this point became freer or laxer, and at present mixed marriages form, in a few countries, an appreciable percentage of the annual marriages. It is readily understood that the Catholic Church is very averse to yield at all on the question of guaranties, but considerations of policy have called forth a certain degree of concession in some Protestant countries from the Catholic Church. The treatment of such marriage — as Walter, a Catholic writer, describes it in his Kirchenrecht (seventh edition, § 318, 1839) — is as follows, unless changes of policy have been introduced in more recent times: By a law of Benedict XIV., a mixed marriage not celebrated according to the rules of the Catholic Church — and thus canonically regarded as a state of concubinage, although it were not entered into in the form prescribed by the Council of Trent, but in a form having legal validity in the place in question — could be regarded as a really and fully valid marriage. This concession, however, was limited at first to the Netherlands, and, by a brief of Pius VIII., to the western part of the Prussian monarchy. These concessions related only to the form of marriage. "But," adds Walter, "in some places, in order to avoid greater evil, even although the necessary guaranties are not given, the Catholic pastor may be present, and may enroll in the church book the declaration that is made. He must refrain, however, from all prayers and solemnities whereby he could have the appearance of approving such a union begun against the requirements of the church." And for proof our author cites a brief of Pius VIII. to Prussian bishops in 1830, and of Gregory XVI. to Bavarian bishops in 1832 (Kirchenrecht, § 318, page 631 of seventh edition).

III. Civil Marriages. — These are marriages entered into according to a form, or in a way, prescribed by the State, and have a validity which is independent of any ecclesiastical solemnization. Such marriages arose out of the unwillingness of dissenting sects in Protestant countries to have the marriages of their members celebrated by ministers of the Established churches, or, perhaps, celebrated according to forms which they could not approve. It is significant of the feeling of some English colonies, as of the Puritan ones in Connecticut and Massachusetts, that at first they required all marriages to be celebrated by a justice of the peace, or other civil officer. The reason of this evidently was, that they had felt what they considered tyranny from the Church of England, or eschewed it as not a true church. In process of time, ministers of the gospel, of any denomination, were allowed to solemnize marriages; and registry laws required that they should have the proper certification. In Europe, civil marriage has been subjected to much opposition, especially on the ground that the religious nature of marriage is not properly provided for by laws which render marriage by a minister of religion unnecessary. There are different ways of uniting civil marriage with religious forms. One is to begin with the civil marriage, which is essential, while the religious celebrations are left to the individual's own choice. This is the civilehe of Germany since Feb. 6, 1875, according to a law of the empire. Of this many religious persons complain, and with reason. Civil marriage is introduced into the principal countries of Europe, and is destined to extend farther.

Marriage and religion being the two main supports of society in all its forms, from the family to the state, we may ask, in closing, whether marriage is now contributing all that it can to the social system. Our answer must be, first, that it is a bad sign where the number of marriages to a given number of persons is, for a long period together, on the decrease, and that such seems to be the condition of some of the most cultivated nations at the present time. And again: the reverence for the institution of marriage, either in society as a whole, or in certain classes, is tested by the annual number of breaches of its essential laws, and by divorces and separations. But it is a sad fact that the breaches, such as adulteries and desertions, are, on the whole, increasing, and that separations have still more increased within the present century. If the expense of maintaining families should increase as it has done, and the style of living go along with it at an equal pace, and the apparent desire of many not to have large families should become still more manifest, then we may expect that decay of family life to show itself which involves the decay alike of religion and the state.

LIT. — Marriage has such various and important relations to religion, morals, the family, the State, and the Church, that its literature is too copious to be fully exhibited. For Hebrew marriage we mention the work on Mosaïsches Recht, by J. D. MICHAELIS (2d ed., 1775), that of SAALSCHEITZ with the same title (2d ed., 1853), and the Antiquities of Israel, a translation of a work of Ewald by Solly, 1876. On marriage among the Greeks and Romans, consult especially K. F. HERMANN'S and SCHOEMANN'S Griech. Alterthum, MEIER and SCHOEMANN'S Attische Process (1821), ROSSBACH'S Röm. Ehe (1869), MARQUARDT, in his and MOMMSEN'S Handbuch, vol. i. of his Privatleben d. Röm. (1879). For the Roman law of marriage, see REIN: Röm. Privatrecht; and the writers on Roman law, as VANGEROW'S Pan- dekten, i. § 201. For the ecclesiastical law of marriage we cite WALTER'S Kirchenrecht, PERMANEDER (R.C.), and RICHTER (Prot. u. Evangel. Kirchenrecht, where, in a note on § 262, sixth edition, a catalogue of authors is given). For the history of state law in all Christian states on the right of concluding marriage, FRIEDBERG (das Recht der Eheschliessung, 1865) is exhaustive. ERNEST CADET'S Le mariage en France is an excellent book (1870). We may mention also PAUL JANET'S La Famille, and TROPLONG'S De l'influence du Christianisme sur le droit civile des Romains, 2d ed. (1855); C. THÖNES: Die christliche Anschauung der Ehe u. ihre modernen Gegner, Leiden, 1881. Writers on morals, public law, and the state, naturally speak of marriage; but we here close our list.

T. D. WOOLSEY.

MARRIAGE AMONG THE HEBREWS. From the beginning, fathers selected for and gave to their sons a bride (Gen. xxiv. 3, xxxviii. 6). Where the wishes of the son were consulted, the proposal was made by the father (Gen. xxxiv. 4, 8; Judg. xiv. 2). Where there was no father, the mother selected the bride for her son (Gen. xxi. 21). Besides the customary presents given to the bride and her relations (Gen. xxiv. 53), a price was stipulated, which was to be paid to the father of the maiden (Gen. xxxi. 15, xxxiv. 12; 1 Sam. xviii. 23, 25; Exod. xxii. 17). This price could be paid either in money (Deut. xxii. 29), or by services rendered (Gen. xxix. 20; Josh. xv. 16; 1 Sam. xvii. 25, xviii. 25). A dowry was very seldom given to the bride. The Mosaic law introduced no changes into these usages. It contains no rules as to the marriage contract. Only from incidental notices we see, that, in older times, the marriage contract was made between the parents orally, perhaps in the presence of witnesses (Ruth iv. 11), or by sworn promises (Mal. ii. 14). Only in the post-exile period do we meet with written marriage contracts (Tob. vii. 14), concerning which more minute rules and regulations were laid down in the Talmudic treatise Kethuboth.

Polygamy was allowed among the ancient Hebrews (Gen. iv. 19; 1 Chron. ii. 18), which at a very early period seems to have been restricted to two wives (1 Sam. i. 2; 2 Chron. xxiv. 3), and which seems to have been customary with kings (2 Sam. v. 13, xii. 8; 1 Kings xi. 3; 2 Chron. xi. 21, xiii. 21; Joseph., Antt., XVII. 1, 3) and prominent persons (Judg. viii. 30). Although the Mosaic law did not forbid polygamy, and only restricted it in the case of kings (Deut. xvii. 17), yet its many enactments tended to discourage, and finally to abolish, polygamy (Exod. xxi. 8 sq.; Lev. xv. 18). By degrees, monogamy gained a strong foothold in the people, especially through the powerful influence of religion; and marriage was finally regarded as a sacred covenant made before God (Prov. ii. 17; Mal. ii. 14; Hos. ii. 20). Hence marriage is very often used by the prophets as a true emblem of the relation between Jehovah and Israel. This religious conception of monogamic marriage became more and more prevalent in Israel; its basis being the divine institution of marriage, especially monogamic marriage, at the creation of man (Gen. i. 27 sq., ii. 18 sq. 24; note especially the expression in ver. 24, unto "his wife," and the addition of the Septuagint, made in the interest of monogamy, "they twain," which is also retained in Matt. xix. 5; Mark x. 8; 1 Cor. vi. 16; Ephes. v. 31). To regulate marriage, — partly in accordance with ancient usages, and partly with the spirit pervading the law of Moses, — degrees were prescribed within which a man was permitted to marry. Out of aversion to consanguinity and the evil consequences resulting from it on the one hand, and in opposition to the then existing Canaanitish and Egyptian usage on the other hand, marriages between a certain number of near relatives were forbidden (comp. Lev. xviii. 7 sq., xx. 11 sq.; Deut. xxvii. 20 sq.; Joseph., Antt., III. 12, 1). He that trespassed against it was to be burnt (Lev. xx. 14). Yet these laws were not always strictly kept (2 Sam. xiii. 13 sq.; Ezek. xxii. 10 sq.); and how little the magnates cared for it we see from the example of the Herodians (Joseph., Antt., XVII. 1, 3; 13, 1, XVIII. 5, 1, 4; comp. Matt. xiv. 4; Mark vi. 17 sq.). Ancient usage, however, favored marriages among more distant relatives (Gen. xxiv. 4, 48); and only in the case of the inheritance of daughters the law provided that they should only marry in their own tribe (Num. xxxvi. 6 sq.), and made it incumbent upon the brother of a deceased husband who died childless to marry his widow (Gen. xxxviii.; Deut. xxv. 5 sq.; Ruth iv. 1 sq.; Matt. xxii. 24 sq.). The priests, especially the high priest, were not allowed to marry a divorced or profane woman, nor a whore (Lev. xxi. 7); and, whilst the priest could marry the widow of a priest (Ezek. xliv. 22), the high priest was even prohibited from the latter. Only maidens were allowed to the high priests. Out of theocratico-religious reasons, the marriage of an Israelite with the daughter from one of the accursed seven Canaanitish nations was forbidden (Exod. xxxiv. 16; Deut. vii. 3; Josh. xxiii. 12), but this command was not always heeded (Judg. iii. 6, xiv. 1; 1 Kings xi. 1 sq.). Marriages with other foreign men and women were permitted (Lev. xxiv. 10; 1 Chron. ii. 34 sq.), since they could acquire the Jewish civil right. After the exile, however, mixed marriages, in consequence of the sad experiences which the people had made as touching their faith, were interdicted, and the more rigorous view became prevalent (Ez. ix. 1 sq., x. 3; Neh. xiii. 23 sq.). A second marriage was permitted, although it was regarded as a higher degree of sanctity not to marry again (Luke ii. 36 sq.). In general, the Jews thought very highly of the married state, and many children were regarded as a great blessing (Ps. cxxvii. 3, cxxviii. 3 sq.).

Marriage Ceremonies. — The betrothal having previously taken place, the bridegroom on the wedding-day, accompanied by his friends (Judg. xiv. 10 sq.; Matt. ix. 15; John iii. 29; 1 Macc. ix. 39), and attired in his wedding-dress, went to the house of the bride, and conducted the veiled one, accompanied by her companions, under song (Jer. vii. 34, xvi. 9), music, and dancing (1 Macc. ix. 37), by the light of torches (Matt. xxv. 1), into his father's house, where the marriage-feast was kept for seven days (Judg. xiv. 10, 12), and where the many friends were entertained with song (Jer. xxv. 10; 3 Macc. iv. 6) and riddles (Judg. xiv. 12). The bridegroom was crowned (Song of Songs, iii. 11; Isa. lxi. 10; 3 Macc. iv. 8). In the evening the couple was conducted to the bridal chamber: and after coition it was ascertained whether the bride had preserved her maiden purity; if she had not, she was stoned (Deut. xxii. 13 sq.).

[Modern Jews celebrate marriages in the following manner. A silk or velvet canopy, about three or four yards square, supported by four long poles, is held by four men out of doors on the day of the wedding. Under this canopy the bridegroom is led by his male friends, preceded by a band of music, and welcomed by the joyous spectators with the exclamation, Barûch Habâh! i. e., "Blessed is he that cometh!" The bride, with her face veiled, is then brought to him by her female friends, and led three times round the bridegroom, thereby fulfilling the command, "The woman shall compass the man" (Jer. xxxi. 22); when he takes her round once amid the congratulations of the by-standers, and then places her at his right hand, both standing with their faces to the south, and their backs to the north. The rabbi then covers the bridal pair with the talith, or fringed wrapper, which the bridegroom has on, joins their hands together, and pronounces over a cup of wine the benediction of affiancing, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast created the fruit of the vine. Blessed art thou . . . who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and hast forbidden to us consanguinity, and prohibited us the betrothed, but hast permitted us those whom we take by betrothal and marriage. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hast sanctified thy people Israel by betrothal and marriage." Whereupon the couple taste of the cup of blessing, and the bridegroom produces a plain gold ring, and, in the presence of all the party, puts it on the bride's finger, saying, "Behold, thou art consecrated unto me with this ring, according to the rites of Moses and Israel." The rabbi then reads aloud, in the presence of appointed witnesses, the kethubah, or marriage contract, and concludes by pronouncing over another cup of wine the seven benedictions, which are given in the Talmudic treatise Kethuboth (Col. 7, col. 2; 8, col. 1). With this the ceremony ends amid the shouts, Mazel tov! i. e., "Good luck!"

Divorce. — The Mosaic law does not institute divorce, but, as in other matters, recognizes and regulates the prevailing patriarchal practice. The ground on which the law allows a divorce is termed ervath dabar, any "shameful thing" (Deut. xxiv. 1). Whatever this ervath dabar meant was much discussed at the time of Jesus in the schools of Shammai and Hillel; [and according to Hillel only the burning of food in cooking was a sufficient reason for putting away a wife]. The husband had to give his divorced wife a bill of divorce (Isa. l. 1; Jer. iii. 8; Matt. xix. 7; Mark x. 4), thus enabling her to marry again. Without such a bill, she was regarded as belonging still to her former husband. A husband who had divorced his wife could not remarry her, even if her second husband had died, or had divorced her (Deut. xxiv. 2 sq.); otherwise the husband was in duty bound to provide his wife with food and raiment, and to fulfil the duty of marriage (Exod. xxi. 10), but was released from the latter duty during the time of her menstruation (Lev. xviii. 19, xx. 18; Ezek. xviii. 6, xxii. 10).

Adultery. — Although connection with an unmarried woman was not regarded as adultery so long as polygamy existed, yet at a very early period connection with a betrothed or married woman was looked upon as so sinful that both the guilty parties were stoned (Deut. xxii. 20 sq.; John viii. 5, 7) or burned (Gen. xxxviii. 24; Lev. xxi. 9). The very fact that the Decalogue already forbids adultery (Exod. xx. 14) proves that the ancient law of Israel regarded the marriage relation as something sacred. When a man violated a woman in the field, where she could not get help, the seducer only was killed. When a husband suspected his wife of adultery, he had to bring her unto the priest, who subjected her to the ordeal of the waters of jealousy (Num. v. 12 sq.). If a man seduced a maid, he had to marry her, or, in case her father refused to give her unto him, the seducer had to pay money according to the dowry of virgins (Exod. xxii. 16 sq.). In spite of all these strict injunctions, the prophets spoke often against this sin (Jer. vii. 9, xxiii. 10; Hos. iv. 2; Mal. iii. 5); and at the time of Jesus immorality was very great in Israel (Rom. ii. 22), which was especially fed by the influence of the then ruling Herodians. Notwithstanding the prohibition in Lev. xix. 29, Deut. xxiii. 17 sq., there existed public prostitutes at all times among the Hebrews (Gen. xxxviii. 14; Judg. xvi. 1; 1 Kings iii. 16; Prov. ii. 16 sq., v. 3 sq., vi. 26, vii. 10, xxiii. 27; Amos ii. 7, vii. 17). Prostitution was especially propagated through the lascivious, sensual Syro-Phœnician cultus, and with it found its way into Israel (Num. xxv. 1 sq.; 1 Kings, xiv. 24, xv. 12, xxii. 46; 2 Kings xxiii. 7; Hos. iv. 13 sq.).

MARRIOTT, Wharton Booth, b. 1825; d. at Eton College, December, 1871. He was graduated at Oxford; fellow of Exeter College; from 1850 till death, assistant master of Eton College. He wrote a work of great learning upon church vestments (Vestiarium Anglicanum, London, 1867), and contributed extensively to SMITH and WACE, Dictionary of Christian Biography, and to SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities.

MARROW CONTROVERSY, so called because it was occasioned by the republication of Edward Fisher's Marrow of Modern Divinity. This author was an English High Calvinist of the seventeenth century, noted for spirituality and learning; and his book was originally issued in 1614. It consists of religious dialogues of an original and sprightly kind, discusses the doctrine of the atonement, and guides the reader safely between the Scylla and Charybdis of Antinomian error and Neonomian heresy (see arts.). A copy of it was brought into Scotland by an English Puritan soldier, and years afterwards found by Thomas Boston (see art.), who was much pleased with it, and spoke of it to several; and so it was republished in 1718, with a commendatory preface by Rev. James Hog of Carnock. The book displeased the Neonomians very much, and they were the leading men in the Church of Scotland. One of their number, principal Haddow of St. Andrews, assailed it in his opening sermon at the synod of Fife, April, 1719; and a "committee for preserving the purity of doctrine" was chosen at the Assembly that year, whose business really was to discredit the book. This was attempted by garbled extracts. In their report in 1720 the committee condemned the book as Antinomian, and the Assembly approved. Then the friends of the book rallied to its defence. Twelve men, who were called "the Representatives," formally called the attention of the Assembly to the anomaly that it had condemned, because taught in the book, propositions which were couched in Scripture language, and others which were expressly taught in their symbolical books. The Neonomians, however, carried the day; and in the Assembly of 1722 the twelve Representatives were solemnly rebuked; and subsequently every effort was made by the Neonomians to prevent the settlement of ministers holding the Marrow doctrines. No action was taken against the Representatives, and so in the church courts the controversy ended. But the irritation lasted, and ultimately led to the formation of the Secession Church. See HEMMINGTON: History of the Church of Scotland, chap. ix., American edition, pp. 342, 344-347.

MARSAY, Charles Hector de St. George, Marquis de, b. in Paris, 1688; d. at Ambleben, near Wolfenbüttel, 1746. His parents belonged to the Reformed faith, and early emigrated to Germany. He himself began his career as a lieutenant in an Anglo-Hanoverian regiment, serving in the Spanish War of Succession; but in 1711 he retired to Schwarzenau in the countship of Wittgenstein, and devoted his life to asceticism and religious meditation. From 1735 to 1742 he lived in the castle of Hayn as the spiritual guide of the family Von Fleischheim. He afterwards also visited Årølsen, Altona, and other places. His writings (Freimüthige und christliche Diskurse, oder Zeugniß eines Kindes; Über die Magie; Wider die Herrnhuter, etc.) are of less consequence; but by transplanting the quietistic mysticism of Bourignon, Guyon, Berbot, etc., to Germany, he exercised an influence which became visible in the Berleburg Bible. An autobiography, letters, etc., are found in manuscript in the church archives of Coblenz. See GOEBEL: Christ. Leben. M. GOEBEL.

MARSDEN, Samuel, the "Apostle of New Zealand;" b. in England, 1764, of humble parentage; d. in Australia, May 12, 1838. He was a tradesman at Leeds, and at first a member of the Wesleyan Church, but, uniting with the Church of England, studied at St. Joseph's College, Cambridge. In 1794 he went out as chaplain to the penal colony at Paramatta, near Sydney, Australia. Deviating from the usual course of missionaries, he established a farm, and sought to train the convicts to habits of industry. On a visit to England in 1809, he appealed for missionaries for the Maoris in New Zealand. The Church Missionary Society was deaf to his appeals; but two laymen, William Hall and John King, offered themselves, and accompanied him on his return journey. Arriving in Australia, Marsden purchased a small vessel, "The Active," at his own expense, and with it cruised to New Zealand, and established a mission; and, though he retained his residence in Australia, visited the island often, and contributed much by his appeals and advice to the christianization and civilization of the people. See MISS YONGE: Pioneers and Founders, pp. 216-240.

MARS' HILL, so called because Mars was judged upon it (Pausan., i. 28, 5), north-west of the Acropolis, is commonly called the Areopagus, and forever associated with Paul, who therefrom delivered a memorable address (Acts xvii. 22-31). It was the seat of the highest of the Athenian courts.

MARSH, Herbert, D.D., Bishop of Peterborough; b. Dec. 10, 1757, at Faversham, Kent; d. at Peterborough, May 1, 1839. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and took a fellowship in 1782. In 1807 he became Lady Margaret professor of divinity at his alma mater: bishop of Llandaff 1816; transferred to Peterborough 1819. He was a vigorous opponent of Calvinism and Roman Catholicism. While professor, he substituted English for Latin in the delivery of his lectures. His biblical works are still valuable: The Authenticity of the Five Books of Moses considered, Cambridge, 1792; Lectures on the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible, London, 1828, new edition, 1838; Lectures on the Authenticity and Credibility of the New Testament, and on the Authority of the Old, new edition, 1840. But best of all is his translation, with notes, of J. D. MICHAELIS: Introduction to the New Testament, 1792-1801, 4 vols.

MARSH, James, D.D., b. at Hartford, Vt., July 19, 1794; d. in Colchester, Vt., July 3, 1842. He was graduated at Dartmouth College 1817, and at Andover Theological Seminary 1822; in 1824 was professor of modern languages in Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia. From 1826 to 1833 he was president of the University of Vermont. In 1829 he edited Coleridge's Aids to Reflection, prefixing a remarkable essay upon the poet. He also translated Herder's Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, Burlington, 1823, 2 vols. His Remains, with memoir, appeared, Boston, 1843, 2d ed., 1845.

MARSHALL, Stephen, b. at Godmanchester in Huntingdonshire, Eng., at an unknown date; educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; became minister at Wethersfield, and then at Finchingfield in Essex, where he was silenced for nonconformity. In 1640 he was made lecturer at St. Margaret's, Westminster. He was one of the chiefs in the Smeectynmuan Controversy (see EDMUND CALAMY) with Bishop Hall in 1641: was made a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines in 1643. He was the greatest preacher of his times and the most popular speaker. He was an active man, and a judicious adviser in all ecclesiastical affairs. He preached before Parliament, the Lord-Mayor, and the Assembly, more frequently than many others combined. He was the most influential member of the Westminster Assembly in ecclesiastical affairs. He represented the English Parliament in Scotland in 1643; attended the commissioners of Parliament at the treaty of Uxbridge in 1644; was one of the Committee of Accommodation in 1645; attended the commissioners sent to the king at Newcastle for the accommodation of peace in 1646; attended the commissioners at the treaty of the Isle of Wight in 1647. He was a moderate and judicious Presbyterian under Cromwell's administration, and as an acknowledged chief was appointed one of the committee to draw up a catalogue of fundamentals as a basis of toleration, to be presented to the House of Commons in 1651, and became one of the Tryers. He died in November, 1655; and his remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, but were shamefully dug up at the Restoration.

Large numbers of his sermons on special occasions were published. These, notwithstanding the faults in method and style characteristic of the times, are models of eloquence and fervor. Among these we will mention, A Peace-Offering to God, Sept. 7, 1611; Reformation and Desolation, Dec. 22, 1611; Meroz cursed, Feb. 23, 1611 (2); Song of Moses the Servant of God, and the Song of the Lamb, June 15, 1643; Sacred Panegyrics, 1644; Sermon of the Baptizing of Infants, 1644; Right Understanding of the Times, Dec. 30, 1646; Unity of the Saints with Christ the Head, April, 1652. The only systematic work he published was A Defence of Infant Baptism against John Tombes, London, 1616, 4to, pp. 256.

C. A. BRIGGS.

MARSHMAN, Joshua, one of the first Baptist and most distinguished missionaries to India; b. at Westbury Leigh, Wiltshire, Eng., April 20, 1768; d. in Serampore, India, Dec. 5, 1837. He had a scanty education, but early developed an insatiable thirst for reading. He was sent to the loom, and continued till his twenty-sixth year a weaver (his father's occupation). In 1794, having previously been married to Miss Hannah Shepherd, he took charge of a school in Bristol, where he found time to acquire a knowledge of the classic, Hebrew, and Syriac languages. Under Dr. Ryland's influence, he joined the Baptist Church, and in 1799, with Mr. Ward and two others, sailed for India. Not being permitted to disembark at Calcutta, they landed (Oct. 13) at Serampore, then under the Danish flag, but destined, by their labors and those of William Carey, to become the most conspicuous spiritual centre in the country. Here for nearly forty years he continued to labor in the pulpit and the school, and through the press, for the moral and intellectual elevation of the natives.

In 1800 Mr. and Mrs. Marshman opened two boarding-schools, the incomes of which were to be devoted to the support of the mission. At the close of two years, their annual revenue amounted to one thousand pounds, and in 1811 to two thousand pounds, only a hundred pounds of which Mr. Marshman reserved for himself. He began preaching in Bengalee Oct 1, 1800. His services in the department of education were conspicuous; and in 1818 he issued, with Carey and Ward, the prospectus of a college for the "instruction of Asiatic, Christian, and other youth, in Eastern literature and European science," which was established and fostered amidst many discouragements. It was chiefly due to him that the Serampore missionaries undertook the publication of the first periodical work in February, 1818, in the Bengalee (the Dig-durpum), and on May 31, 1818, the first native newspaper (the Samachar-Durpum, or "Mirror of News"). The same year, he began the monthly publication of the Friend of India in English (in 1820 changed to a quarterly). Mr. Marshman likewise contributed to the literature of the native tongues by the preparation of dictionaries of the Mahratta (1 vol., 1811) and Bengalee (3 vols.) languages. In 1806 he undertook the study of the Chinese, with the purpose of translating the Bible into that language. After fifteen years of labor, he published in 1822 a Chinese version of the New Testament. In 1814 he had published Clavis Sinica, or "Key to the Chinese Language."

In 1826 Mr. Marshman visited England. The relations of the Baptist Missionary Society and the Serampore Mission had been strained for many years; the former seeking to secure control of the missionary property, which the missionaries, who had won it by their self-denial, and contributed at least fifty thousand pounds to the mission, properly refused to relinquish. These circumstances deprived his visit of much of the pleasure he would otherwise have had; and he gladly returned in 1829 to India, but still pursued by the suspicions and attacks of the Missionary Society, which embittered not only his own last years, but those of Carey and Ward. On June 9, 1834, his old associate William Carey died, and he was left the patriarch of the famous Serampore Mission. His health was completely broken up after that event, and his mental faculties partially failed. In his last hours he prayed in Bengalee, and conversed in that language upon spiritual subjects.

Dr. Marshman stood in close relations with Lords Hastings, Bentinck, and other governors-general of India, whose sympathies and protection he secured for Serampore and its enterprises. Brown University conferred upon him in 1811, as it had previously done on Carey, the degree of D.D. One of his daughters, the wife of Gen. Havelock, died in 1882. See J. C. MARSHMAN: Life and Times of Carey, Marshman, and Ward, 2 vols., London, 1859; and art. INDIA.

MARSILIUS PATAVINUS, b. at Padua between 1270 and 1280; studied canon law and philosophy in his native city; and was rector of the university of Paris in 1312, which presupposes that he had taken a degree, and delivered lectures there. The latter part of his life he spent in Germany, at the court of Lewis the Bavarian, and there he died, probably in 1342. While in Paris he witnessed the contest between Boniface VIII. and Philip the Fair, and no doubt conversed with many, who, in that conflict between Church and State, sided with the king. When, then, in 1323, the contest broke out between John XXII. and Lewis the Bavarian, he himself appeared in the arena with his Defensor pacis, — a most audacious attack on the papal fabric, which just at that moment stood towering victorious in all its splendor and power. The work (which was first printed at Basel, 1522, then at Frankfurt, 1592, and afterwards often) consists of three books. The first book develops the idea of the State; the second, the idea of the Church; and the third sums up the whole exposition in the form of theses. The polemical centre of the work lies in the second book, which, by a series of trenchant arguments, undermines the whole foundation on which the papal power is built up. The priest, the author says, has no secular power,—no power to enforce obedience. The administration of the Word and the sacraments is his only business. All his power is spiritual, all his influence moral. All priests, he further says, are essentially equal in power and dignity. The New Testament knows no difference between a presbyter and a bishop, and no difference between Peter and the other apostles. The sole head of the Church is Christ, and the highest representation of this Church is the Œcumenical Council. The work was by the author presented to Lewis the Bavarian, and exercised a decisive influence on his policy; but his policy was not successful. Once more Marsilius stepped forward, opposing the Pope on occasion of the divorce of Margaretha of Tyrol from Johann Heinrich of Luxemburg, and her marriage with Lewis of Brandenburg, the son of the Emperor Lewis. He defended the emperor's right to dissolve her first marriage; while William Occam defended the legitimacy of her second marriage, in spite of her relation to her husband. Both treatises have been considered spurious, but without sufficient reason. See RIEZLER: Die literarischen Widersacher der Päpste zur Zeit Ludwig des Bayern, 1874; and CARL MÜLLER: Der Kampf Ludwigs des Bayern mit der röm. Kurie, 1879. G. LECHLER.

MARTÈNE, Edmond, b at St. Jean de Lône, in the diocese of Dijon, Dec. 22, 1654; d. at St. Germain-des-Prés, in Paris, June 20, 1739. In 1672 he entered the order of the Benedictines at Rheims, but was soon after removed to St. Germain-des-Prés, where he enjoyed the friendship and advice of D'Achery and Mabillon, and which continued his headquarters, though at various times he resided at MarmonTier and in the monastery of St. Caen in Rouen. His first works, Commentarius in regulam S. P. Benedicti (Paris, 1690), De antiquis monachorum ritibus (Lyons, 1690), and De antiquis ecclesie ritibus (Rouen, 1700), were much appreciated; but it was especially as a collector and editor of old literary documents that he acquired his great reputation. Veterum scriptorum et monumentorum collectio nova (Rouen, 1700), a continuation of D'Achery's Spicilegium, was his first work of the kind; but after a journey of several years through various parts of France, in company with Dom Ursium Durand, he published his great works, Thesaurus novus anecdotorum (Paris, 1717, 5 vols. fol.) and Veterum scriptorum et monumentorum amplissima collectio (Paris, 1724–33, 9 vols. fol.). He also continued Mabillon's Annales ordinis S. Ben. (tom. vi. 1117–1157, Paris, 1739) and Act. Sanct. ordinis S. B. See TASSIN: Histoire littéraire de la Congrégation de St. Maur, Paris, 1750–65, 6 vols. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

MARTIANAY, Jean, b. at St. Sever-Can, in Gasconne, Dec. 30, 1617; d. at St. Germain-des-Prés, in Paris, June 16, 1717. He entered the order of the Benedictines in 1668. In the controversy with Pezron, which was brought to a sudden end by the peremptory order of the Archbishop of Paris, he wrote Défense du texte hébreu et de la chronologie de la Vulgate (Paris, 1689) and Continuation de la défense, etc. (Paris, 1693). His edition of Jerome (Paris, 1693–1706, 5 vols. fol.), of which the first volume attracted much attention, while the others proved a disappointment, implicated him in a very bitter controversy with Richard Simon (Lettres critiques, Basel, 1699) and Johannes Clericus (Questiones Hieronymianæ, Amsterdam, 1700). A complete list of his works, most of which refer to the translation and exposition of the Bible, is found in TASSIN: Histoire littéraire de la Congrégation de St. Maur, Paris, 1750–65, 6 vols. G. LAUBMANN.

MARTIN is the name of five popes.—Martin I. (619–653) was ordained, in the beginning of July, without having obtained the confirmation of his election from the emperor of Constantinople, Constans II.; and as he shortly after, at a synod of the Lateran, condemned not only monotheletism, but also the imperial edict which forbade all further discussion of the subject, the emperor ordered Olympius, the exarch of Ravenna, to send the Pope a captive to Constantinople. Olympius also entered Rome with an army; but for some reason or other—probably because the exarch dreamed of the establishment of an independent Italian empire, and hoped for the aid of the Pope—Martin remained free and unhurt. Olympius died soon after, however; and his successor, Theodore Calliopa, dragged the Pope from the Church of the Lateran, and sent him in chains to Constantinople. After an imprisonment of ninety-three days, he was summoned before the imperial court, and with great brutality condemned to death. On the instance of the Patriarch of Constantinople, the sentence was commuted to banishment; and in March, 655, he was carried to Cherson, where he died, Sept. 16, same year. His letters are found in MANSI: Con. Coll., x. pp. 790 and 1170; JAFFÉ: Regesta Pont. Rom., p. 161; BARONIUS: Annales, a. a., 649; his life, in MURATORI: Res. Ital. Script., iii. pars i.—Martin II. See MARINUS I.—Martin III. See MARINUS II.—Martin IV. (Feb. 22, 1281–March 28, 1285). Simon de Brion, a native of Touraine, an occupant of various ecclesiastical positions, first in Rouen and afterwards in Tours, was in 1260 appointed chancellor of France by Louis IX., and in 1261 made a cardinal by Urban IV. As papal legate he carried on the negotiations with Charles of Anjou concerning his assumption of the crown of Sicily; and it was due to the influence of Charles, then king of Sicily, that the turbulent conclave after the death of Nicholas III. elected Cardinal Simon pope. In honor of St. Martin of Tours, he assumed the name of Martin IV. One of his first acts was to appoint King Charles “senator” of Rome; and, in order to support his claim on Greece, he put the Byzantine emperor, Michael Palaeologus, under the ban, though he thereby brought all negotiations for a union between the eastern and western churches to a sudden end. But March 31, 1282, the Sicilian vesper took place. Charles not only lost his crown, but also his influence in Rome, where a “tribune” was elected in his stead; and it was only by the most complete submission that the Pope escaped from the storm which overtook his ally. See his biographies in MURATORI:

Rev. Ital. Script., iii. pars i.; DUCHESNE: Histoire de tous les cardinaux français (Paris, 1660), and Histoire de chanceliers de France (Paris, 1680).—Martin V. (Nov. 11, 1417–Feb. 20, 1431). Oddo Colonna was made a cardinal by Innocent VII., and charged by Alexander V. with the investigation of Hus's appeal. After the deposition of John XXIII., Gregory XII., and Benedict XIII., by the Council of Constance, he was unanimously elected Pope, and crowned in the Cathedral of Constance, Nov. 21, 1417. The reform of the church in head and members, which was the great task laid upon his shoulders, he very cunningly evaded,—by the appointment of a committee working according to peculiar regulations, by confining the discussion to certain general points, by concluding particular concordats with each state, etc. His solemn promise to call a new council within five years he also evaded; for, though the council was actually called and opened in Paris in 1423, it was dissolved in February, 1424, without having done any thing. To the city of Rome, which he did not enter until September, 1420, he brought peace and order; and in his personal habits he was unpretentious and parsimonious. He was, however, not so very scrupulous in his method of amassing wealth, and still less so in the way of using it. When he died, most of the great offices and benefices of the church were in the possession of his relatives. His bulls are found in MANSI: Con. Coll., xxviii. Biographies of him were written by CROCCO (Foligno, 1638), CA TELORI (Rome, 1641), and in MURATORI: Rev. Ital. Script., iii. pars ii. See arts. BENEDICT XIII., JOHN HUS, and COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE. MARTIN OF BRAGA or DUMIA (S. Martinus Braecarensis sive Dumienensis). Of the life of this remarkable man, only a few notices have come down to us, scattered about in his own works and in those of Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc., v. 38; Mirac. Mart., i. 11), Venantius Fortunatus (Ad Martinum Gallic.), and Isidore of Seville (De Veris Ill., 22, and Hist. Suevorum). He was born in Pannonia about 510, became monk, acquired a great reputation for learning, visited Palestine, and, having fallen in with some Spanish pilgrims there, went in 551 as a missionary to north-western Spain, the present Galicia, at that time inhabited by the half-Arian, half-Pagan Sueves. There he founded the monastery of Dumia, of which he was first abbot, then bishop; and under Theodimir (559–570) he was made archbishop of Braga. The date of his death is unknown, but must fall somewhere between 580 and 589. (See Act. Sanct., March 20.) He wrote on canon law and ethics; some letters and verses by him are also extant. His principal work is his Collectio Orientalium Canonum s. Capitula Martini, a collection of canons of Greek and Spanish synods, published by Mansi (Conc. Coll., ix.), Aguirre (Conc. Hisp., ii.), and others. See MAASSEN: Geschichte der Quellen des kanon. Rechts, 1870, i. pp. 862 sqq. His ethical works, Formula honeste vite, Libellus de Maribus, De Superbia, etc., have had the peculiar fate that several of them for centuries have gone under the name of Seneca. See HAASE: in his edition of Seneca's works, Leipzig, 1852. Of great interest are his treatise De Pascha, first published in TOMAJO SALAZAR: Martyrol. Hisp., ii., and the treatise accompanying his letter to Bishop Polemius of Astorga, concerning the history of the baptismal formula, first published in FLOREZ: España Sagrada, xv. See GAMS: Kirchengeschichte Spaniens, ii. WAGENMANN.

MARTIN OF TOURS, Saint, b. at Sabaria, in Pannonia, 319; d. at Candés, in Gaul, 400. His parents were Pagans; and by his father, a tribunus militum, he was compelled to enter the army. But his inclination led him towards the Christian church and a life of asceticism and meditation; and, after a few years' service in Gaul, he gave up the military career, and was ordained a deacon by Hilary of Poitiers. On a visit to his home he converted his mother; but his zeal against the Arians roused persecution against him, both in his native country and in Milan. In 360, after living for some time as a hermit in the Island of Gallinaria, near Genoa, he returned to Gaul, and settled near Poitiers; from which settlement soon sprung up the monasterium Locociugense (Lieugé), the oldest monastic institution in Gaul. In 375 he was elected bishop of Tours; and though as a bishop he carried on with energy and dignity all the secular business of his office, he continued to live as a monk, and founded on the bank of the Loire the famous monastery of Marmontier. His influence extended far beyond the pale of his diocese, and was, indeed, felt throughout the whole country. He is the founder of monasticism in Gaul, and he contributed very much to the extirpation of Paganism in the country. Thus he became the patron saint of France, also of Mayence and Würzburg; and the date of his death (Nov. 11) is celebrated not only in France, but also in Germany and the Scandinavian countries. See J. CHR. FROMMAN: De anse Martiniano, Leipzig, 1720. He has left no literary monument: the so-called Confessio (GALLANDI: Bibl. patr., vii.) is evidently spurious. His life was written by his pupil, Sulpicius Severus, partially, as the author asserts, from his own notes, and forms a very curious specimen of ecclesiastical writing. Gregory of Tours describes in his Miraculorum Sanctissimi Martini, libri iv., no less than two hundred and six miracles which the saint wrought after his death. Poetical lives of him were written by Sidonius Apollinaris and Venantius Fortunatus. See MARTENE: Thes. anec. See also ACHILLES DUPUY: Geschichte des heiligen Martini, Schaffhausen, 1855 (Roman-Catholic). HERMANN WEINGARTEN.

MARTIN, David, b. at Revel in 1639; studied philosophy at Nismes, and theology in the academy of Puy-Laurens, but left France after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and was appointed minister of Utrecht, then professor of theology at Deventer, and finally minister at The Hague, where he died in 1721. He published three volumes of sermons, and several polemical and apologetical treatises; but his principal works are, Le nouveau Testament expliqué par des notes courtes et claires (Utrecht, 1696), Histoire du vœu et du nouveau Testament (Amsterdam, 1700), and his revision of the Genevan translation of the Bible (Amsterdam, 1707, 2 vols. folio), which, accepted by the synod of Leuwarden (1710), and afterwards revised by Osterwald, is still much used in France. c. SCHMIDT.

MARTIN MARPRELATE CONTROVERSY, The, was occasioned by a series of seven tracts, in which, with much wit, the prelacy of the English Church was attacked. The tracts appeared between November, 1588, and July, 1589, under the manifest pseudonyme of Martin Marprelate, Gentleman, and were printed secretly, and at the risk of life. Notwithstanding, or perhaps in consequence of, the mystery of their appearance, they obtained a wide circulation, and awakened a storm of opposition. Their author was a vigorous defender of the extremest independency. Dr. Dexter ascribes their authorship to Henry Barrowe, and their publication to John Penry. See his Congregationalism as seen in its Literature, Lect. iii. pp. 131-202.

MARTIN, Sarah, philanthropist, b. at Caister, near Great Yarmouth, June, 1791; d. at Great Yarmouth, Oct. 15, 1843. By trade a dressmaker, and destitute of the refinement, social position, and education of Mrs. Fry, she yet was able, almost unassisted, to do a great work among the pauper and criminal classes of Yarmouth. As early as 1810 her interest was excited by the prisoners there; but it was not until 1819 that she ventured to visit them, finally giving up one entire day in each secular week to that purpose. In 1820 she began Sunday services among them. [Up to 1832 she read printed sermons to them, but from 1832 to 1837, original ones; but after, her boldness increasing, she preached extempore. She obtained work for the prisoners, collected a fund for their assistance upon discharge, taught them, and also those in the workhouse. In 1826 she fell heir to ten pounds yearly, whereupon she gave up dressmaking, and devoted her whole time to her philanthropic work. But she was compelled to live in great poverty. In 1841 the corporation of Yarmouth granted her an annuity of twelve pounds. M.* (Yarmouth, 1845), and especially The Edinburgh Review for April, 1847 (pp. 320-340).

MÄRTINIUS, Matthias, b. at Freienhagen, in the countship of Waldeck, 1572; d. at Kirchtimke, near Bremen, 1630. He studied theology at Herborn, under Piscator, and was appointed court-preacher at Dillenburg 1595, professor at Herborn 1596, preacher at Emden 1607, and rector of the gymnasium of Bremen 1610. He was a delegate to the synod of Dort 1618, and represented there the mildest form of the anti-Arminian party. As a theological writer he was very prolific (dogmatical, polemical, etc.); but his principal work is his Lexicon philologico-etymologicum, Bremen, 1623, which is still used. MALLET.

MARTINMAS, Festival of, Nov. 11, in honor of St. Martin of Tours. In Germany the festival is called Martinalia. Luther derives his first name from his being born on St. Martin's Day. "In England and Scotland the winter's provisions were in olden days cured and stored up at that time of the year, and were hence called a mart."

MARTYN, Henry, one of the most devout and noble missionaries in the annals of the Christian Church; b. at Truro, Eng., Feb. 18, 1781; d. Tocat, Asiatic Turkey, Oct. 16, 1812. His father, who had once been a miner, rose to a place of comparative ease as chief clerk in a store, and was able to send his son to the grammar-school, which he continued to attend till 1797, when he entered St. John's College, Cambridge. He developed a remarkable talent for mathematics, and in 1801 achieved the highest academical honor, that of senior wrangler. This high distinction failed to satisfy his mind; and with regard to it he wrote, "I obtained my highest wishes, but was surprised to find that I had grasped a shadow." In 1802 he was chosen fellow of St. John's College, taking the first prize in Latin prose composition. His college subsequently elected him twice public examiner. In 1802 Mr. Martyn formed the resolution of devoting his life to missionary labors. To this state of mind he had been brought, in part, by the perusal of the biography and diary of David Brainerd, with whose life his own had much in common. They both developed a fervid piety, devoted themselves with their whole soul to the work of missions, wrote diaries which are replete with the records of rich spiritual experiences, and died at an early age, leaving behind examples which have been a fruitful source of stimulus and encouragement to others. Mr. Martyn offered himself to the Society for Missions to Africa and the East; but, suffering from pecuniary losses which gave him some anxiety about the welfare of a sister, he ultimately went to India as a chaplain of the East India Company. He had served from 1803 as the curate of Mr. Simeon at Cambridge; and July 17, 1805, sailed for his new home, actuated purely by spiritual motives, and leaving behind him rare opportunities for establishing a reputation as a scholar, and securing a position of ease and comfort. The words of his diary of Sept. 23, written as the vessel was passing out of sight of Europe, indicate well the measure of his consecration: "We are just to the south of all Europe, and I bid adieu to it forever, without a wish of ever revisiting it, and still less with a desire of taking up my rest in the strange land to which I am going. Ah, no: farewell, perishing world! To me to live shall be Christ," etc.

On April 21, 1806, Mr. Martyn's "eyes were gratified with the sight of India." The impression made upon his mind by idolatry was very painful. "The sight of men and women all idolaters makes me shudder, as if in the dominion of hell." On another occasion he writes, of seeing natives bow before a hideous image: "I shivered as if standing, as it were, in the neighborhood of hell." He did not go to his station, Dinapore, till Sept. 13. In the mean time he remained at Calcutta. His tolerant Christian spirit was displayed in the cordial friendship which sprung up between himself and the Serampore missionaries. In 1806 one of them, Mr. Carey, wrote, "A young clergyman, Mr. Martyn, is lately arrived, who is possessed of a truly missionary spirit. . . . We take sweet counsel together, and go to the house of God as friends" (Marshman's Life of Carey, etc., i. p. 246). At another time, writing in regard to sending a Baptist missionary to Patna, he said, "Wherever Mr. Martyn is placed, he will save us the expense of a missionary" (i. p. 250).

Mr. Martyn's work in India was accomplished at the military stations of Dinapore and Cawnpore, and within the space of less than four years and a half. In addition to his labors among the soldiers and English residents, he preached to the natives, and prepared translations in the vernacular. Endowed with rare linguistic talents, and fully consecrated to his work, he speedily became fluent in the Hindostanee; and his preaching was so attractive, that, at the time his failing health obliged him to quit Cawnpore, he had as high as eight hundred in his audiences.

Mr. Martyn's most permanent influence was exerted through his translations. He had by Feb. 24, 1807, already completed a translation of a part of the Book of Common Prayer into the vernacular, which was soon followed by a Commentary on the Parables. In March, 1808, he completed a Hindostanee version of the New Testament, which is said to be very idiomatic. At the urgency of his friends, Mr. Martyn also undertook the supervision of a Persian version of the New Testament. In this task he was not so successful, and his version was referred back to him for revision. He lived to make it, but the effort cost him his life. Never strong, his health gave way in 1810; so that he determined to take a trip back to England in the hope of restoring it, when the rejection of his Persian version induced him to follow the hint of combining, in a journey to Persia, recreation and the prosecution of the revision of the Persian Testament. Starting with alacrity in January, 1811, Mr. Martyn reached Shiraz, where he not only finished the Persian New Testament (Feb. 12, 1812), but made a Persian version of the Psalms, which he calls "a sweet employment that caused six weary moons, which waxed and waned since its commencement, to pass unnoticed." The learning of this faithful Christian translator, and his courage and skill in disputing with the Mohammedans, awakened a profound sensation in the city, and aroused the Moajtahid, or professor of Mohammedan law, to engage in a public dispute with him. The professor followed the discussion up with a tract in defence of Mohammedanism, to which Mr. Martyn replied in an equally spirited and more learned defence of Christianity. Anxious to present a copy of the New Testament to the king of Persia, Mr. Martyn directed his steps to Tebriz, with the purpose of securing a letter of introduction from the British minister, Sir Gore Ouseley. On this journey his body was racked with fever and chills, and he barely escaped with his life. In Tebriz he was kindly cared for, and here, likewise, engaged in animated discussion with the Mohammedans, risking his life by the fearless confession of Christ as the Son of God. Mr. Martyn failed to put his Testament into the hands of the Persian monarch, but left it with Sir Gore, who did it for him, and afterwards saw it through the press. Mr. Martyn then turned his horse's head toward Constantinople, fifteen hundred miles away. This journey under the burning sun of Central Asia possesses a singular interest. It was a race for life. His diary contains the pathetic notes he jotted down by the way. "I beguiled the hours of the night by thinking of the Fourteenth Psalm, especially the connection of the last three verses with the preceding." Such are some of the records. Fever and ague had his system completely in their grasp, and pierced it with unspeakable pains and weariness. With unflinching heroism the sufferer pushed on; but he lost the battle, dying in Tocat amongst strangers, and with no friendly hand to care for his wants. His early death at thirty-one deprived India of one of her most zealous benefactors, and England of one whom she has no reason to refuse a place among her many great dead. Mr. Martyn's body rests in the Armenian cemetery at Tocat. Mr. Rich, English resident at Bagdad, raised in 1823 a monument over the grave, bearing the inscription, "To Rev. Henry Martyn, an English clergyman and missionary, a pious, learned, and faithful servant, whom, as he was returning to his native land, the Lord here called to his eternal joy, A.D. 1812." MARTYR and CONFESSOR. The Greek word μάρτυρ or μάρτυρ denotes simply "a witness," and is often used in that sense in Scripture (Matt. xviii. 16; Mark xiv. 63, etc.). But when the conflict between Christianity and Paganism began, and a Christian at any moment might be called upon to testify to the truth of his convictions by sacrificing his life, the word rapidly assumed that technical sense in which it is now generally used (Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13, xvii. 6). As, however, the conflict extended, and the State officially placed itself at the head of Paganism, the mere profession of Christianity might expose a man to the dangers of torture, banishment, etc.; and those who underwent such sufferings willingly and unhesitatingly, without retracting, or concealing, or prevaricating, were honored as "confessors." Both terms are of frequent occurrence in the writings of the early Fathers.

MARTYRS, The Forty, a title in the martyrologies, referring to those forty soldiers at Sebaste in Armenia, who in 320, during the reign of Licinius, were placed, by the order of Lysias the commander, naked, on a pond covered with ice, and kept there during the whole night, because, as Christians, they would not sacrifice to the gods. Their corpses were then burnt, and the ashes strewn on the waters. Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Gamdentius of Brescia, and Ephraim Syrus often mention the event in their homilies. See PETRUS DE NATALIBUS: Catalogus Sanct., Lyons, 1508; BARONIUS: Martyrologium Romanum, Mayence, 1631; RUINART: Acta Martyrum, Amsterdam, 1713; GÖRRES: Licinius Christenverfolgung, 1875. L. HELLER.

MARUTHAS, the famous Bishop of Tagrit in Mesopotamia. In 403 he journeyed to Constantinople to urge Arcadius to come to the rescue of the Christians persecuted by the Persian emperor Yezdegerd, and again, in the year following, on behalf of his banished friend Chrysostom. Later on, Theodosius II. sent him to Yezdegerd to urge the cessation of persecution, and an alliance with the Roman Empire. Maruthas made such an impression upon the Persian monarch, that the latter was almost converted. He is the reputed author of a history of the Persian martyrs, published by Assemani, Acta Martyrum Orientalium, Rome, 1748, translated into German by Zingerle, Innsbruck, 1838. E. NEETLE.

MARY. Μαρία, or Μαριάμ, is the Greek form of the Hebrew Miriam, which occurs (Exod. xv. 20; Num. xii. 1; Mic. vi. 4) as the name of the poetess and prophetess, sister of Moses.

1. The mother of our Lord. She is not often spoken of in the Gospels; and the worship of which she afterwards became the subject has no foundation in the New Testament. She is first mentioned as the espoused of Joseph the carpenter, of the house of David (Luke i. 27). The real meaning of the words of her son (Luke ii. 49) she understands as little as Joseph. At Cana she tries to induce Jesus to show his power, and is severely rebuked (John ii. 1-12). In the face of the open disbelief of the brethren of Jesus, she remains passive; and his words of blame touch also her (Matt. xii. 46-50; Mark iii. 31-35; Luke viii. 19-23). Deeply impressive, and genuinely moving, she appears when standing under the cross; and the words with which Jesus recommends her to John prove the tenderness he felt for her (John xix. 25-27). After the ascension, she moves in the circle of the apostles as one of the faithful (Acts i. 14). The question whether, after the birth of Jesus, she lived in a real marriage with Joseph, and bore children to him, must be answered in the affirmative; and there is nothing in the Gospels, not even the angel's greeting (Luke i. 28), which raises her above the purely human sphere. On the contrary, the words of Jesus (Luke xi. 27, 28) contain a warning against any exaggerated enthusiasm for her.

Various reasons may be alleged for the rise of such an enthusiasm. First, there was a christological interest at play. The clearer the idea of the god-man developed in the consciousness of the church, the more natural, not to say necessary, it must seem, that the reverence for him was extended also to his mother. She was the condition of his humanity, and on his humanity depended the whole work of redemption. Next, the passion for asceticism, more especially for unmarried life (which, after the fourth century, spread rapidly in Christendom), found in Mary its type of virginity. Tertullian says, without any qualification (De monogam., viii.), that it "was a virgin, about to marry once for all after her delivery, who gave birth to Christ in order that each title of sanctity might be fulfilled in Christ's parentage, by means of a mother who was both virgin, and wife of one husband." Basil acknowledges (Hom. in Chr. Generationem, 5) that the literal sense of Matt. i. 25 is in favor of that view; but he adds that the view itself has something repulsive to the pious feeling. Epiphanius goes still farther (Hær. 78), attacking, under the name of Antidicomarianites, those who maintained, that, after the birth of Jesus, Mary lived in true wedlock with Joseph, and bore children to him; and Jerome designates (De perpetua virginitate Maræ) Helvidius, who held the Antidicomarianite view, as a Herodotus, destroying the temple of the Holy Spirit; that is, the virginal womb of Mary. In opposition to such heretical notions, the marriage of Joseph and Mary was explained as a merely formal marriage to conceal the mystery of the virginal birth from the prince of this world, and the brethren of Jesus were considered either as children of Joseph by a first wife (Epiphanius), or as cousins of Jesus, sons of Mary, the sister of the mother of our Lord (Jerome). While Tertullian (De carne Christi, 23) and Origen (Hom. 14 in Luc.) maintain that the birth of Jesus was a natural process, by which the womb of Mary was closed, the church-fathers after the fourth century assert (probably occasioned by Jovinian) that Mary was and remained a virgin, as well after as before his birth, and that she bore her son "with closed womb." The prototype of this wonder they found in the eastern gate of the temple, which, according to Ezek. xliv. 1-3, should remain closed forever, because Jehovah once passed through it (AMBROSE: De institut. Virginis, c. 8, No. 52; Ep. ad Siricinum, Nos. 4, 5; JEROME: Adv. Pelagianos, ii. 4); and the miraculous in the process they explained by referring to the entrance of the risen Christ through the closed door into the room where the disciples were assembled (GAUDENTIUS OF BRESCIA: Sermo ix.; GREGORY THE GREAT: Hom. in Evangel., ii. 26).

These views were embodied in a series of apocryphal narratives intended to supplement the meagre information given by the Gospels concerning the infancy and youth of Christ. The most important of those narratives is the Prot-evangelium Jacobi, printed in Cod. Apocryph. New Testament, by Thilo (i. 159) and by Fabricius (i. 66). But though, in the Roman-Catholic Church, this whole literature of legends was condemned by the decrees of Gelasius, many of its details, nevertheless, crept into the tradition of the church, — such as the names of Joachim and Anne, the education of Mary in the temple, the formal marriage between Joseph and Mary when Joseph was already ninety years old, etc., — and all traits which served to support the belief in the perpetual virginity of Mary were eagerly adopted. In spite, however, of all the glorification which was lavished on her character and history, at the end of the fourth century people were not yet prepared to worship her, or to pray to her. She was a saint, but she was not without her faults and shortcomings. The Quest. et Respons. ad orthodoxos, of the fifth century, is, indeed, the first attempt of retouching, by means of a tricky exegesis, the picture drawn of the mother of our Lord in the Gospels. As, at the same time, the Pagans began to enter the church in great masses, naturally carrying along with them the great bulk of their Pagan ideas, a general though instinctive demand for a female principle in the deity became active in the church. The Gnostic doctrine of syzygies is an evidence: the sect of the Collyridians is another. The real turning-point, however, in the development of Mariolatry, was the Nestorian controversy. It began with the question whether Mary could be called θεοτόκος, "mother of God," or only χριστοτόκος, "mother of Christ." Nestorius denied her right to the title θεοτόκος; but he was condemned by the synod of Ephesus, 431. And when the Fathers who had defended the "mother of God" left the assembly-room, they were accompanied through the illumined city to their stopping-places with torchlights and incense-burning. From that moment the worship of Mary may be considered as established, and it increased with every century. In one of his laws (Lib. I., Cod. tit. 27 de offic. dract. Afric., i. 1) Justinian prays to her for the restoration of the Roman Empire. Narses, the general, expected from her the designation of the right moment of making an attack (EVAGRIUS: Hist. Eccl., iv. 24). In 608 Boniface IV. dedicated the Pantheon of Agrippa to Maria ad Martyres, and thus the Christian Olympus superseded the Pagan.

The iconoclastic controversies contributed still further to the spreading and consolidation of the worship of the Virgin. After the Council of Nicea (787), images of her became very frequent in churches and houses, in the streets, and along the roads. Candles were lighted, and incense was burnt in front of them. Real portraits of her also existed. The most celebrated was that painted by St. Luke. Spain and Italy possessed several painted by angels. Some of them were black, according to Canticles i. 5: most of them wrought miracles. In the eleventh century a romantic element was added to the reigning Mariolatry, — the issue of the peculiar character and development of the Germanic nations. In his sermons, Peter Damiani describes Mary, not as a humble maid, but as a commanding queen, endowed with a celestial beauty, which raises her above all other creatures, and brings her nearer to God. The enthusiasm of the preacher was shared by the poet and the artist. The minnesinger and the troubadour offered their homage; and the hymnologist sometimes went so far as to awaken a suspicion of travesty. (See Psalterium Mariæ Magnum.) The painter generally represented her as a maiden between fifteen and twenty years old, and of ideal beauty. The statuary gave her a crown, with twelve stars on her head and a sceptre in her hand. In the liturgy she won a prominent place. Saturday was consecrated to her, as Sunday was consecrated to Christ; and the twenty-fifth canon of the synod of Toulouse (1229) fixed a fine for every house-father or house-wife, who, on a Saturday eve, neglected to visit the church in honor of the Virgin. Towards the close of the eleventh century, more than one hundred monasteries, and a still greater number of cathedrals, were dedicated to her. Her relics were numberless, as were the miracles they wrought. One church possessed a skirt of hers; another, a drop of her milk; a third, a bit of her veil, etc. The emperor, Charles IV., had a whole museum of such relics. The most wonderful of all her relics was, of course, her House of Loreto. See art.

In Roman-Catholic countries the worship of the Virgin experienced only a passing disturbance from the Reformation. The Jesuits were immediately on hand; and they succeeded in imbuing that, like so many other mediæval institutions, with new life. Salmeron, Ant. Possevin, and others taught that Mary was the mystical point of unity in the Scriptures; and it was even insinuated, that, in the composition of the New Testament, she had been more active than the Holy Spirit. In the practical sphere, the foundation of quite a number of new female orders in the honor of Mary — such as the Sorores Theatinæ Conceptionis Immaculatæ, Religiosæ Annunciationis, Visitationis, Presentationis, Septem Dolorum, etc. also give evidence of a kind of revival. Of much greater influence was the liberal tendency, which, in the seventeenth century, arose within the pale of the Roman-Catholic Church itself. Adam Baillet, in his De la dévotion à la Ste. Vierge (Paris, 1693), declared the doctrines of the church concerning Mary to be empty flattery, and demanded great limitations and modifications of her worship. Muratori, in his Esercizi spirituali (1723), admits that the worship of the Virgin may be useful, but asserts that it is not necessary. In 1784 the emperor, Joseph II., ordered all the hearts, hands, and feet of gold and silver, which had been presented on the altars of Mary as votive offerings, removed from the churches. But by a singular coincidence, which shows how close by each other light and darkness may lie, in the very same year Alfonso da Liguori published at Venice his Le glorie di Maria, which probably goes farther than any other book on the subject in fantastical assertions and visionary fictions. [For the later development of Mariolatry, see the article on the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.]

Of the festivals instituted in honor of the Virgin, the principal are, — Annunciatio, celebrated nine months before Christmas, on March 25, and first mentioned in the seventh century by Andreas Cretensis (650), the tenth Council of Toledo (656), and the Council of Trullo (692); Purificatio, celebrated forty days after Christmas, on Feb. 2, and instituted by Justinian I.; Nativitas, celebrated on Sept. 8 (the reason not known), and first mentioned in the Orient by Andreas Cretensis, in Rome by the Calendarium Frontonis, in France by Paschasius Radbertus; Assumptio, derived from legends, and first mentioned in the Orient by Andreas Cretensis, in Rome by the Calendarium Frontonis, and in France by the councils of Mayence (813) and Aix-la-Chapelle (818); Presentatio, mentioned in the ninth century in the Homilies of George of Nicomedia, established throughout the Greek Empire in the twelfth century by Emanuel Comnenus, and introduced into the French Church in 1372 by Gregory XI., after the wish of King Charles IV.; Visitatio, first mentioned in the catalogue of festivals in the Acts of the Council of Mans, 1247 (Mansi. Com. Coll., 23, 764); Immaculata Conceptio, see article. Among the minor festivals are Festum Rosarii, Desponsationis, Septem Dolorum, etc. [See F. A. VON LEHNER: Die Marienverehrung in den ersten Jahrhunderten, Stuttgart, 1881.] STEITZ.

2. Mary Magdalene, i. e., Mary of Magdala (a town on the west side of the Lake of Galilee), has been unhappily confounded, not only with Mary of Bethany, sister of Lazarus, but also (indeed, well-nigh universally) with the penitent fallen woman, who, in Simon's house, anointed Christ's feet (Luke vii. 37, 38). Both identifications lack the least support. The former is disproved by the dissimilarity of the names of their respective towns no less than by the dissimilarity of their dispositions; for Mary of Bethany was quiet and deep, Mary of Magdala, passionate and fiery. The latter identification is the most mischievous. A continuous reading of Luke vii. and viii. will show that the evangelist is speaking of two entirely different persons. The woman who was a sinner was morally weak, though sound in health: Mary of Magdala (Luke viii. 2) had seven demons. Our Lord delivered her, and secured her unwavering allegiance and constant attendance. She followed him from place to place; was at his crucifixion (John xix. 25) and burial (Mark xv. 47); prepared spices, and came on Easter morning, with other female friends, to embalm his body (Mark xvi. 1); told Peter and John of the empty tomb, lingered after they had gone, and was honored with the first appearance of the risen Lord (John xx. 1-18). Mary of Magdala is mentioned fourteen times in the New Testament (Matt. xxvii. 56, 61, xxviii. 1; Mark xv. 40, 47, xvi. 1, 9; Luke viii. 2, xxiv. 10; John xix. 25, xx. 1, 11, 16, 18).

CARL BURGER.

3. The sister of Lazarus and Martha; beloved by every Bible-reader for her devotion to Jesus, and earnest attention to his words. Besides the frequent mention in John xi., her name occurs only in John xii. 3, and Luke x. 39, 42.

4. The wife of Cleophas (John xix. 25).

5. The mother of John Mark (Acts xii. 12).

6. A Christian woman in Rome (Rom. xvi. 6).

MASADA, an almost impregnable fortress on the western shore of the Dead Sea, south of Engedi, was built by Jonathan Maccabæus, and much strengthened by Herod the Great. In the final struggle of the Jews against the Romans, it was taken by Flavius Silva; but the whole garrison, comprising about one thousand persons, including women and children, had killed themselves before the enemy entered. See the description by Josephus, in his Jewish War.

MASCH, Andreas Gottlieb, D.D., court-preacher, and superintendent of the Stargard circuit; b. at Mecklenburg, Dec. 5, 1724; d. at New Strelitz, Oct. 26, 1807. He was a famous preacher, but particularly noteworthy as the author of two volumes in continuation of Le Long's Bibliotheca Sacra. Halle, 1778-90.

MASON, Erskine, D.D., youngest child of John M. Mason; b. in New-York City, April 16, 1805; d. there May 14, 1851. He was graduated at Dickinson College 1823, and Princeton Seminary 1824; entered the Presbyterian ministry, and was pastor in Schenectady from 1827 to 1830, and of the Bleecker-street Church, New York, from 1830 to his death. He was one of the incorporators of Union Theological Seminary, New-York City, and from 1836 to 1842 acted as professor of church history in that institution.

MASON, Francis, missionary to Burmah; b. in York, Eng., April 2, 1799; d. in Rangoon, Burmah, March 3, 1874. In 1818 he emigrated to the United States, and, going at once to Missouri, worked at the shoemaker's trade until 1824, when he went to Massachusetts. At Canton in that State he married, united with the Baptist Church, studied at the Newton Theological Seminary, and in 1830 was despatched by the Baptist Missionary Union to Burmah. He became the successor of Dr. Boardman in the work amongst the Karens. He edited for many years The Morning Star, a monthly periodical in the native language, and published a number of books for the Karens, the first of which was the Sayings of the Elders. Among his English works are a Life of Kho-Thah-Byu, the Karen Apostle (Boston), Memoir of Mrs. H. M. Mason (New York, 1847), Burmah, its People and Natural Productions (2d ed., Rangoon, 1860), and an autobiography, The Story of a Working-Man's Life, with Sketches of Travel (New York, 1870). He received the degree of D.D. from Brown University.

MASON, John, b. at Dunmow, Essex, 1706; d. at Cheshunt, Hertfordshire, 1763, where he had been pastor since 1746. He is widely known (formerly much better than now) as the author of Self-Knowledge, a Treatise, London, 1754, very often reprinted in England and America; edited, with Life, by John Mason Good, London, 1811. It has been styled "the best manual of practical Christianity," but is "somewhat sparing of evangelical peculiarities."

MASON, John Mitchell, D.D., b. in New-York City, March 19, 1770; d. there Sunday, Dec. 26, 1829. He was graduated at Columbia College, New York, 1789; until 1791 studied theology with his father, a minister of the Associate Reformed Church, but in the latter year went, for further study, to Edinburgh. His father died the next year, and he returned home; was licensed by the Associate Reformed Presbytery of Pennsylvania, Oct. 18, 1792; supplied the pulpit of his father's church for some five months, when, by the unanimous wish of the congregation, he became their pastor, April, 1793. He soon took a prominent place in his denomination, particularly by his earnest Letters on Frequent Communion (1798), directed against the Scotch custom of communing only once or twice a year. In 1801 he was sent to Great Britain and Ireland by the synod to procure additional ministers. But the manifest advantage of a departure from the plan of a foreign educated ministry led to the appointment, in 1802, of a committee of two, of which Dr. Mason was one, to draught a plan for a theological seminary. In 1804 they rendered their report, and Dr. Mason was unanimously appointed the professor. In 1804 he received the degree of D.D. from the University of Pennsylvania. In May, 1805, the plan was matured; and the seminary opened in November, with eight students. The Bible itself, in the original, rather than any body of divinity, was intended to be the text-book of the institution. The course extended over four years. Dr. Mason was "its life and animating principle." It had originated with him as early as 1796, and it was his darling project through life. "Dr. Mason's Seminary," as the institution was usually called, was the earliest American seminary. In 1807 he began the editorship of The Christian's Magazine, and wrote nearly the whole of each number. The contents were mainly polemical, directed against Bishop Hobart's claims for episcopacy. The Magazine was dedicated to the defence of Presbyterian doctrines and polity, but was only maintained a few years. In 1809 Rev. James M. Mathews was appointed assistant professor in the seminary, and served until 1818. On March 12, 1810, Dr. Mason called a meeting of his congregation, and announced his firm intention to resign. The reasons he assigned were the impossibility of his performing parochial duties among them, owing to the multiplicity of his outside duties, especially the seminary, and their unwillingness both to provide him an assistant and to build a new church. On May 25 the presbytery released him from his charge; but, with a part of the congregation, he began a new church. While they were seeking a temporary church home, prior to building the new church in Murray Street, which was finished in 1812, they were in the habit of meeting in the Cedar-street Presbyterian Church (Dr. Romeyn's), and thus led to unite at communion. This action was looked upon with great disfavor by some in the Associate Reformed Church; but the sober judgment was, in general, favorable. Dr. Mason defended his conduct before the synod in a speech of remarkable power, and later (in 1816) by his Plea for Sacramental Communion on Catholic Principles. In 1811 he became provost of Columbia College, but resigned in 1816. He was one of the founders of the American Bible Society (1816), and its first secretary for foreign correspondence. In this year he sought recreation and health in Europe, and was gone until November, 1817. In 1821 he was called to the presidency of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn., but resigned in 1824, and returned to New-York City to end his days in retirement, — a mere wreck of once splendid powers. He suffered little bodily pain, and was able to the last to conduct family worship, but could not preach. In 1822 he had transferred his ecclesiastical relations to the Presbyterian Church, and became a member of the presbytery of New York.

Dr. Mason was "of a more princely mould than the majority of even great men who were brought into competition with him upon the theatre of action." He was about six feet in height, portly, yet pleasing in appearance, with a face expressing thought, feeling, and courage: his eyes were blue and deep-set, his forehead high, and his face oval. He was indeed, in appearance and in fact, a remarkable man, filling with conscientious care and unflagging zeal many offices in the Church, and doubtless wearing himself out in devotion to her interests. As a teacher he was particularly successful in impressing the students with the necessity of familiarity with the word of God in the original, and in accustoming them to think for themselves. It is, however, as a preacher, that he is best remembered. He stood forth pre-eminent in America. On occasion, he rose to an extraordinary height, as in the two famous sermons, Messiah's Throne (preached in London, 1802, before the London Missionary Society) and Living Faith (in Edinburgh, the same year, before the Society for Relief of the Destitute). He preached extempore, out of a full mind and loving heart, with a great flow of apposite language. "Always master of his subject, and deeply interested in it, he was naturally led into expressions, tones, and gestures at once the most significant and the most becoming. His imagination was both powerful and vivid, but under the control of a sound judgment and good taste. He sought, not to please, but to save." He possessed originality and power. Notwithstanding his denominational restrictions, and lack of means, he inaugurated a system of ministerial education which has since been extensively followed. He thus rid his denomination of dependence upon foreign-instructed ministers. But he also led his brethren to broader views in respect to communion and fellowship. He was associated with every good scheme; e.g., he was one of the earliest and ablest advocates of foreign missions and of the American Bible Society. Even in church architecture he showed his originality in designing a pulpit, which, although ridiculed when proposed, has been accepted substantially ever since. Besides the books already mentioned in the course of this article, a number of sermons, etc., were collected and published by his son, Rev. Ebenezer Mason, New York, 1832, 4 vols., new ed., 1849. His Life was written by his son-in-law, Rev. J. Van Vechten, New York, 1856.

MASON, Lowell, b. in Medfield, Mass., Jan. 8, 1792; d. in Orange, N.J., Aug. 11, 1872. He began to give public musical instruction in Savannah, Ga.; but in 1827 he removed to Boston, Mass., whence he ultimately went through all New England, bent upon exciting popular taste for music. By his instrumentality the Boston Academy of Music was established, and an enormous impetus given to musical education. He early (1828) became an advocate of what is called the Pestalozzian method of teaching music. In 1837 he visited Europe for purposes of study. But while he did much to increase the love for music by the organization of choirs, and also by fostering congregational singing, he did little to advance the art, or to raise the popular standard. His collections, from his first (Handel and Haydn Collection of Church Music, Boston, 1821) to his last (The Song Garden, 1866), number more than forty. In the line of church and Sunday-school music he did more than any one of his day. In 1855 the University of New York made him a "doctor in music," the first degree of the kind given in the United States. His musical library has passed into the possession of Yale Seminary.

MASORAH. See MASSORA.

MASS, The (the designation of the Lord's Supper, as understood and practised in the Roman-Catholic Church), has the significance not only of a sacrament, but of a sacrifice which the priest offers for the living and the dead, and in which the atoning sacrifice of Christ on Calvary is daily repeated.

I. HISTORY OF THE DOCTRINE. — Jesus nowhere released the Israelites who believed on him from the sacrificial ritual of Moses. His words in Matt. v. 23 rather presuppose their participation therein. But when he places mercy above sacrifice (Matt. ix. 13, xii. 7), declares love to be the highest commandment, and proclaims a worship of God in spirit and in truth, apart from Jerusalem (John iv. 21-24); and when, finally, the apostles testify that Christ was the true sacrifice (1 Cor. v. 7; Eph. v. 2; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19; Rev. v. 6, etc.), given for the sins of the world, — we have the premises from which the abrogation of the Mosaic ritual of necessity follows. The Epistle to the Hebrews carries out this argument in detail, and shows that the offering of Christ as the eternal High Priest was made once for all, and needs not to be repeated.

On the other hand, the apostles were far from discarding the idea of spiritual sacrifice from religion. This idea was included in the idea of the priesthood of all believers (Exod. xix. 6; 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9). In this sense the Epistle to the Hebrews (xiii. 15, 16) calls the praise of the Lord, and doing good, sacrifices. And likewise Paul (Rom. xii. 1) calls the sanctification of the body, and the gift he had received from the Philippians (Phil. iv. 18), sacrifices, and compares the faith of the Philippians to a sacrifice, and his life to a drink-offering (Phil. ii. 17).

The oldest church-fathers likewise saw in the Mosaic sacrificial ordinances only a temporary system, and regarded as the true sacrifices a heart consecrated to God, faith, obedience, righteousness (Iren., iv. 17, 4), and prayer; and only the spiritual priesthood can offer them up acceptably to God.

It was in this sense that the idea of sacrifice was at first associated with the Lord's Supper. In the apostolic age the agape, or "love-feasts," were connected with the communion; and to these, even after they were separated, the members of the congregation brought offerings of bread and wine, which were used, not only at the communion, but in the support of the clergy and for the relief of the poor. These gifts, which were called "oblations" (oblaciones) and "sacrifices" (sacrificia), the Apostolic Constitutions in one instance distinguishing the former as gifts, the latter as prayers (ii. 25, 11), were offered by the bishop with a prayer of thanksgiving, and invocation for the blessing of the Holy Ghost. This prayer of thanksgiving (εὐχαριστία) was itself a sacrificial act (Iren. iv. 18, 3); and the difference between this offering and the Mass is at once apparent. Not the body and blood of Christ, but bread and wine as such, were offered; and the offering was not an atoning sacrifice, but a sacrifice of thanksgiving, made, not by the clergyman alone, but by the congregation. It was called a "bloodless sacrifice," not in distinction to the sacrifice of Calvary, but to the bloody sacrifices of the ancient world.

A new meaning was given to these offerings when the bishops and presbyters came to be clothed with the functions of a clerical priesthood, of which the Mosaic priesthood was the type. It was Cyprian who first advocated the priestly idea with full earnestness. He regarded priesthood and sacrifice as correlative notions, and treated the whole service of communion as an offering wherein not only oblations of wine and bread, but of Christ's body and blood, even to his sufferings, were made. Cyril of Jerusalem speaks of an atoning sacrifice (θυσια τοῦ ἱλασμοῦ) in the Lord's Supper, and explains himself by saying, "We offer up the slain Christ in order to reconcile God to ourselves" (Cat. Myst., v. 8-10), but afterwards adds, that the consecrated elements were merely antitypes of the blood and body of Christ (20). Augustine saw in the Lord's Supper a memorial of an accomplished sacrifice (memoria peracti sacrificii). It is, notwithstanding, a most true (verissimum) sacrifice; and the elements are the body of Christ; not the glorified Christ, however, but his Church, in which many become one bread and one body, and again vow to remain in the communion of Christ's body. To eat of Christ's body and drink his blood is nothing more than to be in Christ (In Joann. tract. 26, 18). Augustine, therefore, used interchangeably the expressions, "to offer the bread and wine" and "to offer Christ's body and blood."

The Eastern Church continued to hold to the spiritual nature of Christian sacrifice; and even Chrysostom makes the sacramental meaning more prominent than the sacrificial; while Theodoret declares the Lord's Supper to have only a commemorative significance. On the other hand, the Latin Church laid an increasing emphasis on the sacrificial notion. Gregory the Great (Hom. in Evang. 37, Dial. iv. 58) saw a victim (victima) on the altar, through which the sufferings and death of Christ are repeated: Christ is anew sacrificed (immolatus).

The effects of the communion were regarded as expiatory, but at first only for venial sins; for mortal sins were to be expiated by penance. But it conferred blessings in every relation of life. In the Gregorian Sacramentarium there are masses against drought and too much rain, storms, sickness, etc. Its effects were magical. According to Gregory, a prisoner's chains had been loosed as often as his wife prayed for his soul; and a ghostly appearance offered a shipwrecked sailor bread at the moment that a bishop who thought him drowned offered a mass for his soul (Hom. in Evang. 37, Dial. iv. 57). Masses were offered for the dead; and Augustine (Serm., 172, 2) hoped God would deal with them less severely than their sins merited. Gregory, by his doctrine of purgatory, established a final warrant for this custom, and taught that the dead were helped out of purgatory by the prayers, and especially the masses, of the living. He even knew a monk who was so delivered by thirty masses (Dial. iv. 55); whence the so-called trigesima.

The celebration of the Lord's Supper, which in the early church was, for the most part, confined to the Lord's Day and the anniversaries of the martyrs, at a later period was repeated every day, and, after the time of Leo the Great (Ep., ix. 2, etc.), was repeated several times on the same day. In the eighth and ninth centuries, when the number of chapels was greatly increased, the priest often found himself without a congregation at the time of the celebration. Hence arose private masses, against which Theodulf of Orleans, in his Capitulary of 797 (c. 7), and the synods of Mainz (813, c. 43) and Paris (829, c. 48), protested, but which Wallafried Strabo (d. 849) advocated. In this disjunction of the eucharistic celebration from the congregational communion was involved the idea of a priestly sacrifice; that is, an act independent of the sacrament. But this isolation of the sacrificial notion did not gain full currency till the thirteenth century; Robert Pulleyn (d. about 1150), in his Sentences, treating of the Lord's Supper as a sacrament, and Peter Lombard (d. 1160) himself not going beyond the figurative significance. The latter says (Sentent. lib. iv. dist. 12, G.), That which is consecrated by the priest is a sacrifice (sacrificium et oblatio), because it is a memorial and representation of the true sacrifice on the cross (memoria et representatio veri sacrificii et sanctæ immolationis factæ in cruce).

The beginning of the thirteenth century marks a new epoch in the history of the doctrine of the Eucharist. The doctrine of transubstantiation was fixed in 1215; and, in proportion as the sermon was neglected, the sacrificial functions of the priesthood were emphasized. Thomas of Aquinas said openly that the priest, like Christ, was the mediator between God and the congregation, and that the consummation of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper did not lie in the participation of believers, but in the consecration of the elements (perfectio hujus sacramenti non est in use fidelium sed in consecratione materie, Summa iii. qu. 80, art. 12). The real founders of the doctrine of the Mass were Thomas, and Albert the Great. The former makes a sharp distinction for the first time between sacrifice and sacrament. The participation of the sacrament effects for the believer what the sufferings of Christ had accomplished for humanity as a whole, and consumes venial sins. The Mass, however, regarded as a sacrifice, is propitiatory, and removes even mortal sins. The benefits of the Mass are not confined to the participants, but extend ex opere operato to the absent, among whom the dead are included. Albert the Great said the Mass was not merely a representation, but a true immolation by the hands of the priest (Comm. in 4 Sent. dist. 13, art. 23).

In the Greek Church private masses have not been introduced; no church has more than one altar; and the Mass is celebrated only on Sundays and festivals, and is not repeated.

II. THE TRIDENTINE DEFINITION. — The Council of Trent gave the doctrine of the Mass its final form on Sept. 17, 1562, at its twenty-second sitting, and defined it as at once a sacrament which is received and a sacrifice which is offered. The keenest interpreter of this definition has been Bellarmin. He appealed for its confirmation (1) to Christ's eternal priesthood (Heb. vii. 11), which implies that his sacrifice was to continue to all times; (2) to the prophecy of a pure sacrifice to be made amongst all peoples (Mal. i. 11); (3) to the meaning of "This do (facere) in remembrance of me," as meaning sacrifice both in the Latin and Hebrew usage, etc. With such arguments he seeks to prove that in the Mass a real sacrifice is offered up.

This doctrine of the Mass follows legitimately from the doctrine of transubstantiation; and, if the body of Christ is truly offered up in the Eucharist, it follows that it is the same as the body offered on the cross, except that in the one case it is bloodless. The Mass has also a propitiatory power in effecting the forgiveness of sins, and preserving from the commission of mortal sins. It is also useful for all the perplexities and difficulties in life.

In the Tridentine Decrees the idea of sacrifice in the Mass is brought out in all its baldness; and that which alone is indispensable to its efficacy is not the participation of communicants, but the act of consecration by the priest interceding for the living and the dead. We mention also the practice, which the council confirmed, of mixing the wine with water as a representation of the union of the church with its head, and before its consecration. The act is the sole act of the celebrating priest, who, for that reason, utters the larger number of the prayers in an undertone; for he is acting for the church, but speaking only to God. The words of consecration are likewise uttered in an undertone; for they are spoken only to the elements, and to change them into Christ's body and blood. Thus in the Mass the central idea of Catholicism is involved; namely, the mediatorial and propitiatory functions of the church, which believes that the incarnation and sacrifice of Christ are repeated every day.

Against this doctrine, Protestantism sharply protested; but it lost nothing thereby, for the atoning death of Christ on Calvary, and his high priestly intercession, effect all that the Mass pretends to offer. It secures their blessings by prayer, the proclamation of the Word, and the communion. The immediate effects of the Mass, on the other hand, are inconsistent with God's Word, and are absolutely unattainable.

III. THE CELEBRATION. — In the apostolic age the celebration of the Lord's Supper consisted in teaching, breaking of bread, and prayer (Acts ii. 42), and singing (Eph. v. 19). At a later period Justin (Ap. maj., 65, 67) describes the public services thus: "On Sunday the Scriptures are read, followed by a homily and prayer. After the fraternal kiss, bread and a mixture of wine and water are taken from the gifts of the congregation, the leader offers a prayer of thanksgiving and consecration (εὐχαριστία), the congregation responds with an amen, and then follows the distribution; the elements being carried to the houses of those who are absent."

Under the influence of the disciplina arcana, the didactic and sacramental portions of the service were distinguished, — the former part called the Missa catechumenorum; the latter, Missa fidelium. The service was closed by the deacon, with the word ἀπολύεισθε, or ite, missa est (ecclesia, "Depart, for service is dismissed"). A third period in the development is marked by a change of the earlier part of the service into a mere preparatory service.

Gregory the Great established the liturgy of the Latin Church. Notwithstanding this, however, many distinct books for the Mass were prepared during the middle ages. The Tridentine Council appointed a commission to prepare a new book for universal use; but, failing to act, a commission appointed by Pius V. prepared one on the basis of the Gregorian. It was promulgated July 14, 1570, but was revised by Clement VIII. and Urban VIII.; and by the appointment of Sixtus V., 1587, a congregation of rites, whose duty it is to watch over the purity of the ritual, still exists.

The Mass falls into two main parts, the first being a preparatory celebration (introitus, gradualis); the second, the sacramental (offertorium, canon missæ), followed by the post-communio. Each of these five services is introduced by the words of the priest, "The Lord be with you," and the response of the congregation, "And with thy spirit;" which proves that the early idea included the presence of a congregation. It was at the celebration of the offertorium, that, in the ancient church, the gifts were offered; and a relic of this practice still exists in the Ambrosian ritual of the church in Milan, where, on festal occasions, two old men and two matrons take up vessels of wine and bread to the ministering priest at the altar. It was also the custom for the congregation to sing psalms while the gifts were being offered; but in the middle ages this practice was likewise abandoned, and a single verse of a psalm substituted, and five priestly prayers, which bear the name of offertorium; and this is all that remains of the ancient custom of congregational gifts. The first of these five prayers implores the Father to receive the immaculate host (immaculatam hostiam), which "I offer to thee for my innumerable sins, and for all circumstances, and also for all faithful Christians, both the living and the dead," etc. The second is offered at the mixing of the water and wine. The third asks that the sacrifice being consummated may be well pleasing in God's sight. In the fourth and fifth the priest asks the Sanctifier to bless the sacrifice, and to accept it. In the fourth part of the service, or the canon missæ, occur the words "This is my body," after uttering which the priest bows his knees, and prays to the Christ, who is present in the host, and then shows it to the congregation, that it may do the same. He then places it on the corporale, and again kneels before it. He does the same with the cup; and the whole process is called "the elevation and adoration of the host." In 1203 Cardinal Guido, papal legate in Cologne, ordained, that, when the host was elevated, the congregation should fall on its knees at the ringing of a bell, and remain kneeling until the consecration of the cup. Honorius III. in 1217 raised this enactment to the dignity of a permanent and universal obligation. This portion of the service is concluded by the celebrant's breaking the host over the mouth of the cup, and allowing a piece to fall into the cup, thus signifying both Christ's suffering and the reunion of his soul and body, and communicating himself, with the words, "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ keep my soul unto eternal life," and dispensing the bread to the communicants, if any are present. The fifth part of the service, called the post-communio, consists of prayers, responses, and the reading of John i. 1-14. All these various services are prescribed in the Book of the Mass or missal.

A distinction is made between public and private, sung or spoken, most solemn, solemn, and less solemn masses. Practically the public mass is both a solemn and sung mass. Private masses are those said at side-altars. The public and solemn mass is said in all churches on Sundays and festivals, and every day in cathedrals. Masses are also distinguished into Missæ de tempore, celebrated on the usual Sundays, Christmas, and other festivals; De sanctis, on saints' days; Votive, on special occasions, at the appointment of ecclesiastical superiors, or at the request of private parties; and Pro defunctis ("masses for the dead"), which alleviate the pains, and curtail the duration, of purgatorial punishment.

The Mass in the Roman-Catholic Church takes the place of prayer, and meditation upon the Word, in the Protestant, and binds the people indissolubly to the priest, without whom the principal part of her worship cannot be performed. A mysterious and pompous ritual is connected with its celebration; and Roman-Catholic theologians refer to the contrast which the beauty of this worship presents to the baldness of the Protestant service, with a sermon and a few hymns. The service is in Latin; and not only have Protestants denounced this, but even some Roman Catholics have regretted it. Eugene of Würtemberg in 1786, with the permission of Pius VI., introduced the German Mass into his chapel; and in 1806 the diocese of Constance began the use of the German tongue. But in neither case did the custom last long.

gical and archæological aspects of the Mass are those of BONA, GERBERT, GAVANI, BINGHAM, AUGUSTI, BINTERIM; also the histories of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, of KAHNIS, ÉBRARD, RÜCKERT; HIRSCHER (a Roman-Catholic, who proposed reforms in the celebration, and the change of the language, of the Mass): Missæ genuina notio, Tübingen, 1821; [DU MOULIN: Anatomie de la messe, 1636-39, etc., 1872; DERODON: Le tombeau de la messe, Genève, 1659; LEBRUN: Expl. littér., histor., et dogm. des prêtres et des cérémonies de la messe, 1726; ET. MASSA CANDIDA, a term used by ecclesiastical writers from the fourth and fifth centuries, and referring to a multitude of martyrs (three hundred) who in 258 were put to death at Utica in Africa, by being thrown into a burning lime-kiln. Augustine, however, does not derive the name from the peculiar form of the martyrrium, but simply from the great number (massa) of the sufferers and from the splendor (caudida) of their heroism.

MASSILLON, Jean Baptiste, one of the most brilliant pulpit orators of France, the son of a poor notary; was b. at Hières in the Provence, June 24, 1663; d. at Clermont, Sept. 18, 1742. In 1691 he entered the congregation of the Oratory, where, at the request of his superiors, he pronounced some funeral orations and eulogies. In 1696 he became head of the seminary of St. Magloire in Paris, the most distinguished school of the Oratory. In 1699 he preached the Lenten sermons in Paris and Versailles, before the king; and again he preached before the king, in 1701 and 1704. [Bourdalone, on hearing him, is said to have remarked, "He must increase, but I must decrease."] These sermons are his best; and one of them, on the small number of the elect [Le petit nombre des élus], is said to have struck terror in the distinguished auditory by its evangelical boldness and magnificent descriptions. Louis XIV. said to him, "I have heard more than one great orator in my chapel, and was very well satisfied with them: but, whenever I hear you, I am always dissatisfied with myself." Massillon did not preach before Louis XIV. again, but at his death pronounced the funeral oration over him, [on which occasion one of the most impressive oratorical effects was made of which we have record. Looking over the vast audience, and then at the coffin, the preacher turned his face upwards, and, breaking the solemn silence, exclaimed, Dieu seul est grand, mes frères ("God only is great, my brethren"). In 1717 Massillon was made bishop of Clermont, and preached in the following year before Louis XV. (then eight years old) ten sermons, known as Le petit carême, in which he urged upon the youthful sovereign and his court the obligations of morality and just government. In 1719 he was elected a member of the French Academy, and two years afterwards was called upon to pronounce the funeral discourse of the Duchess Elizabeth Charlotte of Orleans, which is one of the best of six oraisons funèbres. From this time until his death he resided on his diocese, and was recognized as a model of Christian gentleness.

ness and virtue. D'Alembert pronounced his eulogy in the French Academy.

Cardinal Maury, in his Essai sur l'éloquence de la Chaire, ascribes the decline of French pulpit eloquence to the influence of Massillon. But this decline had begun before his time, and was due to the growing corruption of morals and taste. Massillon was the last great pulpit orator of France, and in some respects he stands higher than Bossuet. With him, in its full sense, eloquence was a virtue, an earnest effort to lead men to peace in God. He was more simple and sympathetic than the brilliant and courtly Bossuet, and more sincere and warm-hearted than Bourdaloue (who was the more opulent of thought), and therefore more edifying than both. The purity and unadorned beauty of his style were unsurpassable. He was acquainted with the secret movements of the heart, and made his appeals to it. [His memory was unreliable: but he committed his sermons, calling those the best which were memorized the most accurately.]

LIT. — The first complete edition of Massillon's works appeared in 15 vols., Paris, 1745; and since then they have appeared often, in many forms. The best work on Massillon is THEREMIN: Demosthenes u. Massillon, Berlin, 1845. [See also D'ALEMBERT: Eloges des savants, LA HARPE: Cours de littérature; SAINTE-BEUVE: Causeries du Lundi; B. MASSINGBERD, Francis Charles, b. in Lincolnshire, 1800; d. at South Ormsby, Lincolnshire, December, 1872. He was graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, 1822; took orders in the Church of England, and became rector of South Ormsby 1825; in 1847 prebendary of Lincoln, and in 1862 chancellor of the cathedral. He distinguished himself by his efforts to revive the powers of convocation. He wrote, besides many pamphlets, History of the English Reformation, London, 1812, 3d ed., 1857; Law of the Church and State, 1857; Lectures on the Prayer-Book, 1861.

MASSORA denotes, in general, tradition, as "Moses received the law on Mount Sinai, and delivered it to Joshua" (Aboth, i. 1); but more especially it denotes the tradition concerning the text of the Bible: hence those who made this special tradition their object of study were called "Massoretes." In the latter sense the word will be treated here.

The period of the theocracy and monarchy in Israel was succeeded by the period of legalism. After the return from the Babylonish captivity, the law of Moses was the centre of Jewish life, and its preservation was the main object of the leaders. Ezra is often called the "scribe," and once he is even styled "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (Ez. vii. 6). At a very early age the children were instructed in the law; and the public reading of the law was an ancient institution (Acts xv. 21). From the prophets, also, sections were publicly read (Acts xiii. 15); and the Hagiographa soon rose to a high authority. In order to preserve the text delivered from the Fathers in as pure a state as possible, the minutest rules were laid down for the writing of manuscripts: besides, the verses, words, letters, of the entire Bible, or of its parts, were numbered. Catalogues were prepared of words written, but not read, and read, but not written; of words which the scribes ordained (tikkun sopherim), and of letters which they removed (ittur sopherim). Rules were laid down concerning the puncta extraordinaria found over some letters in the Hebrew text [cf. Gen. xviii. 9, xix. 33; Num. iii. 19, ix. 10; Deut. xxix. 28; Ps. xxvii. 13], the inverted nun (as in Num. x. 35), the suspended nun (as in Judg. xviii. 30), [the Fau Ketia, i. e., the cut-off Vau in Num. xxv. 12, the final mem in Isa. ix. 6], the plene and defective writings, etc. We find nowhere in the Talmud that these rules were written down; and we are therefore led to the assumption that all these rules were orally transmitted from generation to generation. When the text was finally settled, and the vowel-points were introduced to the text, annotations concerning the writing of the latter were either put in the margin or at the end of the manuscripts. From that period the most important period of the Massora commences.

As there was an Eastern and Western, or Babylonian and Palestinian, Talmud, so, likewise, there developed itself a twofold Massora, — a Babylonian or Eastern, and a Palestinian or Western: the more important is the former. At Tiberias the study of the Massora had been in a flourishing condition for a long time. Here lived the famous Massorete, Aaron ben-Moses ben-Asher, commonly called Ben-Asher, in the beginning of the tenth century, who finally fixed the so-called Massoretic text. Those who came after him, and paid special attention to the text, are called "Naqdanim."

The most important Massoretic manual is the Oclah ve-Oclah, so called from the first two words with which it begins [comp. Pick, Oclah ve-Oclah, in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia, s. v.]; the Manuel du lecteur, by I. Derenbourg, Paris, 1871; and the Massoretic notes of Meir ha-levi ben-Todros of Toledo (d. 1214) to his edition of the Pentateuch, Florence, 1750 (less correct, Berlin, 1761).

The first who undertook to collect and sift the entire Massoretic apparatus was Jacob ben-Chajim ibn-Adonia (cf. Ginsburg: Jacob ben-Chajim ibn-Adoniah's Introduction to the Rabbinic Bible, London, 1867); and the result of his labors is found in the second Rabbinic Bible, published by Bomberg at Venice, 1524. This Massora text must be regarded as the textus receptus.

The Massora is divided into the Massora magna and Massora parva. In the Rabbinic Bibles, where the Chaldee is printed side by side with the Hebrew, the Massora parva occupies the empty space between these two columns and that of the outer margin. Above and below the text, the Massora magna is given. At the end of the fourth volume the Massora finalis (which must be distinguished from the Massora marginalis, and which is a kind of Massoretic lexicon alphabetically arranged) is given. The Massora finalis is followed by a list giving the differences between Ben-Asher and Ben-Naphtali, and those of the Western and Eastern Jews. The Eastern Massora differs from the Western not only with respect to vowels and accents, but also in the system of punctuation (cf. STRACK: Prophetarum posteriorum codex Babylonius Petropolitanus, Petersburg, 1876, p. vii.).

MASS-PRIESTS were anciently secular priests, as distinguished from regulars; afterwards priests kept in chantries (i.e., chapels endowed by wealthy persons, in which masses were said for the souls of the donors), or at particular altars, to say mass for the dead.

MASSUET, René, b. 1665, at St. Ouen in Normandy; d. in Paris, Jan. 11, 1716. He entered the congregation of St. Maur in 1682, and made his literary début in the controversy with the Jesuits concerning the edition of Augustine which the congregation had published. In 1699 he answered Langlois' anonymous attacks by his Lettre d'un Ecclesiastique, etc., also anonymous. In 1703 he settled at St. Germain-des-Prés in Paris, the principal centre of Benedictine learning; and in 1710 he published his edition of Irenæus, his chief work. After the death of Ruinart, he continued the Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, and published in 1713 the fifth volume. Five interesting letters from him to Bernh. Pez are found in J. G. SCHELHORN'S Amanitates Literariae, xiii. 278-310. See TASSIN: Hist. littér. de la congrégation de St. Maur, Paris, 1750-65. G. LAUBMANN.

MATAMOROS, Manuel, a devoted Spanish Protestant, whose imprisonment, personality, and early death aroused an interest in Holland, Switzerland, and Southern Germany, in the evangelization of Spain; b. Oct. 8, 1835, at Lepe in the Province of Huelva; d. at Lausanne, July 31, 1866. His father was a captain in the Spanish artillery, and at his wish he entered in 1850 the military school at Toledo. But, conceiving a dislike for a military life, he returned to Malaga, where his mother, then a widow, was residing. On a visit to Gibraltar he casually attended a service held by Francisco de Paula Ruet, who had been brought to a knowledge of the gospel by the sermons of Luigi de Sanctis in Turin, and had been banished from Spain for preaching the gospel in Barcelona. The sermon made an indelible impression upon his mind; and he bought a New Testament, which opened his eyes to the errors of the Roman Church. Through Ruet, Matamoros came into relations with a committee in Edinburgh, and, later, with one in Paris, which prosecuted the evangelization of Spain. He went, under commission of the latter, to Granada, Seville, and Barcelona (1860). At Granada he became acquainted with Alhama, a hat-maker, who had been converted through the instrumentality of an American tract, and was preaching the gospel. Thrown into prison, letters were found on his person from Matamoros, Marin, Carrasco, and Gonzalez, all of whom were likewise thrown into prison. Matamoros laid there two years, awaiting trial, and contracted the disease (consumption) which caused his death. Through the influence of a deputation of the Evangelical Alliance he was released (May 28, 1863), and condemned to nine years' labor in the galleys, which was afterwards changed to nine years of banishment. Matamoros then made a visit to England, where he was cordially welcomed, and afterwards went to Lausanne, where he attended the theological seminary. On a visit to Pau in Southern France, in the interest of his health, he established, through the liberality of an American lady, a Spanish school. Returning to Lausanne, he died just a few days before the time set for his ordination, and two years before his country was opened to Protestant missions (1868). In his last days he exhibited an undiminished interest in the evangelization of Spain; and his rich spiritual experiences have been to this day an incentive to the Swiss to aid in that work. His name will not be forgotten. F. FLIEDNER (Madrid).

MATER DOLOROSA (the mourning mother), a term denoting a certain class of pictures of the Virgin Mary, which represent her alone, without the child, generally as a middle-aged woman, weeping and mourning. See Mrs. JAMESON: Legends of the Madonna, London, 1852.

MATERIALISM, as its name indicates, is the theory which seeks to trace all things in nature to matter as their sole and ultimate source; or, in other words, the theory which professes to explain the universe in terms of matter. This definition may appear clear and precise. The thing defined is, however, essentially obscure and vague, owing to the number and diversity of the conceptions formed as to the nature of matter. Materialism never answers strictly to its name, because it always attributes to matter properties which have not been proved to belong to it. Instead of being a single system, which advances from stage to stage by a self-consistent development, it comprises a crowd of heterogeneous and discordant hypotheses.

The ruder tribes of men are unable to conceive either of mere matter or of mere spirit; and hence their religious beliefs are, to a large extent, materialistic. Anti-religious materialism makes its appearance only when thought has become speculative and sceptical. Such materialism was propagated in ancient China by Yang Choo (about B.C. 300), and in ancient India in the Charvaka system. Materialism, in a form entitled to be called philosophical, was originated by the Greek thinkers Leucippus and Democritus, developed and popularized by Epicurus, and "wedded to immortal verse" by the Latin poet Lucretius. All things, according to their theory, were explicable by "the empty" and "the full,"—the limitless and immeasurable void of space and numberless atoms which are ungenerated, infrangible, unchangeable, and indestructible, which possess no merely qualitative differences, but vary quantitatively in form, magnitude, and density. The general neglect of physical science, and the general acceptance of Christianity, secured the rejection of materialism during the middle ages. In the period of transition from mediæval to modern times it began to re-appear. Gassendi gave it currency in France, and Hobbes in England. The so-called "materialism" of Coward, Dodwell, Hartley, and Priestley, denied the spirituality of the soul, but not the existence of God. La Mettrie and Von Holbach first advocated the atheistical materialism which has since become so common. This form of materialism has never had more advocates than at present. The causes of its prevalence are such as these, — the still operative influence of the thought of the eighteenth century, re-action from the excessive idealism of the transcendental philosophies, political and social disaffection, the spread of rationalism and of unbelief in the supernatural, the predominance of material interests, and the rapid progress of physical, and especially of biological, science, widely engrossing attention, to the comparative neglect of mental and spiritual truth, and also largely engendering undue confidence in a particular class of hypotheses. The materialism of the present day claims to be distinctively scientific; and, of course, it largely incorporates, and freely applies, modern scientific theories. As to its primary principles or assumptions, however, it has no more title to be deemed scientific than the materialism of earlier times. In fact, contemporary materialism shows a manifest tendency to represent matter as essentially endowed with qualitative differences, and even with spontaneity, life, intelligence, "mind-stuff," "soul-organs," etc., which is surely a tendency, not towards science, but towards feticism.

Mr. Herbert Spencer, Professors Huxley and Tyndall, and some other authors, while tracing back all life, intelligence, and history, to matter or to physical force, object to being classed as materialists, on the ground that they acknowledge that matter in its ultimate nature is unknown, and can no more be conceived of, except in terms of mind, than mind can be conceived of otherwise than in terms of matter. Were the objection admissible, we must equally cease to speak of Democritus and Epicurus, Hobbes and Von Holbach, as materialists, seeing that they as fully recognized the truth on which it is rested. It is, however, quite inadmissible. Whoever holds that matter, or material force, is eternal, and originates all mind and mental force, is a materialist.

Materialism claims to be the most rational and philosophical theory of the universe on the following grounds. First, that it best satisfies the legitimate demands of the reason for unity. It professes to be the only self-consistent and adequate system of monism, — the only philosophy which traces all things back in a satisfactory manner to a single ultimate substance as their cause. Theism, materialists hold, is a kind of dualism, because it refers some things to mind, and other things to matter, and maintains matter and mind to be distinct; and idealism they represent as erroneously trying to account for general facts and properties by such as are special, and failing to explain the physical world. Secondly, materialism claims to be the only theory which explains all things in a natural manner, or without having recourse to any arbitrary factor, any transcendent cause, any supernatural will. Thirdly, it claims to be a peculiarly intelligible explanation, — the only explanation which can be realized in imagination and conception, which the mind can picture or figure to itself. In opposition to these claims, however, it is urged that matter has not been shown to be one even in kind, as it has not yet been resolved into less than about sixty elements; that, if it could be reduced to a single homogeneous physical element, that element would not be one, since each of its parts would be as much a substance as the whole; that force has never been shown to be an effect of matter, while, if co-ordinate with matter, every atom must be dual, and, if the cause of matter, materialism must be abandoned; that it is the reverse of scientific to assume without proof that matter and force are eternal, and explain every thing; that it is a violation of the law of causality to account for the lower by the higher; and that truly scientific thought is seldom figurate or pictorial thought.

Materialism involves the affirmation that matter is eternal, but it has as yet entirely failed to produce any good reasons for the opinion. The conditionate character of the atoms and elements of matter strongly favor the contrary view. The relationship of matter to force presents difficulties which materialism has likewise failed to overcome. Force cannot be accounted for by aggregation, or self-determination, of matter, and thus shown to be an effect; yet to represent it as co-ordinate with matter is to fall into the dualism which materialism professes to despise; and to suppose it the cause of matter involves the surrender of materialism. Life must be shown to be either a property or an effect of matter, before materialism is entitled to be accepted. It has certainly not been shown to be either the one or the other. The attempts of M. Pouchet, Dr. Bastian, etc., to prove experimentally the hypothesis of spontaneous generation, have utterly failed. Materialism finds mind still more difficult to explain than life, there being a greater unlikeness between mental and physical facts than between vital and mechanical facts. Matter, in its transformations, never loses properties which mind never possesses in any of its phases. Molecular changes in the nerves and brain not only have not been shown ever to pass into mental states, but cannot even be conceived to do so. Such facts as the unity of consciousness, the consciousness of personal identity, self-consciousness, self-activity, and the moral sentiments, cannot be resolved into states of matter. The universe as a system of law and order presupposes a Supreme Intelligence. On these and other grounds it may be held that materialism is far from a satisfactory doctrine.

The mass of literature on materialism is enormous. F. A. LANGE'S Geschichte des Materialismus is the only able general history of the subject. It has been translated by Mr. Thomas. BÜCHNER'S Matter and Force and Man's Place in Nature, VOGT'S Lectures on Man, HECKEL'S Natural History of Creation and Anthropogenie, and The Old and New Faith of STRAUSS, may also be named as English translations of German works devoted entirely or mainly to the advocacy of materialism.

H. SPENCER'S First Principles, HUXLEY'S essay on The Physical Basis of Life, and TYNDALL'S Bel-fast Lecture, need only to be mentioned. In England, materialism has been combated by Beale, Birks, Carpenter, Elam, MacVicar, Martineau, Clerk-Maxwell, Mivart, Ballfour Stewart, Hutchison Stirling, Stokes, Tait, Thomson, Duke of Argyll, etc.; in America, by Bowen, Bowne, Chadbourne, Coker, Joseph Cook, Dawson, Fisher, Hickok, Hodge, Le Conte, McCosh, Porter, etc.; in France, by Caro, Janet, Pasteur, etc.; in Germany, by Fabri, J. H. Fichte, Hamns, Hoffmann, Huber, Lotze, Bona Meyer, Schaller, Ulrichi, Weiss, Wigand, Zoekler, etc. The chief works relating to particular periods of the history, and special points of the theory, of materialism, will be found indicated in notes v.-xix. on Lectures ii.-iv. of Antitheistic Theories, by the author of this article. R. FLINT (University of Edinburgh).

MATERNUS, Julius Firmicus, is, according to the signature of the only manuscript of the work still extant, the name of the author of the book, De errore profanarum religionum, dedicated to the sons of Constantine, — Constantius and Constans. According to xxviii. 6 and xxix. 3, the book must have been written after the expedition of Constans to England, and before the defeat of Constantius at Singara; that is, between 343 and 348. Its purpose was to induce Constantius and Constans to adopt a policy of active suppression of Paganism: the apology is here transformed into polemics. The work is not complete: the leaves 1, 2, 7, and 8, of the manuscript, are missing. The plan of the composition, however, is perfectly clear. The manuscript, formerly in Minden, is now in the Vatican. It was first edited by M. Flacius, 1562, then by Münter, Copenhagen, 1826; reprinted in MIGNE (Patrol., xii.) by Bursian, Leipzig, 1856, and C. Halm, in Corp. Scr. Eccl. Lat., ii. Of the author's personal life and character nothing is known: he is nowhere mentioned. According to Bursian's investigation, he is not identical with the Maternus who wrote the Libri Matheseos. MATHER FAMILY, The. Richard Mather, the son of Thomas and Margaret; b. in 1596 at Lorton (Winwick), about midway between Liverpool and Manchester, Eng.; d. at Dorchester, April 22 (May 2), 1669. He was sent to the Winwick grammar-school, and at fifteen was chosen teacher of a school at Toxteth Park. Here he became acquainted with an Aspinwall family, by whose influence he was led to devote himself to the ministry, and went to Brasenose, Oxford, to prepare for the same. But the people at Toxteth were so unwilling to wait for him, that he left the university before taking his degrees, and late in 1618, when only twenty-two, preached his first sermon at Toxteth Park. The Bishop of Chester ordained him; and in September, 1624, he married Katherine, daughter of Edmond Holt of Bury. Becoming warmly a Puritan, and being for a time suspended, he left — travelling in disguise to Bristol — for New England, May 23 (June 2), 1635; landing at Boston, after being very nearly shipwrecked, Aug. 17 (27) following. The First Church at Dorchester having emigrated with its pastor, Warham, to Connecticut, Mr. Mather gathered a new (the present First) church there Aug. 23 (Sept. 2), 1636; he being chosen its teacher, which office he held until his death, at the age of seventy-three. He married John Cotton's widow for his second wife, and by his first wife left six sons, of whom four — Samuel, Nathaniel, Eleazer, and Increase — followed their father's profession. He was one of the ablest and most influential among the early ministers of New England, a powerful preacher, and a specially wise counsellor; being, in fact, seized with his mortal illness while moderating that ecclesiastical council in Boston out of whose deliberations the Old-South Church was born. He was skilled in the New-England plan of church government; being the author of three or four of the best early tracts in its exposition and defence, and the chief composer of the "Cambridge Platform." His son Samuel graduated at Harvard College in 1643, went to England in 1650, and was ordained at Dublin, where he preached until his death, Oct. 29 (Nov. 8), 1671, at the age of forty-five. Nathaniel graduated at Harvard in 1647, and, immediately on gaining the degree of M.A., returned to England, where he preached in Devonshire until ejected by the Act of 1662, when he went to Rotterdam, where he spent some time as minister of the English Church, returning, on the death of his brother Samuel, to succeed him at Dublin. In 1658 he removed to London to take charge of the Lime-street congregation, and to be one of the Merchants Lecturers at Pinner's Hall. In London he died, July 26 (Aug. 5), 1697, at the age of sixty-seven, and was interred in Bunhill Fields. Eleazer graduated at Harvard in 1656; in 1658 went to Northampton, and gathered the first church there, over which he was ordained in June, 1661. There he labored successfully till his early death, July 24 (Aug. 3), 1669, aged thirty-two. Increase proved the flower of the family. He, too, graduated at Harvard in 1656, in the same class with his brother Eleazer, though, on account of physical weakness, for a time a pupil of John Norton. On his nineteenth birthday he preached at Dorchester: twelve days after, sailed for the old country; took his M.A. at Trinity College, Dublin; and, after preaching variously, returned to New England in 1661, intending, when times should more favor, to return to England, but was ordained May 27 (June 6), 1664, over the Second Church of Boston, in which pastorate he remained until his death, Aug. 23 (Sept. 4), 1723, at the advanced age of eighty-five. For seventeen years (1685-1701) of this pastorate he was also president of Harvard College; and in 1688 he went to England as special agent of the Massachusetts Colony, where — "his expenses in the mean time greatly exceeding his compensation, and he pledging all his property for money which he borrowed to support himself while he was working for his country" — he remained in this public service about four years. It is related of him that it was his habit to study sixteen hours out of the twenty-four. It is matter of record that he was acceptable not merely, but highly honored, for nearly sixty years, in one of the two most important pulpits on this side of the sea: and he left behind him publications of various sorts to the number of a hundred and sixty. It is in no way, therefore, strange, that he should have been almost unanimously held to be the foremost minister of his day in this new country, and that he should have exercised an influence as vast as it mainly was salutary. In 1662 he married Maria, daughter of John Cotton, by whom he had three sons and seven daughters. His sons — Cotton, Nathaniel, and Samuel — graduated at Harvard in 1678, 1685, and 1690 respectively. Of these, Cotton, the eldest, — b. Feb. 12 (22), 1662 (1663); d. Feb. 13 (23), 1728 (1729). — became the most renowned of the lineage; although, conceding his omnivorous scholarship and exceptional labors, it may be doubted whether he were even the peer of his father or grandfather in intellectual ability. He took his B. A. when less than fifteen years and six months old; taught for a time; overcame an impediment of speech which had threatened to interfere with his success in the family profession; acted as his father's assistant at the Second Church, Boston; and was ordained, as joint pastor with him, May 13 (23), 1685, — a place which he surrendered only at his death, at the age of sixty-five. During these nearly three and forty years he was indefatigable as a preacher, systematic and thorough as a pastor, eminent as a philanthropist, — at great personal risk successfully introducing and defending the inoculative prevention of small-pox, — and amazing as an author: being known to have printed three hundred and eighty-two separate works, of which several were elaborate volumes, and one a stately folio of eight hundred pages; while, to his sore and amazed grief, the great work of his life (in his own esteem), his Biblia Americana, remains in manuscript to this day, in six big volumes. It was his misfortune that the weak and whimsical side of his multiform greatness most impressed itself on many of his generation, and that, for sharing with other good and eminent men of his day in the witchcraft delusion, he has most unfairly been singled out for a specialty of censure and contumely which in no degree fairly belongs to him. He was no more guilty for not being, as to that, in advance of his age, than were Richard Baxter and Sir Matthew Hale in England, or Judge Sewall, or Gov. Stoughton, or Sir William Phips, or scores of others in New England. Cotton Mather married three times. His fourth son (by the second of these ladies), and the only one who lived to manhood, was Samuel. He graduated at Harvard in 1723, before he was seventeen; and four years after his father's death, June 21 (July 2), 1732, was ordained colleague with Rev. Joshua Gee over that same Boston church which his father and grandfather had served for sixty-four years before him. Of considerable learning and fair abilities, he did not, however, till the ancient place; and in less than ten years was dismissed, and, with a not very large following, labored with a new church (which did not survive him) until his death, in 1785. He, too, was an author, of less than a score of books however, only one of which, An Apology for the Liberties of the Churches of New England, deserves, or has, remembrance. Neither of his three sons studied for the ministry.

It may be doubted whether history can parallel this family, of which eleven were trained for the sacred office in four generations, of whom the seven who wrought in New England expended, in two months less than a century and a half, about two hundred and fifty years of ministerial labor upon it, besides publishing more than five hundred different works, and some of them exerting a popular influence never surpassed, and seldom equalled. For its distinguished services in each of its four generations, in reducing to rigid system, illustrating, defending, and chronicling the way of the churches of New England, if it had done nothing else, this Mather group would deserve, as it will receive, perpetual remembrance. See C. ROBBINS: History of Old North Church in Boston, Boston, 1852. A well-printed and indexed edition of COTTON MATHER'S famous Magnum Christi Americana, or The Ecclesiastical History of New England, with memoir, and translations of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin quotations, was printed in 2 vols. at Hartford, 1855.

MATHESIUS, Johann, b. at Rochlitz, Saxony, June 24, 1504; d. at Joachimsthal in Bohemia, Oct. 8, 1565. He studied at Ingolstadt; came in Bavaria in contact with the Anabaptists; was converted by the study of Luther's writings; went in 1529 to Wittenberg; was in 1532 made rector of the school in Joachimsthal; returned in 1540 to Wittenberg, where he lived in Luther's house; and was in 1541 appointed deacon at Joachimsthal, and in 1545 pastor. He published several volumes of sermons, one of which, containing seventeen sermons on Luther (delivered 1562-64, published at Nuremberg, 1566, and often republished), is of great interest, because they constitute the first complete and reliable biography of Luther. His life was written by a descendant of his, J. B. Mathesius, Dresden, 1705. See G. PLITT: Die vier ersten Lutherbiographien, Erlangen, 1876. G. PLITT.

MATHEW, Theobald, the famous "Father Mathew," the Apostle of Temperance in Ireland; b. at Thomastown (five miles west of Cashel), Tipperary, Oct. 10, 1790; d. at Queenstown, Dec. 8, 1856. He studied for a year at Maynooth, 1807-08; was ordained 1814; entered the Capuchin convent at Kilkenny, but the same year went to the Capuchin convent at Cork; attained a wide popularity; was appointed a member of the Board of Direction of the House of Industry (workhouse), Cork. One of his fellow-governors was William Martin, a Friend, and one of the pioneers in the total-abstinence cause. It was he who first impressed Father Mathew with the fearful curse drink entailed, and how it was the cause of the wretchedness the workhouse so strikingly exhibited; and he urged the priest to start a crusade against the evil, maintaining firmly that he was just the man to do it. On April 10, 1838, Father Mathew, who was then in his forty-eighth year, definitely committed himself to the work. His success was phenomenal. Twenty-five thousand signed the total-abstinence pledge inside of three months; and, by January of the next year, two hundred thousand persons, most of whom lived in Cork and its vicinity, had embraced the new gospel. Father Mathew extended his labors over all Ireland, visited Scotland and England (1842-43), and spent two years in America (1849-51), going as far west as St. Louis, everywhere making converts by the hundreds. Much of his success was due to the man, — his exhaustless flow of animal spirits, his humor and wit, his downright earnestness, his courage and high character. To put down drunkenness was his enthusiastic, intermittent endeavor. In business matters he was a child, and managed them so badly, that he quickly, and well-nigh permanently, was sunk in debt. This galled him intensely, conscious though he was of integrity. He was the greatest benefactor to the Irish people since St. Patrick; and, if he were obeyed as constantly as he is revered by them, the Irish question would be a far simpler one. A fine statue has been erected to his memory at Cork. Of the several lives of him, perhaps the best is by J. F. Maguire, London, 1863, people's ed., 1865.

MATHILDA, Countess of Tuscany, b. 1016; d. in the monastery of Bondeno de' Roncori, July 24, 1115; a daughter of Count Boniface of Tuscany and Beatrice of Lorraine; inherited, while still a mere child, very extensive possessions in Lombardy and Central Italy, — Tuscany, parts of Lombardy, Mantua, Parma, Reggio, Piacenza, Ferrara, Umbria, Spoleto, etc. Her parentage was German, and her ancestors were firm adherents of the German emperors; but the treacherous manner in which Henry III. treated her father induced him to throw himself into the opposite camp; and during the reigns of Nicholas II., Alexander II., Gregory VII., Victor III., Urban II., and Paschalis II., the Countess Mathilda was the main stay of the Papacy. Specially intimate was her relation to Gregory VII., whom she sheltered more than once against the fury of Henry IV. She continued the war against the emperor, even after Gregory's death. She was twice married, — first to Godfrey of Lorraine, then to Duke Welf of Bavaria; but her first marriage seems never to have been completed; and from her second husband she was divorced. Her enormous wealth she bequeathed to the papal chair. It formed part of the so-called "Patrimonium Petri." See LUIGI TOSTI: La contessa Matilde ed i romani pontefici, Florence, 1859; and the arts. MATTER, Jacques, b. at Alt-Eckendorf, Alsace, May 31, 1791; d. at Strassburg, June 23, 1861. He studied at Göttingen and Paris, and was appointed professor of history in the college of Strassburg in 1819, and in the following year also professor of church history in the theological faculty. In 1832 he was called to Paris as inspector-general of the university, but returned in 1846 to Strassburg as professor of the philosophy of religion. Of his works the following have specific theological interest: Histoire critique du Gnosticisme, Paris, 1828, 2 vols.; Histoire universelle de l'Église Chrétienne, Paris, 1829–32, 3 vols.; Schelling et la philosophie de la nature, 1842; Histoire de la philosophie dans ses rapports avec la religion, 1857, 2 vols.; Le Mysticisme en France aux temps de Fénelon, Paris, 1861.

MATTHEW (Ματθαῖος, or, according to the Sinaitic manuscript, B and D, Μαθθαῖος). I. THE MAN. — Matthew was one of the twelve apostles, and is mentioned in the lists of the disciples in Matt. x., Mark iii., Luke vi., Acts i. He was a publican, and was sitting at the receipt of custom when Jesus called him to be his disciple (Matt. ix. 9). In Mark ii. 14, Luke v. 27 sqq., he is called Levi. The circumstances in these three cases are the same, and there can be no reason for doubting that the same person is meant. Levi, no doubt, was his original name, which was subsequently exchanged for Matthew. This apostle is not mentioned in the Acts, except once (i. 13); and the early traditions about his career are often contradictory to each other. According to Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. 2, 1), Irenæus (Adv. Har. 3, 1), Eusebius (H. E., 3, 24), and others, he remained in Jerusalem for fifteen years after the ascension, preaching to the Jews. At the end of this period, he went to other peoples (Euseb., H. E., 3, 1; Hieron. catal., 4), — to the Ethiopians (Rufinus, H. E., 10, 9; Socrates, H. E., 1, 19), the Macedonians (Isidor. Hisp., De Sanc., 77), the Persians (Ambrose, in Psalm xlv.) etc. The Roman-Catholic and Greek churches celebrate his martyrdom; but there are no notices of it till after Heracleon, Clement, Origen, and Tertullian; and the tradition is at variance with the representations of these authors.

II. THE GOSPEL. — One of the oldest, least questioned, and most generally believed church traditions is, that Matthew was the author of a Gospel written in Hebrew. Papias (Euseb., H. E., 3, 39) testifies that "Matthew wrote (or arranged) the discourses (τὰ λόγια) in the Hebrew dialect, and each [probably the evangelists] interpreted them as he was able." Irenæus (Adv. Har., 3, 1) says, "Matthew brought a writing of the Gospel among the Hebrews in their own dialect." Eusebius (H. E., v. 10) relates that Pantænus, the contemporary of Irenæus, who made missionary journeys in India, says that Bartholomew "had left to the Indians Matthew's writing in the language of the Hebrews." According to Origen (Euseb., 6, 25), "the first Gospel was written by Matthew, and arranged for believing Jews in the Hebrew language." Not to mention other and later testimonies, Jerome (Catal., 3) says, "Matthew composed the Gospel of Christ in Hebrew letters and words, but it is not made out who it was who afterwards translated it into Greek. Further: this very Hebrew text is preserved unto this day in the Cæsarean Library." He then says that this volume was used by the Nazarenes in Beroë, a city of Syria. He speaks of the Gospel in other places (Proleg. in Matth.; Præf. in IV. Evv. ad Damas., etc.), but in the main point abides by what he here has said. In spite of these explicit testimonies, Calvin, Beza, John Lightfoot, Fabricius, Wetstein, Hug, Fritzsche, Credner, De Wette, Bleek, Ewald, Ritschl, Hilgenfeld, Köstlin, and many others (see below) have advocated the theory that the Greek Gospel was the original one. But from an historical stand-point the view which is attested so constantly and unequivocally, from the first half of the second century on, cannot be overthrown, that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew; and in this opinion agree Mill, Michaelis, Storr, Corrodi, Eichhorn, Bertholdt, Olshausen, Sieffert, Guericke, Ebrard, Baur, Thiersch, Delitzsch, Meyer, and others. No copy of the Hebrew Gospel is extant. Some of the old scholars identified the Hebrew Matthew with the Gospel to the Hebrews often mentioned by Irenæus (Adv. Har., i. 26, 2; iii. 11, 7), Jerome (c. Pelag., 2; Ad Matth., 12, 13), and also called the Hebrew Gospel (τὸ ἑβραϊκόν), or the Gospel of the Ebionites, the Nazarenes, etc. But Origen (Tract. 8 in Matth., xix. 19), Eusebius (H. E. 3, 25), and Jerome (De vir. ill., 3; Ad Mich. 7, 6), who appeals to his own personal observation, distinctly deny it. The divergence in the testimonies seems to point us to a common original, from which the Hebrew Matthew and the other work were derived. And certainly there is no sufficient ground for regarding (with Schneckenburger, Schwegler, Baur) our present Gospel according to Matthew as a translation of this Gospel to the Hebrews; and Jerome, the translator of the latter, specially distinguishes it from our Matthew.

But what relation does our Greek Matthew hold to the original Hebrew Gospel of the apostle? We do not believe, with some, that the author of the original Hebrew Gospel (Matthew) translated it into our present Greek version, or revised it. An apostle who had been an eye-witness of the events would not be the author of the account as we now have it. Many of the discourses are placed out of the environment in which they were uttered. The discourses and miracles are given in groups, and in connection with notices of time such as an eye-witness would not have given (comp. viii. 1, 5, 14, 18, 23, 28; ix. 1, 9, 14, 18, 27, 32; or xii. 38, 46; xiii. 1, 36). Here belong also such concluding statements as vii. 28; xi. 1; xiii. 53; xix. 1; xxvi. 1, at the end of discourses which make the impression that they were spoken in the connection reported, whereas this often was not the case.

But that our canonical Greek Matthew is a translation from the Hebrew, Jerome assures us (Catal., 3), and in a way which leaves no doubt that he had good reasons for so doing. He moreover expressly says that the name of the translator was not ascertained; and later writers regarded him to be James, the Lord's brother, or John (Theophylact, Prolog. in Matth.). Nor does Jerome indicate that there was any difference between the Hebrew Matthew (a copy of which he made) and the Greek or canonical Matthew. It cannot be denied, therefore, that an exceedingly close relationship must be assumed to have existed between our canonical Matthew and the Hebrew Matthew. To this assumption we are forced by the view which the early church had of the first Gospel in our canon. Nowhere do we find a breath of suspicion of its genuineness. The very superscription, "According to Matthew," is weighty in this connection, as no reason can be thought of for ascribing a Gospel to an apostle who left behind no traces of his activity in the church, unless he really was its author. Barnabas (Matt. xx. 16; xx. 14, etc.), Polycarp (ii. 6, 7), and Ignatius (Ad Polyc., 2, etc.) seem to have traces of Matthew. According to Epiphanius (Hær. 24, 5), Basilides made a false use of Matt. vii. 6. Celsus and others seem also to have used the Gospel. After the middle of the second century, we find many evidences of its use in Justin, Athenagoras, Hegesippus, etc. From these testimonies and quotations it is evident that the first of our Gospels was considered to be canonical after the first quarter of the second century. This testimony of the ancient writers is confirmed by the contents of the Gospel itself.

The canonical Gospel, as we have already stated, does not seem to us to be a literal translation of the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew, but was derived from a Gospel which stood in very intimate relations to the Hebrew Matthew. Papias speaks of the τὰ λόγια (the Lord's discourses) which Matthew arranged. Schneckenburger, Lachmann, Credner, Wieseler, Ewald, Köstlin, Reuss, Meyer, and other critics, following the lead of Schleiermacher, have concluded from this statement that Matthew in the first instance made only a collection of the Lord's discourses, the narratives of events being inserted afterwards. But we cannot agree with this view, and hold that there is more to favor the opinion that the expression τὰ λόγια included narratives of events, than to favor the contrary opinion, limiting it to discourses. Papias denominated his own work an Exposition of the Lord's Discourses (λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις). It contains historical details; and, if he had written an account of the Lord's life, he would no doubt have called it Discourses of the Lord (λόγια κυριακά). A conclusive argument for this view is, that, immediately after characterizing the contents of Mark as "what was said or done by the Lord," he designates the same thing by τὰ κυριακά λόγια ("The Lord's Discourses"). The original Gospel of Matthew, which Papias calls τὰ λόγια, was more than a collection of the Lord's sayings.

The quotations from the Old Testament which have been used to confirm the theory of a Greek as well as a Hebrew original, seem to favor our view. Just those quotations (ii. 6, 15, 23; viii. 17; xii. 18-20; xiii. 35, etc.) which are added by the writer himself are independent of the LXX.; while those (about thirty) which occur in the discourses of Christ agree almost unanimously with the LXX. From this circumstance we draw the conclusion that the Hebrew writer used the Hebrew text of the Old Testament in his quotations, and the translator of our Greek Gospel took these quotations from the LXX.; whereas, when he added his own reflections, he went immediately to the Hebrew for his quotations, and translated into Greek.

[The view of the writer of this article is certainly not strengthened by the explanation to which he is forced of the quotations of Matthew from the Old Testament. There are three views historically possible in regard to our canonical Greek Matthew: (1) It is a close translation of a Hebrew original (by Matthew himself, or another), called by Papias τὰ λόγια, and referred to by many of the Fathers; (2) It is a free reproduction and enlargement (either by Matthew himself, — as Bengel, Guericke, Schott, Olshausen, Thiersch, Schaff, and Godet hold, — or by another) of these same λόγια; (3) Papias made a mistake (as did the other Fathers who are in this case regarded as having followed him), and our canonical Greek Gospel is the original. This last view, held (in addition to the scholars above mentioned) by Keim, Alford, Ellicott, Roberts (Dissertations on the Gospels), Davidson, Archbishop Thomson, is affirmed on the ground of the quotations, so many of which are from the LXX., and its "too decidedly Greek character" (Keim), etc. The tendency seems to be rather in favor of this view. But we prefer to hold to the opinion that a Hebrew Gospel of Matthew did exist, and that our canonical Gospel is a reproduction and enlargement of it (by his own hand), on the ground of the strong and unquestioned testimony in favor of a prior Hebrew Matthew, the inherent probability that a Gospel for the Jews would be written in their own language, and the universal regard in which it was held by the early Christian writers.

The date of the Gospel is put (on the ground of xxvii. 8; xxviii. 15, etc.) down quite a time below the ascension, yet (on the ground of v. 23; xxiii. 36; xxiv. 29, etc.) before the destruction of Jerusalem, and between 60 and 70 (Alford, Archbishop Thomson, Godet, 64; Schaff, Keim, 66; Lange, 67-69, etc.). Volkmar puts it down to 105-110; and Güder, while assigning the Hebrew Gospel to a date before the destruction of Jerusalem, assigns the Greek Gospel to a date subsequent to that event.]

The Gospel, as Irenæus, Eusebius, and Jerome observed long ago, was meant for Jewish Christians in Palestine. A knowledge of Jewish customs, topography, etc., is presupposed in the readers (comp. Matt. xv. 1, 2, with Mark vii. 1 sq., etc.); the method of reckoning time is Jewish, etc. The aim of the Gospel was to be a comprehensive proof that Jesus was the promised Messiah. He is represented as David's and Abraham's son (i. 1; ix. 27, etc.), was born in Bethlehem, fled as the new-born king from Herod's wrath (ii. 13-15), was brought up in Nazareth (ii. 23), had John for his forerunner (iii. 3; xi. 10), labors in Galilee (iv. 14 sq.), heals the sick (viii. 17; xii. 17), speaks in parables (xiii. 1 sq.), enters in triumph into Jerusalem (xxi. 5-16), was rejected by his people (xxi. 42), and forsaken by his disciples (xxvi. 56). All these things occurred according to prophecy.

In the disposition of his matter he follows an arrangement based upon the matter, giving the discourses (v.-vii.) and parables (xiii.) in groups, as also the miracles (viii., ix.). The Gospel is divided into three main divisions: (1) The early history of our Lord (i.-iv.); (2) His activity in Galilee (v.-xviii.); (3) The continuance of this activity in Judæa, and the termination of the Lord's career by death and the resurrection (xix.-xxviii.).

MATTHEW OF PARIS (Matthæus Parisius), b. in the beginning of the thirteenth century; d. 1259; one of the most learned men of his age, — a poet, orator, theologian, and historian. His surname he received, according to some, from his having been born in Paris; according to others, from his having studied there. He entered the order of the Cluniacenses at St. Albans in 1217. Innocent IV. sent him to Norway to reform the monastery of Holm. At his instance, King Henry III., who held him in great esteem, granted several privileges to the university of Oxford. Besides biographies of the founder of St. Albans and of several of its abbots, he left a history of England from 1066 to 1259. The first part (to 1235) is simply a transcription of the Chronicle of Roger of Wendover; but the latter part of the work is original, and forms one of the principal sources, not only to the history of England, but to the general church history of the time. It was continued by William Rishanger, a monk of the same monastery, down to 1273. Its general title is Historia anglica major, in contradistinction from the Historia minor, an extract from the work, made by the author himself. [Best edition of the first by Luard, London, 1872-83, 7 vols.; of the second, by Madden, 1866-69, 3 vols.; Eng. trans. of both works in Bohn's Antiquarian Library, 5 vols.] C. SCHMIDT.

MATTHEW OF YORK, b. in Bristol, 1546; d. at Cawood Castle, March 29, 1628. He was graduated at Oxford, 1563; canon of Christ Church, 1570; prebendary of Sarum, and president of St. John's College, 1572; dean of Durham, 1583; bishop of Durham, 1595; archbishop of York, 1606. He was a man of much learning and great eloquence; but his only printed production is Concia apologetica contra Capianum, Oxford, 1581 and 1638. In York Cathedral there are manuscript notes of his upon all the ancient Fathers.

MAULBRONN (a Cistercian monastery in the diocese of Spire, founded by Bishop Günther in 1148) belonged originally under the jurisdiction of the Empire, but passed in the fourteenth century under that of the Palatinate, and was in 1504 conquered by the Duke of Würtemberg, and incorporated with his dominions. When the Reformation was established in Würtemberg (in 1535), Maulbronn was set apart for those monks who wanted to remain Roman Catholics. In 1557 it received an evangelical abbot, and was transformed into a cloister-school. At present it is the seat of a theological seminary. Its buildings, still in good repair, have some architectural interest. See HARTMANN: Wegweiser durch das Kloster Maulbronn, 1877; E. PAULUS: Beschreibung des Klosters M., 1881.

In 1564 a conference was held at Maulbronn between the Lutheran theologians of Würtemberg and the Calvinist theologians of the Palatinate, — the so-called Colloquium Maulbrunnense, — for the purpose of effecting a reconciliation between the two parties. The occasion was the establishment of Calvinism in the Palatinate, and the issue of the Heidelberg Catechism in 1563. The conference lasted from April 10 to April 15, but no result was arrived at. Both parties ascribed the victory to themselves; and, when the Würtemberg theologians published an Epitome Colloquii M. (Frankfort, 1564), the Heidelberg theologians answered with another Epitome (Heidelberg, 1565) and the publication of the Protocol. The Würtemberg theologians also published the Protocol, "without additions or omissions;" and the controversy dragged on for several years. More effective was another conference, held, for the same purpose, at Maulbronn, Jan. 19, 1576. It resulted in the so-called Formula Maulbrunnensis, which afterwards became the basis of the Formula Concordiæ.

MAUNDY THURSDAY, the day before Good Friday. Upon it the Lord's Supper was instituted. Skeat's note (slightly abridged) upon the word is as follows: "Maundy is Middle English maundee, a command, used with especial reference to the text mandatum novum (John xiii. 34), the 'new commandment' is, 'that ye love one another.' This Middle English maundee = Old French mandé, that which is commanded; from Latin mandatum, a mandate, command. Spelman's guess, that maundy is from maund, a basket [i.e., of gifts, which it was the custom among Christians to present at this time, in allusion to Christ's great gift], is as false as it is readily believed." See his Concise Etymological Dictionary.

MAUR, Congregation of St. The Benedictine order presents a remarkable and indeed unique instance of a monastic institution renewing itself after centuries of decay and degradation, and once more developing an admirable activity of eminent usefulness. During the latter part of the middle ages the order sunk very low, and the sixteenth century brought no change. Sensuality and frivolity reigned in the rich monasteries, instead of piety and learning. In the beginning of the seventeenth century, however, Didier de la Cour succeeded in re-establishing order and discipline in the monastery of St. Vanne, near Verdun. Several other monasteries, among which those of Moyenmoutier and Senones, adopted the reform; and Clement VIII. confirmed the Congregation of St. Vanne, from which proceeded Dom Calmet and Dom Cellier. In 1614 the convention of the French clergy expressed the wish that all the Benedictine monasteries of the country should join the Congregation of St. Vanne; but the chapter-general of the Congregation was afraid of so immense an extension, and proposed in its stead the formation of another congregation.

Consequently Dom Bénard, a monk of St. Vanne, who already previously had been charged with the reform of several other monasteries, received in 1618 authority from Louis XIII. to found a new congregation. It was formed under the patronage of St. Maur, and confirmed in 1621 by Gregory XV., and in 1627 by Urban VIII. The first monastery which accepted the reform of Bénard was that of Blancs-Manteaux in Paris; but others soon followed: only that of Cluny refused to join. In 1652 the Congregation numbered forty monasteries: in the beginning of the eighteenth century, a hundred and eighty, which were divided into six provinces. The most celebrated of those monasteries was that of St. Germain-des-Prés, near Paris. It was the residence of the general, who held episcopal privileges, and contained an excellent library rich in manuscripts. The wise arrangements of the first general (Dom Tariffe) for the education and learned training of the monks, soon attracted the gifted youths, even of the most illustrious families; and during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Congregation produced a number of scholars whose labor was an honor to the church and a benefit to science.

What the Congregation of St. Maur has done for history in general, and more especially for the history of France, can hardly be overrated. Such works as La religion des Gaulois (1727, 2 vols.), by Dom Martin, and Histoire des Gaules (1752, 2 vols.), by Dom de Brezillac, may be considered as antiquated; but the Histoire du Languedoc (1730-45, 5 vols. fol.), by Vaissette and De Vie, the Histoire de Bretagne (1702, 2 vols. fol.), by Veisserie and Lobineau (remodelled and completed by Morice de Beauvois in 1742), the Histoire de Bourgogne (1739, 3 vols. fol.), by Plancher, the Histoire de la ville de Paris (1725, 5 vols.), by Félibien and Lobineau, the Histoire littéraire de la France (1733-63, 12 vols., after 1814 continued by the Académie des Inscriptions), etc., are invaluable contributions to the history of France, not to speak of the great collections of sources made by the Congregation: the Scriptores rerum gallicarum et francicarum (the eight first volumes by Dom Bouquet, ninth to eleventh by Dom Haudigier, twelfth and thirteenth by Dom Clément, fourteenth and fifteenth by Dom Brial, afterwards continued by the Académie des Inscriptions), the Spicilegium veterum Scriptorum, 1653-77, 13 vols., by D'Achery; the Vetera analecta, 1675-85, 4 vols., by Mabillon; the Collectio nova veterum Scriptorum, 1700, by Martène; the Thesaurus novus Anecdotorum, 1717, 5 vols. fol., by Martène and Durand; the Bibliotheca Manuscriptorum Nova, 1739, 2 vols. fol., by Montfaucon, etc. Of no less importance are the contributions of the Congregation to universal history or the science of history. The science of diplomatics was founded by its members: De re diplomatica, 1681, by Dom Mabillon; Nouveau traité de diplomatique, 1750-65, 5 vols., by Dom Toussaint and Dom Tassin; Palaographia Græca, 1708, by Montfaucon, etc. They also founded the science of chronology: Art de vérifier les dates, 1750, 2 vols., commenced by Dantine, and finished by Clémencet, afterwards recast by Clément. Of great interest to Greek archaeology is Montfaucon's Antiquité expliquée et figurée, 1719, 10 vols. fol.; and of equal interest to mediæval history are the additions to Ducange's Glossarium by Dom Dantine and Dom Carpentier.

Principally, however, the labor of the Congregation was devoted to the church. The Benedictine editions of the Fathers (Latin and Greek), and of the great ecclesiastical writers of the middle ages, are still models of correctness of text, of acuteness, moderation, and circumspection of accompanying notes, commentaries, introductory, etc., and of typographical outfit. The first of the Latin Fathers whose works the Congregation undertook to edit, was, characteristically enough, Augustine. The work was begun in 1679, in the midst of the Jansenistic controversy, by Dom Delfau, and finished by Blampin and Coustant, 1700, in 11 vols. fol. In 1679 appeared Cassiodorus, 2 vols. fol., by Garet; 1686-90, Ambrose, 2 vols. fol., by Du Frische and Le Nourri; 1693, Hilary of Poitiers, by Coustant; 1693-1706, Jerome, 5 vols. fol., by Martianay; 1726, Cyprian, begun by Baluze, who did not belong to the Congregation, but completed by Dom Maran. Of the Greek Fathers, the Epistle of Barnabas was published in 1645 by Ménard; Athanasius, 3 vols. fol., by Montfauçon, 1698; Irenæus, by Massuet, 1710; Chrysostom, 13 vols. fol., by Montfauçon, 1738; Cyril of Jerusalem, by Toutée, 1720; Basil the Great, by Garnier, 1721-30, 3 vols. fol.; Origen, by Charles and Vincent de la Rue, 1733-59, 4 vols. fol.; Justin and the other apologists, by Maran, 1742; Gregory of Nazianzen, 1788, by Maran and Clémencet (interrupted by the Revolution), etc. Of mediæval writers, the Concordia Regularum, by Ménard, appeared in 1628; Lanfranc 1648, and Guibert of Nogent 1651, both by D'Achery; Robert Pulleyn and Peter of Poitiers, by Mathoud, 1665; St. Bernard, by Mabillon, 1667; Anselm of Canterbury, by Gerberon, 1765; Gregory the Great, 4 vols. fol., by Denis de Sainte-Marthe, 1705; Hildebert of Mans, by Beaugendre, 1708, etc. Directly bearing on church history were, the new edition of Gallia Christiana, 13 vols., 1715-85, continued in 1856 by Hauréau, the first attempt of ecclesiastical geography and statistics, and the model of Italia sacra, Illyria sacra, España sagrada, etc.; the Histoire de St. Denis, by Félibien, 1706, and Histoire de St. Germain-des-Prés, by Bouillart, 1724; the celebrated works on the history of the Benedictine order: Acta Sanctorum O. S. B., by D'Achery, 9 vols. fol., 1668 et seq., and Annales O. S. B., by Mabillon, 6 vols. fol., 1703 et seq.

When the monastic orders were dissolved in France by the Revolution, the Congregation of St. Maur was also compelled to disperse. Many works begun were thus broken off; but some of them were, as above mentioned, taken up by the Académie des Inscriptions. Dom Brial, the last member of the Congregation, died in 1833 as a member of the Académie. In 1837 some friends of Lamennais bought the abbey of Solesmes; and the Congregation was revived there under the authority of the bishop of Mans. The most prominent member of this new Congregation of St. Maur is Dom Pitra, and his most prominent work the Spicilegium Solesmense, of which the first volume appeared in 1852.

MAURICE OF SAXONY, Prince, the famous Protestant general; b. at Freiberg, March 21, 1521; d. in the camp at Sievershausen, July 11, 1553; succeeded his father as duke of Saxony in 1511, and obtained the electoral dignity after the battle of Mühlberg, 1547. Though he had embraced the Reformation, and, together with his father, signed the Articles of Schmalkald, he refused to actually join the League, probably because he considered the organization too weak, and his own position in it too subordinate, to form the basis for his ambitious schemes. By joining the opposite side he could command better terms; and at the diet of Ratisbon (1546), where he and Duke Eric of Brunswick were the only Protestant princes present, he made a secret alliance with the emperor. Accordingly, when the war broke out, he marched his troops into the territory of his cousin, the elector of Saxony, and conquered the country. But as soon as the elector, who stood in Upper Germany with a well-appointed army, heard of this treachery, he hastened back to Saxony, and not only reconquered his own land, but also expelled Maurice from his dukedom. The emperor came to his rescue; and at the diet of Augsburg (Feb. 24, 1548) he was solemnly invested with a large portion of his cousin's territory and the electoral dignity. From that moment, however, his relation to the emperor entirely changed. According to the above-mentioned treaty with the emperor, he was to be left alone in all religious matters. He consequently rejected the Augsburg Interim. But the Leipzig Interim, which he substituted after conferring with Melancthon, Bugenhagen, and others, proved as hateful to his subjects. He began to understand that the Reformation would not be kept apart from politics as a purely religious issue; and, always quick in acting upon a new idea as soon as he perfectly realized it, he immediately decided to place himself at the head of the movement, driven onwards, no doubt, also by indignation at the emperor's faithlessness towards his father-in-law, Philip of Hesse, and by fear of the intrigues recently set on foot for the purpose of superseding King Ferdinand, the emperor's brother, and fastening the succession on Don Philip, the emperor's son, but a Spaniard. Concealing his plans with great adroitness, he gathered a great army, formed an alliance with France, and suddenly fell upon the emperor, who lay sick in Innspruck, but had to fly for his life across the Alps. By the mediation of King Ferdinand, the Convention of Passau was brought about Aug. 2, 1552, and full religious liberty was granted to the Protestants. After this exploit, Maurice completely regained the confidence of his co-religionists; but he had only a short time to avail himself of the great opportunities thereby offered him. In a miserable feud with the margrave of Brandenburg he was severely wounded, and died a few days after. His life was written by Langenn, Leipzig, 1842, 2 vols.

MAURICE, John Frederic Denison, b. in Normanston, Suffolk, Eng., Aug. 29, 1805; d. in London, April 1, 1872. He was the son of a Unitarian minister, and was brought up amidst corresponding theological influences, — a circumstance which should be kept in mind when we examine the character of this remarkable man. If a person be met midway on a mountain's side, it is important, if we would judge of his relative position, that we should ascertain whether he be coming up or going down. Mr. Maurice's was an ascending progress, and he rose from lower views of our Lord and Saviour to infinitely higher ones. He made a mark on the university in his college course at Cambridge; but, being a dissenter at the time, he could not take a degree. At first he thought of employing himself in literary pursuits, and early produced a novel entitled Eustace Conyers; at the time contributing to the Athenæum, a critical journal just started by James Silk Buckingham. But a change came over the spirit of the promising youth. The writings of Coleridge made a deep impression upon him. He changed his views on vital points, proceeded to Oxford, took a degree there, and in 1828 received ordination in the Church of England, of which he became a devoted member, and ever afterwards vindicated its articles and formularies with uncommon zeal. From his own acknowledgments it also appears that he owed much, in the course of his life, to the writings and personal influence of Thomas Erskine of Linlathen, an author and friend to whom he was strongly attached. The earliest of his important works on divinity was The Kingdom of Christ, published in three volumes, 1838, when he was chaplain to Guy's Hospital, and so brought into close contact with the suffering and sorrows of human nature, which always awakened in him very deep sympathy. The second title of this work explains its object — Hints on the Principles, Ordinances, and Constitution of the Catholic Church, in Letters to a Member of the Society of Friends. He could not but appreciate the life and work of George Fox; but he saw what he considered to be great deficiencies in his system, and sought to supply the mental and spiritual wants left unsatisfied by Quakerism, out of the fulness of truth which he attributed to the Church of England. This work on The Kingdom of Christ contains germs of that theological teaching for which he was so famous. His Boyle Lectures On the Religions of the World (1847) attracted much attention: so did his lectures on Patriarchs and Law-Givers of the Old Testament (1851) and Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament (1853). Both courses were delivered in the chapel of Lincoln Inn, where, as lecturer, he gathered round him a select audience; and on winter afternoons, the dim light, the earnest manner of the preacher, the originality of his thoughts, and his devout fervor, left lasting memories on the mind of those who went to hear him. The personality of God, the order of his moral government, the light thrown on the present by the history of the past, were the master themes of his ministry. His Theological Essays (1851) made a great noise in the religious world, and occasioned much controversy. He was charged with heresy, especially with regard to future punishment. His idea of the word "eternal" ran counter to general opinion; and in consequence he remained no longer professor of theology in King's College, London. His own opinions he believed to be consistent with the "orthodoxy" of the Church of England, but a large number of his critics took a different view. In 1854 he established the first working-man's college; and in 1860 he was appointed incumbent of Vere-street Chapel, Marylebone. He accepted the professorship of moral philosophy at Cambridge in 1866, and down to the time of his death continued publishing various works, and laboring hard to improve and elevate "the working-classes" of his countrymen. His History of Mental and Moral Philosophy — treating of speculations before the time of Christ, the metaphysical divinity of the Fathers, and the scholasticism of the mediæval age — is a characteristic performance, in which one sees the opinions of former days expressed with a certain coloring, the result of having passed through the alembic of the author's mind. We cannot enumerate all his publications; but, besides those already noticed, we may mention The Epistle to the Hebrews (three Warburtonian Lectures, 1846), The Lord's Prayer (nine sermons, 1848), The Church a Family (twelve sermons on the occasional services of the Prayer-Book, 1850), Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the First and Second Centuries (1854), Learning and Working (lectures published the same year), The Gospel of St. John (1856), and The Epistles of St. John (a series of lectures on Christian ethics, 1857). The orthodoxy of Mr. Maurice was attacked by Dr. Candlish in a lecture at Exeter Hall, before the Young Men's Christian Association, occasioned by the fact of the wide influence of his teaching in thoughtful circles of society. He had no sympathy with the Tractarian and Evangelical parties in the Church of England; and, though he strenuously maintained the divinity of Christ, his opinions on the subject of the atonement and justification by faith did by no means satisfy orthodox divines of various communions. There is a transparency in his style out of keeping with the occasional obscurity of his thoughts; and, whilst apparently logical in the connection of his thoughts, there are few distinguished authors in whose reasonings may be found so many non-sequiturs, according to the judgment of attentive readers. He was a great philanthropist, a sincere and earnest Christian, and a man of considerable genius. He led a most laborious life. In the posthumous volume, The Friendship of Books, and other Lectures, edited by Thomas Hughes, London, 1873, will be found a Memoir. See The Life of Frederick Denison Maurice, ed. by his son, London, 1884, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1885. JOHN STOUGHTON.

MAURUS, a pupil of Benedict of Nursia, but better known by legend than to history. His name became celebrated only by the Congregation of St. Maur. According to legend he first brought the rules of Benedict to France, founded the first monastery of that order in France, at Glanfeuil in Anjou, wrought many miracles, and died in 581. But the legend dates from the ninth century, and Gregory of Tours knows nothing of him. Its chronology is utterly confused; and Mabillon and Ruinart have in vain tried to establish its trustworthiness. See Acta Sanctorum O. S. B. sæc. 1, 274, and Annales O. S. B., sæc. 1, 107. C. MAURY, Jean Siffrein, Cardinal, b. at Valréas in Venaissin, June 26, 1746; d. at Montefiascone, May 11, 1817. He was educated in the seminary of Avignon, but occupied himself more with literature than theology. By his Oraison funèbre du Dauphin, Panégyrique de saint Louis, etc., he attracted great attention as an orator; was made abbot of Freunde, and prior of Lions, and published his Essai sur l'éloquence de la chaire, etc. Elected a member of the states-general in 1789, and of the constituent assembly, he played a conspicuous part as the orator of the Extreme Right, defending the prerogatives of the crown, the privileges of the nobility, the immunities of the church, etc. Compelled to emigrate in 1792, he repaired to Rome, where he was received by Pius VI. as a saint and martyr; made archbishop in partibus of Nicæa, bishop of Montefiascone, and cardinal 1791. At the instance of Pius VII., it is said, he wrote a humble letter to Napoleon, Aug. 22, 1801, which resulted in his reconciliation with the French Government. In 1806 he returned to Paris; and so absolutely did he devote himself to Napoleon, that he became an object of hatred to the legitimists and the ultramontanes. In 1810 Napoleon made him archbishop of Paris; but the chapter protested against the appointment, and the Pope refused his sanction. Consequently he was expelled from his see as soon as the Bourbons returned; and, when he went to Rome to lay the case before the Pope, he was imprisoned in the castle of San Angelo, and not released until he resigned his see. A selection of his works was published by his nephew, Paris, 1827, 5 vols. His life was written by Poujoulat, Paris, 1835. See also SAINTE-BEUVE: Causerie du Lundi IV.

MAXENTIUS. See CONSTANTINE.

MAXIMILIAN II., emperor of Germany (1564-76), showed in his younger days a decided inclination towards the Reformation, was well acquainted with the writings of Luther and Melancthon, listened cold and silent to the remonstrances of the Jesuits, retained for a long time Pfäuser as his secretary and confessor, and chose his most intimate friends among the Protestant princes, — Friedrich of the Palatinate, and Philip of Hesse, etc. Finally, however, he yielded to the entreaties of his father, Ferdinand I. Pfäuser was dismissed; and, when he was crowned Roman king, he took an oath that he would preserve the Roman-Catholic faith in the realm. At his accession to the imperial crown, the Protestants still expected that he would openly embrace the Reformation; but at the diet of Augsburg (1566) he was even unwilling to grant religious liberty, arguing that such a measure would be against the wish of the majority, and could so much the less reasonably be demanded by the minority as the minority itself disagreed on this point. It seems as if the hatred which grew up between Lutherans and Calvinists, and, within Lutherdom, between the adherents of Flacius and those of Melancthon, led Maximilian II. to doubt whether Protestantism had any vitality at all. Towards the close of his reign he leaned more and more towards the Romanists, especially after the death of Don Carlos, when an opportunity of re-uniting the Spanish and German possessions of the House of Hapsburg seemed to present itself. In his hereditary Austrian countries, however, he continued to the last to protect, if not to support, the Reformation. He opened the university of Vienna to Protestant professors and students; he gave the nobility permission to establish the Reformed worship on their estates, etc. See КОСН: Quellen zur Geschichte Maximilian II., Leipzig, 1857.

MAXIMINUS THRAX, Roman emperor (235-238); the first Barbarian on the throne of the Cæsars; b. in Thrace 173, of a Gothic father and an Alan mother; was a common cattle-driver when he was drafted into the Roman cavalry. Eight feet high, and strong as a giant, courageous and persistent, he rose slowly in his military career until the favor of Septimius Severus at once made him a senator, and commander of a legion, and placed him at the head of the whole establishment for the training of recruits. On the revolt of the soldiers against Septimius Severus, he was proclaimed emperor by the army, and the frightened Senate confirmed the election. But he never visited Rome. He remained with the army, defeated the Germans, removed into Pannonia, and was revolving in his mind great plans for the utter destruction of the Barbarians, when his hard and brutal government, having driven people into despair, caused him to be assassinated.

Shortly after his accession, he issued an edict against the Christians, ordering all the leaders of the congregations to be decapitated. (See EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., vi. 28; RUFINUS, vi. 20; OROSIUS, vii. 19.) It is certain that the edict was not carried out. Eusebius speaks of no martyrs; Rufinus, only of a great number of confessors. Sulpicius Severus counts the persecution of Decius as the seventh. The whole period from Septimius Severus to Decius he designates as a term of peace, and, under the reign of Maximinus, he speaks only of annoyances, not of persecutions. Nevertheless, if Eusebius' report of Maximinus' edict is correct (which cannot be doubted), that edict, however ineffective it may have been in reality, must be considered as the first attempt of a general and systematic persecution of the Christians. Maximinus understood the great importance of the Christian hierarchy. He saw, that, in order to kill the church, he must strike the hierarchy; and his plan was afterwards adopted by Valentinian and Diocletian. G. UHLBORN.

MAXIMUS CONFESSOR, b. in Constantinople about 580; d. in the castle of Schemari, on the eastern shore of the Black Sea, Aug. 13, 662; was the chief champion and martyr of the orthodox party in the Monothelite controversy, and one of the most acute theologians and most subtle mystics of the Greek Church. His personal life is in several points obscure. The principal sources of it are, besides the notes scattered around in his own writings, the Acta et Collationes Maximii — of which a Latin version is found in Anastasioi Bibl. Collectanea (edited Sirmont, Paris, 1620), and a Greek and Latin version in Combesis' edition of Maximus' works, and in MIGNÉ: Patrol. Græc. (90) — and a Vita Maximii, extant in a shorter and longer recension, and printed by Combesis and Migné, l.c. According to that vita ("life"), Maximus descended from a distinguished family, and received a very careful education. Though he was small and feeble of body, and his mind naturally inclined towards study and authorship, he entered the political career, and was appointed secretary to the Emperor Heraclius. But he afterwards gave up this position,—at what time and for what reason is not known,—and became a monk in the monastery of Chrysopolis, near Constantinople. When the Monothelite controversy broke out (633), he was in Alexandria; and when the Ecthesis was promulgated (638), he placed himself at the head of that movement which swept through the whole Northern Africa, and made that country the principal seat of the opposition, both to monophysitism and to monothelitism. He was supported by the imperial governor, Gregorius, or Georgius, who thought of making himself independent, and hoped to use the movement to his own advantage. After the death of Heraclius (641), Pyrrhus, patriarch of Constantinople, having been implicated in the intrigues of the empress widow Martina, sought refuge with Gregorius; and the latter arranged a disputation between him and Maximus. It took place at Carthage in July, 645; and its Acts, printed by Combefis, Migne, Mansi, etc., belong to the most remarkable monuments of the Monothelite controversy. Pyrrhus was completely vanquished: he recanted, and adopted the orthodox view of a double will corresponding to the double nature in Christ. In 646 the bishops of North Africa assembled in a synod, condemned Monothelitism, and invited Bishop Theodore of Rome to add weight to the decision by the authority of his name. Maximus and Pyrrhus repaired to Rome, and the latter presented a formal recantation of his Monothelite doctrines to the Pope, who then recognized him as the legitimate patriarch of Constantinople. Thus a most formidable alliance stood arrayed against the Monothelites; but as Gregorius fell in a battle against the Saracens (647), and Pyrrhus made his peace with the Emperor Constant by recanting once more, the alliance collapsed without producing any effect. Meanwhile, Maximus remained in Rome, steadily active in his opposition to the Monothelites; and when, in 648, the emperor promulgated the Typos, forbidding all further discussion of the subject, Maximus induced Pope Martin to convene the synod of the Lateran, which (649) condemned, not only Monothelitism, but also the imperial Typos. The fate of Pope Martin is known: that of Maximus was not very different. Having been arrested in Rome, he was brought to Constantinople. The chronology is uncertain; but the process against him seems not to have been opened until 650. Twice he was placed before the imperial court; and as he remained stanch, and refused to accept the Typos, and enter into communion with the patriarch of Constantinople, he was both times banished. Of those proceedings a minute protocol has been printed by Combefis, Migne, etc. Of his third and last appearance before the court (in 662) no protocol exists. But, in the mean time, the imperial policy had changed. There was no more question of negotiation or compromise. He was formally anathematized by a Monothelite synod. His tongue and right hand were cut off; he was whipped through the streets of Constantinople, and finally shut up in the castle of Shemari.

As an author, Maximus forms a most interesting transition between Dionysius Areopagita and Scotus Erigena. The mysticism of the Greek theology he carries from the former to the latter. On account of a somewhat turgid style, his writings are often hard to understand: even Photius complains of their obscurity. They have, however, always found many and devoted readers. They may conveniently be arranged into three groups,—exegetical, dogmatico-polemical, and ethico-ascetic. His exegetical method is that of the Alexandrian school. Starting from the principle that every passage of Scripture contains an inexhaustible depth of meaning, he applies the allegory as the true means of interpretation; and his commentaries, though he now and then treats linguistic and archaeological questions, are therefore dogmatical exposition rather than simple exegesis. The principal work of this group is the Questiones ad Thalassium, addressed to a presbyter and abbot (Thalassius), and containing, besides a treatise on evil, sixty-five questions and answers concerning difficult passages of Scripture. Less original are his Questiones et Dubia, Expositium in Psalmum LIX., etc. When treating the works of the Fathers, he employs exactly the same method; as, for instance, in his Scolia in Opera S. Dionysii Areopagita, of which the best edition is that cum versione Balth. Corderii (Paris, 1633). His Ambigua in Gregorium Naz. was translated into Latin by Scotus Erigena 864, at the instance of Charles the Bald, and accompanied with an address to the king, in which Erigena gives an account of his relation to Maximus, and of the relation of Maximus to Dionysius. The Greek text, together with the Latin translation, was published by Thomas Gale, Oxford, 1681, in his edition of Erigena's De divisione naturæ. In his dogmatico-polemical writings he treats christological, trinitarian, and anthropological questions; but for the history of doctrines, more especially for the history of the Monophysite and Monothelite controversies, those treating of christological questions are by far the most important. In a series of works (De duobus Christi naturis, Pro synodo Chalcedonensi, etc.) he defends the orthodox doctrine of two natures in Christ, such as it was formulated by the synod of Chalcedon, directing his attack principally against those Monophysites, who, after the example of Philoxenus and Severus, in the sixth century, taught one compound nature in Christ. Still more numerous and more important are his writings against the Monothelites,—twenty-one, besides the above-mentioned Acta disputationis cum Pyrrho: they form, indeed, the chief monuments of the whole controversy. In his epistle to the presbyter Marinus of Cyprus, he treats the question of the procession of the Holy Spirit; and in his De animæ natura et affectionibus, that of the immortality of the soul. His ethico-ascetic works consist of treatises and collections of aphoristic propositions. Of the former the most celebrated is the so-called Liber Asceticus, a dialogue between an abbot and a young monk on the duties of ecclesiastical life, and one of the most remarkable specimens of the ascetic literature of the Greek Church. It was translated into Latin by Pirkheimer (Nuremberg, 1530), and again by Nobilius, together with some treatises of Basilus and Chrysostom, Rome, 1587. Of the latter the so-called Capita theologica, or Sermones per excepta, or Loci communes, is the largest; but it contains no original propositions by Maximus: it is entirely borrowed from Scripture, the Fathers, and some profane authors. It was first published with a Latin translation by Konrad Gesner, Zurich, 1516. The Capita de caritate (a collection of four hundred sentences, mostly of ethical, but also of dogmatical and mystical contents, and all original) is generally printed as an appendix to the Liber Asceticus. It was first published in Greek and Latin, by Opsopneus, Hagenau, 1531, but under the name of Maximus of Turin. Besides the works which can be arranged in those three groups, Maximus has also written a great number of letters, some hymns, etc. A complete edition of his works does not exist: that by Combefis (Paris, 1675) was intended to comprise three volumes folio, but only the two appeared, as Combefis died in 1679.

MAXIMUS, Bishop of Turin, lived in the middle of the fifth century. His numerous writings consist of homilies and sermons, and are very rich in interesting notes on the history and character of Christian life in those days when the waves of the migration of nations rolled heavily over the country, and Paganism was still powerful outside of the cities. One of his homilies refers to the destruction of Milan by Attila (452); another, to the martyrs who suffered death from the fury of the Pagans at Anania, in the Rhoetian Alps (397), during the celebration of the Pagan festival of Ambervalia; a third, to the baseness of people in many cities of Northern Italy, who, when the Huns retired from the country, bought their prisoners to keep as slaves, etc. The principal edition of his works is that of Rome, 1794, reprinted by Migne. MAXWELL, Lady Darcy, b. in Ayrshire, Scotland, 1742; d. in Edinburgh, July 2, 1810. She was married to Sir Walter Maxwell in 1759, but left a childless widow two years later. In 1764 she first heard John Wesley preach; and, from that time on, she was connected with the Methodists. In 1770 she established a school in Edinburgh for the Christian education of poor children. She not only supported this during her life, but left provision for its continuance. She was a most exemplary Christian. See LANCASTER: Life of Lady Maxwell, New York, 1837.

MAY, Samuel Joseph, Unitarian minister and earnest antislavery advocate; b. in Boston, Sept. 12, 1797; d. in Syracuse, N.Y., July 1, 1871. He was graduated at Harvard College 1817; entered the ministry, and was pastor at Brooklyn, Conn., 1822–35; in 1835 was general agent of the Massachusetts Antislavery Society; in 1836, pastor in South Scituate, Mass.; from 1842 to 1844, principal of the Lexington Normal School for Girls; and from 1845 to 1868, was pastor in Syracuse. Wherever situated, the cause of the slave received his enthusiastic advocacy, and more than once his zeal endangered his life. He wrote Recollections of our Antislavery Conflict, Boston, 1869. See his Memoir, by T. J. MUMFORD, Boston, 1873.

MAYENCE (a city of Germany, on the Rhine, opposite the influx of the Main) was for centuries the seat of one of the most magnificent ecclesiastical establishments of the country. Of the Christianization of the place, the foundation of the bishopric, and the history of the see, down to the middle of the sixth century, our information is very fragmentary, and of a legendary character. St. Crescens, the pupil of Paul (2 Tim. iv. 10), is said to have been the first to preach Christianity in those regions. In 745 Boniface was appointed bishop of Mayence; and in 747 Mayence was formed into an archbishopric, and made the metropolitan see of Germany, — a rank which it retained until 1803. From the tenth century the archbishops of Mayence were often chancellors of the realm; and from Christian I. (1165–83) the title of arch-chancellor of Germany became permanently connected with the see of Mayence. As the electoral dignity arose in the twelfth century, the archbishop of Mayence became one of its principal bearers; of the three ecclesiastical electors, — Mayence, Cologne, and Treves, — Mayence had the precedence. During the period of the Reformation the two archbishops — Albert II. (1514–45) and Sebastian (1545–55) — governed with great wisdom and moderation, and successfully resisted the spreading Protestantism without having recourse to violence. At the beginning of the present century the elector of Mayence ruled over about three hundred and twenty thousand souls, and had an annual income of about two million gulden. Ten suffragan sees belonged to his province, — Worms, Spire, Strassburg, Chur, Würzburg, Eichstädt, Paderborn, Hildesheim, Constance, and Augsburg, — and he was the primate of the German clergy. But all that splendor came to a sudden end. By the peace of Luneville, 1801, the whole left bank of the Rhine was ceded to France, and a bishopric of Mayence was established under the authority of the archbishop of Mechlin. The possessions of Mayence on the right bank of the Rhine were divided between Prussia, Hesse, etc. The electoral dignity, however, was not abolished. The last archbishop of Mayence, Friederich Karl, died at Aschaffenburg in 1800; but his coadjutor, Dalberg, succeeded him as primate of Germany, arch-chancellor of the realm, etc.; only the see was removed from Mayence to Regensburg. After the fall of Napoleon, the German territories ceded in 1801 were restored; and in 1829 the bishopric of Mayence was, by a papal bull, laid under the authority of the archbishop of Freiburg. See WERNER: Der Dom zu Mainz, Mayence, 1827, 3 vols.; SCHAAB: Geschichte der Stadt Mainz, Mayence, 1844, 3 vols.

MAYER, Johann Friedrich, b. at Leipzig, Dec. 6, 1650; d. at Stettin, March 30, 1712. After studying theology at Leipzig, he was appointed superintendent of Leisnig 1673, of Grimma 1678, professor of theology at Wittenberg 1684, pastor of St. Jacob of Hamburg 1686, being at the same time professor in the university of Kiel, and superintendent-general of Pommerania, and professor in the university of Greifswald 1701. He had great gifts as a pulpit orator, but acquired a rather unenviable reputation as a polemic, especially in his controversy with the Pietists (e.g., Horbe). He was indeed appropriately styled by S. B. Carpov "the hammer of heretics and pietists." The Lexikon d. hamburg. Schriftsteller, vol. 5, pp. 89–164, Hamburg, 1870, gives the titles of 581 writings of his. See J. GEFFCKEN:

CARL BERTHEAU.

MAYER, Lewis, D.D., minister of the German Reformed Church: b. at Lancaster, Penn., March 26, 1783; d. at York, Penn., Aug. 25, 1849. He was ordained, 1807, pastor at Shepherdstown, Va., until 1821, and at York until 1825, when he assumed the presidency of the theological seminary of his denomination, which was first established at Carlisle, Penn., but afterwards removed to York. He retired in 1835, and devoted his remaining years to a history of the German Reformed Church, of which only the first volume, carrying the story down to 1770, has been published (Philadelphia, 1850). To the volume is prefixed a Memoir by Rev. E. Heiner.

MAYHEW. I. Experience, b. in Martha's Vineyard, Mass., Jan. 27, 1673; d. there Nov. 29, 1758. He passed his days as a missionary among the Indians on Martha's Vineyard and adjoining islands; being familiar with their language from infancy, his direct ancestors being also Indian missionaries. In 1709 he finished a version of the Psalms and of John, for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. He also published a work upon Indian Converts (1727), giving an account of thirty Indian ministers and some eighty other pious Indians (reprinted 1729). In connection with a Discourse, he gave in 1720 a history of the Martha's Vineyard mission from 1694 to 1720. II. Jonathan, son of the preceding; b. in Martha's Vineyard, Mass., Oct. 8, 1720; d. in Boston, July 9, 1766. He was graduated at Harvard College 1744; entered the ministry, and in 1747 he was called to the West Church, Boston. But only two members came of the first council called to ordain him, owing to the suspicion of his heresy; and so a second and selected council had to be assembled. Although settled with such difficulty, and long under the ban, he still maintained his connection with the West Church all his life. He was an ardent patriot, and vigorous opponent of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; because he, in common with intelligent New-Englanders generally, regarded it as a mere disguise for introducing prelay. He did much to hasten the Revolution. Two of his publications reveal his opinions. In 1750 he issued a Discourse concerning unlimited submission and non-resistance to the higher powers: with some reflections on the resistance made to King Charles I., and on the anniversary of his death: in which the mysterious doctrine of that Prince's sainthood and martyrdom is unriddled (reprinted in Thornton's Pulpit of the American Revolution, Boston, 1860); and in 1763 Observations on the character and conduct of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. In 1751 he received the degree of D.D. from the University of Aberdeen. In theology he was a Unitarian. See his Memoir by A. Bradford, Boston, 1838.

MAYNOOTH, County Kildare, Ireland, fifteen miles west-north-west from Dublin; seat of the Royal College of St. Patrick's, founded in 1795, by the Irish Parliament, for the education of the Roman-Catholic priests, and supported by an annual grant of £8,000. After the Union (1801) this grant was continued, and, in 1808, £13,000 voted for enlarging the buildings. In 1815 Sir Robert Peel proposed to increase the grant to £26,360, but make it part of the yearly budget, and vote £30,000 for building purposes. After vigorous opposition, the bill passed. By the Irish Church Act, July 26, 1869, the grant ceased after Jan. 1, 1871; and, as a compensation, £372,331 was appropriated for the college support. Besides this, the Dunboyne estates in County Meath yield £460 per annum. The institution has a full faculty in the arts and theology, together with president, vice-president, and four deans.

MAZARIN, Jules, Cardinal, b. at Piscina in Southern Italy, July 14, 1602; d. at Vincennes, March 19, 1661. He first studied law, then held a command as captain in the papal army, and finally entered the service of the church. As secretary to Cardinal Sacchetti, he came to France in 1629. His diplomatical ability was immediately recognized; and his partiality to French interests was so pronounced, that in 1639 he was naturalized as a French citizen, and entered the service of the king. In 1640 he was made a cardinal, and in 1642 he succeeded Richelieu as prime-minister of France; which position he continued holding to his death. Partly from religious indifference, and partly from political calculation, he showed great tolerance to the Huguenots. May 21, 1655, he solemnly renewed all edicts in their favor, and at times he showed considerable courage in resisting the fanaticism of the Roman-Catholic clergy. Turenne and Gassion retained their positions in the army; and Herworth, a Protestant banker, was made comptroller-general, in spite of a formidable opposition. The last great favor he showed the Reformed was the permission granted in 1659 to convoke the synod of London. Chenuel edited his letters, and wrote the history of his times, Paris, 1879 sqq.

MAZARINE BIBLE, The, discovered by De Bure in the Mazarine Library at Paris (hence the name) about 1760; is the first complete book ever printed with movable type. It was printed by Gutenberg, in Mentz, 1450-55, but is without date or place. Henry Stevens very properly calls it the "Gutenberg Bible." There are two sorts of copies of this Bible,—that on paper, which is earliest, and that on vellum. Dr. S. Austin Allibone, in the Literary World (Boston, Nov. 18, 1882), gives the places of deposit of this Bible. According to his list there are six known copies upon vellum (the one found by De Bure is in the Paris library), and twenty-one copies upon paper; a vellum copy in the British Museum, and one on paper in the Lenox Library, New-York City. In 1876 a copy of the Mazarine Old Testament only was discovered in the sacristy of a village in Bavaria. The present value of a perfect copy of the Mazarine Bible on paper is about three thousand pounds, and one on vellum about four thousand pounds. See Dr. Allibone's article for interesting additional information.

M'ALL MISSION IN PARIS. Rev. R. W. M'All was a Congregational minister in Hadleigh, Lancashire. In August, 1871, he went with his wife to Paris, for the first time, intending merely to make a four-days' visit. They distributed tracts, and were especially impressed by their reception in Belleville, the artisan district of Paris. They saw an opening for effective religious work. After much consultation, and study, not only of localities, but of the French language

(with which Mr. McAll had been previously unacquainted), they opened their first station at Belleville in January, 1872. Since that time the work has gone on, until there are, according to the Tenth Annual Report (1881), 24 stations in Paris and 8 in the environs, with 5,900 sittings in all. There are also stations in Lyons, Boulogne-sur-mer, and thirteen other places; so that the total number of mission-stations is 56. In 1881 there were held 5,755 meetings for adults, attended by 525,569 persons. Eighteen new stations were opened. The income was £8,232 13s; and the expenditure, £5,828 19s.

Mr. McAll thus tells the story of his work:—

“The stations are all shops. A large calico sign invites the workmen to enter. We also distribute small bills of invitation in each district, telling the people that English friends wish to speak to them of the love of Jesus.” Persons at the doors encourage suitable persons to come in. In each room we have an harmonium. Most of our hymns we have ourselves imitated from the English. The meetings are very simply conducted. On entering, a magazine, a Bible, or other book, is lent to each attendant. We have hymns alternately with short addresses or readings. Variety and brevity are aimed at. On Sundays something more of the usual form of a religious service is adopted. We give a short sermon, and the feature of prayer is added. The reading of the Bible is listened to on all occasions with marked interest.”

McCAUL, Alexander, D.D., Hebraist; b. in 1798; d. Nov. 13, 1863. He was educated at King's College, London; served as missionary for the Society for the Conversion of the Jews; and in 1845 was appointed professor of divinity in his alma mater, and prebendary of St. Paul's. He wrote a number of valuable books upon Hebrew and Jewish topics, among which may be mentioned, The Old Paths, or a Comparison of the Principles and Doctrines of Modern Judaism with the Religion of Moses and the Prophets, London, 1837, new edition, 1868; Lectures on the Prophecies, proving the Divine Origin of Christianity, 1846; The Messiahship of Jesus, 1852. The two last are the Warburton Lectures for 1837-39 and 1840 respectively.

McAULEY, Catharine E., b. in Gormanstown Castle, near Dublin, Sept. 29, 1787; d. in Dublin, Nov. 13, 1841. She was born in the Roman-Catholic faith, but, having had the misfortune to lose both her parents while yet a child, was brought up without religious instruction. She was adopted by Mr. Callahan, and inherited his large fortune. She professed Romanism, and devoted herself and her property to the service of the poor. In 1827 she and a few other ladies purchased a house in Baggot Street, Dublin, and opened a home (“House of Mercy”) for the destitute and forlorn, and a free school for Roman-Catholic children. These ladies soon determined upon a regular organization, underwent a novitiate in a convent of Presentation nuns, and Dec. 13, 1831, the new Order of Mercy was founded. (See art.) Of this order Miss McAnley was mother-superior until her death. See Life of Catharine McAuley, New York, 1866.

McCHEYNE, Robert Murray, Scottish pastor and evangelist; b. at Edinburgh, May 21, 1813; d. at Dundee, March 25, 1843; educated first at the high school, and then at the university of his native city, in both of which he distinguished himself by gaining honors in his classes; his poetic faculty being even thus early recognized by Professor John Wilson, the celebrated “Christopher North,” who awarded him the prize for a poem on The Covenanters. He studied theology at the Divinity Hall of the University of Edinburgh, under Drs. Chalmers and Welsh, having been first quickened into earnest religious life through the effect produced upon him by the death of a beloved brother, and the reading of The Sun of Saving Knowledge, which is generally appended to the Westminster Confession of Faith. Among his fellow-students and intimate friends at this time, and during his life, were Alexander Somerville (whose name has recently come into prominence for his evangelistic labors in Australia and the Continent of Europe), Horatius Bonar, the well-known hymnist, and Andrew Bonar, afterwards his biographer. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Established Church presbytery of Annan on July 1, 1835, and began his ministerial labors at Lariert, near Falkirk, on Nov. 7 of the same year. After nearly two years of work in this rural sphere, he was (Nov. 24, 1836) ordained to the pastorate of St. Peter's Church, Dundee, which he continued to hold until his death.

Toward the close of 1838 his health began to fail, and he was induced, along with Drs. Black and Keith, with his friend Andrew Bonar, to undertake a mission of inquiry among the Jews in Palestine and on the Continent, of which an interesting account was published, forming one of the earliest of those works on the Holy Land which have been such a feature of the biblical literature of recent years. He returned to Dundee to find his church in the midst of a great revival, under the ministry of William Burns, afterwards celebrated as a missionary to China, who had been supplying his pulpit in his absence. This religious interest continued unabated till the close of his career, and many hundreds of souls were thereby brought to the knowledge of the truth. He paid two visits to Ireland, and went frequently from place to place in Scotland, having “a growing feeling that the Lord was calling him to evangelistic more than to pastoral labors.” In the controversy known as “The Ten-Years' Conflict” he took very decided ground on the non-intrusion side; but, before the disruption, he had gone to the region where controversies are at an end; for, having caught typhus-fever in the discharge of his pastoral labors, he died at the early age of twenty-nine years and ten months. But, useful as his personal ministry had been, it was through his death that he rose to his highest and widest influence; for his Memoir and Remains, prepared by his friend Andrew Bonar, has had a most extensive circulation, and has been richly blessed both to pastors and Christian people generally. In 1880 the book was in its hundred and sixteenth English edition. This fact shows how extensive has been the circulation in Great Britain; and that in America has probably been nearly as great. It has become an established classic of the closet, and especially of the pastor's closet. The sermons are not remarkable for genius, originality, or intellectual grasp; but they are full of “unction,” and have in a very large degree the fervor of earnestness and the glow of holiness. They are tolerably extended "briefs," not used in the pulpit, but digging the channels for the thoughts, which, when he preached, were allowed to flow in such words as the moment suggested. But the power was not in the sermons so much as in the man himself; and perhaps the secret of it all is revealed in these words, found in a letter addressed to him by an unknown hearer who had heard his last discourse, and whose note was discovered unopened on his desk after his death: "It was not so much what you said, as your manner of speaking, that struck me. I saw in you a beauty in holiness that I never saw before." Besides his sermons, his Remains consist of fugitive articles on various subjects, and fourteen poems, which his biographer has called Songs of Zion. Among these are the beautiful hymns beginning "I once was a stranger," and "When this passing world is done," which have become universal favorites, and his exquisite lines on the Sea of Galilee. His career is another illustration of how much one man can do, even in the compass of a brief life, when the Spirit of God is with him; and his name, for this as for other reasons, will be coupled with those of David Brainerd and Henry Martyn, for all three had both the fire and the holiness of the seraph. See Memoir and Remains of the Rev. Robert Murray McCheyne, by ANDREW A. BONAR (original edition), Dundee, 1845, frequently reprinted in Great Britain and America. WM. M. TAYLOR.

MCCLELLAND, Alexander, D.D., b. at Schenectady, N.Y., 1791; d. at New Brunswick, N.J., Dec. 19, 1861. He was graduated at Union College 1809; studied theology under Dr. J. M. Mason; was licensed by the Associate Reformed Presbytery 1815; and was pastor of the Rutgers-street Presbyterian Church from 1815 to 1822, when he became professor of logic, metaphysics, and belles-lettres in Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn. From 1829 to his death he taught in Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N.J. (as professor of languages, 1829-32; and of Evidences of Christianity, 1840-51), and in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church in the same place, as professor of Oriental languages and literature, 1832-57. He resigned in 1857, and passed his closing days in scholarly retirement. As a preacher and a teacher, Dr. McClelland stood forth pre-eminent. In the pulpit he proclaimed God's truth with eloquence, unction, and logical power. In the professor's chair he was enthusiastic, inspiring, exacting and thorough, witty and severe. As a teacher of Hebrew he is remembered for his fidelity and success in grounding his pupils in that language. His condensed Hebrew grammar, never published, was a masterpiece. The good students thanked him for his stimulating method: the dull ones writhed under his continual exactions. His publications were very few: among them was, Manual of Sacred Interpretation, New York, 1812; 2d edition, under title Canon and Interpretation of Scripture, 1860. A volume of his Sermons, with Sketch of his Life, was published 1867.

MCCLELLAND, John, D.D., LL.D., joint founder and editor of McClintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia, b. in Philadelphia, Oct. 27, 1811; d. at Madison, N.J., March 1, 1870. He was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania 1835; received as travelling preacher in the Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist-Episcopal Church the same year; from 1836 to 1848 he was professor in Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn. (which in 1831 had passed under the Methodist influence), first in mathematics, but after 1840 in classics. In 1816 he commenced, in conjunction with Professor G. R. Crooks, a series of elementary books upon Latin and Greek, which applied the method of imitation and repetition so successfully used in teaching modern languages. The series has been very widely used. From 1818 to 1856 Dr. McClintock was editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review. In 1857 he went to Europe as delegate to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in England, and also to the Berlin meeting of the Evangelical Alliance. From 1857 to 1860 he was pastor of St. Paul's Church, New-York City; from 1860 to 1864 pastor of the American Chapel, Paris, and corresponding editor of the Methodist (established in 1860, merged in the Christian Advocate 1882). While in Paris, he took an earnest interest in the American civil war, and strove to circulate correct information respecting the nature and importance of the struggle. Returning to New York in 1861, he was recalled to St. Paul's; but ill health compelled his resignation after a year. In 1867 he accepted the responsible position of president of the newly organized Drew Theological Seminary at Madison, N.J. (See art.) Dr. McClintock was generally recognized as the best scholar in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, and also as one of her foremost pulpit orators. He industriously cultivated his natural powers, and left behind him many proofs of his labor. Personally he was very attractive, a man of liberal views, and genial and amiable spirit.

His publications include, besides the series already mentioned, an Analysis of Watson's Theological Institutes, New York, 1842, prefaced to the American edition of Watson since 1850; a translation, in connection with Professor C. E. Blumenthal, of Neander's Life of Christ, New York, 1847; Sketches of Eminent Methodist Ministers, New York and Cincinnati, 1852; Temporal Power of the Pope, 1855; edition of D. S. Scott's translation of Felix Bungener's History of the Council of Trent, New York, 1855; a translation of Count De Gasparin's Uprising of a Great People, London, 1861, expressly designed to help on the Union Cause in England. Since his death there have been issued a volume of his sermons, phonographically reported, entitled Living Words, New York, 1871, 2d edition, same year, and his Lectures on Theological Encyclopaedia and Methodology, Cincinnati, 1873. These volumes represent only a portion of his activity. He wrote for different periodicals, and interested himself in various enterprises, and by one great work he laid the church under heavy debt. As early as 1853, in connection with Dr. Strong, he began the collection of materials for a Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, which should be much more complete than any existing. With unusual industry he labored on, assuming alone the department of systematic, historical, and practical theology. It was not until 1867 that the first volume appeared (Harper & Brothers, N.Y.). He lived to superintend the publication also of the second (1868) and the third volumes (1870); but the fourth (1871) was prefaced by a Memorial by Dr. Strong. There can be no question of the great value of this Cyclopaedia. See art. DICTIONARIES, vol. i. p. 636; Life and Letters of Rev. John McClintock by GEORGE R. CROOKS, D.D., New York, 1876.

McCLURE, Alexander Wilson, D.D., b. in Boston, May 8, 1808; d. at Cannonsburgh, Penn., Sept. 20, 1865. He was graduated at Amherst College 1827, and at Andover Seminary 1830; and was Congregational pastor successively at Malden, Mass. (1830-41), St. Augustine, Fla. (1811-41), and Malden again (1818-52). In 1852 he was installed over the First Reformed Dutch Church of Jersey City, but became corresponding secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union 1855. He held the position until 1858, residing, from 1856 to 1858, in Rome, Italy, as chaplain of the Union. During his closing years, from 1859, he was a great sufferer. His scholarship was profound, and his writings were genial and popular. He edited The Christian Observatory, 1814-47, and wrote many valuable articles in other periodicals. His books comprise Four Lectures on Ultra-Universalism, Boston; Lives of the Chief Fathers of New England, 2 vols.; and particularly that painstaking and valuable historical work, — The Translators Revived: a Biographical Memoir of the Authors of the English Version of the Holy Bible, New York, 1853, the materials for which were "drawn from the best sources in Great Britain and America, and with the utmost care for many years, to secure accuracy and fulness."

McCRIE, Thomas, D.D., Scottish preacher and author; b. at Dunse in November, 1772 (exact date unknown, but baptized Nov. 22); d. at Edinburgh, Aug. 5, 1835. He was educated at the school of his native town. He entered the university of Edinburgh when he was about sixteen years of age, and completed his curriculum in 1791. In the autumn of the same year he went to Brechin, where he acted as assistant in a private academy, and also opened a day-school in connection with the Anti-burgher congregation of the town. Here he resided for three years, except during the few weeks which were annually required for attendance at the theological seminary of the General Associate, or Anti-burgher, denomination at Whitburn, which was then presided over by the Rev. Alexander Bruce. He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Kelso in 1795, and ordained to the pastorate of the Potter-row Church, Edinburgh, May 26, 1796. Here he remained for ten years; when, owing to differences about the province of the civil magistrate in religious matters, a schism occurred in the Anti-burgher denomination, and McCrie, with other four ministers, separated from the General Associate Synod, by which they were afterwards deposed. They formed themselves into a new denomination, called "The Constitutional Presbytery," which was, at a later date, merged in the Synod of Original Seceders; and McCrie, followed by the larger part of his flock, removed to another place of worship, in which he continued to minister until his death. The controversies in which he was engaged led him to investigate the early history and constitution of the Church of Scotland; and in the years 1802-06 he contributed to The Chris- tian Instructor a series of papers, chiefly biographical, bearing on these topics. These, however, were but unconscious preparations for the great work — the Life of John Knox, the Scottish Reformer — by which his name will be perpetuated. This work (begun in 1807, and published in 1811; enlarged edition in 1813), not only placed McCrie in the front rank of the authors of his day, but also produced a great change of popular sentiment in regard to Knox. It was distinguished by original, painstaking research, independence of judgment, judicial fairness of mind, and singular clearness of style; and its effect on the general estimate of Knox among men was not unlike that produced, in the succeeding generation in reference to Cromwell, by the publication of Carlyle's monograph. It was received with the greatest favor by critics; its author was honored by the degree of D.D. from the University of Edinburgh in 1813; and there is reason to believe that the impulse given by it to the study of the history of the Scottish Reformation, and the principles involved in the subsequent conflicts of the Scottish Church, did much to bring about that movement which resulted in the disruption of 1843. In 1817 McCrie reviewed the delineation of the Covenanters, by the author of Wacerley, in Old Mortality, in a series of articles; and the effect of these was so great, that Scott felt it needful to reply to them under cover of an article in The Quarterly Review. McCrie continued through life to prosecute his historical studies; and the results of these were given to the world in his Life of Andrew Melville (1819, 2 vols.), History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy (1827), and his History of the Reformation in Spain (1829). These, together with an excellent memoir by his son, were republished in 1857, and along with them a volume of posthumous Sermons, a series of Lectures on the Book of Esther, and a collection of Miscellaneous Writings, including some valuable pamphlets, which he had given to the press. — Thomas, jun., D.D., LL.D., son of the biographer of John Knox; b. at Edinburgh, 1798; d. 1875. He was educated in his native city; succeeded his father in the pastorate of the Original Secession church in that city in 1836, and was afterwards appointed professor of divinity by the members of his denomination. He joined the Free Church of Scotland at the union with it of the larger part of the Original Secession church in 1852, and was chosen in 1856 to the professorship of systematic theology in the English Presbyterian College at London. Besides the memoir of his father (1840), he wrote Sketches of Scottish Church History (1840), a Life of Sir Andrew Agnew, Annals of English Presbytery from the Earliest Period to the Present Time (1872), Story of the Scottish Church from the Reformation to the Disruption (1875), The Early Years of John Calvin (1880), and edited a new translation of The Provincial Letters of Blaise Pascal, with Historical Introduction and Notes (1846). He was also editor of The British and Foreign Evangelical Review from 1862 to 1870.

McDOWELL, John, D.D., b. at Bedminster, Somerset County, N.J., Sept. 10, 1780; d. in Philadelphia, Penn., Feb. 13, 1863. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey 1801; installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Elizabethtown, December, 1804; declined calls to other charges and to theological professorates, but finally became pastor of the Central Church, Philadelphia, June 6, 1833, and, from 1846 till his death, pastor of the Spring-Garden Church in the same city. "Few men have ever been connected with the American Presbyterian Church who have rendered it such manifold and varied services as Dr. John McDowell. He was a man of excellent common sense, had great executive ability; but his crowning attribute was earnest and devoted piety." He wrote his name ineffaceably upon the records of Elizabethtown. Eleven hundred and forty-four persons joined his church during that memorable ministry of twenty-eight years. From 1825 till 1836 he was permanent clerk of the General Assembly. In the disruption he sided with the Old-School branch, and was stated clerk of the Assembly from 1836 till 1840. He wrote A System of Theology, 1825, 2 vols. — William Anderson, brother of the preceding; b. in Livingston, N.J., May 15, 1789; d. there Sept. 17, 1851. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey 1809; entered the Presbyterian ministry; was pastor at Bound Brook, N.J., 1813-14; Morristown, N.J., 1814-23; Charleston, S.C., 1823-33; moderator of the General Assembly, 1833; secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, 1835-50. See W. B. SPRAGUE: Memoirs of John and W. A. McDowell, New York, 1864.

McILVAINE, Charles Pettit, D.D., D.C.L. (Oxon.), D.C.L. (Cantab.); b. in Burlington, N.J., June 18, 1799; d. at Florence, Italy, March 14, 1873; of the Mackilvanes of Ayrshire; ancestor removed to the neighborhood of Bristol, Penn., about 1700; baptized about 1815; graduated at Princeton 1816; ordained deacon, July 4, 1820, by Bishop White; ordained presbyter, March 20, 1823, by Bishop Kemp; consecrated bishop, Nov. 1, 1832, by Bishops White, Griswold, and Meade; minister of Christ Church, Georgetown, D.C., 1820-25; chaplain to the Senate, United States, 1822 and 1824; chaplain West Point Military Academy, 1825-27; pastor St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, L.I., 1827-32; bishop of the diocese of Ohio, 1832-73.

WORKS. — Evidences of Christianity (lectures delivered at University of New York, 1831, edited in England by Olinthus Gregory); Oxford Divinity compared with that of the Romish and Anglican Churches, Philadelphia, 1841; A Charge to the Clergy of his Diocese on the Righteousness by Faith; Sermon at the Consecration of Bishop Polk, 1838; Sermon at the Consecration of Bishop Lee, 1841; On Episcopacy; Charge to the Clergy of his Diocese, 1841; On the Chief Dangers of these Times (twenty-two sermons); The Truth and Life, 1854; The True Temple or Holy Catholic Church, 1860; Preaching Christ Crucified; A Charge to his Clergy, 1863. — Sources of further information. Memoirs of McIlvaine, by Canon Carus, Winchester, Eng. (Whittaker, New York, 1882); Memorial Address to the Diocese, by Bishop Bedell (Diocesan Journal of Ohio, 1873); Address by Bishop Huntington (Diocesan Journal of Central New York, 1873); Memorials, a Series of Papers (Standard of the Cross, Cleveland, O., 1882).

Bishop McIlvaine in personal presence was tall, of a commanding figure, with dignified action. His eyes were particularly bright and keen, habit-nally full of tenderness, but capable, when occasion arose, of expressing scorn and pity for whatever seemed to him base and unworthy.

Bishop McIlvaine was no less distinguished for worthy traits of natural character than for the form and features of his manhood. His dignity of presence found an answering dignity in manner, thought, and mode of speech. Many people who did not know him well supposed him to be distant and haughty. He was indeed reserved until satisfied that his complacency would not be abused. He was endowed with something of that fine sense of propriety and decorum, which, in the other sex, is their divinely intended protection from the intrusion of the unworthy. Besides, his tastes and habits of education inclined him to prefer to associate with those who were refined and cultured.

Those who knew Bishop McIlvaine only slightly were likely to interpret his natural reserve as haughtiness; but, when his confidence was won, not only did all signs of reserve disappear, but a confiding amiability took its place, which his intimate associates remember with great delight.

He was never weak, never impassive; always honest, fair, and firm; generous, except when a sacrifice of truth was demanded; a man of pure unblemished character, finely strung nervous temperament; possessing a peculiar sense of honor; sustained by manly pride; profoundly humble, devoutly spiritually minded; a saint, but in every sense a man.

Bishop Huntington said of him, "Inheriting Scotch blood, his mental constitution bore the marks of that ancestry in his theological genius, and his taste and ability in dogmatics, as well as in his strong personal will. Gifted with a quick and capacious understanding, moving always with the dignified and graceful mien of a noble person, and lifted into universal respect by his ardent piety, it might not be fanciful to trace in him some characteristics of his national descent, — something of the evangelicalunction of Leighton, of the sanctity of Erskine, of the directness of Rutherford, and even the courage of Knox."

As a Theologian. — Bishop McIlvaine was an Evangelical, of the school illumined in this country in the Episcopal Church by the lives and teaching of Milnor, Meade, Bedell, Johns, Tyng, May, Sparrow, and Eastburn. Being a logician, and brought up in a school (Princeton) where dogmas were placed in the crucible of human reason, it was almost of necessity that his religious views should be tinged with Calvinism; for the system of John Calvin is the result of the severest logic.

But he did not follow Calvin implicitly, or into conclusions not warranted by Scripture. His rule of truth was the plain statement of the word of God. As the church well says, "Whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the faith." Holding fast this truth, whilst he maintained the doctrine of the divine sovereignty, and believed the doctrines of grace in their fulness, he stopped short of those human limitations, which, although perfectly logical, are unscriptural.

The term "evangelical," which satisfied him, exactly describes a system of dogmatical teaching which is based upon, strictly follows, and is consistent with, the evangel of our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles. Evangelical is descriptive of that system of doctrine which is defined in the Thirty-nine Articles of religion. It inspires the whole teaching of the liturgy of the church of which he was a member. Such evangelism is the pervading element in the Memorials written by Canon Carus. It is refreshing, in this age of negations, to listen to a teacher who not only knew in whom he believed, but what he believed, and who was always ready to declare it with unmistakable distinctness. The Memorials are fragrant with the "sweet spices" of the name and graces and love of the Saviour of sinners, the "Crucified." For the central thought, the sum and the substance, of Bishop McIlvaine's teaching, was "Jesus Christ and him crucified."

As an Ecclesiastic. — Whilst the bishop held strong views of the scriptural and historical authority of episcopacy, he maintained a liberal estimate of the breadth of the Church of Christ. He held that it consists of all God's faithful people. Whilst his conviction of the value of episcopal regimen was distinct and strong, he overcame the temptation to uncharitable judgments of those who differed from him. Bishop McIlvaine's views of the falsity of what is known as "Sacramentalism" were very positive. He writes, the sacraments are "not to be seen, but to be sought through." Those words are golden. He taught that neither our Lord nor his apostles made a mystery of the sacraments, much less a mist.

As a Diplomat. — Bishop McIlvaine was a diplomatist as well as a theologian and administrator. That phase of his eventful life has necessarily been less widely observed than the others, which were more in accord with his ecclesiastical mission. Yet his diplomatic mission was entirely in accord with his ministry of the gospel of peace; for it tended to prevent war between England and America at a crisis of civil strife.

Capt. Wilkes, commander of the United-States sloop-of-war "San Jacinto," learning that the Confederate envoys, Messrs. Mason and Slidell, were on their way to Europe in the English mail-steamer "Trent," seized them, with their secretaries, from under the protection of the English flag. Under the circumstances President Lincoln deemed it important for the public interest, that citizens of known high standing should visit England, to counteract erroneous impressions. The high estimation in which Bishop McIlvaine was held abroad induced the President and secretary of the United States to request his good offices in England at this crisis. Two other distinguished citizens were associated with him in this mission. — Mr. Thurlow Weed, and Bishop Hughes of the Roman-Catholic Church. Of the success of this diplomacy the bishop, on returning home, records, —

"We reached England in the darkest days of the Trent affair. Constant efforts were needed to explain and vindicate our cause, to correct misapprehensions, conciliate prejudices, strengthen friendships, and all among the highest people, as well as the most intelligent and educated. I thank God, who gave me courage and strength.

"I had the comforting and gratifying assurance of many in England (including our minister, Mr. Adams) that my mission had been productive of great good; and when I reached Washington this seemed to be the opinion among the members of the government.

"If I have been enabled thus to serve my beloved country in these days of her deep tribulation, I count it one of the greatest honors and privileges of my life."

As an Administrator. — He entered on the care of the diocese of Ohio in 1832. It was disordered by the sudden rupture of its relations with its first bishop. The institutions at Gambier were in peril. There were only forty parishes in the diocese (nine of them feeble), and only seventeen clergymen. The State was still new. Travelling was difficult, always slow, often dangerous. The parishes were scattered over every portion. There was little communication between the dispersed members of a feeble communion, all the communicants numbering not quite nine hundred; and there were some unhealed breaches of charity even among these. Seldom has a bishop entered on a more difficult task. At the end of his work, after forty years, the diocese consisted of 123 parishes, 108 clergymen, 10,000 communicants, and probably 50,000 souls; whereas only 40 parishes existed in 1832.

But no statistics can present the general agreement in doctrine, and the delightful spiritual accord, which characterized the diocese during the major part of those forty years. There were divisions and diversities, of course. Absolute agreement among all members of so large a diocese is impossible; it would imply such a stagnation as would indicate disease or deadness. He labored that what are known as evangelical principles should prevail, and that diversities therefrom should never exceed the liberty of the standards. He labored that all parishes and all the clergy should conform to outward observances as ruled by the canons and liturgy, and neither by defect nor by excess violate external unity and order. He succeeded to a degree which might almost be claimed as complete. The purpose of administration is to maintain the privilege of all alike under the laws, and to secure to all the peaceful enjoyment of every lawful privilege. For this purpose it is necessary to maintain the integrity of the law as the safeguard for all. Such being the duty and responsibility of the episcopal office, Bishop McIlvaine's administration was a marked success.

The bishop's judgment was generally accepted as law. The wisdom and tact, the firmness and moral power, of the administrator, was manifested in preventing strife, in settling controversies before they became public, in satisfying conflicting interests before they reached the point of contention. Here the greatest skill of an executive displays itself. He has attained the summit of power, whose word is accepted instead of the slow decisions of a tribunal, and against whose invariable rectitude, acknowledged correctness of judgment, and firmness, men cease to contend.

His method of maintaining integrity in doctrinal opinions and in ecclesiastical law was to discuss variations from his own view frankly, fully, and with an earnestness that showed his sense of the importance of the topics. He entered into these discussions oftenest in charges, or in annual addresses, and sometimes by pastoral letters. On the gravest occasions he entered into the arena of public controversy. His logical acumen here exhibited itself, accompanied by such a thorough mastery of all the elements properly belonging to the topic, and such force in presenting them, that his conclusions were invariably accepted by the diocese, and generally by the church. In a discussion of the greatest moment, arising out of the publication of the Oxford Tracts, the calm decision of the church at large, after years of reflection and experience, has undoubtedly affirmed the bishop's judgment, and vindicated his foresight.

As a Preacher.—His great power in the pulpit was in the manifestation of the gospel. His main topics were, redemption,—the need of it, the mode of it, the efficacy of it, the completeness of it. How he rung the changes on that chime!—ever varied, ever the same; the melodies many, the harmony one; the one thought, Jesus Christ and him crucified. The range which it covered was as large as every spiritual need, and every doctrine which it illustrates or defines. His special themes were, the ruin of our nature by sin, and the atonement,—the vicarious sacrifice of Christ. His remarkably clear conceptions of these two foundation truths of the gospel scheme gave a character to his preaching very like that of St. Paul. He was thoroughly imbued with the principles affirmed in the Epistles to the Romans.

In later years his sermons were largely extempore; and, both in his written and extempore discourses, he has seldom been surpassed for the steady march of logical, compact, easy, melodious, and intensely convincing eloquence.

G. T. BEDELL (Bishop of the Diocese of Ohio).

McKENDREE, William, D.D., Bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; b. in King William County, Va., July 6, 1757; d. near Nashville, Tenn., March 5, 1835. He served in the Revolutionary army for several years, and as an adjutant and commissary was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, 1781. He was converted in 1787, joined the Methodists, and became an itinerant preacher in 1788; in 1796 was made presiding elder; in 1801 given general superintendence of the Western Conference; in 1806 transferred to the Cumberland District; in 1808 elected bishop. He was one of the principal founders of his denomination in the West, and "venerated as one of the most able and saintly men" in its annals. His Life was written by Bishop Paine, Nashville, 1869, 2 vols.; new edition, 1875. See also the sketch by Dr. T. O. Summers, in MacCracken's Lives and Leaders of our Church Universal, pp. 623-631.

McLEOD, Alexander, b. in the Island of Mull, Scotland, June 12, 1771; d. in New-York City, Feb. 17, 1833. He came to America in 1792; was graduated from Union College, Schenectady, 1798; from 1801 till his death was pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, New-York City. By reason of his eloquence he obtained great fame. His publications embrace Negro Slavery unjustifiable, New York, 1802, new edition, 1860; Lectures on the Principal Prophecies of the Revelation, 1811; View of the Late War, 1815; The Life and Power of True Godliness, 1816. His Memoir was written by Samuel B. Wylie, New York, 1855.—His son, Xavier Donald (b. in New-York City, Nov. 17, 1821; d. near Cincinnati, July 20, 1865), was graduated at Columbia College; entered the Episcopal ministry in 1845, but while in Europe (1850-52) he became a Roman Catholic. On his return he took up a literary life, until, in 1857, he became professor of rhetoric and belles-lettres at Mount St. Mary's College near Cincinnati, and was ordained priest in the Roman Church. He wrote much in prose and poetry. Among his books may be mentioned a Life of Mary Queen of Scots, New York, 1857; and History of Devotion to the Virgin Mary in North America, 1866, 5th ed., 1868. The latter work contains his Memoir, by J. B. Purcell.

McVICKAR, John, b. in New-York City, Aug. 10, 1787; d. there (in Bloomingdale) Oct. 29, 1868. He was graduated at Columbia College 1804; entered the Episcopal ministry 1811; was professor of moral philosophy, rhetoric, and belles-lettres 1817-57, and of natural and revealed religion 1857-64, and afterwards professor emeritus, and chaplain at Governor's Island. He wrote, besides other works, pamphlets, and articles, A Domestic Narrative of the Life of Samuel Bard, D.D., 1822; Memoir of Edmund Dorr Griffin, 1831; Early Years of Bishop Hobart, 1834; and Professional Years of Bishop Hobart, 1836. See Memoir of Dr. McVickar by his son, W. A. McVickar, D.D., New York, 1871.

McWHORTER, Alexander, D.D., b. in Newcastle County, Del., July 15, 1734; d. in Newark, N.J., July 20, 1807. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey 1757; studied theology under William Tennent; became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Newark, N.J., 1759. In 1764 he was sent by the synod of New York and Philadelphia to North Carolina on a mission, and in 1775 he was sent by Congress to western North Carolina to induce the Royalists there to take up the Revolutionists' cause. In 1778 he became chaplain of Knox's Artillery Brigade. In 1779 he went to Charlotte, Mecklenburg County, N.C., to be pastor there, and also president of Queen's Museum College, afterwards Liberty Hall. But Cornwallis took the town. Dr. McWhorter lost his library; and in 1781 he returned to Newark, where he was re-installed. He took a prominent part in forming the constitution of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. For thirty-five years he was a trustee of the College of New Jersey, and collected large sums for it after its buildings were burned (1802). He published several volumes of sermons.

MEADE, William, D.D., third bishop of the Protestant-Episcopal Church of Virginia; b. Nov. 11, 1789, in Clarke County, Va.; d. in Richmond, March 11, 1862. He was the son of Richard K. Meade, a favorite aide-de-camp of Gen. Washington's in the Revolutionary War. He entered Princeton College in 1806. It was during his last year in college that his religious views and experience assumed a decided character, and he formed the purpose of entering the ministry of the Episcopal Church. Out of a class of forty he was assigned, on his graduation, the valedictory. As there were no theological seminaries at that time, he prepared for the ministry under Rev. Walter Addison of Maryland, and was ordained by Bishop Madison, Feb. 21, 1811. His first charge was Christ Church, Alexandria, where Gen. Washington had frequently attended divine service. Here, by the character of his preaching, he attracted members of Congress from Washington, only seven miles distant, among whom were John Randolph and James Milnor, afterwards rector of St. George's, New York. With John Randolph he had a correspondence on the subject of personal religion, which has been published.

He was now zealously and successfully engaged in the revival of the Episcopal Church in Virginia, which had been left by the Revolution in the most discouraging state. He had much to do with the election of Richard C. Moore, D.D., of New York, as bishop. In 1823 he was the "Founder of the Protestant-Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia," as the inscription on his monument records. This institution has sent out about seven hundred and fifty ministers of the Episcopal Church, among whom have been forty-five foreign missionaries. In 1829 he was elected bishop of Pennsylvania by a majority of one clerical vote, but from some technicality the election was not confirmed. In 1829 he was elected assistant bishop to Bishop Moore, with the right of succession. On the death of Bishop Moore in 1841, he became bishop, and continued so till his death, March 14, 1862.

He regarded with favor, and sustained with zeal, the American Bible and Tract Societies, and often and earnestly commended them to the patronage of his diocese. In the intervals from his abundant labors as bishop he was never idle. Besides many sermons, he published Lectures on the Pastoral Office; The Bible and the Classics; and Old Churches, Ministers, and Families of Virginia, a work of great research and value.

His last words were, "My hope is in Christ, the rock of ages. I have no fear of death, and this not from my courage, but from my faith. I am at peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. The prospect of rest from sin and suffering is attractive." Thus died in faith a bishop, who, by natural and acquired gifts, was "fashioned to much honor," who had in his day more influence in the house of bishops than any other man. His influence in his own diocese by his wisdom and firmness was unbounded. The title of the "Restorer" of the Episcopal Church in Virginia belongs to him more than to any other man. See J. JOHNS: A Memoir of the Life of the Rt. Rev. William Meade, D.D., Baltimore, 1867.

JOSEPH PACKARD.

MEALS AND BANQUETS AMONG THE HEBREWS. The principal meal seems to have been taken at night, as we conjecture from Exod. xvi. 12, xviii. 12, 13, Ruth iii. 7; and the other meal not before nine o'clock A.M. (Acts ii. 15), and on Sabbath, according to Josephus (Life, § 54), not before noon, when the synagogue service was over. It is every way probable that the Jews ate very little meat, bread and fruits constituting with them, as with the modern Orientals, the principal diet. Primitively the Jews sat (i.e., probably squatted on the ground) at meals; but contact with other nations, especially with the Babylonians, refined their ideas of life; and hence Amos (eighth century B.C.), inveighing against the luxury which enervated the upper classes, speaks of those "that lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches." The New-Testament notices show that the custom of reclining at meals, at least where there were guests, had become national. This fact is brought out most prominently in John xiii. 23 ("There was at the table reclining in Jesus' bosom one of his disciples, whom Jesus loved"), xxi. 20 referring to the same fact (the disciple who "leaned back on his breast"). The persons leaned upon their left elbows, and took the food with the right hand, ordinarily all out of one dish. The tables were three in number, arranged as three sides of a parallelogram; so that the servants could serve the guests from inside the open space. The most honorable place was the first at the right-hand table (Matt. xxiii. 6). The hands were washed before and after meals,—a custom dictated by decency; for the food was taken in the fingers. In daily life it is probable that both sexes ate together. Grace was said before and after meals (1 Sam. ix. 13; Deut. viii. 10). Our Lord was particular in following the custom (Matt. xv. 36; Luke ix. 16; John vi. 11).

Frequent mention is made in the Bible of banquets. These were held, as among us, in celebration of special events, such as marriages (Gen. xxix. 22), house-building (Prov. ix. 2), burials (Hos. ix. 4). Official banquets were given, as at the ratification of treaties (Gen. xxxi. 54), and in celebration of royal birthdays (Mark vi. 21). There were also drinking-bouts, in which some food was served (1 Sam. xxv. 36; 2 Sam. xiii. 28; Isa. v. 11; Amos vi. 6). Similar gatherings are condemned in the New Testament (Rom. xiii. 13; Gal. v. 21; Eph. v. 18; 1 Pet. iv. 3). To the banquets and drinking-bouts the women of the family did not come, except to serve. The guests were received by a kiss (Luke vii. 45), and had their feet washed (Luke vii. 44): they were then arranged at table according to their rank, and their relations with the host (Gen. xliii. 34; 1 Sam. ix. 22; Luke xiv. 8). As an especial sign of favor or honor, a particularly choice piece of meat (1 Sam. ix. 24), or an unusually large portion (Gen. xliii. 34), was sent from the host to a guest. For the entertainment of the meal there were music, song, and dancing (2 Sam. xix. 35; Isa. v. 12; Amos vi. 5; Matt. xiv. 6). The guests were anointed with oil (Luke vii. 46), and sometimes even crowned with garlands (Isa. xxviii. 1). Marriage festivities lasted several days, and were under the charge of a "ruler of the feast" (John ii. 8), usually a guest, who was master of ceremonies, and director of the servants.

MEANS OF GRACE are the instrumentalities which God has ordained for our use to secure spiritual enlightenment and edification. In the narrower sense they are three, — the Word of God (preached and read), the sacraments (the Lord's Supper and baptism), and prayer (Westm. Short. Cat., q. 88). The Augsburg Confession makes special mention of only two: "By the Word and sacraments, as by instruments, the Holy Spirit is given," etc. (art. 5). The Protestant Church agrees in holding that the efficacy of these means depends upon the faith of the individual (even in the case of infant baptism) and the sanctify-ing influence of the Spirit. The Roman-Catholic Church modifies or destroys the efficacy of these means by creating a priesthood whose administration is necessary to the validity of the sacraments, and by withholding the Bible from the laity; or adds to them by increasing the number of the sacraments to seven, and representing the Lord's Supper as the Mass, in which the bread and wine are transmuted into Christ's body and blood. It also differs from the Protestant Church by teaching that the efficacy of the sacraments depends upon the proper priestly administration, and not upon the faith of the participant; so that they work ex opere operatum. On the other hand, the Friends discard the sacraments, and offer a partial substitute for the Word in the inward light, upon which they lay much stress.

At least one of the means of grace (baptism) is regarded as a condition of salvation in the Roman-Catholic Church. The Protestant theory is, that the Holy Ghost may and does regenerate the heart sometimes, and sanctify it, irrespective of them, but that this is an unusual way, except in the case of infants dying in infancy. The Lutheran and Anglican communions have laid a greater emphasis upon the necessity of the use of the sacraments than the Reformed communions, but not upon the reading and preaching of the Word and the use of prayer, especially extempore and family prayer. For further details see BAPTISM, LORD'S SUPPER, etc., and the theologies of HODGE (iii. 466 sqq.), VAN OOSTERZEE (ii. 730 sqq.), and DORNER.

MEASURES. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEAT, MEAT OFFERINGS. The word "meat" in the Authorized Version means food in general; what we now mean by "meat" is called "flesh." A "meat-offering" was an "unbloody offering," consisting of a cake made of flour and oil. The law respecting its preparation and use is found in Lev. ii, vi. 14-23. In the case of public sacrifices a meat-offering was enjoined as a part of the morning and evening sacrifice (Exod. xxix. 40, 41), the Sabbath offering (Num. xxviii. 9, 10), the offering at the new moon (Num. xxviii. 20, 28), the offerings on the great day of atonement (Num. xxix. 9, 10). The same was the case with private sacrifices, as at the consecration of priests (Lev. vi. 20) and of Levites (Num. viii. 8), the cleansing of the leper (Lev. xiv. 20), and the termination of the Nazarite vow (Num. vi. 15). See OFFERINGS.

MECCA, the birthplace of Mohammed, and by that reason the chief of the holy cities of Islam, is situated in latitude 21° 30' north, longitude 40° 8' east, in a narrow and barren valley in the Arabian province of Hedjaz, sixty-five miles east of Jiddah, its port on the Red Sea, and about two hundred and fifty miles south of Medina. It has no manufactures and no commerce. Its forty-five thousand inhabitants depend almost entirely on the pilgrims who come to pray in its celebrated mosque (its only public building), and to kiss the black stone of the Kaabah; and the whole city seems to have been constructed for this one purpose, all houses being simply a kind of tenement houses. In 1875 the number of pilgrims is said to have risen to about two hundred thousand; but, generally speaking, it is decreasing. (See KAABAH.) See R. E. BURTON: Mecca and Me- dinah, London, new edition, 1879-80, 2 vols.; T. F. KEANE: Six Months in Mecca, London, 1881.

MECHTHILDIS is the name of two female saints. — Mechthildis of Hackeborn, b. 1240; d. 1310; a sister to "the great Gertrude;" entered the Benedictine convent of Helfta, near Eisleben, when she was seven years old, and began to have visions after the death of her sister in 1290. Her visions were written down by two of her friends, and circulated widely under the name of Liber spiritualis gratia. — Mechthildis of Magdeburg, b. 1214; d. 1277; belonged to a noble family, but left the paternal house when she was twenty-three years old; lived for a long time at Magdeburg, and settled finally in the convent of Helfta. Her visions, originally written down in Low German, were translated into High German (Fließende Licht d. Gottheit) by Heinrich von Nördlingen, Basil. 1344, and into Latin (Lux divinitatis) by her confessor, Heinrich von Halle. See Revelationes Gertrudiane et Mechthildiane, edited by the Benedictines of Solesmes, Paris, 1877; LUBIN: La Matelda di Dante, Graz, 1860; PREGER: Dantes Matelda, Munich, 1873.

MECKLENBURG, Ecclesiastical Statistics of. — I. Mecklenburg-Schwerin contained, according to the census of 1875, a population of 553,785 souls; of whom 548,209 were Lutherans, 2,258 Roman Catholics, 532 Reformed, and 2,786 Jews. The Lutheran Church is a state establishment. At its head stands the chief of the state (the grand duke), who governs through his minister of education and public worship, and through an ecclesiastical council composed of two theologians and two jurists. The establishment comprises six bishoprics (the bishops wearing the title of superintendent), — Doberan, Gustrow, Malchin, Parchim, Schwerin, and Wismar. — and 346 parishes, with 479 churches; one pastor in some cases celebrating service alternately in two different churches. On an average there belong 1,600 souls to each pastor, but the distribution is very unequal. The parish of Gischow numbers only 223 souls, while that of St. Jacob in Rostock numbers 20,000 souls. The connection between the church and the school is very close. All school-inspection belongs to the superintendent and pastor, though subject to the authority of the minister of education and public worship. A rector of a public elementary school must in the cities be a candidatus theologiae, and in the country a graduate from one of the two normal-schools, which are completely under the management of the church. — II. Mecklenburg-Strelitz contained, Dec. 1, 1879, 91,988 Lutherans, 265 Roman-Catholic, and 470 Jewish inhabitants. The constitution of the Lutheran Church is exactly the same as in Mecklenburg-Schwerin. The church comprises only one superintendent and sixty-eight pastors, with a hundred and fifty-three churches. A. PENTZ.

MEDARDUS, St., b. in 465; d. in 515; was elected bishop of his native city, Veromandunum in Picardy, in 530, but removed the see to Noyon, which, as a fortified place, offered better protection against the attacks of the Barbarians. In 532 he was also elected bishop of Tournay; and for the rest of his life he administered both dioceses; very active and very successful in spreading Christianity among the Pagans. He is commemorated by the Roman-Catholic Church on June 8. He is the patron of haymaking. His life was written in verse and in prose by FORTUNATUS, and in prose by RABODUS. See Acta Sanctorum, Junii ii.

MEDE, Joseph, B.D., b. at Berden, in Essex, 1786; d. as a fellow of Christ College, at Cambridge, Oct. 1, 1838. He was reader of the Greek lecture on Sir Walter May's foundation, and eminent for learning and piety. He is best known by his Clavis Apocalyptica, Cambridge, 1827; English translation by R. More, The Key of the Revelation, London, 1843; new translation by B. Cooper, London, 1833. The work is highly esteemed: indeed, he was considered "as a man almost inspired for the solution of the apocalyptic mysteries," and the first to find the true way of interpretation. He advocated what is called the continuistic view of the apocalyptic prophecies; i. e., that they are predictive of progressive history, being partly fulfilled, partly unfulfilled. His Works (containing, besides the Clavis, several other apocalyptic studies, and a Life) were published, London, 1848-52, 2 vols. folio; 2d and best edition, 1864; 5th edition, 1886.

MEDHURST, Walter Henry, missionary, sinologist, linguist, and lexicographer; b. in London, 1796; d. there Jan. 24, 1857. From 1816 to 1856 he was in the Far East, doing missionary work in India, Java, and Borneo (1822-30), and China (1830-56). He mastered Javanese, Chinese, and Japanese; made a translation of the Bible into Chinese, and compiled a Chinese and English Dictionary, Batavia, 1842-43, 2 vols.; and English and Chinese Dictionary, Shanghai, 1847-48, 2 vols.; and wrote a classic upon China, — China, its State and Prospects, with Especial Reference to the Diffusion of the Gospel, London, 1838.

MEDIA, MEDES (Hebrew, מֵדָי; Assyrian, Madai; Persian, Māda; Medo-Elamitic, Mada; Greek, ἡ Μῆδία), a country and people mentioned in the Old Testament as follows, the Hebrew word being the same in almost all cases: Gen. x. 2 (Madai); Isa. xiii. 17 (Medes); Jer. xxv. 25 (id.); li. 11, 28 (id.); 2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11 (id.); Ez. vi. 2 (id.); Dan. v. 28 (id.); 31 [vi. 1] (Median, מֵדָי); vi. 8 [9] (Medes); 12 [13], 15 [16] (id.); viii. 20 (Media); ix. 1 (Medes); xi. 1 (Mede, מֵדָי); Esth. i. 3 (Media); 14, 18 (id.); 19 (Medes); x. 2 (Media); — cf. Judith xvi. 10; 1 Macc. vi. 56, xiv. 1, 2; — Acts. ii. 9. The name is applied, as will be seen, much more often to the people than to the land inhabited by them. Its meaning is in dispute. Some identify it with the Acedian mada, Assyrian mātu, "land" (Oppert, etc.); others give it an Aryan source, either deriving it from some known root, as Sanscrit madhyu, "middle" (v. Bohlen, etc.) or, more wisely, refraining from any opinion as to its precise etymology (Spiegel, Lenormant, etc.).

Extent. — The boundaries were somewhat different at different periods. According to our earliest information, the northern limit was at or near the Caspius (Elbur) range of mountains, just south of the Caspian Sea: on the east was Parthia; on the north-east, Hyrcania; on the south, Elam, on the west the Zagrus Mountains, or the territory bordering on these. Later, the country stretched into Atropatene on the north-west, the term "Great Media" still having application to the narrower limits. Later still, all boundaries were lost; and the land of Media is at present divided into various provinces, and merged in the Persian Empire, forming its north-western portion. The chief cities of ancient Media were Ecbatana (Hamadan) in the south-west (see ECBATANA), and Ragá (Rhaga) in the north-east. The lowlands of the whole district were fertile, and Media was famous for its horses (cf. Strabo, XI. 521 ff.).

People. — During the time of the political importance of Media, its population consisted of two distinct elements, — a non-Aryan (the earlier inhabitants) and an Aryan, less in numbers, but composed of the conquerors and rulers of the former. It is probably to this ruling class that the Madai of Gen. x. 2 refers; for it occurs in the enumeration of the sons of Japhet. The same is true of the "Medes" so often mentioned in honorable connection with the Persians in the Bible, in the Achaemenid inscriptions, and in Greek writers. Herodotus (VII. 62) even tells us that the Medes (and this must refer to the ruling element of the population) called themselves Ἀριοι. The same writer (I. 101) divides the Medes into six γένη, — Βουσαί, Παρητακηνοί, Στρούχιστες, Ἀρζάνοι, Βοΐδοι, Μάγυ. The last was probably an order or class, rather than a tribe, and to this class the priests appear to have belonged.

Languages. — These were, at least, two in number. The Aryan language of the dominant race is preserved to us in many proper names. The language of the original subjugated inhabitants is, with little question, that in which the second or middle column of the tri-lingual Achaemenid inscriptions is composed. This non-Aryan language is akin to that of the inscriptions of Susa, but not identical. It has been variously called "Scythic," "Elamitic," "Medic," "Proto-Medic," and "Medo-Elamitic;" the last being probably the most exact designation.

Religion. — In the Persian period the religion of the Medes was not essentially different from that of the Persians. Trustworthy information is greatly lacking as to earlier times; but the sun-god Mithras was held in especial honor. The moon and Venus were also worshipped; and so were fire, earth, the winds, and water (Strabo, XV. 732). The office of priest involved a knowledge of esoteric doctrines, and descended from father to son; particular functions often belonging to particular families.

History. — The early history of Media is obscure. We do not know when the Aryan invasion took place, and authorities are much divided as to the date when the land became a political unit. The statement of Diodorus Siculus (II. 1), in regard to Pharnos, King of the Medes (c. B.C. 1230), is quite as untrustworthy as his mention of Ninus, king of Assyria, the conqueror of Pharnos. We know nothing authentic until the ninth century B.C. Then we have in the Assyrian records scattered notices of Media, by Salmanser II. (probably; he says, not "Madai," but "Amadai;" see Schrader, Die Keilinschriften und Geschichtsforschung, 1878, pp. 173 ff.), who reigned B.C. 858-823, by Shamash-Rammānu (823-810), and by Ramman-Nirari (810-781). At length we find Tiglath Pileser II. (B.C. 745-727) conquering and annexing to the Assyrian Empire at least part of Media. Sargon (B.C. 722-705) transported captives to the cities of Media (cf. 2 Kings xvii. 7). Similar reports come from Senaacherib (B.C. 705-681) and Esarhaddon (681-668). Media does not appear as a single consolidated power until the reign of Assurbanipal (B.C. 668-626); and this, joined with the plural expression "all the kings of the Medes" (Jer. xxv. 25; cf. li. 11, 28), seems to indicate that the petty chiefs of the country were not until then united under one headship. Herodotus' statements, therefore (I. 96 ff.), in regard to King Deiokes (B.C. 708-655) and the hundred and twenty-eight years of Median dominion over Upper Asia, can hardly be credited. Phraortes (B.C. 655-633), Kyaxares (633-593), and Astyages (593-550), are the only Median kings whose reign is fully established by Persian and Greek authorities. (On "Darius the Mede," see DARIUS.)

Under Phraortes, Media became a formidable power; and his son Kyaxares, in league with Nabopolassar of Babylon, succeeded, toward the end of the seventh century B.C., in capturing Nineveh, and putting an end to the Assyrian Empire. Under Astyages, his son and successor, the kingdom of Media was not only not extended, but even declined. The king himself had neither the love nor the confidence of his people; and when, in B.C. 550, the army of Cyrus, "King of Anzan," came face to face with that of Astyages, the soldiers of the latter betrayed their monarch, and Cyrus entered Ecbatana, and became master of the whole country. (See CYRUS.) Thenceforth the history of Media is merged in that of other kingdoms, — the Persian, Syrian, and Parthian.

MEDIATOR, MEDIATION. Mediation is the work of reconciling persons who are at variance. Sin had caused variance between God and man. But, in order to reconcile them, there must be satisfaction for sin, a veritable atonement. Peace could come in no other way. There was only one being who could make satisfaction, and be the mediator, — the daysman who could lay his hand upon both the parties. The Scriptures plainly lay down the qualifications for the work. The mediator must be a sinless man, and at the same time a divine person; for "the blood of no mere creature could take away sin." Jesus Christ possessed all the qualifications, and therefore he is the mediator (1 Tim. ii. 5). Mediation was effected by him in his dual personality, as the God-man; but his mediatorial work is usually and properly exhibited under the heads of his prophetic, sacerdotal, and kingly offices. "We need a Saviour who is a prophet to instruct us, a priest to atone and to make intercession for us, and a king to rule over and protect us." See HODGE: Systematic Theology, pt. iii. chap. iv. (vol. ii. pp. 455-461); arts. ATONEMENT, CHRISTOLOGY, INTERCESSION, JESUS CHRIST, THREE OFFICES OF, etc.

MEDICINE OF THE HEBREWS. The sources from which our knowledge of the medicine of the Jews is derived are two; viz., the Bible and the Talmud. Unfortunately the descriptions of diseases contained in the Bible are so vague that to arrange from them a system of medicine is largely a matter of conjecture; the Jewish idea of pathology and etiology being very meagre. For clearness let us divide our subject into two parts: 1st. What we can learn from biblical accounts of medicine; 2d. What the Talmud has to teach us of Hebrew medicine. The first shows its origin from Egypt and the influence of Assyrian ideas, while the second is imbued with the wisdom of the Greeks.

I. HEBREW MEDICINE, both in the old and the New Testament, was a matter belonging principally to the priestly class; the priests caring both for private ailments and public hygiene. This was but natural, since all disease was regarded as sent by Jehovah, mostly in punishment of sin; for the Jews had no knowledge of those changes in the tissues of the body which constitute disease. God called himself "the physician" of his people (Exod. xv. 26); and so the assumption of the office of physician by the priest was eminently proper. There were some physicians, however, who were not priests.

Among diseases threatened for disobedience were the plague, boils, fever, sterility, jaundice, ulcers, itch, insanity, blindness, and leprosy. The following maladies are mentioned in the Bible. (1) Fever and ague (Lev. xxvi. 16). (2) Dysentery (Acts xxviii. 8), with, probably, prolapsus ani, as in Jehoram's case (2 Chron. xxi. 15, 19). (3) Inflammation of the eyes, due to heat, night dews, sea breeze, flying sand, injuries, etc., which was often followed by blindness (Lev. xix. 14; Deut. xxvii. 18; Matt. xii. 22, etc.); while congenital blindness is spoken of, as in the case of the man whom our Lord healed, who had been blind from his mother's womb (John ix. 1). (4) Disease of the liver. (5) Hypochondria. (6) Hysteria. (7) Rheumatism and gout, for the cure of which many resorted to the Pool of Bethesda (John v. 2-3). (8) Consumption, a general term including hectic, typhoid, and other fevers (Lev. xxvi. 16; Deut. xxviii. 22, etc.). (9) Phthisis (?), indicated by leanness (Isa. x. 16); these last two being punishments for the misuse of the corporeal blessings of God. (10) Atrophy of muscles, "withered hand," being due either to rheumatism, plugging up of the main artery of the limb, or paralysis of the principal nerve, etc. (Matt. xii. 10; 1 Kings xiii. 4-6, etc.). (11) Fevers in general (Matt. viii. 14, etc.). (12) Pestilence (Deut. xxxii. 24). (13) Oriental pest, the so-called "bubonpest," a disease propagated through a miasm, a form of typhus-fever of the Nile lands, raging specially in warm, damp, thickly-peopled deltas, characterized by swellings in the groins, armpits, knee-joints, and neck, with petechial spots on the body; often fatal before the end of second day, though most die between the third and sixth day, before appearance of boils: it has prodromal symptoms, is accompanied with fever and delirium, and very fatal (Lev. xxvi. 25; Deut. xxviii. 21, 27, 60, etc.). The "emerods" spoken of in 1 Sam. v. 6, etc., are thought by some to be the plague, by others, the bites of a poisonous insect (Salpuga fatalis), hemorrhoids, or dysentery. (14) Boils (2 Kings xx. 7, etc.). (15) Sunstroke (2 Kings iv. 19, etc.). (16) Gonorrhœa (Lev. xv. 2). (17) Metrorrhagia, or uterine hemorrhage (Lev. xv. 25; Luke viii. 43, etc.). (18) Sterility (Gen. xx. 18, etc.). (19) Asa's foot disease, either œdema, or gout (2 Chron. xvi. 12). (20) Elephantiasis (?) (Job ii. 7). (21) Dropsy (Luke xiv. 2). (22) Cancer (2 Tim. ii. 17). (23) Worms, may have been phthiriasis (lice) (2 Macc. ix. 5-9). (24) Leprosy (see art.). (25) Other varieties of skin diseases, as the itch, which rendered its victim unfit for the priesthood (Deut. xxviii. 27). (26) Apoplexy, as in the case of Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 37, etc.). (27) Lethargy (Gen. ii. 21; 1 Sam. xxvi. 12). (28) Paralysis, palsy (Matt. iv. 24; Acts. iii. 2, etc.). (29) Epilepsy, the so-called "possession of devils" (Matt. iv. 24, etc.). (30) Melancholia, madness (Deut. xxviii. 28, etc.). David's case (1 Sam. xxi. 15), supposed by some not to have been assumed, but a passing mental affection due to his nervous strain. The case mentioned in Dan. iv. 33 was the madness of self-delusion in regard to identity, of which there have been similar cases placed on record. (31) Nervous exhaustion is supposed to have been the trouble with Timothy, causing his stomach disorder, for which Paul gave the most excellent prescription, "a little wine" (1 Tim. v. 23): this was the usual treatment in those days. (32) Miscarriage from a blow (Exod. xxi. 22). (33) "Boils and blains," which may have been phlegmonous, or common erysipelas (Exod. ix. 9). (34) Gangrene and mortification, quite common in those countries (2 Tim. ii. 17). (35) Poisoning by arrows (Job vi. 4). (36) Poison from snake-bite (Deut. xxxii. 24), scorpions and centipedes (Rev. ix. 5, 10). (37) Old age as described Eccl. xii.

The law forbade any Levite who was blind of an eye, or defective in sight, to practise as a physician, and any examination of people or things to be made in the twilight, or on cloudy days. As it was considered and declared pollution to touch a dead body, of course the Jews had no means of studying anatomy and pathology.

The rules of hygiene were carefully laid down, many of them being most excellent, as that of circumcision, which not only marked the Jew as a Jew, but was cleanly, and preventive of many grievous maladies. Minute directions were given for the segregation of lepers, isolation of the sick, and the treatment of vessels used by them, what food should be eaten, and the manner of slaying cattle; the marriage of relations interdicted, thus preserving the vigor of the race, etc. In regard to surgery we only read of two operations, — circumcision (Lev. xii. 3) and castration (Matt. xix. 12). Of obstetrics we know that midwives were employed, they being mentioned in Moses' time; that what was called a "bearing-stool" was used; that the women were prolific; and that they had some knowledge of the lochia. Of gynecology we learn that they distinguished between menstruation and metrorrhagia; seven days of purification following the former, during which marital relations were forbidden — another excellent hygienic rule. Of surgical instruments mention is made of a sharp stone for circumcision (Exod. iv. 25), and a knife, probably for the same purpose (Josh. v. 2), an awl for boring the ears of bondsmen (Exod. xxi. 6), a roller-binder for fractures (Ezek. xxx. 21), and the scraper or potsherd of Job (Job ii. 8).

Though the Jews had knowledge of many plants, their materia medica was scant, so far as we can learn. Figs (2 Kings xx. 7), fish-galls, and fasting-saliva (Mark viii. 23), we meet with. The only thing like a prescription found in the Bible is that for the holy anointing oil, consisting of myrrh, cinnamon, sweet calamus, cassia, and olive-oil (Exod. xxx. 23-25).

II. TALMUDIC MEDICINE. — Consequent upon the successive destructions of Jerusalem, and the carrying-away of the people into captivity, the rabbis were brought in contact with the medical thought of other people: hence their ideas were modified, and we find in the Talmudic medicine the influence of the Greek school. The medical part of the Talmud may be called a collection of minutes of the meetings of the medical rabbis, when they discussed their art, and of their writings (see art. TALMUD). Now their medicine became somewhat systematized, the rabbis having learned something of anatomy and pathology, though even in these branches their knowledge was largely derived from the study of disease in the brute creation. The reading of the medical part of the Talmud is very stupid; it being full of uninteresting discussions upon minute points, which to us, with our broader culture, seem very trivial. Many of the directions for treatment of disease are rather humorous reading in our present light.

Of anatomy they knew the essential parts, but of course had no knowledge of histology. They recognized the beginning of the spinal cord at the Foramen magnum, at the base of the skull, and its ending in the Cauda equina, near the end of the spinal column. They thought the œsophagus consisted of two coats; that the lungs were enclosed in two membranes, and the fat about the kidneys in its own skin. In the first century A.D., one rabbi dissected the body of a prostitute, and said that he found two hundred and fifty-two bones (two hundred is the correct number). As to physiology, they experimented in taking out the spleen, and said that the operation was not fatal. They distinguished between albumen and seminal fluid, saying, that, by boiling, the first coagulated, and the second liquefied.

Surgery. — They considered dislocation of the femur, contusion of the skull, perforation of the lungs, œsophagus, small intestines, stomach, and gall bladder, injuries of the spine, pia mater, and trachea, and fractures of the ribs, as fatal, unless surgical help was at hand. They thought that polypi of mouth and nose were sent as punishment for past sins. They also recognized stone in the bladder. Bleeding was done by the barbers, as it is in the East to-day.

Pathology. — Diseases were supposed to be either constitutional, acquired from injurious influences working on the body, or due to magic. Among other diseases, they recognized jaundice as due to retained gall; dropsy, as due to retained urine, and divided it into three kinds; viz., anasarca (general dropsy), ascites (abdominal dropsy), and tympanites (really a collection of gas distending the abdomen). Hydrocephalus internus was thought to be fatal; hydrocephalus externus not necessarily so. Tearing and atrophy of the kidneys, suppuration of the spine, cirrhosis of the lungs, were declared to be fatal. Their pathology was founded on observations made on animals, and the Talmud is full of long discussions over these points. As critical symptoms, they regarded sweating, sneezing, discharge from the bowels, pollutions, and dreams prophesying a happy ending to the disease.

Obstetrics.—Pregnancy was said by the Talmud to last from 270 to 273 days (now reckoned at from 280 to 300 days), and to be unrecognizable before the fourth month. It was thought that an eight-months child could not live,—a popular idea at the present time, but false. Cæsarean section, turning, evisceration, and abortion, are operations spoken of, and moles (false pregnancies) and monsters were known; the latter supposed to be caused by intercourse of a demon or animal with a woman, or a man with an animal. By the sixth week they thought that the genitals, mouth, nose, and eyes of the foetus, were formed; by the seventh week, the upper and lower extremities; by the third month, or third and a half, the first hair. Out of the male element the bones, sinews, brain, and white of the eye were produced; while from the female element came the skin, flesh, hair, black of the eye, etc.; but God gave the soul. Menstruation in children was known, although it is of rare occurrence.

Therapeutics.—Besides certain drugs, magic was employed. Any thing that a patient specially craved to eat he was given. Other dietetic rules were, before the fortieth year, eat more, after that, drink more; after meals, eat salt; after wine, take water; not too much working, walking, sleeping, loving, or drinking; regular stool; frequent baths, anointings, and washings. They gave onions for worms, wine and pepper against stomach disorders, milk drawn directly from the udder of a goat for dyspnoea, emetics for nausea, a mixture of gum, alum, and crocus, for menorrhagia, the liver of a dog for the bite of a mad dog, injections of turpentine for stone in the bladder, a drop of cold water into the eye in the morning, and warm foot and hand baths in the evening for eye troubles; venesection, assafœtida, etc. Besides the drugs already mentioned, use was made of beer, vinegar, honey; various oils, as opobalsamum (balm of Gilead), olive, myrrh, roses, palma christi, walnut, sesamum, colocynth, and fish; figs, dates, apples, pomegranates, pistachio-nuts; almonds from Egypt; wheat, barley, and other grains; garlic, leeks, and some other herbs; mustard, pepper, coriander-seeds, ginger, preparations of beet, fish, etc., steeped in wine or vinegar; whey, eggs, salt; wax and suet in plasters; gall of fish for inflamed eyes; ashes, bat's blood, etc.

Though here may be said to end the period covered by the scope of this article, it should be added, that, long after the destruction of the Hebrews as a nation, the Jewish physicians were held in high repute, and became prominent as body-physicians of more than one mighty monarch.

MEDINAH, the burial-place of Mohammed, and by that reason the second of the holy cities of Islam, is situated in latitude 24° 50' north, longitude 39° 51' east, in the Arabian province of Hedjaz. It contains a large mosque with the mausoleum of Mohammed, and is annually visited by a great number of pilgrims. It has about fifteen thousand inhabitants. See BURTON: Mecca and Medinah, new edition, London, 1879-80.

MEDLER, Nikolaus, b. at Hof, in Voigtland, 1502; d. at Bernburg, Aug. 24, 1551. He studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg, and established a school at Eger, but came in conflict with the city authorities because he taught his pupils Luther's doctrines; was appointed preacher in his native place, but had to leave because his preaching was too sharp; lived several years in Wittenberg as chaplain to the wife of Joachim I.; and was appointed superintendent of Naumburg in 1536, of Brunswick in 1546, and of Bernburg in 1551. Luther has designated him as one of his three true disciples, and he was indeed full of pugnacious zeal for Luther's cause. Dollinger's representation of him, however, in his Reformations-Geschichte, is unjust. A list of his writings is found in M. A. STREITPERGER: De vita Med., Jena, 1591; and in SCHAMELIUS: Numburgum literatum, pp. 19 and 37. H. WEINGARTEN.

MEGANDER (Grosmani), Kaspar, b. at Zürich, 1495; d. there Aug. 18, 1545. After studying at Basel, he was appointed preacher in his native city, and became one of Zwingli's staunchest adherents. After the disputation of Bern (1528), he was made professor of theology, and preacher there, and for many years he stood as the leader of that opposition which Bern offered to all attempts at reconciling the Swiss and German Reformation. But in the synod of 1537 the proceedings of Butzer were recognized, and the catechism which Megander had drawn up was altered in unionistic spirit. Provoked, Megander gave up his position in Bern, and retired to Zürich, where he was made dean at the cathedral. He left commentaries to various parts of the Scriptures. See HUNDESHAGEN: Konflikte zwischen Zwingli, Luther und Calvin in Bern, Bern, 1842. GÜDER.

MEGAPOLENSIS (the Hellenized form of Van Mekelenburg), Joannes, b. at Koedyck, Holland, 1603; d. in New York, Jan. 21, 1670. He came to America, 1642, on the invitation, and at the expense, of the patroon of Rensselaerwyck, who employed him as a frontier missionary at a salary of eleven hundred guilders ($410). He remained with the patroon until 1649, meanwhile laboring among the Mohawk Indians, whose language he learned, and many of whom joined his church. He was thus the first missionary among the Indians, preceding Eliot by three years. From 1649 to his death he was pastor of the Dutch Church in New Amsterdam (New York). His zeal led him into intolerance towards Lutherans and Independents. His valuable Short Account of the Mohawk Indians, their Country, Language, Figure, Costume, Religion, and Government, written originally in Dutch, and published in Holland without his consent (1651), will be found translated in Hist. Coll. State of New York, vol. iii.

MEGIDDO, a city of Manasseh, yet situated within the borders of Issachar. Before the Conquest it was a royal city of Canaan (Josh. xii. 21). It is generally identified with the present Lejjun (called by the Romans "Legio"), on the south-western edge of the plain of Esdraelon, six miles from Carmel; but Conder suggests Mejedd'a, ten miles from Jenin. This places the Valley of Megiddo, memorable as the scene of the deadly wounding of Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 29; comp. 2 Chron. xxxv. 22-24), in the valley between Jezreel and Beth'shean.

MEISNER, Balthasar, b. in 1587; d. Dec. 29, 1626; studied at Wittenberg, Giessen, Strassburg, and Tübingen, and was in 1613 made professor of theology at Wittenberg. His Philosophia sobria (Giessen, 1611), written in opposition to the prevailing tendencies of logical studies in his time, was much read; and his Pia desideria, dictated to his hearers shortly before his death, and published anonymously at Francfort, 1679, shows that he had a sharp eye for the deficiencies of the church.

A. THOLUCK.

MEKHITARISTS, The, form one of the noblest congregations of the Roman-Catholic Church, and have developed a literary activity which may fairly be compared to that of the Congregation of St. Maur. They received their name from the founder of the order, Mekhitar, b. at Sebaste, in Lesser Armenia, Feb. 7, 1676; d. in Venice, April 27, 1749. In his fourteenth year he entered the monastery of the Holy Cross near his native place, and afterwards he studied the Scriptures and the Fathers in the monastery of Edshmiazin, the residence of the Armenian patriarch, and the seat of Armenian learning. He had heard, however, of Europe and Rome, and he longed to go there. In 1695 he actually set out on the voyage. At Aleppo, where he staid for some time, he became acquainted with the Jesuit missionary Antoine Beauvilliers. But in Cyprus he was overtaken by a violent fever, which compelled him to give up the undertaking, and return to Sebaste. In 1696 he was ordained priest; and the great object to which he had decided to devote his life—the moral and religious education of his countrymen, and the reconciliation of the Armenian and the Roman-Catholic church—he immediately began to labor for by gathering pupils, and training missionaries. In 1700 he went to Constantinople; and his learning, as well as his great gifts as a preacher, soon secured for him a considerable influence among his countrymen. But, when it was discovered that he was making propaganda for a union between the Armenian and the Roman-Catholic church, persecutions began, and he was compelled to seek refuge with the French ambassador. Morea, at that time in the possession of the republic of Venice, was pointed out to him as the place best suited for such a missionary establishment as he intended to found; and in 1703 he settled at Modon, under the protection of the republic. In 1706 the monastery, church, and school were built, and filled with Armenian youths. In 1712 the order he established was confirmed by Pope Clement XI. But shortly after Morea was conquered by the Turks, and the whole establishment had to be removed with great loss to Venice in 1715. The city council, however, presented the order with the Island of San Lazzaro; and, before Mekhitar died, not only were a monastery and a church erected there, but a school and a printing-press were in active operation, and the whole establishment was in the most flourishing condition. Besides a number of hymns which date back to his early youth, but which are still used in the Armenian Church, Mekhitar published an Armenian grammar and dictionary, commentaries on several books of the Bible, a text-book in religion for children, and a complete translation of the Bible. His pupils followed his example with decided success. The Mekhitarists have put themselves in possession of most civilized languages; and while, on the one side, they publish translations into Armenian of European literature, and make their countrymen acquainted with the ideas and methods of modern civilization, they, on the other side, also publish critical editions of the old Armenian literature, whereby they have made known to the world many classical works which exist only in Armenian translations, such as the works of Ephraem Syrus, the De providentia of Philo, the Chronicle of Eusebius, etc. In material respect the order has also prospered. It has received great donations; and the mother institution of San Lazzaro has been able to establish branches in every place in Europe where Armenians are settled, especially in Vienna.

MELANCHTHON, Philipp, the eminent co-laborer of Luther in the German Reformation; b. at Bretten in Baden, Feb. 16, 1497; d. in Wittenberg, April 19, 1560. His original name was Schwarzerd ("black earth"), which, after the custom of the times, and on the advice of his great-uncle Reuchlin, the famous scholar and humanist, he exchanged for its Greek equivalent, Melancthon. After the year 1531, the Reformer wrote his name Melanthon (Corpus Reform., i. p. exxxi), with a view, probably, to facilitate the pronunciation. In 1507 he entered the Latin school at Pforzheim, the residence of his grandmother, where he came into close contact with Reuchlin. In 1509 he passed to the university of Heidelbergl, where he gave himself up assiduously to private studies, and in 1511 took the bachelor's degree. Being refused the following year the degree of master, on account of his youth, and in spite of his attainments, he went to the university of Tübingen, where he devoted himself, not only to the study of philosophy and the humanistic culture (humaniora), but to law, astronomy, and medicine. In 1514 he took the master's degree, and began the study of theology. He continued at Tübingen. put forth editions of Terence (1516) and his Greek grammar (1518), and was engaged as proof-reader for a time in the printing-establishment of Anshelm. He also wrote the preface of the Epistola clarorum virorum (1514).

Melanchthon, at the advice of Reuchlin, refused calls to Ingoldstadt and Leipzig, but accepted the invitation to the chair of Greek in the university of Wittenberg, for which Reuchlin had recommended him. Arriving in Wittenberg Aug. 25, 1518, he delivered his inaugural on the necessity of a change in the course of academic studies (De corrigendis adolescentiæ studiis), in which it is apparent that he hoped to effect a reformation within the Church through the instrumentality of literary culture. But the influence of Luther led him to a deeper study of the Scriptures; and the religious discussion at Leipzig in 1519 — at which he says he was an "idle spectator" (otiosus spectator), but really aided Luther — contributed to interest him more profoundly in theological questions, and to strengthen the friendship between Luther and himself. A letter to Ecolampadius, which was published, incited Eek against him. In his reply to Eek (Defensio adv. Eccianam inculpationem), he emphasized the authority of Scripture. His theological attainments were acknowledged by the gift of the degree of bachelor of theology. The degree of doctor of theology was also conferred upon him; but he refused it, urging that it ought to be sought in a reverential spirit, and conferred with great care (Corpus Reform., iv. p. 811). In 1520 he was married to Catharine Krapp, a daughter of the mayor of Wittenberg. To this step he was led by the urgency of his friends. In 1521 he stood forth as the champion of Luther, in a tract signed Didymus Faventinus, declaring that he had not renounced true Christianity, but had only denounced the abuses of the Pope and the Church. In this same year (December, 1521) Melanchthon published the first system of theology of the Reformation, under the title, Loci communes rerum theologiarum, seu Hypotyposes theologice. His next years were occupied largely with the German translation of the Bible (in which he was associated with Luther), and in the publication of commentaries. In 1524 he took a journey to Southern Germany in the interests of his health, and was approached by the papal legate Campegius, urging him to renounce the Reformed doctrines. Melanchthon refused, and confirmed his verbal testimony with a brief published survey of the Lutheran teachings (Summa doctrinæ Lutheri). In 1526 he was advanced to a theological professorship, and continued in Wittenberg during the remainder of his life, in spite of calls to Nürnberg, Tübingen (1531), to France, etc. In 1527 he took part in the visitation of the churches and schools, and was commissioned to prepare a plan of instructions for the visitors to the clergy. This work (Unterricht der Visitatoren an die Pfarherren, 1528) was cordially approved by Luther, who, however, inserted some "nails and lances against the papal hierarchy, as Melanchthon was too mild" (Luther's Briefe, De Wette, iii. No. 906).

The year 1529 is important, both in the history of the Reformation and the life of Melanchthon, on account of the Diet of Spire and the conference at Marburg. Melanchthon was present at both, counselling, at Spire, against any condemnation of the Swiss Reformers before giving them an opportunity to be heard, but at Marburg, where he took little part, willing to break off fraternal relations with the Swiss.

The year 1530 forms an epoch in the history of the Reformation. It was the year of the Diet of Augsburg, and the composition of the Augsburg Confession (Confessio Augustana). See art. AUGSBURG CONFESSION. Melanchthon was commissioned by the elector to prepare a statement of the articles in dispute between the emperor and the Protestants. He developed in its stead an apology of the Protestant faith, by proving it to be in agreement with the Scriptures and with the writings of the early Fathers. Luther, who remained at Coburg, approved the document as sent by Melanchthon. This first confession of Protestantism is indebted to Melanchthon for its peaceable and irenic tone, and its clear and simple terminology. It followed the stricter doctrines of Luther, as is apparent from Art. X., — which concerns the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and in regard to which Melanchthon himself wrote (June 26, 1530), "The article concerning the Lord's Supper follows the views of Luther" (juxta sententiam Lutheri, Corpus Reform., ii. 142), as also from the change which Melanchthon himself made in this article in 1540 (the so-called Augustana Variata). Thus Luther was in one sense the "father of the Augsburg Confession," as Plitt has said (Augsb. Bekenntnis, i. 772), although Melanchthon was its immediate author. Luther did not fully approve the irenic spirit which it breathed, and wrote (Briefe, iv. 110), "Satan well feels that your apology, Soft-stepper, dissimulates the article about purgatory, the worship of the saints, and especially about the Pope, the Antichrist" (Satan bene sensit apologiam vestram, Leisetreterin dissimulare articulum de purgatorio, etc.). Melanchthon subsequently wrote the Apology of the Augsburg Confession [also one of the symbols of the Lutheran Church], in which, provoked by the Roman-Catholic theologians, he is sharper than in the Augsburg Confession, and gives an admirable portrayal of the scriptural evidence for the evangelical doctrines.

For several years after the Diet of Augsburg, Melanchthon performed his academic duties in comparative retirement. The most important theological work of this period was his Commentary on Romans (Com. in Ep. Pauli ad Romanos, September, 1532). He fully approved of the Form of Concord sent to him by Bucer, and met with him by appointment at Cassel, 1531, to discuss the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. He departed, in consequence of this discussion and previous studies, farther and farther from the views of Luther, and distinctly calls himself, at Cassel, a representative of other views (Corpus Reform., ii. p. 882). At a later period, Luther suspected him of leanings to the Zwinglian theory, but added that he would, in spite of this, "share his heart with Melanchthon." He was accused (1536) by Cordatus, preacher in Niemeek, of affirming good works to be an indispensable condition of justification; and in 1535, in the second great edition of his Loci, he had departed farther from the Augustinian views, and emphasized his so-called Synergism. But, in a letter to Luther and his other colleagues, he says, "I never have wished to teach, nor have I taught, any thing about this controversy (good works) than that which you in common teach" (Corpus Reform., iii. 180).

These discussions and differences imbittered his stay in Wittenberg during the years 1536 to 1538;

so that he compares himself to Prometheus bound to Caucasus (Corpus Reform., iii. p. 606). About this time occurred the notorious case of the double marriage of Philip of Hesse. Melanchthon, as well as Luther (see LUTHER), regarded this an exceptional case, was present at the marriage, but urged Philip to keep the matter a secret. When it was made public, and Melanchthon, then at Weimar, heard it, he was so overcome with regrets, and pangs of conscience, that he sickened unto death, and was only delivered by the heroic courage of Luther in prayer, and the influence of his powerful will. In October, 1540, he was present at the religious conference in Worms, and determined to be less sparing of the Papists than he had been in 1530 at Augsburg. The conference was afterwards adjourned to Regensburg (1541), and was followed by the Regensburg Interim. In 1543 he came into conflict with Luther by the definition in the statement prepared by Bucer and himself for the Reformation party in Cologne. Luther spoke out his feelings of disapprobation from the pulpit, and even went so far as to say that Melanchthon ought to be banished from Wittenberg (Corp. Reform., v. 478). On the other hand, Luther's tract against the Swiss Reformers (Kurze Bedenken, etc.) of the year 1544 contains no disparaging references to Melanchthon. The relations, however, between these Reformers henceforth lacked the old freedom and confidence. But Luther's death (Feb. 18, 1546) overwhelmed Melanchthon; and in his memorial address before the university (Feb. 22), while hearty references to their friendship are lacking, he dilates at length upon Luther's great services to the Church, and counts him with Isaiah, John the Baptist, Paul, and Augustine, among the elect witnesses and leaders of the kingdom of God on earth.

The last eventful and also sorrowful period of his life began with the Interim and Adiaphoristic controversies in 1547. In the case of the Augsburg Interim, and especially of the Leipzig Interim, Melanchthon admitted that many Roman-Catholic customs belonged to the adiaphora, that is, were matters indifferent in their nature, and came into conflict with Flacius and other Lutheran divines. He continued, however, now that Luther was dead, to be the "theological leader of the German Reformation" (Nitzsch), but not the undisputed leader; for Flacius Illyricus, at the head of a more strict school of Lutheran theology and practice, accused him of erroneous teaching. He was also brought into conflict (after 1549), about the doctrine of justification, with Andreas Osiander, who had renounced the forensic view. These attacks, from which personal abuse was not wanting, wore upon his sensitive mind; but he bore them with great patience, and wrote letters conceived in an irenic spirit to his opponents. Nor were his labors against Catholicism at an end. When the elector of Saxony determined to send a statement of the Protestant faith to the Council of Trent, Melanchthon was chosen to draw it up. This confession, known as the Confessio Saxonica, contains a definite and strong presentation of the fundamental doctrines of Protestantism. Melanchthon started for Trent in 1551, noticed however, the military preparations of Maurice of Saxony on his way through Dresden, and, after getting as far as Nürnberg, returned to Wittenberg (March, 1552); for Maurice had raised his standard. The safety of the cause of the Protestants was insured by the religious peace of Augsburg (1555); but Melanchthon was induced by the emperor to attend another discussion between Protestant and Catholic theologians at Worms in 1557. But the Protestant party was represented by the two wings of the Lutheran Church, of which Flacius and Melanchthon were the leaders. The discussion came to nothing.

Contemporary with these other discussions during the last period of his life was the controversy about the sacraments. It was this which imbittered his last years more than any thing else, and led him to pray to be delivered from the rabies theologorum. The renewal of this discussion was occasioned by the triumph of the Calvinistic doctrine in the Reformed churches. He did not fully sympathize with Calvin, but had a view of his own, even before Calvin had any influence upon him. The personal presence of Christ, and the impartation of himself in the Lord's Supper, were matters of supreme importance with him; but he is not clear upon the point as to what relation the body and blood of Christ sustain to this personal presence and activity. Peucer, his son-in-law, and most others, hold that he, in the later period of his life, regarded the participation of Christ's body and blood as a figurative expression for the union with Christ. He undoubtedly gave up, after 1534, the idea of a physical union of the body and bread (physica conjunctio corporis et panis), and quotes approvingly the words of Macarius, that they who partake of the bread "eat spiritually the flesh of the Lord" (πνευματικῶς τὴν σάρκα κυρίου ἐσθίουσιν, Corp. Reform., ix. 1046). Above all, he made prominent the union with Christ and the mystical body; but he always seems to represent this as mediated by a carnal impartation by Christ of himself. But, in considering his views of the Lord's Supper, we must not forget his bias for union, and how far he was willing to go in the modification of his views in order to promote it.

A few days before his death he wrote down his reasons for not fearing death. On the left hand of that paper were the words, "Thou shalt be delivered from sins, and be freed from the acrimony and fury of theologians;" on the right, "Thou shalt go to the light, see God, look upon his Son, learn those wonderful mysteries which thou hast not been able to understand in this life," etc. He contracted a severe cold on a journey to Leipzig, which brought on an intermittent fever. His last hours were spent in prayer, and listening to passages of Scripture, especially Ps. xxiv.-xxvi., Isa. liii., John i., xvii., and Rom. v. Especially significant did the words seem to him, "His own received him not; but as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God" (John i. 11, 12). When Peucer asked him whether there was any thing else he wanted, he replied, "Nothing but heaven." His body was laid at the side of Luther's, in the Schlosskirche in Wittenberg.

In estimating Melanchthon's influence we naturally think, first of all, of his share in developing the interests of the Protestant Church. As the colleague of Luther, he was especially called to confirm and carry on the work of the Reformation upon the basis which Luther had laid. Providence joined these two men, so opposite in their natures, together in one great work, because they complemented each other. It required the heroism and creative power of a Luther to break with the ruling church. Melancthon himself was led by him into labors for the Reformation and theology. He shrunk from public activity, and would have preferred to confine himself to an academic and literary career. Without Luther, as Nitzsch has said, he would have "become and remained a second Erasmus;" although his deeper religious nature would have given him a more vital interest in the Reformation. He is continually longing for the retirement of a literary life, exclaiming, as early as 1529, "Oh, happy they who abstain from public affairs!" (Corp. Reform., i. 106). But it was essential that he should aid in the public work of the Reformation, and bring into use these very literary talents. If Luther scattered the sparks among the masses, it remained for Melancthon by his logical and systematic writings, comparing the Protestant faith with the Scriptures, to win not only princes, but also a large number of the cultured and learned, for the cause of the Reformation. Melancthon's moderation and conservative tendency were, in general, as necessary, in their place, to the success of the German Reformation, as were Luther's heroism of faith, and bold and military nature. Only Luther could have written the Ninety-Five Theses, the book addressed to the nobles of the German nation, etc., and have made the bold confession before the emperor at Worms; but Melancthon had to write the Augsburg Confession, the Apology, and the Loci Communes. These two men fully understood their own capabilities and the talents of each other. In 1520 Melancthon writes (Corp. Reform., i. 160), "I will rather die than be torn from Luther." Luther he compares to Elijah (Corp. Reform., i. 448), and calls him "the man full of the Holy Ghost" (Corp. Reform., i. 282). In spite of the coldness which grew up between them in the last years of Luther's life, Melancthon exclaims at Luther's death, "Dead is the horseman and chariot of Israel who ruled the Church in this last age of the world" (Corp. Reform., vi. 59). On the other hand, Luther wrote of Melancthon, in the Preface to Melancthon's Commentary on the Colossians (1529), "I was bound to fight with rabble and devils, for which reason my books are very belligerent. I am the rough pioneer, who must break road; but Master Philip comes along softly and gently, sows and waters heartily, since God has richly endowed him with gifts." A year before his death, Luther, in the Preface to his own works, praises Melancthon's Loci above them, and calls him an instrument of God who had accomplished the very best in the department of theology, to the great rage of the Devil (HENKE: D. Verhältniss Luthers u. Melancthons, 1860). In the last years of his life, although Luther was opposed to Melancthon's views on the Lord's Supper and other questions, he controlled his feelings, and never said any thing harsh against him. In their relations it cannot be denied that Luther was the more magnanimous, never once uttering a suspicion against Melancthon's personal character; while Melancthon did express now and then a want of confidence in Luther's. The latter, however, is to be explained by the fact that Melancthon was the weaker nature, and at times felt the dominating personality of Luther to press like a yoke.

It is Melancthon's moderation, conscientious prudence, and love of peace, which merit our respect for him as a Reformer. Nothing is easier than to be dazzled by the lightning and thunder of Luther's strong mind and personality. Melancthon's moderation and caution were often, during his lifetime and after his death, explained as fear, and want of courage and character. But, if there is much to make such a view plausible, we must remember that he was always thinking more of the welfare of the Church than of his own. Nor did he lack in personal fortitude; and it is related how, a few years before his death, he dashed into a crowd of noisy students with a drawn dagger, in order to restore peace. In fact, it required no little courage to practise a cool moderation when all was in haste, especially in view of the calumnies of the Catholic party. But courage was forced out of him, rather than an inborn characteristic. The distinction between Luther and Melancthon in this regard is well brought out in Luther's letters to the latter (June, 1530): "To your great anxiety, by which you are made weak, I am a cordial foe; for the cause is not ours. It is your philosophy, and not your theology, which tortures you so,—as though you could accomplish any thing by your useless anxieties. . . . So far as the public cause is concerned, I am well content and satisfied; for I know that it is right and true, and, what is more, it is the cause of Christ and God himself. For that reason, I am a bare spectator. If we fall, Christ will likewise fall; and, if he fall, I would rather fall with Christ than stand with the emperor."

Nothing is more prominent in Melancthon's temper than its irenic tone. He was mild by nature, and shunned contentions and divisions. His was the churchly disposition; and he retained a profound and pious respect for the Church, and found it much more painful to think of an irreconcilable separation from it than Luther did. He laid emphasis upon the authority of the church Fathers, especially Augustine. He stood nearer the Catholic Church than Luther, because he laid more stress upon external discipline and ceremonies than Luther. His love of peace, and aversion to ecclesiastical separation, led him to undertake conciliatory measures, which sometimes gave to his contemporaries the occasion for the charge of vacillation. It is in this very fact that the unionistic tendencies of our day in the churches of Germany love to strike their roots. Kahnis, in his Gedächtnissrede (1860), has said, "The spirit of mediation in the Protestant Church is the inheritance which we are to preserve as coming from Melancthon."

The literary talents and learning of Melancthon were very great. His works betray an excellent gift of observation, a healthy though not always profound judgment, fine aesthetic tastes, and a happy memory. To these gifts he added an assiduous eagerness to get knowledge, and facility in the use of his acquisitions. His style was marked by clearness, vivacity, and a simple elegance. In Latin he was a master, and even in Greek he expressed himself with more elegance than in German. Melanchthon exercised as great an influence upon the culture of the time through his academic activity as by his writings. His lectures were attended by throngs of hearers. Heerbrand says there were two thousand, and, among these, princes, counts, barons, etc. He was fitly called the Præceptor Germaniæ ("teacher of Germany").

As a theologian, Melanchthon appears not only as the theological co-reformer, but as the leader of the German Reformation. He wrote the first Protestant work of systematic theology. Melanchthon's was not an original, creative mind, but predominantly receptive. In his Loci he sought to give the theological and religious results of the Reformation, and pursued the dialectic rather than speculative method, making accurate definitions, clear divisions, etc. It was also his aim to make prominent the practical truths of the gospel in opposition to the theoretical and speculative. It was as the author of the Loci that his influence continued to be felt years after his death. In the first edition of the Loci (1521) he follows closely the Epistle to the Romans in his delineation of the fundamental doctrines of sin and grace. Twelve years intervened between the first edition of the Loci and its revision by its author in 1535. The first German translation was made by Spalatin (1522), and a second (1536) and third by Justus Jonas. He insists upon his doctrinal agreement with Luther, and does, in fact, agree with him in making all prominent the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ. But the Melanchthon of a later period differed very considerably from him. The vein of mysticism running through Luther's theology he did not draw from, but, on the other hand, emphasized the ethical elements by insisting that salvation can only be genuinely appropriated by the ethical nature, and must produce ethical fruits.

In the doctrine of the decrees, however much Melanchthon may have sympathized with Luther in his strict predestinarian views at one time, after 1527 he turned more and more away from them, and sought to make room for the free activity of the will, and regarded civil (natural) righteousness as the forecourt of spiritual (heavenly) righteousness. In the doctrine of faith he emphasizes faith, not so much as a work of God as the moral act of man; in this differing from Calvin, who treats of it principally as a grace implanted. He mentions three causes as "concurring in the work of conversion, — the Word of God, the Spirit, and the human will assenting to, and not rejecting, the Word of God." In general it may be said, that, while the type of Melanchthon's theology was essentially the same as Luther's, yet the Melanchthonian system modified, and in some points developed, Luther's system. It had a character of its own; and, emphasizing the ethical element of Christianity, it filled out Luther's fundamental idea of salvation by faith, and in its relation to Zwingli's all-efficient Providence, and Calvin's irresistible grace, presented a necessary corrective. It emphasized moral freedom, and the moral nature of man, which is alone receptive of divine grace, and must of necessity, having received it, show itself in moral actions.

In the department of ethics the influence of Melanchthon was greater and more lasting than in that of systematic theology. His three principal works in this line were, Prolegomena to Cicero's De Officiis, 1525; Enarrationes librorum Ethicorum Aristotelis, 1529, etc.; and Ethica doctrina elementa, 1550. In the last work he insists that ethics are to be "treated in the Church as well as by philosophy."

As an exegete he does not occupy the same prominent position as Luther. He assisted Luther to some extent in translating the Bible, and both the Books of the Maccabees in Luther's Bible are ascribed to him. His principal commentaries are, Genesis, Proverbs, Daniel, The Psalms, and especially those on the New Testament. — Romans (edited in 1522 against his will by Luther, then, in revised editions, 1532, 1540, 1556), Colossians (1527, revised editions, 1529, 1534, 1559), Annotations in Evangelium Johannis (1523). He lays down the principle, that every faithful theologian and interpreter of the Scriptures must be first a grammatical scholar, then a dialectician, and third a witness. He insisted upon the literal sense in contrast to the four senses of the scholastics. His commentaries, however, are not grammatical, but full of theological and practical matter, confirming the doctrines of the Reformation, and edifying believers.

Melanchthon also exerted a wide influence in the department of homiletics, and has been regarded as the author, in the Protestant Church, of the methodical style of preaching which follows a subject. He himself keeps entirely aloof from all mere dogmatizing or rhetoric in the Annotations in Evangelium (1544) and the Conciones in Evangelium Matthæi (1558), and his German sermons prepared for George of Anhalt. He never preached from the pulpit, [never having been ordained]; and his Latin sermons (postilla) were prepared for the Hungarian students at Wittenberg, who did not understand German. [By his De Rhetorica (1519) and De Officiis Concionatoris (1535), he exerted a profound influence upon the writers on rhetoric who followed him. See art. HOMILETICS.]

In the departments of philology and pedagogy Melanchthon's influence was also very great. He has been called Præceptor Germaniæ. He laid great stress upon classical studies, and, by urging the study of the classic languages and models, became the founder of the learned schools of Germany. He advocated the close and necessary conjunction of the school and the church; the school being a nursery, or forecourt, of the church. He was, in fact, the most active representative of the union of the evangelical church and the new culture. [He put forth editions of many classic authors, and published Greek and Latin grammars, which held their places in German schools for two centuries.]

Portraits still exist of Melanchthon, — by Holbein at Hanover, which is said to be the best (Woltmann: Holbein, i. 359), by Dürer (made in 1526, representing him with a large head and high forehead), and others. He was small and meagre in body, but had a bright and sparkling eye, which kept its color till the day of his death. He was never in perfectly sound health, and managed to perform as much work as he did only by reason of scrupulous care in his habits. His domestic life was happy. He called his home "a little church of God" (ecclesiola Dei), and always found there peace, and showed a tender solicitude for his wife and children [two of whom survived him,—a daughter and a son], and not infrequently was he found rocking the cradle with one hand, and holding a book in the other. In his public career he sought not honor or fame, but earnestly endeavored to serve the church and the cause of truth. Humility was one of the signal features of his character. In him we have no great, impressive personality, winning his way by massive strength of resolution and energy, but a noble personality which we cannot study without loving and respecting.

The opinions of Melancthon's character and work have undergone radical changes since his death. One would deem it incredible, if it were not well authenticated, that, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, Leonard Hutter, in a public discussion at Wittenberg at which Melancthon's authority was appealed to, tore down a picture of the Reformer, which was hanging on the wall, and in the sight of the audience trampled it under foot. For more than a hundred years after that, few voices spoke a word in his favor. In 1760 the anniversary of his death was for the first time celebrated, and from that time a different view began to gain currency. In 1860 the 300th anniversary of Melancthon's death was observed with much enthusiasm all over Germany; and, in spite of his weaknesses, he will continue to be honored for his positive and not inconsiderable contributions to the Reformation.

LIT.—Melancthon's Works were issued at Basel, 1541, 2 vols.; Wittenberg, 1562-64, 4 vols. MELCHIADES, or MILTIADES, Pope (July 2, 310-Jan. 10 or 11, 314), was an African by birth, and lies buried in the cemetery of Callisti. The edict of toleration by Galerius, the occupation of Rome by Constantine, and the edict of toleration by Constantine and Licinius, fall in his time. A letter from Constantine to him, written in Gaul in 313, is found in EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl. x. 15, 18. The decrees ascribed to him by the Liber Pontifi. and Gratian are spurious.

MELCHITES, in contradistinction to Monophysites, denoted the orthodox Christians living in those provinces of the Roman Empire which were conquered by the Arabs. The name, derived from מלך ("king"), referred to their allegiance to the Pope, that is, to the empire. They were treated with much more severity by the Arabs than were the Monophysites.

MELCHIZEDEK, the priest of the Most High God, and king of righteousness, is mentioned in Gen. xiv. 17-20, Ps. cx. 4, Heb. vii. 1-3. He met Abraham after his victory over the kings, and offered him bread and wine, and blessed him. Receiving a tithe of the spoil from Abraham, he returned again into retirement, a true representative of the higher world of peace. We shall consider here his city, his God, and his priesthood.

The Salem of which Melchizedek was king (Gen. xiv. 18) has been identified with a city called Salem, or Salumias, which Jerome states was close by Scythopolis. He further states that Melchizedek's palace was shown there (Ep. ad Evagr.). Whitby, Reland, Rosenmüller, Bleek, Alford, Ewald, and others have adopted this view, and refer to Salim (John iii. 23). It is better to identify it with Jerusalem. In Ps. lxxvi. 2, where the word occurs again as the designation of a place, it stands for Jerusalem. Its meaning, peaceful, made it an appropriate name for the city. The analogy between the names Melchizedek and Adonizek, the king of Jebus (the old name of Jerusalem) in the time of Joshua (Josh. x. 1), also favors this view. Abraham would naturally have taken the road by the city in returning to Hebron. The Targums, Josephus, Jerome, at first (Quest. in Gen.), and most of modern critics, adopt this view.

The God whom Melchizedek worshipped bore the name of El (the original divinity of the Phœnicians, Babylonians, and other Semitic peoples) and Elyon (Most High). He is the "possessor of heaven and earth." These designations indicate that Melchizedek was a monotheist, and worshipped essentially the same God as Abraham, who recognized him as a priest, and applied to Jehovah the same appellation, Most High (Gen. xiv. 22).

Melchizedek was a priest not merely by virtue of his being the head of a family, but as being a prince; all princes, according to the ancient Phœnician custom, exercising the functions of the priesthood. In him as its representative, the older and purer Canaanitish religion offered the hand to the representative of the new Hebrew religion, and acknowledged his own and his people's salvation by Abraham from perils they could not resist themselves. This foreigner, Melchizedek, subsequently became the ideal priest in the eyes of Israel (Ps. cx. 4); and the Epistle to the Hebrews finds in Christ his true antitype. Origen and Didymus regarded Melchizedek as an angel, because the Hebrews represent him as without pedigree. Hierakas regarded him as an incarnation of the Holy Spirit, and the sect of the Melchizedekites as the incarnation of a power superior to Christ (App. ad Tert. de præscrip., c. 53; Epiph., Her., 35). Another opinion held by the Targums, the most of the rabbins, Jerome, Luther, Melancthon, [Hugh Broughton, Selden, Lightfoot, Jackson], is that he was Shem, who seems, according to the biblical chronology, to have survived Abraham's entrance into Canaan a hundred and twenty-five years. Others have advocated the view that he was Ham, or Japhet, or even Enoch. (Comp. DEYLING: Observat. ii. p. 71 sqq.) Our best point of departure for ascertaining Melchizedek's nationality is the name of Adonizek. The latter was a Jebusite (Josh. x. 5, 6), and we may conclude that the former was so likewise. [See H. BROUGHTON: Treatise of Melchizedek, 1591; GAILLARD: Melchisedecus Christus, etc., 1688; BORGISIUS: Hist. Crit. Melchisedeci, 1706; JACKSON: On the Creed (book ix. § 2, ch. vi.-xi.); and the Commentaries on Gen. xiv. 18-20, and Hebrews vii.] F. W. SCHULTZ.

MELDENIUS, Rupertus, is the name of the author of the Parænesis rotica, pro pace Ecclesie, ad theologos Augustanæ Confessionis, which appeared in Germany about 1630. Of his personal life nothing is known: it is even probable that the name is fictitious. The book, which, though written from an orthodox Lutheran stand-point, maintains that practical piety is more important than purity of doctrine, contains the famous sentence, in necessariis unitas, in non necessariis libertas, in utrisque caritas ("in necessary things unity, in unnecessary things liberty, in both things charity"). This sentence has had a great effect in soothing controversy. It is a veritable watchword for the peacemakers. But whether Meldenius originated it, as Lücke maintains, is doubtful. At all events, it is found in Gregor Frank's Consideratio theologica, dated 1628; and Baxter, in 1679, quotes it as the words of the "pacificator," which would seem to point to an older and better known author than Meldenius or Frank. When Lücke wrote his book, only the reprint of Meldenius by J. G. Pfeiffer, in his Variorum auctororum miscellanea theologica (Leipzig, 1736), was known; but since, at least two copies have come to light, one of which is noticed by Lücke in Studien u. Kritiken, 1851. See F. LÜCKE: Ueber das Alter, den Verfasser, die ursprüngliche Form u. den wahren Sinn des kirchlichen Friedensspruches "In necessariis", etc., Göttingen, 1850. C. BERTHEAU.

MELETIAN SCHISM. See next two articles.

MELETIUS OF ANTIOCH and the Meletian Schism in Syria. When, in 360, Bishop Eudoxius of Antioch removed to Constantinople, as the successor of the deposed Macedonius, Meletius (who had previously been bishop of Sebaste in Armenia, but at that time lived in retirement at Beroëa in Syria) was elected bishop of Antioch on the supposition that he belonged to the Arian party. This proved a mistake, however. A sermon which he delivered shortly after his election, and which has been preserved by Epiphanius (Her. 73, 29), revealed to the congregation, that, though he was not an adherent of Athanasius in the strict sense of the word, he was decidedly antagonistic to Arianism. The discovery caused great commotion. Meletius was banished by the emperor; and Euzoius, a full-blooded Arian, was appointed bishop. Nevertheless, a large portion of the congregation, holding the same views as Meletius, remained true to him; and thus the church of Antioch became split into three parties, — the Eustathians, who, under the leadership of the deacon Paulinus, lived in a quiet and retired manner, accused of Sabellianism by the two other parties, but recognized by Athanasius as the true church; the Arians, who enjoyed the support of the court; and the Meletians, who formed a rapidly growing middle party between those two extremes. A synod of Alexandria, presided over by Athanasius, undertook in 362 to bring order into the disturbed affairs of the church of Antioch, or at least to unite all the anti-Ariians into one camp. But, before the emissaries of the synod reached Antioch, Lucifer of Calaris had consecrated Paulus bishop; and, as he was recognized by Athanasius and by Rome, the schism became fully established. Under Julian, Meletius returned to his see; and the great personal reputation he enjoyed, as well as his intimate connection with Basil and the two Gregories, gave to his party a paramount importance. A reconciliation did not seem to be altogether impossible, however. The Meletians were steadily approaching the orthodox. At a synod of Antioch in 363, presided over by Meletius himself, they formally adopted the Nicæan Creed; and the explanations with which they accompanied it seemed to be simple precautions against Sabellianism. They became still more pliant when the persecutions of Valens struck them alone, and left the Eustathians untouched as an obscure sect. Meletius went in exile a second time. But the stubbornness and arrogance of Pope Damasus frustrated all negotiations. A synod of Rome in 375 declared Paulinus to be the rightful bishop of Antioch; and another, in 377, even declared Meletius a heretic. After the death of Valens, however, Meletius once more came into possession of his see (378); and it was significant with respect to the position he occupied, that the imperial edict of 380, enforcing the Nicene Creed as the one alone valid and alone tolerated, did not in any way interfere with him; on the contrary, he was recognized as bishop of Antioch by the imperial officer Saporis. A kind of reconciliation was also brought about. Meletius and Paulinus agreed that he who lived longest should be sole bishop, that he who died first should have no successor. But, unfortunately, the agreement was not kept. Meletius died the following year, 381, in Constantinople, where he represented the church of Antioch at the council; and the Syrian bishops immediately appointed the presbyter Flavian his successor. In 388 Paulinus died; but Evagrius succeeded him, and the schism continued. Finally Chrysostom succeeded, in 398, in reconciling Flavian with Alexandria and Rome; and in 415 the successor of Flavian, Bishop Alexander, led the Eustathians back into the bosom of the church.

MELETIUS OF LYCOPOLIS and the Meletian Schism in Egypt. During the persecution of Diocletian it came to an open breach between

Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, and Meletius, Bishop of Lycopolis, a city in the province of Thebais. They held different views with respect to the re-admission of the lapsi. According to the penitential writing of Peter, which the Greek Church has incorporated with the Epistole Canonica, and which is found in Routh, Reliq. Sacr., iv. 23, he recommended mildness and forbearance; while Meletius protested that no lapsus could be re-admitted until after full penance; that an ecclesiastic who had fallen should be degraded, etc. To this difference of views may be added a feeling of jealousy: the Bishop of Alexandria having at that period begun to exercise a kind of authority over the rest of the Egyptian Church, which was vehemently opposed by the other Egyptian bishops, especially by Meletius. The dissension broke out while the two bishops were still in prison; and when Meletius, after his release, undertook to ordain presbyters and deacons outside of his own diocese, in dioceses whose bishops were in prison, and everywhere tried to enforce his views with respect to the lapsi, Peter felt utterly provoked, cancelled all his ordinations, and even deposed him from his see. The Council of Nicæa now interfered. In its famous sixth canon it formally acknowledged and established the supremacy of the Bishop of Alexandria over the Egyptian Church, thereby laying the foundation of the future patriarchate of Alexandria. But in other respects it treated Meletius and his adherents, the Meletians (or, as they called themselves, the "Church of the Martyrs"), with great mildness. His ordinations were recognized, and he himself was continued in office, though under certain restrictions. After this, every thing went on smoothly and quietly until Athanasius became bishop of Alexandria. He regretted the mildness which the Council of Nicæa had shown, and employed much harsher measures, the consequence of which was, that the Meletians formally broke off from the church, and formed an independent community of their own. In the following contest between Athanasius on the one side, and the Eusebians and Arians on the other, the latter were always supported by the Meletians; and it took a whole century before the schism was thoroughly healed.

MELITA was the site of the shipwreck of the vessel which was conveying St. Paul as a prisoner to Rome (Acts xxvii.—xxviii. 10). Two islands have had advocates as the ancient spot, — Meleda in the Adriatic; and Malta, sixty miles south of Sicily, in the Mediterranean. It is now generally agreed that the latter was the Melita on which Paul was cast. This is made almost certain by the description the Acts gives of the seas which washed up on the island, the harborage of a grain-ship, and the direction Paul took, by way of Puteoli, on leaving the island, to get to Rome. The subject is thoroughly and interestingly treated by Capt. Smith, in Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, and Dean Howson, in Smith's Bible Dictionary, "Life of St. Paul," and the International Revision Commentary on the Acts. New York, 1882.

Malta had a brilliant period as the headquarters of the Knights of St. John, and now belongs to the British crown.

MELITO OF SARDES (Sardis), the only bishop of that place mentioned in the literary monuments of the first three centuries, flourished in the middle of the second century, and acquired great fame by his activity in the church and in literature. Of his numerous works, only fragments have come down to us, collected by Routh, in his Reliquie Sacrae, i.; but both Eusebius and Jerome have given complete lists of them. Besides the celebrated Apology of Christianity as the true philosophy, which he dedicated to Marcus Aurelius, and of which fragments have been preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., iv. 26), there is ascribed to him another apology, of which a Syrian translation was discovered by Tattam in a monastery in the Nitrian desert, and edited by Cureton, in Spicil. Syr., and by Pitra-Renan, in Spicil. Solesmense; but its authorship is very doubtful. In the introduction to his commentaries he has given the first Christian list of the canon of the Old Testament: he excludes the Books of Esther and Nehemiah, and the Apocrypha. The curious notice by Origen, that he ascribed corporality to God, and found the likeness of God in the human body, is, on account of its brevity, very difficult to explain. Perhaps he, like Tertullian, considered corporality and substantiality as identical ideas, — a view which might arise very naturally as an opposition to the spiritualistic vagueness of the Gnostics. Many works have been falsely ascribed to him, as, for instance, the Clavis Melitonis, edited by Cardinal Pitra, in the Spicil. Solesmense, ii. and iii. It probably belongs to the latter part of the eleventh century. A sect of Melitonians is probably a later fiction. [For an excellent study of Melito and his writings, see HARNACK: Texte u. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Altchrist. Lit., Bd. i. (Leipzig, 1882), pp. 240-278.] STEITZ.

MELVILL, Henry, b. at Pendennis Castle, Cornwall, Eng., Sept. 14, 1800; d. in London, Feb. 9, 1871. He was graduated at St. Peter's College, Cambridge, 1821, where he was fellow and tutor; took holy orders; was minister of Camden Chapel, Camberwell, London, 1829-43; chaplain to the Tower of London, 1840; principal of the East India College, at Haileybury, 1843-59; and for nearly ten years held the Golden Lectureship, St. Margaret's Lothbury. In 1853 he was appointed one of her Majesty's chaplains; in 1856 a canon of St. Paul's; in 1863 rector of Barnes, and rural dean. He enjoyed a high reputation for pulpit oratory. His style was florid, and his delivery impassioned. Very many of his lectures and sermons have been published; e.g., Golden Lectures, from 1850 to 1856, 7 vols.; Sermons delivered in the Cathedral of St. Paul, London (1856-59), 1860; Selections from the Sermons preached during the Latter Years of his Life, 1872, 2 vols. His Lectures on Practical Subjects was reprinted in Philadelphia, 1864; and his Sermons was edited by Bishop Melvaine, New York, 1870, 2 vols.

MELVILLE, Andrew, b. at Ballovy, near Montrose, Ang. 1, 1545; d. at Sedan in 1622. He was a "sickly, tender boy." After preliminary training in Latin, Greek, and French, at Montrose, he entered St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, in 1559; and when he left St. Andrews for the University of Paris, in the autumn of 1564, he was commended as "the best philosopher, poet, and Grecian of amie young maister in the land." In Paris he studied Hebrew as well as Latin, Greek, and philosophy. Two years later he went to Poitiers to master civil law, and became a regent in the College of St. Marceon. He afterwards travelled to Geneva, where he was speedily appointed to the humanity chair. During his five-years' residence there he devoted himself chiefly to the study of theology under Beza, who, at his leaving, wrote that the greatest token of affection the church of Geneva could give, was that it had consented to be deprived of Melville, that the church of Scotland might be enriched. Having returned to Scotland, in July, 1574, he accepted the principalship of Glasgow University. He began his work in it in November, and by his incredible labors and enthusiasm drew students from all quarters; so that the class-rooms, which for some years before had been literally empty, were soon filled to overflowing.

Before Melville's return to Scotland, "Tulehan" episcopacy had been erected; and when John Dury protested in the General Assembly, in August, 1575, against the lawfulness of the bishop's office, Melville showed that prelacy was unscriptural, and should be abolished, and parity in rank and authority be restored among the ministers of the church. Five years later, the episcopal office was formally abolished by the assembly, without a dissenting voice. Melville was on all the committees employed in collecting materials for the Second Book of Discipline, took a prominent part in the discussions concerning it, and was moderator of the assembly which approved it, in April, 1578.

In December, 1580, Melville was transferred to the University of St. Andrews; installed as principal of St. Mary's College, which, by act of Parliament, had been appropriated to the study of divinity. Here, at first, he met with much opposition; but in less than two years his learning and zeal wrought a favorable change. The number of the students increased; and the cause of religion prospered, both in the city and in the university. This was only interrupted by his being called to defend the polity and liberties of the church. Despite the confession or covenant of 1581, the privy council revived the regulations recognizing episcopacy, framed at Leith in 1572; and Lennox, one of the king's unworthy favorites, got Montgomery presented to the archbishopric of Glasgow. High-handed procedure by the court was boldly met by the church, and Montgomery was excommunicated. The privy council proclaimed the excommunication null and void, ordered those who refused to pay him the episcopal rents to be imprisoned, and laid Glasgow College under a temporary interdict. In his opening sermon before a special meeting of the assembly, Melville inveighed against those who had introduced "the bludie gullie of absolute power into the country, and who sought to erect a new popedom in the person of the prince." A remonstrance was drawn up, which he and others presented to the king. In February, 1584, he was summoned before the Privy Council for seditious and treasonable preaching. Conscious of his innocence, and furnished with ample proof, he appeared, and gave account of his sermon. On the council resolving to proceed with the trial, he maintained that he ought to be tried in the first instance by the church courts. As he would neither yield to entreaties nor threats, he was found guilty of declining the judgment of the council, and was sentenced to imprisonment in Edinburgh Castle, and further punishment at the king's pleasure; but he escaped to England.

As the court wished to make James absolute by bringing every cause before the Privy Council, it was necessary to curb the church courts; and accordingly, in 1584, Parliament overthrew presbytery, and laid the liberties of the country at the king's feet. But in 1585, after twenty months' absence, Melville returned with the exiled nobles. Weary of tyranny, their countrymen flocked to their standard, Arran fled, and the king received them into favor. Melville was moderator of the assembly in June, 1587, and was one of its commissioners to the Parliament which annexed the temporal lands of bishoprics, abbeys, and priories to the crown, thus paving the way for the entire abolition of episcopacy. At the coronation of the queen, in May, 1590, he recited a Latin poem, entitled Stephaniskion, which he composed on two days' notice. Patrick Adamson, who still persevered in opposing presbytery, and attacking Melville, having fallen into poverty, addressed "elegant and plaintive verses to his Majesty," who turned a deaf ear to him; but Melville generously supported him several months, as he himself was afterwards aided, when a prisoner in the Tower of London, by Adamson's nephew and Jameson Patrick Simpson. In June, 1592, Melville's labors were crowned with success; Parliament having consented to pass an act ratifying the assemblies, synods, presbyteries, and kirk sessions of the church, and declaring them, with their jurisdiction and discipline, as agreed to by the king, and embodied in the act, to be, in all time coming, "most just, good, and godly." This settlement is still the charter of the church of Scotland's liberties.

Contrary to his promise, James persisted in restoring the popish nobles, and put the ministers on their defence by declaring that state affairs should not be introduced into their sermons, that the assembly should not convene without his command, that its acts should not be valid until ratified by him, and that church courts should not take cognizance of offences punishable by the criminal law. One minister being dealt with as an example, the others made common cause with him. Soon they were forbidden to speak against the doings of the council, the king or his progenitors, under the pain of death, and ordered to subscribe a bond, before receiving their stipends, promising to submit to the king and council when accused of seditious or treasonable doctrine. Melville and the other commissioners of assembly were ordered to leave Edinburgh, and their power was declared illegal. Determined to restore episcopacy, James, by secret and corrupt influence, secured a vantage-ground for his future plans at an assembly which Melville could not attend. It was with difficulty he carried his measures, even in a modified form, at next assembly, where Melville was present. The committee of ministers there appointed to advise with the king about church affairs was "the needle which drew in the episcopal thread." In 1597 Melville was deprived of the rectorship of St. Andrew's University, after holding it seven years. To get rid of his opposition in the church courts, all doctors or regents teaching theology or philosophy, not being pastors, were forbidden to sit in sessions, presbyteries, synods, or the assembly, under pain of deprivation and rebellion. Prelacy was soon declared the third estate of the realm; and, when the assembly met, the king would not allow it to proceed until Melville retired; and ultimately he was forced to quit the town. James protested that he did not intend to restore bishops, but only wished some of the wisest ministers, as commissioners of the kirk, to have a place in the Privy Council and Parliament to judge in their own affairs. To this the assembly by a small majority agreed. The king would not permit Melville to sit in the assembly of 1600, and, by acceding to many caveats, he induced the members to comply with his plan. When the Scotch Parliament restored the bishops to their ancient privileges, in 1606, Melville, who was sent by St. Andrew's presbytery, protested. As the bishops had as yet no spiritual power, Melville and other seven ministers were summoned to Loudon, nominally to confer with the king on church affairs, really to deprive their brethren of their aid and council in opposing the changes contemplated. The English nobles were astonished at Melville's talents and courage. On a highly ritualistic service which he had been made to witness in the Chapel Royal he wrote a Latin epigram, which one of the court spies, set to watch him, conveyed to the king. For this Melville was tried by the English Privy Council on the 30th of November, and, though he had given out no copy, was found guilty of scandalum magnatum. In April he was sent to the Tower, where for ten months he was treated with great severity. Pen, ink, and paper were taken from him; and none saw him save the person who brought his food. But his spirit was free and unbroken, and he covered the walls of his cell with verses beautifully engraved with the tongue of his shoe-buckle. By means of packed assemblies and bribery, prelacy was established in Scotland when he and other faithful men were far away. Though the Protestants of Rochelle were eager to have Melville as professor of divinity, James would not consent; but, after four years' captivity, he, at the request of Du Plessis-Mornay, allowed him to go to Sedan to share with Tilenus the professorship of divinity. There his last years were spent, the bitterness of his exile being alleviated by the kindness of some Scottish professors and students. Among these last were John Dury (afterwards famous for his efforts for union among Protestants), and perhaps Alexander Colville, destined so long to carry on his work in St. Mary's College. The contest in which he took such a prominent part, not only affected the government of the church, but also the cause of civil and religious liberty. "Scotland," says his nephew James, "never received a greater benefit at the hands of God than this man." "If," says Dr. McCrie, "the love of pure religion, rational liberty, and polite letters, forms the basis of national virtue and happiness, I know no individual, after her Reformer, from whom Scotland has received greater benefits, and to whom she owes a deeper debt of gratitude and respect, than Andrew Melville." He was full of spirits, vigorous and courageous, quick-tempered but kindly, of great and varied learning, but more of a scholar than a popular orator. His chief work was in the universities and church courts, rather than in the pulpit; and that, perhaps, was the reason why, with all his influence among his brethren, he never gained such sway over the nobles and people as Knox and Henderson attained. The hard measure meted out to him by King James was one of the greatest blots on his reign.

MEN OF UNDERSTANDING (Homines Intelligentiæ), a sect, which, about 1411, sprang up in Flanders, and was most numerous around Brussels. Its founders were Giles the Singer (cantor) and a Carmelite monk, William of Hildesheim (Hildeinssen). The former was illiterate, and, carried away by his fanaticism, proclaimed himself a savior of men, as Christ was. In general, the sect was related to the earlier Brethren of the Free Spirit (see art.). It maintained that the Church "was under the rule of the Holy Spirit; that these latter days were a time of higher illumination than any which had preceded, so that the Scriptures were practically superseded; that the only resurrection of the body which would ever take place had taken place already in that of Christ; that the spirit is not defiled by bodily sin; that the punishments of hell are not eternal; and that even the evil angels would be eventually saved." MENÆA, or MENAION, corresponds, in the Greek Church, to the breviary of the Roman Church, containing for each feast and holiday of the year the appointed prayers and hymns, together with short lives of saints and martyrs. There are large editions, — a volume for every month, and smaller ones (two volumes) for each half-year. Manuscript copies are very frequent; of the printed editions the most magnificent is that of Venice, 1628-45. GASS.

MENAHEM (comforter), king of Israel for ten years, 771-760 B.C. usual chronology, or 769-759 according to Ewald (2 Kings xv. 11-20). He came to the throne by his murder of Shallum, who was king for only one month. Under Menahem, Israel's affairs became desperate, as Hosea (in chaps. iv.-xiv.), Isaiah (ix. 10 sqq.), and Zechariah (x. 10, xi. 1-10) abundantly prove. It was then that the first invasion of Assyrians took place. Pul (Tiglath-pileser) the invader was, however, bought off by 1,000 talents of silver (about $1,612,000). With this biblical statement tallies the Assyrian inscriptions which speak of Menahem (or, as they call him, Minhimmi Samirinai) as tributary to Tiglath-pileser. Menahem's reign opened with an act of awful cruelty, — the massacre of the Tiphites, because they did not at once yield to his usurped authority,—ran its course of imbecility and idolatry, but ended peacefully; and Pekahiah his son reigned in his stead. RÛRTSCH.

MENANDER, one of the oldest Gnostics, was, according to Justin (Apolog., i. 26), born at Capparataia, a village in Samaria, and taught in Antioch. According to Irenæus (Oper., i. 17, edit. Harvey), he was a pupil of Simon Magus, and the teacher of Saturninus, Saturvilus, and Basilides, thus forming the transition from the Oriental to the Hellenistic Gnosticism. G. ULLHORN.

MENDÆANS (properly Mandæans), or CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN, are an Eastern religious sect, who appear to retain some New-Testament features, tainted, however, with Jewish, and even Parsic, elements. They derive their name from Mandâ ("gnosis"): hence Mandâyê ("gnostics"). But the Mandâ is not the "gnosis" in the abstract, but is a kind of a personified and hypostatized male æon, which as the Mandâ d'hayyê, or "spirit of life," represents the Mendæan mediator and saviour. In public they call themselves Subbâ, i.e., "Baptists," and allow themselves to be regarded by the Mohammedans as the Sabæans mentioned in the Koran. They reside about the cities of Wâsit and Basra, and in Chûzistân (the ancient Susiana), on the eastern shore of the Tigris. On account of their veneration of John the Baptist, they were also called "Christians of St. John."

The first knowledge of these Christians of St. John was brought to Europe by the Carmelite missionary, Ignatius a Jesu, of the seventeenth century, then by the Maronite Abraham Echelensis, Pietro della Valle, and others. But our knowledge as to their religious tenets is best derived from their own literature, which is very rich.

Sacred Books.—(1) The most important is the Sidrâ rabbâ ("the Great Book"), also called ginza, i.e., "treasure." It is divided into two parts,—into the yaminah, i.e., "the right;" and the s'mala, i.e., "the left." The first, forming about two-thirds of the whole, is written for the living; the other, for the dead, and contains especially prayers, etc., to be read by the priests at funerals. The last section of the larger portion is also called Book of the King. The whole was published by Norberg (Codex Nasaralus, liber Adami appellatus, 5 vols., Londini Gothorum, 1815-17) and by Petermann (Thesaurus sive Liber magnus, 2 vols., Berlin, 1867). (2) The next work of importance is the Sidrâ d'Yahyâ ("Book of John"), also called d'râsê d'malkê ("Lectures of the Kings"), of which only fragments were published by Lorsbach, in Museum für biblische und orientalische Literatur (Marburg, 1807, pp. 3-71). (3) The Qolasta, a collection of hymns and doctrinal pieces concerning baptism and the "ascension" of the soul after death: hence it is also called Sidrâ di nismata ("Book of Souls"), in a hundred and three sections, published by Euting, Stuttgart, 1867. Besides, it also contains a liturgy and prayers to be used at sacrifices and marriages. (4) Divân, a kind of ritual, unpublished. (5) Asfar Malwâsê, on astrology. Aside from these, they have formulas for all kinds of sorcery, and amulets for sickness and other misfortunes which evil spirits may bring. These charms are worn on the breast.

Religious System.—At the beginning of all things they place the Pirâ rabbâ ("the great glory, or splendor"), comprehending every thing, and only finite in itself. With the Pirâ rabbâ are connected the Ayar zivâ rabbâ ("the ether of great brilliancy") and the Mânâ rabbâ d'ekârâ ("the great spirit of glory"), commonly called Mânâ rabbâ. From it emanates the Yardnâ rabbâ, or "the great Jordan." Side by side with Mânâ rabbâ, sometimes Dmûthâ, i.e., "image," is mentioned as female potency. Mânâ rabbâ called forth "the first life," and then went into the most absolute retirement, visible only to the purest emanations and the most pious among the Mendæans, who, after their death, are permitted, but only once, to contemplate the Almighty. As the revealed, active, and governing deity, stands the Chayê Kadmâyê ("the first life"): hence it is to be adored alone, because Mânâ rabbâ is above all adoration. The "first life" is to be invoked first at prayers, and with his name every book begins. Like the Mânâ rabbâ, the "first life" dwells in the pure, brilliant ether, which is inhabited by numberless Uthrê, or "splendors." God is therefore called "father of all Uthrê" (iii. 12), who is surrounded by angels and messengers and other glories. From the "first life" emanated the Chayê Thinganê, also Yûsamîn, or "second life;" and then the Mandâ d'hayyê ("spirit of life"), the mediator and saviour of the Mendæans, their Christ, after whom they called themselves "Mendæans." The "second life" attempted to usurp the place of the "first life," and was on that account exiled from the pure ether into the world of light, being separated from it by the Hephikey mayê, i.e., "water-canals." But the "spirit of life" remains with the "first life," or rather the Mânâ rabbâ, whose "beloved son" he is styled, also "good shepherd," "high priest," "word of life." He revealed himself, however, to humanity in his three sons, who are also called his brothers,—Hibil, Sitil, and Anûs (Abel, Seth, and Enoch). In another place it is said that Hibil alone is his son, Sitil his grandson, and Anûs his great-grandson. Hibil, the most important among them, is almost equally venerated with the Mandâ de-Chayê, receives the same names, and is often confounded with him. If Mandâ is the Christ, Hibil is the Jesus Christ, of the Mendæans. Among the Uthrê ("angels") who emanated from "the second life," is the Hayyê l'litâyê ("the third life"), the first and most prominent of the Uthrê, often also called Abâtûr, i.e., "father of the Uthrê," or "the Ancient," "the hidden one," "the watchman." He sits at the limit of the world of light, where the door leads to the middle and lower regions, and, in a scale which he holds in his hand, he weighs the deeds of the departed as they appear before him to be admitted. Under him there was at the beginning an immense void, and at the bottom of it the troubled, black water, mayyê s'yâwê. As he looked down, and saw his image reflected in it, arose P'tâhîl, who is also called Gabriel, the son of Abatur, who retains in part the nature of the dark water from which he proceeded. He receives from his father the mission to build the earth and to create man. This he does, according to some, alone; according to others, with the aid of demons. When he created Adam and Eve, he found himself unable to give them an upright posture, because the spirit was not in him. Hibil, Sital, and Anûs then interfered, and obtained from Mânâ rabbâ the spirit, and infused it into man, that he might not worship P'tâhil as his creator. Hibil Zivâ then instructs Adam and Eve concerning the "great king of light" (i. 13, 18 sq.), and commands the first men, "Take unto yourselves wives, and fill the earth; but after cohabitation wash and cleanse yourselves" (i. 14, 3 sq.). P'tâhil is then exiled from the world of light by his father Abatur, because he had lost his power over the first man, and consigned to a place below, where he is to remain until the day of judgment. He will then be raised up by Hibil Zivâ, be baptized, made king of the Uthrê, and will be worshipped.

The nether world consists of four entrances into hell, and three hells. Each of the entrances is governed by a king and queen. Then only comes the real kingdom of darkness, divided into three stories, governed by three old single kings. — S'dâm, "the warrior," grandson of darkness; Giv, "the Greek;" and Krân, or Karkâm, the oldest and mightiest of all, the Sûrâ rabbâ d'besrâ, i. e., the "great mountain of flesh," and "first-born of darkness." In the entrances to hell there is yet dirty, slimy water: in the real hell there is none; and Krân's kingdom consists only of ashes, dust, and vacancy. In hell and its entrance there is no longer any brilliancy in fire, but only a consuming power. Hibil Zivâ, or Mandâ d'hayyê, sustained by the power of Mânâ rabbâ, descended into it, unravelled the mysteries of the lower regions, took all power from their kings, and closed the door of the different worlds. By subterfuge he brought out Rûchâ, daughter of Kîn, the queen of darkness, and prevented her return to the nether world.

Rûchâ is the mother of Ur, i. e., fire, or destroyer, the worst of all devils. When, in his zeal, Ur sought to storm the world of lights, Hibil Zivâ threw him into the black waters, bound, and surrounded with seven iron and seven golden walls. While P'tâhil was occupied in the creation of the world and of man, Rûchâ bore first seven, then twelve, and again five, sons to Ur. These twenty-four sons were by P'tâhil transplanted into the heavens. The first seven are the seven planets, one for each of the seven heavens; the twelve became the signs of the zodiac; the remaining five have not yet been interpreted. The sun, as the greatest of the planets, stands in the central or fourth heaven. The planets are intended to be serviceable to man, but only seek to injure him, and are the source of all evil and wrong upon earth. The seven planets have their Mattârâthâ, or stations, where they return always, after accomplishing their course in the heavens. They, like the earth, and another world situated in its neighborhood, to the north, rest on anvils which Hibil Zivâ placed on the belly of Ur. The heavens the Mendæans consider as built of the purest, clearest water, but so solid that even diamond will not cut it. On this water the planets and other stars are sailing: they are of themselves dark, being evil demons, but are illuminated by brilliant lights carried by the angels. The clearness of the sky enables us to see through the seven heavens as far as the polar star, around which, as the central sun, all the other stars are revolving. Towards it, as to their Kûbla, the Mendæans turn their face at prayer. The earth they regard as a circle, inclining somewhat to the south, and surrounded on the three sides by the sea. On the north is a great mountain of turquoise, whose reflection causes the sky to appear blue. On the other side of that mountain is the world of the blessed, a kind of lower paradise, where the Egyptians reside who did not perish at the Red Sea. They are regarded as the ancestors of the Mendæans, since Pharaoh had been high priest and king of the Mendæans. Both worlds are surrounded by the Yammâ rabbâ d'sûf, i. e., the outer sea.

Man consists of three parts, — the body, or pagrà; the animal soul, or rûcha; and the heavenly soul, or n's'emâtâ.

They consider the earth as four hundred and eighty thousand years old, divided into seven epochs, each of which is governed by a planet. According to the Sidrâ rabbâ, the human race has been three times destroyed by water, fire, sword, pestilence; only one couple remaining alive after each time. At the time of Noah (Nû), the world was four hundred and sixty-six thousand years old. After him rose many false prophets. The first prophet was Abrahîm, who came six thousand years after Noah, when the sun came to reign over the world. Then came Mishû (Moses): in his time the Egyptians had the true religion. After him came Shlônûn (Solomon) bar Davith, to whom the demons yielded obedience. The third false prophet is Yishu Mshîha, a sorcerer. Forty-two years before him lived, under the king Pontius Pilate, the only true prophet, Yahyâ, or Yûhânâ bar Z'karyâ, whose mother was Enishbai (Elizabeth); Yahyâ, being deceived by the Messiah, baptized him. He is the incarnation of Hibil Zivâ, who already preached repentance in the time of Nû. With the Messiah and John the Baptist lived Anûs Uthra, a younger brother of Hibil Zivâ, who had descended from heaven, was baptized by Yahyâ, wrought miracles, healed the sick, raised the dead, and was the cause of the crucifixion of the false Messiah. He then proclaimed the true religion; and, before his return to the world of lights, he sent three hundred and sixty prophets into the world to proclaim his teaching. Jerusalem, which was once built at the command of Adnuay, and which the Mendæans call Urashlam, i. e., the devil Ur has completed, was destroyed by Anûs, while the Jews were dispersed into all the world, having killed John the Baptist. The last of the false prophets was Mhamad, or Ahmat bar Bishat. There will be none after him. After four thousand or five thousand years, mankind will again be destroyed by a terrific storm; but the earth will be again re-peopled by a man and a woman from the upper world, whose descendants shall dwell on earth for fifty thousand years in piety and virtue. Then will Ur destroy the earth and the other medium worlds; and, being burst in pieces, will fall down into the abyss of darkness, to be annihilated there with all worlds and powers of darkness. Then the universe will become a realm of light, enduring forever.

Ethics. — Ethical sentences from the Sûtra d'Yahyâ were given by Lorschach l. c.

Hierarchy. — There are three different degrees in the priesthood among the Mendæans: (1)

Sh'kandâ, or deacon, to which office he is ordained at the age of nineteen: having served for one year as deacon, he becomes (2) Turmîdâ, or priest, presbyter, by the ordination performed through a bishop, with the assistance of two priests. The highest degree is that of (3) Ganziorâ, i.e., "treasurer," corresponding to our "bishop." Besides these three degrees, there is yet another ecclesiastical dignity similar to that of patriarch or pope, that of the Rîsh amnâ, who is both the civil and ecclesiastical authority. Women are also allowed to become members of the clergy: they must be virgins at their entrance into the diocese. In order to be raised to the dignity of Turmîdâ, they must at once marry a priest of that order, or of a higher. In no case the woman can have a higher title than her husband. The official dress of the priests is pure white. During divine service they wear on the right fore-arm the tûgâ, or crown. On the little finger of the right hand the priests wear a gilt, and the bishops a golden, seal-ring, bearing the inscription, sâm jâvâr zivâ, i.e., the name of Yâvâr Zivâ, i.e., the victorious Hîbil Zivâ: in the left hand they carry an olive-branch. They must always be barefooted in exercising their functions.

Rites.—The most important of all religious ceremonies is the masbatha, or baptism, by which they receive children into the communion of Subbâ. A second baptism is performed on sundry occasions, and a third during the five days of the festival of baptism. Besides baptism, they have also a Pehîâ, i.e., a kind of Lord's Supper. To assure an entrance into the upper world in case of a sudden death, the bishop reads betimes, for such a desire, the masakta, a kind of mass for the departed.

Churches, or ma'skenâ, are only for the use of the priests and their assistants; the laymen remaining in the entry. The churches are so small that only a few persons can stand in them. They are built in the vicinity of a flowing water, to be used for baptism. When a church is dedicated, the priests offer up a dove.

Sacred Seasons.—Besides Sunday, they celebrate, (1) The Nawrûz rabbâ, or New-Year's Day, at the beginning of the first month of the winter; (2) Dehwâ k'nînâ, or Ascension Day, in commemoration of the return of Hîbil Zivâ into his realm of light; (3) Marwânâ, in honor of the Egyptians who perished in the Red Sea; (4) Pantshu, i.e., the five days of baptism, during which time all Mendæans, male and female, must bathe themselves three times every day in the river, and must wear purely white dresses; (5) Dehwâ d'daimânâ, in honor of one of the three hundred and sixty Uhrâs; and (6) Kanshê zahtâ, or the last day of the year. Besides, they have some n'battal, or fast-days.

Calendar.—The Mendæan year is a solar year of three hundred and sixty-five days, divided into twelve months of thirty days each.

Polygamy is advised in the Great Book, but at present most of them have only two wives.

Number.—In the seventeenth century the Mendæans still numbered about twenty thousand families: at present their number is very small. They are located on the Euphrates and Tigris, south of Bagdad, and in various cities of Chuzistân, where they carry on the trades of jewellers, blacksmiths, carpenters, etc. They do not outwardly distinguish themselves from the Mohammedans among whom they live.

The Sacred Language of the Mendæans is an Aramaic dialect very much akin to the language of the Babylonian Talmud.

Origin and Home of Mendæism.—Mendæism originated in Babylonia, and is descended from the religion of the ancient Babylonians. They are not descendants of the disciples of John the Baptist, though they often speak in their writings of John and of the Jordan. Manichaism is nearest akin with Mendæism.

K. KESSLER.

MENDELSSOHN, Moses, b. at Dessau, Sept. 6, 1729; d. Jan. 4, 1786; descended from a poor Jewish family, and studied the Bible, the Talmud, Maimonides, and afterwards modern languages and literatures, under great privations. In 1750 he became tutor in the family of a rich Jewish manufacturer in Berlin, and in 1754 book-keeper in the firm. From about the same time date his intimate acquaintance with Lessing, Nicolai, Abbt, etc., and the beginning of his long and varied literary activity. His Phädon, oder über die Unsterblichkeit der Seele (1767), and Morgenstunden (1787), lectures on the existence of God and immortality, procured for him a great name as a philosopher, and were translated into several foreign languages. But his ideas as well as his method are now utterly antiquated. More interest have his controversies with Lavater, who wanted to convert him to Christianity, but completely failed, and with Jacobi, who had accused Lessing of Spinozism. Of lasting merit were his efforts for the elevation, mental and moral, of his co-religionists in Germany, and especially in Berlin. The most complete edition of his works is that by his grandson, Leipzig, 1813-15, 7 vols. His life was written by Samuels, London, 1822, and by Kaysersling, Berlin, 1862; and his German writings upon philosophy, aesthetics, and apologetics, were edited by Braseh, Leipzig, 1880, 2 vols.

MENDICANT ORDERS, or BECCING FRIARS, is the general designation of those monastic orders, which, at least for a time, took their vow of poverty in earnest, and actually existed on the alms they received. They were four,—the Franciscans, Dominicans, Carmelites, and Augustinian Hermits; but the history of those four orders and their branches shows how soon their poverty became a mere deception, and their beggary a base means of amassing wealth.

ME'NI, the name of a divinity, probably Babylonian, and therefore Shemitic, mentioned once in the Bible (Isa. lxx. 11 [margin of the Authorized Version: the text has "number"]). The identification of it with the Greek moon-god, Mην, or goddess, Μηνη, has no other basis than similarity of sound. Better it is to refer to Manu, "the great, the reverser of fate," mentioned by Lenormant among the dii minores of Babylon. Almost certainly Mani is the same as Manat, the name of an idol worshipped by the pre-Mohammedan Arabs. Its juxtaposition to Gad in Isa. lxx. 11, margin, has led to the happy conjecture that it was a god of evil fortune, and therefore to be adored with propitiatory sacrifices. See SCHRAEDER, s. v., in Riehm. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

MENIUS, Justus, b. at Fulda, Dec. 13, 1499; d. at Leipzig, Aug. 11, 1558. After studying for several years at Erfurt under Mutianus, Eoban Hess, Crotus Rubianus, and other humanists, he went in 1519 to Wittenberg, where he joined Luther and Melancthon. In 1523 he was appointed pastor of Mühlberg near Gotha, in 1525 pastor of the Church of St. Thomas in Erfurt, in 1529 superintendent of Eisenach, in 1546 superintendent of Gotha, and in 1556 pastor of the Church of St. Thomas in Leipzig. He was very active in spreading and consolidating the Reformation in Thuringia, watched with special care over the Anabaptists, and wrote against them Der Widertäufer Lehre und Geheimniss widerlegt, 1530, and Vom Geist der Widertäufer, 1544, which won the great favor of Luther. He also published a somewhat modified edition of Luther's Small Catechism, which continued in use down to the present century. The latter part of his life was much troubled, however, by his controversies with Amsdorf and Flacius. See his life by G. L. Schmidt, Gotha, 1867, 2 vols., which catalogues his writings. OSWALD SCHMIDT.

MENKEN, Gottfried, b. at Bremen, May 29, 1768; d. there June 1, 1831. The first religious impressions he received from the works of Jacob Böhme; and consequently, when in 1788 he entered the university of Jena, he felt almost disgusted at the flat rationalism there prevailing. In 1790 he went to Duisburg; and there he felt somewhat more at home, especially on account of his intercourse with some pietist families. It was, however, neither pietism nor mysticism which became the informing power in his character, but a kind of evangelicalism which developed from his friendship with Hasenkampf and Kollenbusch, and which brought him in decided opposition, not only to philosophy (he called Kant one of the most pernicious men living) and theology (he said even of Lavater and Jung-Stilling, that they had sacrificed to Satan), but also to the abstract infatuations of the mystics and the self-sufficiency and self-complacency of the pietists. In 1793 he published his Beitrag zur Dämonologie, against Professor Grimm of Duisburg, and was appointed assistant pastor at Uedem near Cleve; and in 1794 he removed, to a similar position, to Francfort, where he published his Glück und Sieg der Gottlosen against the French demagogues. In 1796 he was appointed pastor at Wetzlar, and in 1802 pastor in his native city of Bremen. In both places he produced a deep impression, and exercised a wide influence by his preaching; and to this latter period of his life belong also his principal writings (Betrachtungen über das Evangelium Matthäi, vol. i., 1809, vol. ii., 1822, Blicke in das Leben des Apostels Paulus), and several collections of sermons. A collected edition of his works appeared at Bremen, 1860, in 7 vols. His life was written by C. H. GILDEMEISTER, Bremen, 1861, 2 vols.; see also A. RITSCHL: Geschichte d. Pietismus, Bonn, 1880. PII. E. HAENCHEN.

MENNAS was appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 536 by the Emperor Justinian, instead of the Monophysite Antimus, and was the first Eastern patriarch who was consecrated by a Roman pope. But this cordial relation proved fatal to the patriarch. When the Three-Chapter controversy broke out, he sided with the emperor, and the Pope consequently deposed him. Mennas submitted, however, and died shortly after, 552.

MENNO SIMONS, b. at Witmarsum, a village in Friesland, 1492; d. at Oldeslohe in Holstein, Jan. 13, 1559. The dates often met with in German works on the subject (1505-61), and those often met with in Dutch works (1496-1561), are mistakes due to the anonymous bungler, who in 1619 published the Uitgang en bekeering van Menno Simons. In 1515 or 1516 Menno was ordained and priest, appointed vicar or subpastor at Pingjum, near Witmarsum. He entertained, even at that time, grave doubts with respect to the dogma of transubstantiation; but for a time he tried to drive them away as temptations of the devil. He finally sought refuge with the Bible, which he had hitherto shunned as a dangerous seducer; and the effect of his study was, that he very soon acquired the fame of being an evangelical preacher. In 1531 he was removed as pastor to Witmarsum. In that year the burning at the stake of Sicke Freerks, for holding Anabaptist views, made a great sensation, and led Menno into investigations which resulted in the firm conviction that neither the New Testament nor the writings of Luther, Butzer, and Bullinger, gave sufficient evidence of the validity of infant baptism. Many were led by his preaching to leave the Roman-Catholic Church: he himself, however, still remained in his office as priest; and when, in 1534, Jan Matthijszoon's book, Van der urake, was spread over all Friesland, Menno wrote against it, — Bewijs uit de II. Schriften dat J. C. is de rechte beloofde David, etc. Nevertheless, in 1535 a swarm of fanatic Anabaptists forcibly took possession of the monastery Blomkamp, and it came to a bloody encounter with the Frisian governor, in which most of the enthusiasts, and among them Menno's own brother, were killed. Jan. 12, 1536, Menno resigned his office, left the Roman-Catholic Church, and began to preach secretly to the brethren who gathered around him, though not so secretly that the Inquisition did not notice it.

In August, 1536, delegates from various Anabaptist congregations assembled at Bockholt in Westphalia. All parties present agreed with respect to the questions of infant baptism, the Lord's Supper, the incarnation of Christ, free-will and grace, etc.; but great dissension prevailed concerning the questions of marriage and the kingdom of heaven. Those from Münster and Batenburg defended polygamy; while the Melchiorites and Obbenites condemned it as adultery, and even demanded divorce if one of the married couple did not belong to the brethren. Again: the Obbenites held that no other kingdom of heaven was to be expected on earth than that which already existed under the form of persecution and suffering to all the faithful; while the Melchiorites hoped that an entirely new state of affairs would soon be established by a new descent of the Holy Ghost, accompanied by new prophets and apostles with many wonders and miracles; and those from Munster and Batenburg even went so far as to declare that this new state of affairs must be and should be introduced by force of arms. David Joris understood how to avail himself of the discord: in December he had his first visions. The Obbenites tried to resist the general fermentation, and sent six or eight representatives to Menno to induce him to assume the office of "elder" among them. After much hesitation he consented; and he became a blessing to the brethren. Pious and conscientious himself, he demanded the strictest morals in the congregations; and with powerful hand he kept down any outburst of enthusiasm or fanaticism. From 1537 to 1541 he resided in Groningen; but, when a price was put on his head, he removed first to Amsterdam, then to various places in North Holland, and finally settled at Emden in East Friesland, in 1543, whither he had been invited by John a Lasco in order to hold a public disputation with him on the various Anabaptist issues.

Menno was not an original genius. His doctrinal system was completely borrowed from the brethren. But he was eminently clear (the charge of obscurity is entirely due to the circumstance that he wrote many of his tracts in "Oostersch," a Low-German dialect, from which they afterwards were translated into Dutch in a very bungling way), and his ideas always clothed themselves in a simple and impressive form. Nor was he a great and imposing character. He was often hesitating, not so much from weakness, though, as from humility. But, when the decision was taken, he was firm and persevering. By his frequent and searching visitations he exercised great influence. From Emden he was compelled to move in 1545, as Charles the Fifth peremptorily demanded the Anabaptists expelled from Friesland. He found a temporary refuge at Cologne, but settled finally, in 1546, at Oldeslohe. There he gathered a number of brethren, and established a printing-press; but most of his time he spent in travelling from one congregation to another, making visitations. By his literary activity he also exercised great influence. Besides a number of devotional tracts and apologetical and polemical treatises, he published the Fondamentboek, 1539 (in which he expounded his views of grace, conversion, faith, baptism, etc., and warned against the "perverse sects," the "Davidjorists," and other uproarious Anabaptists) and the Klare beantwoording over eene Schrift van Gellius Faber, 1556, an apology of his whole doctrinal system. The first collected edition of his works appeared in 1562, and was translated into High German in 1575. A more complete edition, under the title of Sommarie, appeared in 1601 in two volumes, one still more complete, under the title Opera Menno Simons, also called the Groot Sommarie, in folio, in 1616, and the latest and best, 1681. But there lacks a satisfactory edition.

LIT.—The best information on his life is found in his own notes accompanying his apology against Gellius Faber; in The Confessions of Obbe Philip; in NIK. MEINDERTS VAN BLESDYK: Vita Davidis Georgii. Biographies by F. G. KITTNER (in Latin, Leipzig, 1696), A. M. CRAMER (in Dutch, 1837), C. HARDER (1816), B. C. ROOSEX (in German, 1848), and N. BROWNE (in English, Philadelphia, 1853). Cramer's is by far the best one. DE HOOP SCHEFFER.

MENNONITES is the name of those evangelical Christians, who with respect to constitution, discipline, baptism, oath, military service, etc., agree with Menno Simons, after whom they are named. In the Netherlands they are now called "Doopsgezinde." But the views the Mennonites hold originated in Switzerland. At present they have congregations in Germany, France, Switzerland, Russia, and North America.

In 1525 Grebel and Manz, who were members of Zwingli's congregation, but felt dissatisfied with what they considered his lack of consistency, formed an independent congregation in Zurich, in which baptism was administered only after confession. See E. EGLI: Die Züricher Wiedertäufer, 1878. Though they designated infant baptism as a most horrible invention of the Devil and the Pope, they generally laid less stress on doctrines than on practice. They banished from their worship all features not found in the apostolical church; they rejected a paid clergy, tithes, the holding of civil offices, the use of the sword, the oath, etc.; they wanted to re-introduce into the community the apostolical ban, community of property, etc. It is possible that they inherited several of those views from earlier mediæval sects, as, for instance, the Waldenses (see J. MEHRING: Der heiligen Tauff Historie, 1647); but there is no proof. Very soon, fanaticism developed among them; and the wild extravagances of Thomas Münzer and Carlstadt gave the civil authorities a welcome occasion to employ harsh measures also against the peaceful and harmless. Persecution was instituted, and continued throughout the whole sixteenth century: in the beginning of the seventeenth it reached its culmination. In 1635 the magistrate of Zürich undertook to compel the Mennonites by force to enter the Reformed Church. They were thrown into prison, and their property was confiscated. Schaffhausen, Bern, and Basel joined hand with Zürich, and great cruelties were perpetrated. Bern sold a number of its Mennonites as slaves to the king of Sardinia, who used them on his galleys. In the course of about seventy years, all Mennonites were expelled from Zürich, Schaffhausen, and St. Gall. In Basel, Bern, and Neufchatel they lived on in concealment until the persecution stopped (about 1710). During the persecution, however, a split took place among them; and they were divided into two fractions,—Obere- and Untere-Mennonites. The former followed the elder, Jakob Amman, who demanded a most rigorous exercise of the ban, and utterly repudiated the use of buttons and the practice of shaving; the latter followed the elder, Hans Reist, who held milder views with respect to the ban, and considered the buttons and the beard as adiaphora.

The German Mennonites live in Alsace (especially in the Vosges).—thirteen congregations in the Bavarian Palatinate; eleven in Baden; in Wurtemberg, Bavaria, Hesse, Nassau; in Neu-wied, Crefeld, Cleve, Goch, and Emmerich in the valley of the Lower Rhine; three congregations in East Friesland; seventeen in Lithuania; six in Poland; one in Galicia; in Hamburg, Danzig, Elbing, and Königsberg. See ALFR. MICHELS: Les anabaptistes dans les Vosges; HUNZINGER: Religions-, Kirchen-, und Schulwesen der Mennoniten in Baden, 1830; GRÜNEISEN: Mennoniten in Württemberg, 1817; WINTER: Geschichte der bairischen Wiedertäufer, 1819; WOLNY: Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren, 1850. — The French Mennonites have congregations in Nancy, Toul, and Franche-Comté. — The Russian Mennonites, numbering about 20,000 souls, and settled in about 50 colonies in the circles of Chortitz, Molotshna, Mariapol, and Samara, are all of German descent. On the invitation of Catherine II. they emigrated to Russia, mostly from Lithuania, and founded a number of flourishing agricultural colonies, especially in the Crimea. But an edict of June 4, 1871, bereft them of their exemption from military service, giving them, however, a term of ten years in which to arrange their affairs; and in 1873 no less than thirty families emigrated to the United States, followed in the next years by a considerably larger number. See D. VON SCHLATER: Reisen nach dem südlichen Russland; and A. PETZOLDT: Reise im westl. und südl. Russland. — The American Mennonites number about 200,000 souls, of whom 150,000 are settled in the United States, and 25,000 in Canada. Driven away by the persecutions in Switzerland and the devastation of the Palatinate, and allured by the promise of perfect religious freedom which William Penn held out to them, the Mennonites very early began to emigrate to America. They founded their first settlement at Germantown, near Philadelphia, in 1683. In America they retained the distinction between Obere and Untere Mennonites. The latter, by far the largest division, is generally known under the name of Old Mennonites, and has again sent forth the following branches: Reformed Mennonites, or Herrians (that is, followers of Johann Herr), 1811; New Mennonites, 1817, who in 1872 founded a theological seminary at Wadsworth; and Evangelical Mennonites, 1856. [For further information, see TUNKERS.] — This frequent branching-off into minor individual divisions must not be considered a token of a specially rapid development. Wherever the Mennonites have settled, they have distinguished themselves by the simplicity of their habits and the honesty of all their dealings. But, looking down upon all knowledge as merely secular and profane wisdom, they consider theology not only as something superfluous, but even as something pernicious. Consequently they stand to-day where they stood in the sixteenth century, and doctrinal development is entirely out of the question. See HOEKSTRA: Beginselen en leer der oude Doopsgezinde.

In the Netherlands the brotherhood found in Menno Simons so able a defender of their views (1537), that he naturally became their leader, and they adopted his name. Nevertheless, as the fundamental principle of their organization was the independent congregation, and no other relation than that of simple brotherhood existed between the various congregations, great differences could not fail to arise. It was in the Netherlands, as in Switzerland, the question of the ban which produced the first and the most radical split. At the convention of Wismar (1554), one fraction of the brotherhood adopted the ban in its most rigorous form, declaring, that, according to Matt. xviii. 17 and I Cor. v. 11, excommunication dissolved every relation of human life, even that between husband and wife and that between parents and children; while another fraction, called Waterlanders, from their location in the province of North Holland, held that excommunication affected no other relation but that to the church. The rigorous party was again divided into Vlamingen and Frisians; the Vlamingen, into Old Vlamingen and Contrahuiskopers; and the Frisians, into Hard and Soft Frisians. But the necessity of drawing up confessions (the Concept of Cologne, 1591; that of thirty-three articles printed in the Book of Martyrs, 1617; the Bekentnis vom Ölzweig, 1627; that of Jan Cents, 1630; and that of Adrian Corneliszoon, 1632) once more united the whole party; and they retained the name of "Mennonites." Quite otherwise with the Waterlanders. Their milder views, and their aversion to all doctrinal controversies, drew them nearer to the State Church. They dropped the name of Mennonites, and called themselves simply Doopsgezinden. After the cessation of persecution, in 1581, they were not only tolerated, but even protected by the State; and in 1672 they were formally recognized. They generally chose their preachers among their learned men, — physicians and lawyers; but in 1735 they founded at Amsterdam a theological seminary, which in 1811 was considerably extended, and is now in a flourishing condition. About 1700, their number was 160,000; but at the beginning of the present century it had decreased to 30,000. At present there are 127 congregations, consisting of 47,000 members, and settled principally in the provinces of North Holland and Friesland. See TUNKERS.

MENOLOGION, in the Greek Church, corresponds to the Calendarium and Martyrologium of the Latin Church, and contains a complete list of all the festivals celebrated throughout the year in honor of the saints and martyrs, together with short notices of the life and death of the person in question, etc. See the art. MENAION, and ALLATIUS: De libris Græcorum, 83–86. MENOT, Michel, d. 1518; a French monk of the order of the Cordeliers; lived during the reigns of Louis XI., Charles VIII., Louis XII., and Francis I.; taught theology in one of the establishments of his order in Paris, and acquired a kind of celebrity as a preacher, his sermons offering the most extreme instances of the style called "Macaronic;" Latin and French, serious thoughts, and open indecencies, etc., being mixed with each other. Four volumes of his sermons have been printed. The most characteristic is that entitled Sermones quadragesimales Paris, 1519.

MENSES PAPALES (papal months) denotes the right of the Pope to dispose of those benefices which become vacant during certain months. The term, however, is not synonymous with alternativa mensium. The latter expression refers simply to an exception from the common rule; the eight papal months being reduced to six in favor of those patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops who reside in their dioceses. The months thus reserved for the Pope are always the uneven, — January, March, etc., — whence the expression “uneven months” in the sense of “papal months.” This peculiar right of the Pope arose from a custom, prevalent already in the twelfth century, according to which the Pope recommended a certain clerk to a certain office. If the papal letter of recommendation (preces) was left unheeded, it was followed by a mandatum de providendo, and this again by littere monitorie, præceptorie, and executorie, until the vacancy was filled in accordance with the wishes of the Pope. Soon, however, the Pope began to issue mandata de providendo, not only for vacant benefices, but also for benefices which were not vacant; and great confusion and corruption were the natural results of such a practice. The Councils of Constance and Basel tried in vain to restore order; but, by the concordat of Vienna (1418), an arrangement was made by which the months were divided, and the uneven reserved for the Pope. At present, the right, though not altogether extinguished, exists only in certain countries and under certain modifications.

MENTZER, Balthasar, b. at Allendorf in Hesse, Feb. 27, 1565; d. at Marburg, Jan. 6, 1627. He was appointed professor of theology at Marburg in 1596, but removed to Giessen in 1605, as he was vehemently opposed to the landgrave's plan of establishing the Reformed Church in Hesse. After the closing, however, of the university of Giessen, in 1625, he returned to Marburg. He was an ardent champion of Lutheran orthodoxy, and sustained numerous controversies in its behalf with the Roman Catholics and the Reformed. His Opera Theologica Latina were collected in two volumes (Frankfort, 1669) by his son, BALTHASAR MENTZER (b. at Giessen, May 14, 1614; d. at Darmstadt, July 28, 1679), who, like the father, was a staunch Lutheran, and professor of theology at Marburg.

MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY, a school of philosophy and theology which took its rise, about the year 1836, in Marshall College and in the Theological Seminary of the German Reformed Church, at that time located at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. This title was derived from the name of the village, and first applied by opponents, as indicating a novel and somewhat doubtful system of speculation in American Protestantism. It grew out of the contact between the modern evangelical theology of Germany and Anglo-American church life, and quickened the German Reformed Church to new activity. That church was just then awaking from a state of comparative stagnation, and passing from the German to the English language. In this unavoidable process of transition, she was in danger of losing her historical identity, and dissolving into other denominations. The Mercersburg system saved her historical church life, but transformed and adapted it to the condition and vocation of a new country. It produced considerable fermentation and controversy, which affected also the Lutheran and other neighboring churches, but is now a matter of history, though its fruits remain. The movement has three phases. The first was philosophical (from 1836 to 1843); the second was theological, and turned chiefly on the church question (1843-58); the third was liturgical (from 1858 to 1866). The liturgical movement began at the synod of Norristown, in 1817; but the liturgy was not published till 1858.

The man who gave the initial impulse to this school of thought was the Rev. F. A. Rauch, Ph. D., first president of Marshall College (founded in 1835), a pupil of the distinguished theologian Dr. Daub, in Heidelberg, and a ripe scholar of varied culture. He came to this country as a political refugee. Well acquainted with German and Scotch systems of philosophy, and recognizing the deficiencies and merits of each, he conceived the purpose of uniting the best qualities of both in an advanced system, which he proposed to call “Anglo-German philosophy.” His method of thought was internal and organic, in distinction from the external and mechanical method. It was internal, in that he reflected upon a subject from its principle to its mode of action and consequences, and regarded the parts of a whole as being a unity by the operation of an immanent law, not as held together by forces outside of itself; and organic, because the living individual furnished the governing idea, or type, for inquiry in psychology, in ethics, in religion, and in all other branches of knowledge. For example, imagination, memory, and will are not related like the parts of a mechanism, but are the members or organs of a living unit, being vitally connected, like the eye and the ear, the heart and the lungs, of the human body. Rauch's plans were frustrated by his premature death, but the seed-thoughts sown by him yielded a rich harvest.

With Rauch, the Rev. Dr. John W. Nevin, called from the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Allegheny, to the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church, became associated in the spring of 1840. Somewhat prepared by his own independent studies for a transition into the bosom of a German church, he soon learned to appreciate the genius and the genetic method of Rauch. His new vocation led him to study more fully the Heidelberg Catechism, and the history of the Continental Reformation, and modern German philosophy and theology. Rauch died in April, 1841. Nevin became the second president of Marshall College. Two years later the Reformed Church called Dr. Philip Schaff, by birth a Swiss, from the University of Berlin, where he had just begun to lecture, to the chair of church history and exegesis in Mercersburg. Arriving in the summer of 1844, young and enthusiastic, he entered with freedom into the theological life then pulsating in the Mercersburg institutions, and gave fresh impulse to its growth by the publication of his inaugural address on the Principle of Protestantism (1845). Rauch, Nevin, and Schaff were alike conversant with philosophy and theology; but Rauch excelled chiefly in the former, and Nevin in the latter; while Schaff was by predilection a church historian, filled with love for the past, and hope for the future,—an advocate of progressive development. Complementing each other reciprocally, these three scholars developed the ideas of Mercersburg theology in different ways. Dr. Nevin discussed the questions concerning the church and the sacraments. Turning to Cyprian and the Nicene age, he represented the contrast between the church idea then extant and the sect system of our century, but aimed chiefly to show that the Oxford Tractarian theory of reprobation was historically untenable, and would lead logically to the whole system of the Papacy, which in some respects was an improvement on Nicene and ante-Nicene Christianity. On the nature of the sacraments he reproduced the anti-Zwinglian and anti-Lutheran conception of John Calvin, which he held to be the true Reformed doctrine. Schaff, in his Principle of Protestantism, vindicated the doctrines of the Reformation on the basis of historical development, in decided opposition to Romanism and Puseyism on the one hand, and also to rationalism and sectarianism on the other. Their attitude towards opinions then current provoked the charge of Romanizing tendencies against the Mercersburg school; yet, at the very time, Nevin was dealing heavy blows against Rome in his articles on Brownson's Quarterly Review, and Schaff, in his treatise, What is Church History? justified and defended the epoch of the Reformation as the legitimate result of the preceding ages, and the main current of modern Christianity. The Mercersburg school was also charged with transcendentalism and mysticism, but all these charges have gradually subsided. Among the expounders and defendants of the school must be mentioned Drs. Wolf (d. 1872), Harbaugh (d. 1867), Higbee, Gerhart, Apple, Gast, and many other graduates of the college and seminary of Mercersburg. The chief opponents within the German Reformed Church were Dr. Berg, then in Philadelphia, and afterwards Dr. Bomberger, who headed the anti-liturgical movement since 1858. A regular heresy trial was held at the synod of York in 1815, and again at two subsequent synods; but in each case the Mercersburg professors were acquitted by an almost unanimous vote.

We shall state in brief compass, not in the historical, but in logical order, the points of doctrine which were at issue in these controversies.

1. Mercersburg theology taught that the divine-human person of Jesus Christ is the primordial truth of Christianity, both of revelation and redemption. From the Christ-idea, as the fundamental principle, are to be developed all scriptural doctrines. Issue was taken with the high Calvinistic principle of a twofold unconditional predestination, as well as with the contrary Arminian principle of freewill, and no less decidedly, also, with the Roman system, which starts from the idea of the Church as a visible and centralized organization. Neither the sovereign will of God, nor the natural freedom of man, nor an infallible church or pope, can, according to Scripture, be the starting-point in theological science. Mercersburg was the first theological school in America which propounded and vindicated what has since been called the "Christocentric" idea of Christianity.

2. The doctrine concerning the nature of the Church. Jesus Christ, the incarnate Son of God, is the second Adam, the head of a regenerate human race. Born in him and of him, by the Holy Spirit, believers are his members. He, glorified in heaven, and they, though still in the flesh on earth, together constitute one mystical body, a spiritual organism. This is the Christian Church, holy, catholic, and apostolic. Of supernatural origin, invested with divine authority, possessing spiritual powers adequate to the fulfilment of her mission, instinct with heavenly life, and destined to overcome her enemies, she is the communion in which men may obtain salvation and eternal life. The Church, extending through all ages, and destined to embrace all nations, is ever identical with herself, having one Lord, one faith, one baptism; yet as she is not an aggregation of individuals, but a vital whole, she is organized, and she perpetuates her spiritual organization, agreeably to the laws of human life. Her history resembles the history of an individual man. The Church begins her life in infancy: she passes, by growth, through the period of childhood and youth, and by successive stages develops toward the strength and maturity of manhood. Different phases of the fulness of her spiritual life, including doctrine and morals, cultus and ecclesiastical polity, appear at different epochs in her wonderful history. Hence no statements of doctrine formulated in any past age need be final, and no form of organization can be fixed and unchangeable. But the Church modifies doctrinal formulas according to her progress in the knowledge of Christian truth, and adjusts her organization to the advanced status of her life and to her altered connections with the world. On this principle, Mercersburg could recognize propriety and wisdom in the papal hierarchy of mediæval Romanism, and yet affirm the necessity of the Reformation, and vindicate the validity of the anti-hierarchical organizations of the Protestant churches.

This idea was at war with the prevalent notion that the Church is a voluntary society of Christian individuals, organized for their common spiritual good, and with the opinion that the orthodox confessions of the Reformation are as fully adapted to the needs of the Church in the nineteenth, as they were in the sixteenth or seventeenth, century. Since the controversy closed, a great change has been wrought in the attitude of evangelical denominations. The uncharitable judgments on the Roman Church are moderated; and the tendency to union is spreading in proportion as the various branches of the Church by better knowledge of the history of the past become acquainted, and learn to appreciate each other.

3. An elevated conception of the Church involved a corresponding estimate of the spiritual dignity of the ministry. Christ perpetuates his mediatorial office by an order of chosen men, who, by the laying-on of hands, are duly invested with divine authority to speak in his name, to dispense the sacraments, and to bear rule as undershepherds over the flock. At the same time, Mercersburg always taught the general priesthood of the laity and the equality of ministers, and therefore had no sympathy with the Anglican High-Church movement, which rests on the theory of an external episcopal succession, and a sacerdotal view of the ministry. The constitution and polity of the Reformed Church are essentially Presbyterian.

4. The sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, being of divine appointment, are not empty forms, but the significant signs and seals of God's covenant with us. They are means of grace which become efficacious by faith alone. By baptism, the subject is received into the covenant. The Lord's Supper is the commemoration of the once crucified but now glorified Christ, and the communion of his body and blood, wherein, by the impartation of his own divine-human fulness, he nourishes his people unto everlasting life. The contrary opinion, which then largely prevailed in the American churches, that baptism is only the empty symbol of forgiveness and of the new birth, and the Lord's Supper merely a celebration of the crucifixion of Christ, was sharply criticised. This positive view respecting sacramental grace, though many theologians were repelled by it, was nothing more than a strong re-assertion (so Dr. Nevin persistently claimed, and demonstrated by historical proofs against Dr. Hodge) of the doctrine advanced and elaborated by John Calvin, and embodied in all the later Reformed confessions, including that of Westminster.

5. Such views of the church, of the ministry, and the sacraments, involved the principle of liturgical worship. Mercersburg found fault with the common style of extemporaneous public prayer, and advocated a revival of the liturgical church-service of the Reformation period, but so modified and reproduced as to be adapted to the existing wants of Protestant congregations. The result of this phase of Mercersburg activity was, "A Liturgy; or, Order of Christian Worship," prepared by a committee (Schaff, Nevin, Harbaugh, Gerhart, Apple, Steiner, and others), and published in Philadelphia, 1858; a book of common prayer, which was subsequently revised, and issued in 1866, entitled An Order of Worship for the Reformed Church. Both, however, are merely optional, and not intended to supersede free prayer. A new German hymn-book was also prepared, by Dr. Schaff, in 1859, and is now generally used in the German congregations of the Reformed Church.

6. Mercersburg laid special stress on educational religion, particularly on the diligent instruction of the baptized youth. By Christian teaching all children and youth were to be led to Christ in the exercise of a living faith. To this end, family training, the teaching of the catechism, and the faithful preaching of the gospel, were adequate means. Hence the opposition to the "anxious bench" and the spasmodic revival system, which for a time had widely spread in the German Reformed and Lutheran churches, contrary to their genius and history.

These prominent features are all logically connected with the primordial truth that the Word made flesh, Jesus Christ, is the sum and substance of Christianity. The essence and form of doctrine asserted in each case is determined by its internal relation to this fundamental principle.

The whole movement was christological, and in close sympathy with the positive evangelical theology of Protestant Germany, though necessarily modified by American surroundings and wants.

In 1853 Marshall College was removed to Lancaster, Penn., and united with Franklin College. The theological seminary followed in 1871. The appellative Mercersburg, therefore, no longer signifies any local relation. The name has been employed in this article to denote that christological type of thought which originated and was developed at Mercersburg. At the present time, the peculiar characteristics of the Mercersburg school are no longer equally distinctive, because similar christological tendencies have since sprung up, and taken root in other denominations: hence former issues have been superseded. Instead of antagonism at nearly all points, there is now some degree of living sympathy between the different branches of American Protestantism and schools of evangelical theology. Within the German Reformed Church itself the two parties which for years were divided on doctrine and worship have been brought into closer sympathy, and in 1880 appointed a "peace-commission," which has since been engaged in preparing a new English liturgy and hymn-book.

MERCY, God's love displayed towards the sinner as subject to sorrow, misery, and death, as grace is God's love displayed to the sinner as a transgressor of the law, and guilty. This is a theological distinction, and is not made in the New Testament in the use of the terms "grace" and "mercy." See GRACE, LOVE.

MERCY, Sisters of, or ORDER OF OUR LADY OF MERCY, a religious order founded in Dublin by Miss Catharine McAuley (see art.), Dec. 13, 1831. The first rules were approved by the archbishop of Dublin, Jan. 23, 1834; but subsequently the rule of St. Augustine, with some necessary modifications, was chosen, approved by Gregory XVI. in 1835, and formally confirmed by him in 1840. The order has spread very rapidly, and is now found in all parts of the British domains and of the United States. The first house upon the American Continent was opened at St. John's, Newfoundland, 1842, and, in the United States, at Pittsburg, Penn., 1843. The Sisters of Mercy devote themselves to the suffering and the tempted among women. They are divided into choir-sisters and lay-sisters. The latter are occupied with the duties in the houses; the former, with those connected with their more active work. The former also elect the superior for the order in each diocese, for there is no general superior over the entire order. Those who would enter either class undergo a postulancy of six months, assume the white veil, and then, after a novitiate of two years, are received. The irrevocable vows are of poverty, chastity, obedience, and service to the poor, sick, and ignorant. The habit of the order is a black robe with long loose sleeves, a white coif, and a white or black veil. In the streets a bonnet of black crape is worn, instead of the coif and veil. MERIBAH (quarrel), the name of two places (Exod. xvii. 7; Num. xx. 13), upon the wandering of the Israelites, where Moses, on command of God, drew water out of a rock. (1) Meribah, with the alternative name Massah (temptation), was in Rephidim, the last station before the Sinai Desert. The monks of St. Catherine put it in the Wady Lejá, at the base of Sinai, on the other side from the convent; but the location is improbable. Against it is the monastic and Bedouin eagerness to put as many holy places as possible together, the improbability that Rephidim was at the base of Sinai, and yet not in the Wilderness of Sinai, and the perennial supply of water at Sinai. Wilson and Warren place it in Wady Feiran, near Mount Serbal; Holland, in the pass at Watiyeh, at the eastern end of Wady es-Sheikh. (2) Meribah, near Kadesh, in the Wilderness of Zin. From Ezekiel's mention of it (xlvii. 19), it has been conjectured that the water still flowed in his day. See KADESH. It was at this Meribah that Moses disobeyed God by striking the rock, instead of speaking to it, and received the heart-breaking intimation, that, in consequence, he would not be allowed to lead the Israelites into the promised land, as he had expected (Num. xx. 12).

MERITUM DE CONDIGNO, DE CONGRUO. This distinction in the conception of the merit of good works, as first made by Thomas Aquinas (P. ii. 1, Qu. III, arts 4 and 6), is, in his system, a compromise between the stronger Augustinian leaning, which personally ruled and distinguished him, and the Pelagian inclination in the Catholic Church towards emphasizing good works. He taught, (1) that no one but Christ can gain grace for any one else by the "merit of condignity," i.e., real merit; (2) that each can gain such grace by the "merit of congruity," since God meets the wish of man for the salvation of others. Duns Scotus goes even farther in this Pelagian direction, and asserts that man can prepare himself to receive this grace. But Protestants reject altogether this teaching, on the ground that it tends to lessen the mediatorial character of Christ, and leads tender consciences to doubt of all their works, and to seek ever for more. MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ, Jean Henri, b. at Eaux-Vives on Lake Lemán, Switzerland, Aug. 16, 1794; d. at Geneva, Oct. 21, 1872. He studied theology at the university of Geneva; but the deepest and most decisive religious impressions he received from Robert Haldane and the religious revival which he produced in Geneva in the second decade of the present century. It was not without some hesitation that he subscribed to the famous edict of May 3, 1817, issued by the Venerable Association of Pastors, a thoroughly rationalistic body, and forbidding the preachers to discuss any debatable doctrine in the pulpit, such as hereditary sin, predestination and grace, etc. But some explanations induced him to take a lighter view of the edict; and July 3, 1817, he was ordained. It was at that time his idea to devote himself to literature in general, and he was much occupied with translations of Ariosto and Schiller; but his visit to Eisenach in October, 1817, during the celebration of the third centennial festival in commemoration of the Reformation, made it one of the great objects of his life to write the history of the religious reforms of the sixteenth century. After a short stay in Berlin, where he acquired the friendship of Neander, he was appointed pastor of the Reformed congregation in Hamburg, 1818, and court-preacher in Brussels, 1824. In both places he exercised great influence; but in Hamburg he experienced some difficulties from the side of the consistory, and from Brussels he was driven away by the revolution of 1830. Meanwhile the Evangelical Society had been formed in Geneva; and, in order to provide the church of Geneva with evangelical pastors, the society had founded an independent theological school. From that school Merle accepted a call as professor of church history; and in that position he remained for the rest of his life, preaching alternately with Gausson and Gall, and in the Chapelle de l'Oratoire. The formation, however, of the Evangelical Society, and the foundation of the new theological school, could not help arousing the jealousy of the state church; and the Venerable Association of Pastors forbade Merle the pulpit. One of Merle's most cherished ideas was the union of all true Christians, and consequently he actually dreaded a separation from the state establishment. But, on the other hand, he could not allow any external authority to interfere with his office as a preacher of the gospel; and in 1835 an independent congregation was formed at the Oratoire, which, by joining the Bourg, de Pair in 1849, became the foundation of the Église Évangélique in Geneva. In the same year he published the first volume of his great work, Histoire de la Réformation, of which the thirteenth and last volume appeared after his death. The work consists of two divisions, — the Reformation at the time of Luther (English translation, many editions), and the Reformation at the time of Calvin (English translation, 1863-79, 8 vols.); the two great characters forming the respective centres of the two groups of Reformers. Its success was marvellous, especially in the English-speaking countries Great Britain and America, but also in France and Germany. It was translated both into English and German, and edition followed upon edition. Among his other works are Le Protecteur, 1818, an apology of Oliver Cromwell; Trois Siècles de lutttes en Écosse, 1850; and a great number of pamphlets, speeches, sermons, etc. [See REMUSAT: Mélanges de Littérature et Philosophie; and ROBERT BAIRD: D'Aubigné and his Writings, New York, 1846.]

MERO'DACH (Heb., מֶרֹדַךְ; Babyl., Marduk, Maruduk, origin and meaning of name uncertain), a famous Babylonian deity, son of Éa, god of the planet Jupiter; a valiant warrior, agent and herald of the gods; during the later Babylonian Empire, the special guardian of Babylon itself; is named (Jer. 1. 2) as overthrown at the predicted capture of that city. Bel is here mentioned with Merodach: but the latter was himself called bilu, bel ("lord"); and it is on other grounds probable, that, before the end of the Babylonian rule, the distinction observed in more ancient times between him and the mighty god Bel (see BAAL), who belonged to the superior triad, was obscured, so that the epithets and dignity of Bel were transferred to Merodach. Nebuchadnezzar, in particular, addresses Merodach by the loftiest titles. "Merodach" appears repeatedly in Babylonian proper names, such as Amil-Marduk (Évil-Merodach), Marduk-abal-iddina (Merodach Baladan), Marduk-nâdin-achi, Marduk-itu. The Assyrians also worshipped Merodach, though he was less prominent among them than among the Babylonians.

MERO'DACH-BAL'ADAN (Heb., מֶרֹדַךְ בַּלְאָדָן, and, evidently by an error, מֶרֹדַךְ בִּלְאָדָן; Babyl., Marduk-abal-iddina, "Merodach a son gave"), a king of Babylonia, is mentioned (2 Kings xx. 12 ff., and Isa. xxxix. 1 ff.) as sending letters and a present to Hezekiah on the latter's recovery from his sickness. Hezekiah showed the ambassadors all his treasures and his defences, and thus gave Isaiah an opportunity of foretelling the capture and plunder of the royal house by the Babylonians.

The name Mardukabalidinna occurs in the cuneiform inscriptions as follows: (1) Among the kings who paid tribute to Tiglath Pileser II. at Babylon, B.C. 731. He is there called "son of Jakin." (2) As "king of the land of Kaldi," defeated and put to flight by Sargon, B.C. 709, 708. He is called "son of Jakin," "dwelling on the sea:" his stronghold is "Dur-Jakin," lying evidently in "Bit-Jakin;" and "Bit-Jakin" ("house of Jakin") is the land bordering on the Persian Gulf, in extreme Southern Babylonia (cf. Bit-Chumri, "House of Omri," applied by the Assyrians to the northern kingdom of Israel). "Son of Jakin" means, probably "of Jakin's dynasty." (Cf. "Son of Omri," applied by Shalmaneser II. to Jehu.) (3) As "King of Kar-Duniash" (Babylonia in the narrow sense), defeated and put to flight by Sennacherib, B.C. 701. (4) As again conquered by the same monarch in Bit-Jakin, B.C. 700. (5) On contract-tablets we find mention of the ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and (Schrader: Keilinschriften u. Geschichtsforschung, p. 535; cf. Boscawen, in Trans. Soc. Bib. Archaeol., vol. vi., p. 19) twentieth year of the reign of Mardukabalidinna. Ptolemy's Canon gives for the reign of Μαρδοκίμπαδος in Babylon twelve years, — B.C. 721-710; and Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb., Chron., l. 5), probably on the authority of Berossus, names Marudachus Baldanes as ruling in Babylon for six months just before [B]elibus, — B.C. 702.

Now, if, according to the last contract-tablet mentioned above, a King Mardukabalidinna reigned for twenty years, then the identity of the persons thus named by Sargon and by Sennacherib, of the Μαρδοκίμπαδος of Ptolemy, the Merodach-Baladan of the Bible, and the Marudachus Baldanes of Alexander Polyhistor, is highly probable. He would not interrupt his reckoning because during some of these years (after his twelfth, — years during which no contract-tablets bearing his name have been discovered) he failed actually to hold the throne. It is more doubtful whether the king named by Tiglath Pileser II. is the same person, though this is quite possible. But if "Baladan," the name of the father of Merodach-Baladan according to 2 Kings xx. 12 and Isa. xxxix. 1, is abbreviated, as is not unlikely, for Merodach-Baladan (father and son having the same name), then the contemporary of Tiglath Pileser may have been the father.

Most difficult of all is to fix the time of the embassy to Hezekiah. In all probability, the object of it was really to pave the way for an alliance; and it occurred, most likely, at a time when Merodach-Baladan was in special straits, or saw a good opportunity for striking a blow against Assyria. It is impossible at present to decide, however, whether it was in the time of Sargon or of Sennacherib, and, if the latter, whether before or after Sennacherib's campaign in Judæa. See SARGON, SENNACHERIB.

MESOPOTAMIA (Μεσοποταμία, i. e., ἡ μέση τῶν ποταμῶν τοῦ τε Εὐφράτου καὶ τοῦ Τίγριος — Arrian. Alex., 7, 7, cf. Tacit. Annal., 6, 37) is the name given by the Greeks, from the time of Alexander the Great, and, after them, by the Romans, to the region bounded on the east and west by the Tigris and the Euphrates. The Taurus range was generally regarded as separating it from Armenia on the north: the Median wall and the Euphrato-Tigris canal-system usually stood for its southern limit. It was rarely held to include Babylonia, both Upper and Lower. The Old Testament assigns this general region to Aram, and calls it אַרְם נְהָרַיִם, "Aram of the two rivers" (Gen. xxiv. 10; Deut. xxiii. 5, etc.). פְּרָן אֲרָם, Plain-Aram, "Plain of Aram" (Gen. xxv. 20, xxxi. 18, etc.) is the name of part of the same district. (See PADAN-ARAM.) The LXX. translated these names by Μεσοποταμία, Μεσόπορ, Συρία, or πεδῖον Μεσοπορ. The later Arabic name Al-Djezirah ("the island") covers nearly the same extent of territory.

The northern part of the district is mountainous (comp. Num. xxiii. 7), with fruitful valleys attractive to settlers, and was populous from early times. Toward the south the land was dry and barren, except along the river-beds, crossed by caravan-tracks, but otherwise abandoned to wild beasts (Ammian. Marc., 18, 7; Xen. Anab., 1, 5, 1 ff.) and to Arabian robber-bands, whose presence there caused it sometimes to be considered part of Arabia (Dio Cass., 68, 31).

Among the chief cities of Mesopotamia were Haran (Carrhæ), Edessa, Nisibis, and Tul-Barsip (later Kar-Salmanassar), capital of the important principality of Bit-Adini (בֵּית אֲדִינִי, Amos i. 5).

Mesopotamia was not a political unit, and its history is involved in that of the great peoples which bordered upon it. The ancestors of the Hebrew people settled there (Gen. xi. 10 ff., xii. 5; Josh. xxiv. 2 ff.; Acts vii. 2), after leaving Ur of the Chaldees (see Ur); and, even after Abraham had entered Canaan, a connection with his family in Mesopotamia was maintained — Rebecca came from Mesopotamia (Gen. xxiv. 10 ff., xxv. 20). Thither went Jacob, and gained wives and fortune (Gen. xxviii. ff., xxxv. 26, xlvi. 15). Egyptian records tell us that Egyptian kings of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties made inroads into Mesopotamia (circa B.C. 1700–1350). In the time of the Judges we hear of "Chushairishathaim, king of Mesopotamia" (אַרְם נְהָרַיִם), as an oppressor of Israel (Judg. iii. 8, 10). In David's time the king of the Syrian Zoba had vassals in Mesopotamia (2 Sam. x. 16, cf. v. 19). From the Assyrian inscriptions it appears that the land was divided among petty chiefs, whom the Assyrians by degrees subdued; Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 858–823) establishing at length a permanent control over the greater part of the territory. The district then belonged successively to the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians; falling later under the dominion, first of the Seleucids, then — after being long the battle-ground of Parthian, Armenian, and Roman armies — of the Romans. Its incorporation into the Roman Empire was due to Trajan, and, more completely, to Caracalla (A.D. 217). At this time two main divisions were recognized, — Osrhoene in the West, with Edessa as its capital; Mygdonia in the East (Polyb., 5, 51), with Nisibis as the chief city. The Arabs conquered Mesopotamia A.D. 637–641.

MESROB, or MASHTOZ, b. in the middle of the fourth century, at the village of Haezagaz in the Armenian province of Taron; d. at Walarshapat, Feb. 19, 441. He was educated by the catholicos, Nerses the Great, and instructed in Greek, Persian, and Syriac. After the death of Nerses, he came to the court of King Vramshapuh as his secretary; but, after the lapse of seven years, he retired, dissatisfied with a merely worldly life, first to a monastery, and afterwards into the desert. The great fame of the catholicos, Sahak the Great, allured him back into the world; and then began his great missionary and literary labors. The Bible was known in Armenia only in the Syriac translation, which the common people did not understand; and the Armenian language could be written only by means of Greek characters, which were altogether incapable of representing it. After many troubles, he finally succeeded in producing an alphabet of thirty-six letters, which proved admirably fitted for the Armenian language; then he translated the Bible into Armenian in connection with Sahak; and finally he laid the broad foundation of the whole Armenian literature by a number of translations from Greek and Syriac, performed by disciples whom he had sent to Edessa, Constantinople, Athens, and Alexandria. For a short time after the death of King Vramshapuh, he was disturbed in his beneficent activity. The Persian kings decided to govern their Armenian provinces by Persian governors, and those strangers determined to introduce the Persian fire-worship in the country. Merob and Sahak fled into Greek Armenia; but the persecution was only of short duration, and both were able to return. See SOK. SOMAL: Quadro della storia letteraria di Armenia, Venice, 1829; and the life of Mesrob, written by GORIUX, and translated into German by Welte. PETERMANN.

MESSALIANS. — I. Messalians, or Massalians, a word of Syriac derivation, and denoting "praying people," was the name of a non-Christian religious party which flourished in Asia Minor in the middle of the fourth century. According to Epiphanius, they originated among the Hellenists. They accepted a plurality of gods; though they recognized only one God, the Omnipotent, as worthy of being worshipped. They held frequent prayer-meetings, with illuminations and singing. In some respects they resembled the Cœlicolæ and the Hypsistarians; in others, they seem simply to be a popular form of Persian dualism. They were never numerous, but they were persecuted by the Christian authorities. See EPIPHANIUS: Hæc., 80; CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA: De Adoratione, iii.; ULLMANN: De Hypsistariis. — II. Entirely without connection with this non-Christian party, there existed in Syria, in the latter part of the fourth century, under the name of Massalians, a Christian sect, which, however, soon obtained other names, — Euchites, after their principle of perpetual prayer; or Chorentæ, after their habit of dancing; or Adelpheians, Lampetians, Marcionists, Eustathians, etc., after their various leaders. They were monks; but, in opposition to other Eastern monks, they refused to work for their bread, but roamed about begging. The demon, they taught, with which every human being is born, can be expelled or subdued only by intense prayer: baptism and the Eucharist are of no account. But, in the enthusiasm of intense prayer, the soul is raised above all passions and cravings, and consequently, also, above all moral restrictions. Condemned by one council after the other, and persecuted both in Syria and Asia Minor, they are still heard of in the sixth and seventh century. [See the exhaustive article, "Euchites," by G. Salmon, in SMITH and WACE: Dictionary of Christian Biography.]—III. Once more the name of Messalians comes to the surface in the history of the church; namely, in connection with the Paulicians in the tenth century, but probably also as a branch of that sect. See article on PAULICIANS.

MESSIAH, MESSIANIC PROPHECY. According to the prophecies of the Old Testament, the consummation of the plan of salvation was, on the one hand, to be brought about by the personal advent of Jehovah in his glory. He appears, amidst the jubilation of the whole creation, to establish his kingdom on the earth (Ps. xcvi. 10 sqq., xcviii. 6 sqq.), and reveals himself to his people as the Redeemer from bondage and the Good Shepherd (Isa. xxxv. 4 sqq., xl. 10 sq., lii. 12; Ezek. xxxiv. 11 sqq., etc.). Jehovah, himself takes up his dwelling on Zion, ruling all nations as their king (Zech. xiv. 16), fills the new temple with his glory (Ezek. xliii. 2, 7), shines as the eternal light over the divine city (Isa. ix. 2, 19), etc. So patent was this future indwelling of God in his church to be, that no ark of the covenant would be any longer necessary (Jer. iii. 16). While on the one hand, the representations are thus most distinct, that Jehovah will dwell among his people in the era of salvation, they are, on the other, equally distinct, that the kingdom of God will be restored by a member of the house of David. Both of these representations are put side by side in Ezek. xxxiv., where Jehovah himself is portrayed as the shepherd (ver. 11), and as, at the same time, raising up a shepherd, even his servant David (ver. 23). In verse 24 both delineations are merged in the description, "I the Lord will be their God, and my servant David a prince among them." This member of the house of David is the promised Messiah.

The Hebrew word "Messiah" (מָשִׁיחַ), translated in the LXX., Χριστός ("Christ"), designates in the Old Testament, in the first instance, every person anointed with the holy oil, as the high priest, and especially the king. From the latter use, its application passed over (Ps. ii. 2; Dan. ix. 25) to Him who was to represent and introduce the consummation of the kingdom of God. The Targum of Onkelos adds the title at Gen. xlix. 10, Num. xxiv. 17; and the Targum of Jonathan, at Hos. iii. 5, and many other places. The term "Messiah" is twice used in the New Testament (John i. 42, iv. 25); and its Greek equivalent, "Christ," almost always with the article in the Gospels, without it in the Pauline and Petrine Epistles. The promise of the Messiah was connected with the family of David, but it presupposes and was built upon the hope of salvation which Revelation from the very beginning had excited. It is with this expectation that we must therefore here begin.

1. Prophecies in the Old Testament.—The first promise of salvation is put in closest connection with the Fall (Gen. iii. 15). The older theologians wrongly interpreted the "seed of the woman" to mean an individual; and the Roman Catholics, on the basis of the false rendering (ipsa conteret caput), referred it to the Virgin Mary,—an exegesis which the Jesuits zealously espoused. The passage predicts the conflict of the human race with the kingdom of evil, and the final triumph over it; so that it is indeed the "first Gospel" (πρώτον εὐαγγέλιον), as the older theologians designated it. Of very great importance is the further teaching of the passage, that, as all evil is the consequence of sin, so salvation will be a consequence only of the destruction of sin. In other words, the conflict here indicated is a moral conflict. Gen. iv. 1 does not refer to the God-man, as Luther indicates in his translation; but the name "Noah," which Lamech gave his son (Gen. v. 29), proves that the antediluvian world was looking forward to a deliverer from the curse of sin. After the Flood, those divine acts of election occur by which the way for the fulfilment of salvation was being prepared. The God of revelation was the God of Shem (Gen. ix. 26); and the promise that in Abraham (Gen. xii. 3, xviii. 18, etc.) all nations were to be blessed was to find its fulfilment in the kingdom of Christ. Important is the thought that the chosen tribe is to rule all nations (xxvii. 29), and this tribe was to be Judah (xlix. 10). No matter how the word "Shiloh" is interpreted ["Christ the Prince of peace," or, "a place of peace"], it is replete with the promise of the future.

A third period of Messianic prophecy begins with the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. Balaam's prophecy of the star of Jacob (Num. xxiv. 17 sqq.), referred by the ancient Jews to the Messiah, evidently points to a glorious rule and ruler issuing from Israel. The passage in Deuteronomy (xviii. 15-19) does not refer, as it used to be explained, to a single individual prophet, Christ, but to the office of the prophets. It has, however, its place in the Messianic predictions, as showing that prophetic as well as regal functions were necessary to the consummation of God's kingdom on earth. [Stephen, in his address before the Sanhedrin, quotes this passage from Deuteronomy, and finds in it a direct reference to the Messiah,—Acts vii. 37.] The point of departure for the more definite concentration of the Messianic expectation on a person is 2 Sam. vii., where Jehovah promises to establish David's dynasty forever, and to make his seed his son. This son was not the whole house of David, but one of David's descendants (1 Chron. xvii. 11). By this passage (2 Sam. vii.) two things were fixed,—that the Messiah was to be a king, and a son of David. David's house can be humbled, but not permanently (1 Kings xi. 39). In David's last song (2 Sam. xxiii.) predicates are affirmed of David's royalty, which cannot be referred to his own person, but to the ideal kingdom he represented (compare Ps. xxi. 5, 7, lxi. 7). In Ps. ii., xlv., lxxii., ex., a royal personage is depieted, to whom neither David nor Solomon corresponds, but only He of whom they were types. There are two schools of interpretation with regard to these psalms. The one, represented by Calvin, holds, that, in the first instance, they refer to a king of Israel, but that the ideal predicates affirmed of him refer to the Christ. The other school holds that the Psalmist had before him the ideal theocratic king, and so spoke directly of Christ. This last view cannot be set aside by the objection that the Psalmist could not sing of a future king; for he does sing of a future glory of the holy city (Ps. lxxxvii.), and the future advent of Jehovah to establish his kingdom (Ps. xvi.-xviii.). This view seems to be decidedly the more natural in Ps. ii., lxxii., cx. These psalms depict the Messiah as a victorious prince, ruling over the world, and relieving the suffering (Ps. lxxii.). This king is also a priest (Ps. cx. 4), a designation it was impossible to give to David or Solomon; and the affirmation that his priesthood was to be "after the order of Melchizedek" shows that it was to be something outside of, and superior to, the Mosaic order.

Turning to the prophetic books, we find in the oldest of them no distinct reference to the person of the Messiah. But the elaborate descriptions of his person and rule which Isaiah and Micah give do not make the impression that the idea was a novel one; and the view that the Messianic expectation goes back no farther than the eighth century B.C. has no warrant. It should not occasion any surprise that the prophets, at the time of the deterioration of the Davidic dynasty, should have pointed more distinctly to the future; for this was the very function of the prophets, — to testify to the indestructible truth of the divine promise. Pursuing first the line of the predictions concerning Christ's person, we discover that he is to be endowed with a superhuman dignity. He is of divine origin (Mic. v. 2), and endowed with divine power (Mic. v. 4). To this passage in Micah corresponds Isa. iv. 2, if this is to be referred to the Messiah, as the Targum assumes. Isa. vii. 14 refers to the birth of "Immanuel;" and it is now again pretty generally conceded that it refers to the Messiah from its connection with ix. 5 sqq., where the divine nature of the Messiah is affirmed. In xi. 1 sq. the divine in him seems to be described as only the result of the Divine Spirit's resting upon him. In Jer. xxiii., xxxiii. 14-26, we have other prophecies of the Messiah; but, in the first, the expression "the Lord our righteousness" (xxiii. 6) does not necessarily contain the affirmation of the divinity of the Messiah; for it does not say he is divine, but is "called" so. In Jer. xxx. 21, however, the Messiah is described as a ruler, and in a peculiar relation to Jehovah, such as no man can hold to him. In Zech. iii. 8, vi. 12, the expression "Branch" is used as a proper name of the Messiah. In Mal. iii. 1 we have a prophecy of a "messenger," whom the Lord would send to prepare the way for the "messenger of the covenant," or angel of the covenant. The Lord who dispatches the messenger is Jehovah. The angel of the covenant may be the angel of the wilderness, but it is more plausible to refer it to the Messiah. Finally, in Daniel, we come to the close of the Messianic prediction of the Old Testament. In vii. 13 sq. the vision of the four beasts is concluded with a vision of the "Son of man coming with the clouds to the Ancient of days." According to some interpreters, the Son of man referred to the theocratic people, as the four beasts referred to world-kingsdoms: but this is very improbable: and, as far back as we can trace the exegetical tradition, it was referred to the Messiah. So here, likewise, he appears as a divine as well as a human being: for only God can use the clouds as his chariot (Ps. civ. 3). If we follow the usual interpretation, the Messiah is not again referred to in the heavenly creatures of Daniel; but who is he whose voice is heard on the bank of the Ulai (viii. 15-17), who appears in majesty at the Tigris (x. 5 sqq.), and swears by him that liveth forever (xii. 6 sqq.)? That is the best view which sees here the angel of Jehovah (Michaelis, etc.) If this be so, his identity with the Son of man of vii. 13 (not with Michael, as Hengstenberg urged) is easily made out. It is to be noticed that the Apocalypse (i. 13-15) gets its description of the appearance of the glorified Christ from Dan. x. 5 sqq.

The union of this Son of man coming from the clouds with the member of the house of David is not described in the Old Testament (we prophesy only in part, — 1 Cor. xiii. 9). All the elements, however, are furnished in the prophecy of the Old Testament. It remained for Christ to unite them in his person, — the object and the fulfilment of these two lines of prophecies.

2. The Office and Work of the Messiah. — The first characteristic of the Old-Testament prophecies is, that the Messiah was to be a king, and the Messianic kingdom was to rise from a humble beginning to a glorious consummation (Isa. xi. 1; Mic. v. 2). Like the first David, he was to come forth as a stem out of Jesse, and be born in Bethlehem. The same truth is taught by the allegory of the cedar of Lebanon (Ezek. xvii. 22 sqq.), which grows from a little twig that the Lord planted, and under the shadow of whose branches all the birds of heaven congregate. This allegory refers, not to Zerubbabel, but to the Messianic kingdom. The Messiah was to come, not in pomp, but in humble circumstances (Zech. ix. 9 sq.). His royal power was to extend over all nations (Isa. xi. 10 sqq.).

The second characteristic of the Messiah of the Old Testament is that he suffers, and by his suffering and death atones for the sins of the people. The destruction of sin he will accomplish by the exercise of righteous judgment (Isa. xi. 9) and the spread of the knowledge of Jehovah through the land. At the side of passages of this kind are others, in which prophecy points to a servant of Jehovah who suffers in the people's stead, to an act of atonement upon which the dawn of the period of salvation depends. The Messiah is to be a priest. The sufferings of the Messiah bring about a recognition of the God who saves among those who theretofore have not known him. This idea is brought out very distinctly in Ps. xxii., which cannot refer to David, in whose life no circumstance is found to correspond to it (not even 1 Sam. xxiii. 25 sq.), nor to Jeremiah, who would hardly have associated the establishment of the kingdom of God among the heathen with his deliverance. The meal of thanksgiving and sacrifice (Ps. xxii. 26) is identical with the prophesied meal of the Messianic period (Isa. xxv. 6 sqq.), which God prepares on Zion for all nations. Nor is the suffering one in the psalm, Israel (Kimchi), as verses 22, 23, show. This Messianic suffering is regarded as vicarious. The whole Old Testament is full of the thought that God stays judgment upon a guilty race on account of a just and righteous substitute. The most pious of the patriarchs of Israel are sinful themselves, for this reason cannot roll away the curse from the people (Isa. xliii. 27, etc.), and do well if they save themselves (Ezek. xiv. 11 sqq.). The people needs a more perfect mediator. This is the servant of Jehovah. The fundamental conception of the servant of God in Isa. xl. sqq., it is true, is the people of Israel (xli. 8 sq., xlv. 1 sqq.; comp. Jer. xxx. 10), in which the prophets are included. It is not the prophetic order by itself, for the prophets were not a corporation; and the description of blind and dumb dogs (lvi. 10) is not applicable to them. But when this servant of Jehovah is described as the light of the Gentiles (xlii. 1-7), the one who shall lead the people back to the Holy Land (xlix. 1-6, etc.), it is not to be denied that the description refers to an ideal person, and not to the servants of God (Israel) as an aggregate. This must be affirmed very positively with regard to lii. 13-14. The people itself has the consciousness of guilt (lix. 16, lxiv. 5), and cannot atone for its sins (lix. 16). The prophecy points to one who suffers not for his own sins, but gives up his life as a substitute, as a ransom (כֹּפֶר), for the sins of others. He is rejected of men, but honored of God, and by him lifted out of the grave into glory. This servant of God is the son of David, as is plain from lv. 3 sqq., which refer back to the promise of David. In Zechariah it is plainly taught that the Messiah is to be priest, making atonement for his people (iii.), and is crowned with the double crown, uniting the royal and priestly functions (vi. 9-15). He is to suffer death; and, when he is pierced, it is as though Jehovah himself were pierced (xii. 10-13).

3. The Apocrypha. — The question whether the Messianic expectation runs through the apocryphal books of the Old Testament has been recently discussed with a good deal of heat, but without overthrowing the old position, that only faint indications of the Messianic hope are found in them. Turning first to the apocryphal Chochma literature, we find that Ecclesiasticus speaks of the promises delivered to the patriarchs (xliv. 21 sqq.), David's glorious throne (xlvii. 11), and the coming of Elias (xlviii. 10), but nowhere even hints at the Messiah, the destroyer of sin, the consummator of the Davidic royalty. The Book of Wisdom borrows from the Old Testament the idea of a day of judgment, at which the divine kingdom shall be restored (iii. 7 sqq., v.); but there is not a vestige of a reference to the future King and Saviour of David's lineage. One passage (ii. 12-20) was referred by the ancient church to the death of Christ, but the connection forbids this reference. What is true of these two books is true of all the Apocrypha of the Old Testament. The Book of Baruch, which the writer attempted to set in the key of the old prophets, speaks of the glory of Jerusalem and the return of the people (iv. 21 sqq.), but has no word about the Messiah. The same is the case with Tobit, which refers to the conversion of the Gentiles (xiii. 8-18, xiv. 5-7), but not to the Messiah. The First Book of Maccabees breathes, more than any of the other Apocrypha, the theocratic spirit of the Old Testament; but here, too, there is no trace of a Messianic expectation. The Messianic hope had not died out among the people, as we shall see below; but it is evident that the Maccabean leaders and their party did not strengthen its courage by Messianic expectations. The expectation of the Messiah was associated with deliverance; and the people found in the patriotism of the Maccabees a substitute for the Messianic deliverance, so far as the national aspect was concerned, and their partial fulfilment in (Obad. 20 sq.; Amos ix. 11 sq.) John Hyrcanus, who united in his own person the offices of priest, prophet, and king. The moral aspect of the Messianic deliverance came, after a while, to be explained to be the deliverance of each individual by his own efforts. Philo represents this position, and found the ideal of the good and wise man, not in the future Messiah, but in the patriarchs, and especially in Moses, whom he praises as the holiest of men, uniting in his person royal, prophetic, and priestly functions (De prom. et pun., 9). For this reason we shall not be surprised to find the notion of a personal Messiah wanting in Philo's system. That "more divine than human revelation" of which he speaks, follows the description of the Shechinah of the wilderness, not the Messiah; and this is not the result of his preference for the Pentateuch over the prophetic books, for the Alexandrine version of the Pentateuch contains the term "Messiah." He does not mention an objective act of atonement, nor a restoration of David's throne; and the victorious conqueror of the heathen (Num. xxiv. 7) he explains away as the unperturbed courage and robust physical strength of the Jews.

In spite of what has been said, the Messianic hope which flamed forth under the Herods had not died out in this period. It was still held as a scholastic opinion, as is proved from the LXX., the earliest monument of the Jewish exegesis, which probably understood Gen. xlix. 10 in a Messianic sense, and Num. xxiv. 7, 17, when he whose kingdom is greater than that of Agag cannot be any one else than the Messiah. The same may be said of Isa. ix. 5, where they seem to have identified the Messiah with the angel of the Lord's presence. The earliest Targums prove the same thing as the LXX. (see below). The Messianic hope was also fostered in those narrow and pious circles (Essenic circles, Hilgenfeld) from which the Jewish apocalyptic literature sprang after the Maccabean period. To this literature we now turn.

4. The Hebrew Apocalyptic Literature. — The Book of Enoch, whose composition is put by the latest authorities in the year 110 B.C., substitutes for the seventy weeks of Daniel seventy periods in which heathen rulers shall govern. At the completion of these periods, the end will come (lxxxix. 59 sqq.), the heathen nations will be subdued, the new Jerusalem be established, and the Messiah reign (xc. 37 sqq.). The Messiah is represented under the figure of a white bullock, whom all the beasts of the earth, and fowls of the heavens (the heathen nations), shall acknowledge. The name of the Messiah occurs most frequently in chaps. xxxvii.—lxxi (which Hilgenfeld declares to have been written after Christ's birth), and was given before the world's creation (xlvi. 3). When he appears (xli. 4 sqq.), he will cast out all the great of the earth who refuse to acknowledge him from their seats of power: but even his enemies shall bow before him (li. 3-5, lxii. 9). If this section was written before Christ, then we have in it, as Hilgenfeld has said, "the highest doctrine of the Messiah known to us in the Hebrew literature before Christ." It also speaks of the Messiah as being at once the Lord from heaven and the son of a woman (lxii. 5), but does not teach an incarnation. The step is so great from the Messianic passages in the Old Testament to the Christological section in Enoch included between xxxvii. and lxxi as to force me to the conclusion of Hilgenfeld, that it is of post-Christian origin.

The Book of Daniel was much studied in Alexandria; and the apocalyptic thoughts it started were embodied in the Sibyl, a heathen voice announcing the glory of Judaism, and its triumph over heathenism. The oldest document ascribed to the Sibyl is the prophecy in the third of the Sibylline books, which Hilgenfeld puts in the year 140 B. C. This prophecy announces the Messiah: but the God of Israel is the great king, and he rules through prophets. It is the universal sway of the Mosaic law, and not the consummation of the Davidic authority, which is brought out. Virgil's description of the return of the golden age is very properly regarded as having drawn from this document. The Sibyl regards the fourth kingdom of Daniel as the Roman Empire; and in proportion as the Roman oppression was increased did the expectation become more intense, that the approach of the Messiah was near. These Sibylline books aided in spreading that general expectation which we find so prevalent in the heathen world, that a new period of the world's history was about to dawn, and which Suetonius (Vespas., 4) refers to as an old and firm opinion.

The Fourth Book of Ezra is the last of the Hebrew apocalyptic writings. The most recent criticism again refers its origin to a date before Christ, although we still prefer to place it about 100 A. D. The teachings concerning the Messiah include much that is peculiar to the Talmud. It represents the fourth world-power as the Roman Empire. The Messiah will come to bring the eagle (the Roman Empire) to judgment, and to cast it into the fire (xi. 37 sqq.), and, on the other hand, to bless the people of God until the day of the last judgment (xii. 33). In chap. xiii. the advent and work of the Messiah are more fully described. His face is as a consuming fire. The nations will give up their wars when he speaks. His reign, however, is limited to four hundred years, when he and all men living shall die, but, after seven days, rise again. The Highest will then reveal himself, and establish righteousness.

5. Culmination of the Messianic Expectation. — The expectation of the Messiah culminated in the Herodian period. This result was caused by the restlessness of the people under the dominion of Idumean and Roman rulers; and the people looked forward with great longing to the coming of the Son of David, which from henceforth is a title of the Messiah in the New Testament (Matt. ix. 27, etc.) and the Targums. The best authority on the subject, as it was held at this time, is the New Testament; after it, Josephus, who however, is very cautious in his utterances. The New Testament represents one of the essential features of the time to be the waiting for the Messiah (Luke i. 38, ii. 25), who should deliver Israel from its enemies, and redeem it from its sins (Luke i. 74-77). He was to establish righteousness, but only through suffering and conflict rise to his glory (Luke ii. 34; John i. 29). Very different was the Messianic hope of the Pharisees. They expected the kingdom of God to come with outward circumstance (Luke xvii. 20), and to be a political power. Their ideas were visibly embodied in Judas the Galilean, and the faction of the Zealots.

The vital power of these Messianic expectations is attested by the frequent outbreaks of the Jews against the Romans. Josephus (B. J., VI 5, 4) explains this inveterate hostility by a prophecy in their sacred books, of double meaning, according to which one should attain to dominion over the world from Judæa. He found the fulfilment in the Roman emperor Vespasian. The passage to which he referred was, in all probability, Dan. ix. 24-27.

The destruction of Jerusalem was by no means the grave of the Messianic hopes; on the contrary, from that event dates the reception of this belief as a Jewish article of faith; and Bar Cochba was able once more to gather the people about him, under the delusion that he was the Messiah, and to lead them into a death-struggle. Rabbi Akiba acknowledged his Messianic claims; but Hillel II., in the time of Constantine the Great (Grätz: Gesch. d. Juden., iv. 386), said, "There is no Messiah for Israel; for Israel had its Messiah long ago, in the days of Hezekiah." To which Rabbi Joseph replied, "May God forgive Hillel!" It was firmly believed that the Messiah would come. The manner and the time of that coming were questions in dispute. We shall now turn to the later opinions of the Jews, especially as they are embodied in the Targums of the elder Onkelos — which explains Gen. xlix. 10, Num. xxiv. 17, of the Messiah (the younger finding seventeen Messianic passages in the Pentateuch) — and Jonathan, the Mishna (which does not contain much), the two Gemaras, and the older writings of the Midrash.

6. Rabbinical Views. — Jewish theology distinguished two periods (æons), by which they did not mean this world and the world to come, but two periods in this world's history. The second period follows upon the resurrection. Some taught that the Messianic period began before, some after, that event. The former was the prevailing view; and R. Eliezar says, that, in the days of the Messiah, wars will continue. The duration of the Messianic kingdom is variously defined. The principal reference is Bab. Sanh., 97 sqq. After limiting the duration of the world to six thousand years, to be followed by a universal sabbath lasting a thousand (Rab Ketina) or two thousand (Abaji) years, during which the world will lie desolate, it says, "It is a tradition of the school of Elias, that the world will last six thousand years, two thousand of which are desolation (Thohu), two thousand law (Thora), two thousand the Messianic period; but, on account of our sins, a part of the latter is run out." In another place, leaning upon Persian sources, it says, that, after 4,291 years should have elapsed from the creation of the world, the war between Gog and Magog would begin; and then the Messiah would come, and, at the end of seven thousand years, God would create a new world.

The Messiah was to appear suddenly (Bab. Sanh., 97: "Three things come unexpectedly, — the Messiah, that which is found, and a scorpion"), but whether in Nisan (the month of the deliverance from Egypt) or Tisri (Ps. lxxxii. 14) was a matter of dispute. Signs would precede his coming. R. Jochanan says (Bab. Sanh., 98), "The Son of David will not come, except in that generation when all are either undeserving of punishment (Isa. lx. 21), or all are guilty (Isa. lix. 16)." R. Acha asserts, that, if Israel was in a state of penitence only for a single day, the Son of David would at once come; and he bases the assertion on Ps. xcv. 7. R. Levi says, that, if Israel observed only a single day according to the rules, the Messiah would immediately come. It was believed that the Messiah would appear at a time of great moral depravity (see especially Mishna Sota, ix. 15), unchastity, drunkenness, heresy, etc.

As to the person of this Messiah, it cannot be questioned that the most current view amongst the Jews was that which Trypho — after declaring the doctrines of the divinity and eternal pre-existence of Christ to be absurd — indicates in the Dialogue of Justin Martyr (c. 49): "We all expect that Christ will be a man born of men." Not even in the oldest Targums can the doctrine of the superhuman dignity of the Messiah be found; and in the Targum of Jonathan at Isa. vii. 14, Mic. v. 2, there is no trace of a reference to his birth from a virgin; and the explanation of Isa. ix. 5 is ambiguous. But the notion of the Messiah's superhuman nature was not altogether wanting, as is proved by a reference to some of the Midrashim, especially Bereschith rabba, edited, according to Zunz, in the sixth century. The latter identifies the Spirit of God moving upon the face of the waters (Gen. i. 2) with the Messiah; declares him to be higher than the patriarchs, Moses, and the angelic ministers (at Gen. xxviii. 10 sq.); asserts, that, in the future world, he will be at God's right hand, Abraham at his left, etc. (at Gen. xviii. 1). It was taught that the Messiah was to live in obscurity after his birth. According to the Talmud, he was born at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, received the name Menaheem, but, being made known by a Jew, was separated by storm from his mother (Hieros. Berachoth, 5). His place of abode afterwards was Rome, Isa. xxi. 11 being used as proof, and Edom being regarded as referring to Rome. There, according to the famous passage (Bab. Sanh., 98), he sat at the gate of the city, surrounded by the sick and suffering, whose wounds he bound up, and waiting for that day (Ps. xcv. 7) when the people should repent, and warrant his going to them. It is in this same passage that the Messiah is called "the Leper," the proof-text being Isa. liii. 4. This description of a state of humility and obscurity through which the Messiah was to pass shows the influence of Isa. liii. upon the Talmud. It was represented that Elijah would precede the Messiah in person, until Maimonides (Mal. iv. 5) explained the prophecy of one coming in the spirit of Elijah. Many represented that the Messiah's first act would be the breaking of the foreign yoke; and some rabbins held that he would arouse the righteous dead, but in regard to the resurrection of the dead there was a great divergence of views amongst the Jewish theologians.

A great interest centres in the question, whether the Jewish teachers taught an atonement for sin through the sufferings and death of the Messiah. (See WÜNSCHE: D. Leiden d. Messias, 1870.) There is no doubt that the old Jews referred the Messianic passages in Zechariah and Isa. liii. to the Messiah; and Trypho (Justin. c. 89) says, "It is evident that our Scriptures announced that Christ will suffer;" but the idea of atoning sufferings is not to be found in the Talmud associated with him. Its method of salvation is expressed in these words (Berachoth, 5): "Their sins are all forgiven who study the Law, do acts of mercy, and bury their children." The Christ of the atonement was an offence to the Jews. The Targum of Jonathan, in its paraphrase of Isa. liii. 5, says, "By his teaching, peace will be multiplied upon us; and, if we hearken to his words, our sins shall be forgiven." The teaching spoken of must refer to a revision of the Mosaic law, which was deemed of permanent validity, stretching even to the future world (Pesikta sut.). In regard to the fate of the Gentile nations, some taught full citizenship would be offered to them; others, that not even the privileges of the proselyte would be granted.

He was a learned theologian, an excellent preacher, and one of the main supports of the French Reformed Church in the seventeenth century, very active in its synods, in its disputations with the Jesuits, and in its negotiations with the court. He published several collections of sermons, of which the most remarkable is the Exposition de l'épître aux Hébreux, Geneva, 1655, 3 vols. Of his numerous polemical writings, his treatise, De la Communion à J. C. au Sacrement de l'Eucharistie, Sedan, 1624, was translated into German 1624, English 1631, and Italian 1638. METALS IN THE BIBLE. The use of bronze and iron was so old among the Hebrews, that they, like other ancient people, dated it back to the very beginning of history. (Compare Gen. iv. 22.) Abraham was rich in gold and silver, and the treasures of David and Solomon were famous (1 Chron. xxii. 14, xxix. 4; 1 Kings ix. 26, x. 27; 2 Chron. viii. 18). Palestine itself, however, is not rich in metal-bearing strata, but the neighbor countries are; and, since the author of the Book of Job shows a considerable knowledge of mining, he may very well have acquired it from personal experience. According to Strabo, gold and silver were dug in the land of the Nabateans, and, according to Edrisi, at Gebel es-Serâ in the Seir Mountains, and along the boundary-line between Egypt and Nubia; but the principal places from which it was derived were Ophir (1 Kings ix. 26, 27, x. 11, 12, 22, 24; 2 Chron. viii. 17, 18, ix. 10), Uphaz (Jer. x. 9; Dan. x. 5), Havilah (Gen. ii. 11, 12, x. 29), Sheba (1 Kings x. 2, 10; 2 Chron. ix. 9; Ps. lxxii. 15; Isa. lx. 6; Ezek. xxvii.), and Parvaim (2 Chron. iii. 6), — places, which, according to Sprenger (Die alte Geographie Arabiens) and Soetheer (Das Goldland Ofir, Berlin, 1880), were situated in Jemm, on the south-western coast of Arabia. Copper and iron were found at Punon, between Zoar and Petra, the region in which Moses raised the brass serpent (Num. xxi. 9, xxxiii. 12), and still more plentifully in the peninsula of Sinai, where the Wady Megharâ was specially famous. According to its rock-inscriptions, the Egyptian king Sufra, the successor of Cheops (3122-2978), opened mines there fifteen hundred years before the time of Moses. Noticeable were the copper-works of Lebanon, of which traces are still visible, and the iron-works east of the Jordan, midway between the Lake of Genesareth and the Dead Sea, which Ibrahim Pasha once more put into order (1835-39). Most of the metal, however, used by the Hebrews, was brought to them by the Phœnicians.

Gold generally occurs more or less mixed with silver, and silver more or less mixed with some baser metal; but the Hebrews understood the various processes of purification; and gold from Ophir was specially valued on account of its purity (Job xxviii. 16; Ps. xlv. 9; Isa. xlii. 12). Before the exile, neither gold nor silver was coined into money, though both were used in the payment of tributes (2 Kings xii. 18, xiv. 14; xviii. 14, xxiii. 33) and of taxes (Exod. xxv. 3, xxxv. 5; 1 Kings x. 15; 2 Chron. ix. 14). Gold and silver were mostly used for ornaments, such as bracelets (Gen. xxiv. 22), chains (Gen. xli. 42), tablets (Exod. xxxv. 22), and necklaces (Exod. xxxv. 22), or for embroidery (Exod. xxxix. 3; 2 Sam. i. 24) and decoration. Especially was silver lavishly used in the outfit of the temple, — for the sockets of the boards (Exod. xxvi. 19, xxxvi. 24), for the hooks of the pillars (Exod. xxxviii. 10, 19), for the bowls and chargers (Num. vii. 13), the trumpets (Num. x. 2), the candlesticks, and tables (1 Chron. xxviii. 15, etc.). Copper was very commonly used. It could easily be smelted and fused; and those processes naturally suggested its being mixed with other metals, especially so as to produce bronze. Iron was more difficult to handle. It could be purified by smelting away all foreign elements, but it could not be smelted or fused itself. The smith, however, understood to forge it into axes, swords, etc. (1 Sam. xvii. 7; 2 Sam. xxiii. etc.). The "north ern iron" (Jer. xv. 12) seems to correspond to what we call steel. Zinc and lead were also known, and applied in various ways in practical life. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

METAPHRASTES, Simeon, a Byzantine writer, who has acquired a name in mediæval literature by a compilation and partial remodelling (μετέφρασε, whence his name) of a great number of lives of saints and martyrs. Of his personal life nothing is known with certainty. Leo Allatius, and, after him, Cave and Fabricius, place him in the first half of the tenth century, in the reigns of Leo the philosopher and his son Constantine; while Oudin, and, after him, Hamberger and others, place him in the middle of the twelfth century, in the reign of John Comnenus. The work itself, such as it exists in numerous manuscripts in the libraries of Vienna, Paris, Moscow, and London, and such as it has been partially incorporated with the Acta Sanctorum, is a bewildering maze of old and new, genuine and spurious; a hundred and twenty-two lives being considered genuine, and four hundred and forty-four spurious. Other works ascribed to him are Epistolarum IX., Carmina, Sermones, etc. The Simeonis Chronicon is of doubtful authorship. GASS.

METH, Ezechiel, and STIEFEL, Esaias, were the leaders of a sect of mystical enthusiasts, which, in the first half of the seventeenth century, caused considerable trouble to the authorities in Thuringia. Stiefel, a wine-dealer in Langensalza, was the originator of the whole movement; but Meth, his nephew, seems to have been its principal power. Many of their relatives and acquaintances joined them, and neither admonitions nor punishments had any effect. The Countess Juliane of Gleichen separated from her husband, convinced that she was going to bring forth the Messiah. But, when Stiefel died (Aug. 12, 1627), Meth felt sorely disappointed, as he believed him immortal; and Meth is said to have died a converted Christian, Oct. 26, 1640. The views of the sect, such as represented in Zehn christliche und gottselige Traktätlein von Esaias Stiefel and Die zwölf Artikel, welche Ezechiël Meth von Langensalza bekennt, are almost identical with those of the Anabaptists and Schwenkfeld. See K. F. GÖSCHEL: Chronik der Stadt Langensalza in Thüringen, 1818, vol. ii. p. 310. K. F. GÖSCHEL.

METHODISM, the third epochal religious movement in the history of the Protestant Church in England, sprang from the bosom of the Church of England in the last century, against whose religious apathy it was a protest, and sought to make Christianity a more vital force, and to leaven the neglected masses with the leaven of the gospel. It has with justice been called the "Second Reformation" of England, and the "starting-point of our modern religious history" (Isaac Taylor).

The Puritans, whose brief term of power came to a close with the Restoration (1660), gradually lost their zeal, or were involved in the meshes of deism. The Church of England, on the other hand, had fallen into a low spiritual condition. It still had its able and pious men, competent and willing to defend the faith; but the churches were empty, and the masses neglected. The condition of the lower clergy was a lamentable one; and idleness, indifference, and ignorance reigned among them, while many of the higher clergy enjoyed the benefits of their livings, but left to curates their religious exercises. The prominent prelates of the church contemplated its condition with grief, and looked forward to its future with alarm. As they were vainly looking around them for help, it came from an unexpected quarter and in an unexpected way. Several students, in 1729, had combined at Oxford, for the study of the Scriptures and religious conversation. Of their number the most prominent were John Wesley (1703-91) and his brother Charles (1708-88), and, several years later, George Whitefield (1716-70). In sport they were called "Sacramentarians," the "Pious Club," and also, on account of their regular habits of study and mode of life, "Methodists,"—a name which they themselves afterwards adopted, defining a "Methodist" as one who lived after the method laid down in the Bible. It was from this club of Methodists that the religious regeneration of England proceeded. The first period of the history of Methodism synchronizes with the history of the latter's career: the second dates from his death.

I. HISTORY OF METHODISM TILL THE DEATH OF JOHN WESLEY, 1791. — The club at Oxford, which spent several evenings in the week in the study of the Scriptures, first began to show its works in the visitation of the poor, sick, and imprisoned. After six years (1735), the Wesleys departed to Georgia, in answer to calls,—the one to be pastor of the colony, the other to be missionary to the Indians. On board ship they came in contact with twenty-six Moravians, and much to their spiritual profit. John Wesley once said, "I went to America to convert others, and was not converted myself." They both had returned, by 1738, to England. Soon afterwards John Wesley and Whitefield began preaching in London churches, and by their fervid eloquence excited a deep sensation.

The movement afterwards known as "Methodism" had begun to develop its prodigious power. Like a mighty storm, the new preaching shook the hearts of the hearers, and threw new converts into the dust; so that, with great agitation and much crying, they entreated for mercy. The representatives of the movement were, on the other hand, treated to ridicule, scorn, and active persecution. But the movement spread in spite of resistance. Nothing was at first farther from the thought of John Wesley than to act independently of the English Church. He himself was a High-Churchman; but the Church of England turned a deaf ear to Wesley's appeals, and shut its places of worship against him and his co-workers. But the work was to go on; and on Feb. 17, 1739, Whitefield inaugurated (or, rather, restored) field-preaching at a service with the colliers of Kingswood. Wesley, overcoming his first feelings of revolt, followed his example at Bristol; and, when the public places were denied him, he established the first Methodist chapel at that place, May 12, 1739. Great throngs now gathered to hear these two preachers, in Moorfields, Kensington Common, Mayfair, Blackheath, and other places. Nothing of the kind had been seen since the Reformation,—no, not even then. They and others knew, as Isaac Taylor has said, "how to hold the ear of men with an absolute mastery." Their sermons were interrupted by disturbing noises and personal violence; but their courage increased, and John Wesley could exclaim, "To save souls is my vocation, the world is my parish." In 1740 (July 23) he organized, with twenty-six male and forty-eight female members, the United Society in the Foundry, London. The year following (1741) Cennick, who had charge of a Methodist school at Kingswood, and advocated strict Calvinistic views, separated from Wesley, with fifty-two others; and, soon after, a further division took place in the Methodist ranks, in consequence of a difference, upon the doctrine of predestination, between Wesley and Whitefield, the latter holding to the Calvinistic view. The consequence was a Calvinistic and Wesleyan (or Arminian) branch of Methodism, the latter being much the stronger.

As the numbers of the congregations increased, the organization of the Methodist movement, or the "societies" as they were called, occupied Wesley's attention. With no other resort within reach, he somewhat reluctantly selected the most competent of the converts as lay-preachers. Maxfield had preached without his knowledge, but with great acceptance; and him he made the first lay-preacher (or helper), but not till his scruples had been removed by the strong words of his mother: "Take care what you do with respect to that young man, for he is as surely called of God to preach as you are." In 1742 the number had already risen to 20. These men were without much education, but became eloquent by reason of a living faith, and, as local and itinerant preachers, accomplished an immense amount of good, suffering often imprisonment and other personal indignities in the work. Education was not a condition of a license to preach; but, by the rules of 1746, simply a gift for preaching and personal faith were required. They were licensed at first as "preachers on trial," for one year. By a rule passed in 1763 they were not allowed to remain longer than two years (afterwards extended to three years) in the same place.

The life of Methodism was settled by the admission of lay-preachers. The next thing in the way of perfecting the organization was the inauguration of an Annual Conference, the first session being held June 25-29, 1744, in the Foundry, London. Four lay-preachers were admitted. In the first instance it was designed by Wesley to be simply a meeting with his friends. But it came to be more of an authoritative body, with the power of discussing questions of doctrine, and formulating rules. The minutes of the early conferences were first published in 1763.

The first Methodist organizations were called "societies;" and the General Rules, so called, drawn up by Wesley for the guidance of the members, forbade blasphemy, sabbath desecration, dishonesty, usury, etc., and enjoined works of charity, and the use of the private and public means of grace. The societies were divided into classes; and here we come in contact with a peculiarly Methodist institution, and one of its sources of power. The idea struck John Wesley in Bristol, when, in order to raise money to pay the debt of the chapel, he divided the members into classes of twelve, and appointed one of them to collect from the other eleven a penny a week. Henceforth, all the societies were divided into classes, with a class-leader, who gathered the classes together once a week, presided over their meeting, and conversed with them on their spiritual estate. The separate societies were united in circuits; and in 1748 there were nine of these, with about seventy-two societies. These circuits were occupied by itinerant and local preachers, over whom one of their number presided as the overseer, with the title at first of assistant, and later of superintendent. (The Wesleyans in America call them "bishops.") Each society had a corps of officers called "stewards," who met twice a week, and cared for its temporal concerns and diaconal work.

This was the excellent outward organization of the Methodist body. But that which gave it power was the fresh blood of the gospel, which coursed through its veins. All the lay-talent was employed, the gifts of preaching were put into requisition, prayer-meetings (1762) gave an opportunity for all to exercise their powers, and, with the love-feasts, an opportunity for mutual encouragement and edification.

It is impossible here to follow the work of Wesley and his coadjutors in detail. They passed into districts where the people were most destitute, from a religious point of view. Methodism spread into Scotland, where Whitefield preached in 1711, and Wesley in 1751; and four circuits — Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, and Glasgow — were constituted. It was planted in Ireland in 1747, and both the Wesleys were soon after on the ground. At the end of thirty years, there were in Great Britain 50 circuits, 100 itinerant preachers, a larger number of local preachers, and 30,000 members, connected with the Methodist societies.

In another direction, but with the same aims as the Wesleys, Whitefield had been continuing to work, as also that eminent woman Lady Huntington (d. 1791), — the one preaching without rest, in England and America, to immense and entranced throngs; the other building chapels with her private means, and seeking to interest the nobility in vital religion. Whitefield died in 1770. The year before, the Conference, with Wesley at its head, made very strong utterances against Calvinism. A protracted discussion followed, carried on by the apostolic Fletcher (d. 1785) and Wesley on the one hand, and Toplady, Rowland Hill, and others, on the other, and also divisions among Wesley's followers.

The management of the Methodist movement had been in the hands of Wesley almost exclusively, but provision had to be made for a more permanent government. In consequence, the so-called "Deed of Declaration" was drawn up by Wesley (Feb. 28, 1784), and filed in the High Court of Chancery, in which he renounced his claim to the chapels, etc., in favor of the stewards, and conferred the right of appointing preachers upon the Conference, to be composed of a hundred members. This Conference was to sit every year for not less than five days, and its members were to be drawn from the clergy exclusively. This document established Methodism permanently. But it became at once the occasion of passionate discussions among the Methodists, as well as of divisions. Wesley was accused of being hierarchical, and intolerant of lay-participation in the management of the church, and of holding too firmly to the Church of England.

In 1784 Wesley took a step which formally put him outside of the pale of the Church of England. Called upon in 1784 to send ministers to America, he requested the Bishop of London to ordain several of his lay-preachers. On receiving a refusal, he himself ordained two such preachers, and Dr. Coke, his able co-worker, as superintendent. Charles Wesley was much pained at hearing of this; but, at the Conference of 1785, John ordained three preachers for Scotland, and, two years subsequently, three for England. Before that time, the Methodists had received the sacrament from the ministers of the Church of England.

John Wesley died in 1791, leaving behind him an example to his followers of Christian humility, purity of motive, and laboriousness, which will continue to be a perennial source of inspiration. He lived to see his words verified, — "The world is my parish." The following figures were presented to the Conference of 1790, the last he attended.

COUNTRIES.	Circuits.	Preachers.	Members.

These were some of the practical results of the self-sacrificing zeal and indomitable purpose of Wesley and the early Methodists.

Wesley's theology had a predominantly practical trend. He himself was no creative mind in this department, nor did he ever think of founding a new system of theology. He stood almost wholly upon the platform of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. His system is called Arminian; but it must not be forgotten that he did not reject, as did the followers of Arminius, the doctrines of original sin and the Trinity. He taught very definitely the fall of man, the necessity of grace, and justification by faith alone. But his moral nature rose in revolt against the doctrines of absolute election, irresistible grace, and the perseverance of saints. He taught a conditional election and the possibility of falling away from grace. Two points upon which he laid great stress were regeneration and sanctification (perfection). By the former he meant a sudden conversion; the individual being able, like Wesley himself, to put his finger on the place on the face of the clock when he felt the power of a new life. This doctrine, which was almost a novel one at that time to the Church of England, has had a great power, especially among the masses; but it has also given rise to the abuse of laying an undue stress upon the affections. The doctrine of sanctification, or Christian perfection, Wesley also developed, appealing to passages like Ezek. xxxvi. 25; Matt. v. 48; John xvii. 19, 23; Eph. v. 25-27; 1 Thess. v. 23; 1 John v. 19. Perfection is attainable on the general ground that God would not demand any thing which could not be reached. An absolute and sinless perfection he did not teach, and repeatedly explains that it does not consist of freedom from ignorance, and error in things which are not essential to salvation, or of freedom from physical weaknesses, but of supreme love to God, and an equal love to our neighbor. In other words, the perfection of Wesley is relative, a purely moral perfection, in which love has consumed sin. In regard to this, as to other gifts of grace, he taught that it could be lost. The doctrinal authorities in the Wesleyan Methodist Church are the Works of John Wesley and Fletcher, and the Minutes of the Conferences, especially the Large Minutes, which are a summary of the Minutes from 1744 to 1789.

II. HISTORY OF METHODISM FROM 1791 TO THE PRESENT TIME. — Wesley foresaw dissensions in the church after his death, and left behind him a document for the Conference, urging the members to covenant not to assume authority the one over the other, or to be partial in the distribution of the funds. But differences of opinion at once revealed themselves. One party was in favor of the "old plan;" that is, the continuance of the union with the Church of England. Another party were strongly in favor of separation. There was also a decided difference of opinion in regard to lay-representation in the Conference, which Wesley had opposed. Alexander Kilham led the party favoring separation; and he was supported by numerous memorials to the Conference, but defeated by a large majority in the body. The Conference united the circuits into districts, and formed the so-called "district committee," consisting of all the ministers of the district, which was to have authority to locate (subject to the confirmation of the Conference) and suspend ministers, etc. The year following (1793), it accorded to the societies the right of administering the sacraments, and ordained that no steward should be removed from office before his guilt was proved in the presence of the other stewards and the class-leaders. But, these concessions failing to satisfy all, a Plan of Pacification was passed in 1795, which went farther in the direction of separation from the Church of England, vested the power of locating ministers in the hand of the Conference (subject to the will of the stewards), in general accorded more power to the lay-element, and confirmed the law limiting the representation in the Conference to a hundred.

Kilham, discontented with the continued refusal of the Conference to admit laymen as representatives, sought to arouse opposition to that body. The Conference, in its turn, suspended Kilham, and endeavored to quiet the agitation by according more power to the lay-element in the so-called "Regulations of Leeds" (1797). Still dissatisfied, Kilham and three other preachers broke off from the parent society, and on Aug. 9, 1797, founded in Leeds THE METHODIST NEW CONNECTION, with which 5,000 seceders at once united. This body adopts the Wesleyan teaching and polity in every regard except in its treatment of the laymen, to whom it accords an equal representation with the clergy. In 1881 it had 26,564 communicants, with 176 ministers.

THE PRIMITIVE METHODIST CONNECTION has grown much more rapidly. It grew out of the endeavor of Bourne and Clowes to introduce camp-meetings into England. Excluded by Conference, they established a new body in 1810, which preserved substantially the Wesleyan teachings, except in the matter of lay-representation. They admit delegates in the proportion of two laymen to one clergyman, and are distinguished for their original Methodist simplicity in the pulpit and private life. The body carries on missionary work in Canada, New Zealand, and Australia. In 1881 it had 185,312 members and 1,149 preachers.

In 1815 there was another separation, of the so-called BIBLE CHRISTIANS, or BRYANITES, of whom William O'Bryan was the founder. It grew out of a feeling of discontent with the remuneration of the itinerant preachers. In 1881 they had 21,209 members. In 1816, 9,000 of the Methodists of Ireland formed a new organization, under the name of the PRIMITIVE WESLEYAN METHODISTS. The leader of the movement was Adam Averill, who revolted against the departure from Wesley's original plan in allowing the societies to hold their services at the same time with those of the Anglican Church. In 1877 the body was again united with the Wesleyan Methodists.

The secessions were not yet at an end. Every new question admitting of a difference of opinion seemed to carry in it the seeds of dissension and separation. In 1828 the INDEPENDENT WESLEYANS and the WESLEYAN PROTESTANT METHODISTS went out from the main body; the original occasion being a dispute over the introduction of an organ into a chapel at Leeds against the wish of the class-leaders. Neither of these bodies attained much importance. Of more significance was the Warren movement of 1834, occasioned by the project of the Conference to establish a theological seminary, against which Dr. Samuel Warren protested. Warren was ultimately excluded from the Conference, and, with 20,000 others, constituted the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION (see below).

The church continued to have peace for ten years, when (in 1811) it was again interrupted by the so-called Fly Sheets, which, unsigned, were sent to every Wesleyan minister, and were directed against Dr. Bunting, who for thirty years had been one of the most influential men in the body. The cry was, "Too much centralization of power." It was evident that the Fly Sheets represented the feelings of a party. The Conference of 1817 took notice of them, and passed a law requiring every minister who had not taken part in their dissemination to sign a document to that effect. About one-fourth of the clergy (256) refused their signatures, rebelling against conduct which they regarded as inquisitorial. The party represented by the Fly Sheets, now emboldened, established two organs, — The Wesleyan Times and The Wesleyan Banner. The agitation spread; and Dunn, the editor of the latter, Griffith, a co-editor of the former, and Everett, the author of the Fly Sheets, were excluded from Conference, while others were reprimanded. The excluded preachers were regarded as martyrs. Meetings were held, and finally, on March 12, 1850, in London, a convention of Wesleyan delegates. This meeting, while confessing its sympathy with the teachings of Wesleyanism, demanded lay-representation and other concessions. A petition, signed by 50,000 Methodists, was presented to the Conference, which, however, refused to accept it. The excitement in Methodist circles was intense, and in a single year (1850-51) the body lost 56,000 communicants. In 1850 the British Conference in England alone had 358,277 communicants, and in 1855 only 260,858. It continued, however, year after year, to refuse any concessions; and the agitators, finding their efforts hopeless, ceased agitating. Of the 100,000 who had left the main body, 19,000 in 1857 united with the Protestant Methodists and the Wesleyan Methodist Association (numbering 21,000 members) to form the association of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. They hold an Annual Assembly composed of ministerial and lay delegates, each five hundred church-members being entitled to one delegate. In 1881 they numbered 72,839 members. The other reformers went to other denominations, except the few who organized the WESLEYAN REFORM UNION, which in 1880 numbered 7,860 members.

It took a number of years for the wound which the Wesleyan Church had suffered to be healed. The increase in the number of communicants from 1855 to 1882 has been from 260,858 to 509,367 members (51,489 on trial), 2,121 ministers (298 on trial), and 311 supernumeraries. After its victory it was wise enough to give the lay membership a larger representation on the committees, and in 1877 to constitute a Representative Conference, composed of laymen and clergymen in equal proportion. It does not take the place of the Conference of a hundred, but is auxiliary to it.

During this second period of its history, Methodism has not outgrown its original zeal and energy, but has shown itself more expansive, combining with the simplicity of early years a more perfected organization and broader culture. Its churches are no longer all chapels, but vie with those of other denominations in elegance of architecture, and luxury of furniture; its members also have wealth; its preachers lay more stress upon education, until now they have seminaries at Richmond, Didsbury (Manchester), Headingley (Leeds), and Belfast. The Primitive Methodists have also established a school of theology in Sunderland; and the Methodist New Connection, at Ranmoor, Sheffield.

From the very start, the Methodist body has been most active in carrying on missionary labors. At the time of Wesley's death, there were already 5,848 communicants connected with its foreign stations. Dr. Coke was the first superintendent of Methodist missions; and his indefatigable zeal secured the funds, and established stations in many different parts of the world. The Fiji and other Islands of the Southern Pacific were Christianized exclusively by their zeal. The West Indies were another of the main stations of early Methodist missions; and in 1880 they had there 46,082 communicants among the negroes. In 1795 it began its mission at Sierra Leone, proverbial, as a convict colony, for its moral degradation, which now has 13,647 communicants. It has since established missions in India, China, and other foreign lands, as well as in Germany, Italy, France, and other countries of Europe. In 1878 the Methodist Church in Canada and British America numbered 124,000 communicants. The Australian Conference, founded in 1877, has now 70,000 members.

In surveying the history of Methodism from its beginning, we are struck with the aggressive feature of this movement. Wesley felt that the masses were neglected, and he went out to meet them with the gospel in his hand. In Great Britain, Methodism found its first great field among the destitute and neglected, the poor and forsaken: on the New Continent, it has always been first on the frontiers. It is true that the Anglican Church now vies with the Methodists in working among the lower classes, and there is danger of their neglecting them in their zeal for culture; but this remains one of the merits of the body, that it has emphasized aggressive church activity. This activity it was the further merit of Wesley to emphasize as the privilege and duty of all Christians. The laity were not to be merely receptive, but active. One of the great sources of power in Methodism has been the extent of lay-activity. Lay-preaching, the conduct of the classes, the prayer-meeting, — these all have afforded an opportunity for the use of lay-gifts, and at the same time have drawn them forth.

In this connection we may refer to the philanthropy of Methodism. Before Elizabeth Fry had entered the prisons, and long before the institution of the Ragged-schools, the Methodists were laboring among the destitute, visiting jails, distributing tracts, and establishing free Sunday schools; and among the first to condemn slavery was the founder of Methodism.

Repeated attempts have been made to win the Methodist Church back to the communion from which it came. All such efforts have heretofore proved in vain, and the prospect is that they will in the future. (See RIGG: The Churchmanship of John Wesley.) It has won for itself, in spite of scorn and persecutions, a place of power in the State and Church of Great Britain. It has its representatives in Parliament, and no statesman can afford to trifle with it any longer. It roused the Anglican Church itself to activity and renewed faith a hundred years ago, and has not only a history behind it, but a work before it. The fulfilment of its great aim depends upon its continued emphasis upon the practical temper of its founder. It was this which has given it the sway over a constituency of 15,000,000 in all parts of the world.

[On Wednesday, Sept. 7, 1881, there assembled in City Road Chapel, London, the first Ecumenical Methodist Conference, consisting of 400 delegates. The suggestion came from the General Conference of the Methodist-Episcopal Church of the United States in 1876; but the place of meeting was appropriately "the principal centre of John Wesley's labors, and close to which he had finished his course." The conference represented 28 different branches of the Methodist family of churches, with an aggregate of 89,292 local preachers and 5,000,000 church-members. The first session of the conference was presided over by the Rev. Dr. George Osborn, president of the British Wesleyan Conference; and the opening sermon was by Bishop Simpson of the Methodist-Episcopal Church of America. On the evening of the day before, a public reception, at the Mansion House, was given to the delegates by the Rt. Hon. William McArthur, mayor of London, who is a Wesleyan. The conference was in every way a success. It closed upon Tuesday, Sept. 20. The second conference is to be held in the United States, in Louisville, Ky., 1887. METHODISM IN AMERICA. I. EARLY HISTORY. — The great religious movement inaugurated by the Wesleys and their co-laborers could not long be confined to Great Britain. It was natural that the British Colonies should likewise be recipients of some brands from the great conflagration in the mother-country. America was no exception. Among those on the European side of the Atlantic who were most benefited by the Wesleyan revival were the Irish Palatines of Court Mattrass, Killiheen, and Balligarrane. In 1760 a party of these German refugees left their Irish home to seek their fortune in America, and arrived in New York, Aug. 10. The emigrants included in their number Philip Embury, a class-leader and local preacher, and Barbara Heck, wife of Paul Heck. Embury seems to have lost a part of his zeal on coming to America; and it was not until 1766, that, upon the earnest entreaty of Barbara Heck, he began to preach in his own house to such as could be induced to go there for religious service. In February of the following year, Capt. Thomas Webb of the British army appeared among the worshippers at Embury's house, and presented his credentials as a local preacher; and from that time forward he became an active agent in the establishment of American Methodism. Embury's house soon became too small for the rapidly increasing audience, and a more commodious room in the neighborhood was obtained. Through the preaching of Embury and Webb, vast numbers were attracted to the services, requiring still larger accommodations. A rigging-loft on William Street, sixty feet by eighteen, was hired in 1767; but this would not accommodate one-half of the people who desired to attend. Barbara Heck, with womanly foresight and spiritual zeal, secured the erection of the first Methodist chapel in America. A site on John Street was purchased in 1770, and a building was constructed of stone, faced with blue plaster. Capt. Webb was very active in the spread of Methodism. He founded societies in various parts of the country, notably in Philadelphia, where he formed a class of seven members in 1767 or 1768, and aided in the purchase of the first Methodist church of that city (St. George's) in 1770. Interest in the new movement increased with such rapidity, that it was impossible to supply the demand for preaching. Appeals were sent to England for help; and in response to the call, on the 3d of August, 1769, from the Conference, then in session at Leeds, Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor were sent over. In 1771 Francis Asbury and Richard Wright were sent to assist in the farther spread of Methodism in this country. In the following year they were joined by Thomas Rankin and George Shadford.

The first Methodist Conference held in America convened in St. George's Church, Philadelphia, on Wednesday, July 14, 1773, and closed on Friday, the 16th. Its members were Thomas Rankin, Richard Boardman, Joseph Pilmoor, Francis Asbury, Richard Wright, George Shadford, Thomas Webb, John King, Abraham Whitworth, and Joseph Yearbo, — ten in all. The aggregate membership of the classes reported was 1,160, although there were many adherents beside. At this session the Wesleyan discipline was made binding on all the preachers and adherents of American Methodism. The second Conference occurred in May of the following year, when the returns indicated 10 circuits, 17 preachers, and 2,073 members. At the Conference of 1775 the returns showed a membership of 3,148. The Revolution, now coming on, wrought great hardship to the itinerants and to the entire body of Methodist adherents. The progress of the movement, though steadily onward for a time, was not only checked, but caused to retrograde at last.

In 1776 there was a membership of 4,921, and an itinerant roll of 25; in 1777, 6,968 members and 38 itinerants. The year which followed this conference was one of clouds and darkness to American liberty and the cause of Methodism. British arms were successful. The itinerants were persecuted, and in some instances compelled to seek safety in seclusion; and Methodism, instead of pursuing its onward way with its accustomed vigor, declined considerably. The sixth Annual Conference convened at Leesburg, Va., May 19, 1778, when the returns indicated 6,095 members and 30 ministers,—a loss of 873 members and 8 preachers. New York and Philadelphia were in the hands of the British, and many other parts of the land were under the menace of the enemy's guns. But Methodism emerged from the Revolution strong and vigorous, with no purpose to relinquish the field for any opposition. During the summer of 1783, a few months after the close of the war, Asbury wrote,—

"We have about 14,000 members, between 70 and 80 travelling preachers, between 30 and 40 circuits. . . . I admire the simplicity of our preachers. I do not think there has appeared another such a company of young devoted men. The gospel has taken a universal spread. . . . O America, America! It certainly will be the glory of the world for religion."

II. METHODIST-EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—The authority of England over America was now at an end; and the relation of the "societies" to the English Church could not be maintained, as in the mother-country. Something must be done to provide for the sacraments among this vast body of believers. In 1784 Mr. Wesley determined to ordain, in accordance with the usages of the Established Church, as elders or presbyters, Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vasey, and to set apart Thomas Coke, a presbyter of the Church of England, as a bishop, under the modest title of "superintendent." The ordination took place at Bristol, on the first and second days of September, 1784. The three arrived in New York Nov. 3, and began preaching, and administering the sacrament.

On Friday, Dec. 24, 1784, the preachers assembled in Baltimore, in what has since been known as the "Christmas Conference." Dr. Coke presided, and, on taking the chair, presented a letter from Mr. Wesley, recommending the organization of a church, with Thomas Coke and Francis Asbury as superintendents. Asbury would not accept the responsible station, unless also elected by a vote of his brethren of the Conference. Coke and Asbury were unanimously elected superintendents. On Saturday, the second day of the session, Asbury was ordained a deacon by Coke, Vasey, and Whatcoat; on Sunday he was ordained an elder; and on Monday he was consecrated superintendent. The following is from Whatcoat's account of the Conference:—

"On the 24th we rode to Baltimore. At ten o'clock we began our conference, in which we agreed to form a Methodist-Episcopal Church, in which the Liturgy (as presented by the Rev. John Wesley) should be read, and the sacraments administered by a superintendent, elders, and deacons, who shall be ordained by a presbytery, using the Episcopal form, as prescribed in the Rev. Mr. Wesley's Prayer-Book. Persons to be ordained are to be nominated by the superintendent, elected by the conference, and ordained by the imposition of the hands of the superintendent and elders. The superintendent has a negative voice."

The Conference lasted ten days, and resulted in the organization of a church which is to-day by far the largest body of Methodists on the face of the earth. The doctrinal basis of the organization was an abridgment of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church, consisting of Mr. Wesley's Twenty-four Articles, together with another, "Of the Rulers of the United States of America," making twenty-five; and these constitute, in the main, the doctrinal basis of all American Methodist bodies. (See ARMINIANISM.) The Christmas Conference above mentioned differed from the ordinary annual meeting of the preachers, in that it was not confined to a particular district, but included the entire connection. The conferences now provided for in the church were three,—the quarterly, or conference of the officers of each circuit or station; the annual, or conference of the preachers of a particular section of the country; and the general, or conference of all the preachers of the entire church. The growth of the church was so rapid as to make it necessary in a short time to limit the General Conference by making it a delegated body. This was provided for at the Conference of 1808; and, as the General Conference had convened once in four years since 1792, the first delegated General Conference met May 1, 1812, with one delegate to every five members of the annual conferences. The ratio has been changed several times with the growth of the church. In 1816 it was one to seven; in 1836, one to twenty-one; in 1856, one to twenty-seven; in 1872, one to forty-five, when lay delegates were admitted, two from each annual conference. Every preacher, from the bishops to the humblest circuit-rider, is required to "itinerate." The preachers are not permitted to have charge of the same circuit or station more than three years in succession, nor more than three years in six. The presiding elders, who have supervisory oversight of the districts or sub-divisions of the annual conferences, are not permitted to remain in charge of the same district for more than four years in succession. The bishops arrange their own appointments to the presidency of the conferences at their semi-annual meetings.

The Methodist-Episcopal Church has various benevolent institutions in vigorous working-order. The Missionary Society has been in operation since 1819. There are missions, under the direction of this society, in Africa, India, China, Japan, Korea, Germany, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Bulgaria, Italy, South America, and Mexico, of the foreign fields; and, in the home fields, among the American Indians, the Germans, the Scandinavians, the Chinese, in the Territories and frontier settlements, and in various other localities known as "English-speaking" missions. In the foreign fields there are over 100 foreign missionaries, with about 70 assistants; about 200 native ordained preachers, with as many more who are not ordained; about 300 local preachers; 400 native teachers; about 37,000 members and 55,000 Sunday-school scholars; 517 day schools, 16,000 scholars. In the home fields there are some 2,500 missionaries, 3,500 local preachers, 280,000 members and probationers, 512,000 scholars in the Sunday schools. The receipts of the Missionary Society are nearly a million dollars annually. The Church Extension Society was incorporated in 1865, and is now erecting churches, in localities where the people are not able to build for themselves, at the rate of more than one for every day in the year. The Freedman's Aid Society has been in operation since 1866, and has done much to educate and Christianize the freedmen of the South. The following figures are taken from the report of the Society for 1886:—

Number of institutions is 41; number of teachers employed, 169; number of pupils taught in the year 1885-86 in the institutions of the Society, 6,085; funds received and expended during the fiscal year, $171,210.06; total disbursements by the Society since its organization in 1866, $1,568,558.29.

There are also a Sunday-school Union, a Tract Society, a Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and a Woman's Home Missionary Society.

The Methodist-Episcopal Church has two great publishing-houses, known as "Book Concerns," located at New York and Cincinnati respectively, where the books, tracts, and most of the periodicals of the church, are published. Weekly papers under the patronage and control of the church are published at New York, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, New Orleans, Syracuse, and Pittsburg. There are also numerous other periodicals in English and German, including Sunday-school supplies and a Quarterly Review.

III. METHODIST-EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH.—The question of slavery had been agitated in the Methodist "societies" in America, and in the conferences, previous to the formation of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, and still continued as a disturbing element after the organization. At the General Conference of 1844, however, the agitation reached a crisis, which resulted in the disruption of the church. The Rev. Francis A. Harding, of the Baltimore Conference, had been suspended from the ministry for refusing to emancipate slaves belonging to his wife; and he appealed from this decision to the General Conference. Bishop James O. Andrew was also found to be in possession of slaves through marriage and bequest. This state of affairs, and a growing conviction on the part of a majority of the church that slavery and Christianity are inconsistent, brought the Conference to definite action. After a long and able discussion of the question, the following action was taken by a vote of 111 in the affirmative, and 69 in the negative:—

"Whereas the Discipline of the Church forbids the doing any thing calculated to destroy our itinerant and general superintendency; and whereas Bishop Andrew has become connected with slavery, by marriage and otherwise, and this act having drawn after it circumstances, which, in the estimation of the General Conference, will greatly embarrass the exercise of his office as an itinerant general superintendent, if not, in some places, entirely prevent it: therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this General Conference that he desist from the exercise of this office so long as this impediment remains."

The Southern delegates were greatly displeased with this action; and, after several unsuccessful attempts at a modification of the attitude of the Conference, they adopted the following declaration:—

"The delegates of the conferences in the slaveholding States take leave to declare to the General Conference of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, that the continued agitation on the subject of slavery and abolition, in a portion of the church, the frequent action on that subject in the General Conference, and especially the extra-judicial proceedings against Bishop Andrew, which resulted, on Saturday last, in the virtual suspension of him from his office as superintendent, must produce a state of things in the South which renders a continuance of the jurisdiction of the General Conference over these conferences inconsistent with the success of the ministry in the slaveholding States."

It now became plain that the Southern delegates would be satisfied with nothing less than a discontinuance of all further agitation of the slavery question, and the Northern delegates would insist upon administering discipline to all ministers in the Church who should buy, sell, or hold slaves. A committee of nine, composed of Northern and Southern delegates, was appointed, to prepare a Plan of Separation, which they submitted to the Conference, and which was adopted by a nearly unanimous vote. The "plan" provided for the voluntary withdrawal of the annual conferences of the slaveholding States, the permission to ministers and members to adhere to the body of their choice,—the Methodist-Episcopal Church, or the Church South,—an equitable distribution of the church property, and a formal agreement not to interfere with the work of each other. The Southern delegates issued an address to their constituents, detailing the facts, and calling for a convention, composed of delegates from the annual conferences in the ratio of one to eleven, to meet in Louisville, Ky., May 1, 1845. This convention organized the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, invited Bishops Soule and Andrew to become itinerant general superintendents, and appointed its first General Conference to be held in Petersburg, Va., in May, 1846. At that session the church had 19 annual conferences, 1,519 travelling preachers, 2,833 local preachers, and 327,284 lay-members. The church made rapid progress until the late civil war, in which it suffered greatly, in common with all the Southern interests. Since the war, it has again started on a new era of prosperity. It has a "book-concern" at Nashville; and editors are employed, and various books and periodicals are published. There are numerous foreign missions; various benevolent organizations are maintained; and colleges, universities, and other schools, are supported and controlled within the denomination.

IV. METHODIST-PROTESTANT CHURCH.—The original constitution of the Methodist-Episcopal Church vested the legislative power entirely in the travelling ministry. This was satisfactory for a brief time only. Local preachers of influence, and prominent laymen, soon began to desire some voice in the general government of the church. The power of the episcopacy was also a source of discontent to many. The question of electing presiding elders was discussed at the General Conference of 1820, and caused considerable excitement. William S. Stockton, a prominent layman of that church, then began the publication of The Wesleyan Repository at Trenton, N.J., in the interest of lay-representation in the conferences, and advocating, also, representation of the local preachers. The General Conference of 1824 decided to make no radical change in the government of the church. The friends of the movement held a meeting in Baltimore, May 21, 1824, in which they resolved to form union societies within the church for the dissemination of their principles, and to establish a periodical called the Mutual Rights of the Ministers and Members of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. From that time onward, the controversy became exceedingly bitter. Crimination and recrimination followed each other in quick succession; pamphlets were published on both sides of the question; several persons were expelled from the church for the bitter spirit manifested; others, dissatisfied, withdrew; petitions were prepared to be submitted to the General Conference of 1828; and every arrangement made to force the issue upon the church as a whole. The General Conference refusing to grant the proposed changes in government, a convention was called to meet in Baltimore, Nov. 12, 1828. A provisional church was organized under the name of the "Associate Methodist Churches;" and a general convention was called to meet in Baltimore, Nov. 2, 1830. Then and there the Methodist-Protestant Church was organized. The doctrines are the same as those of the parent body. The government differs in a few points. The episcopal office is abolished, together with that of presiding elder, and each conference elects its own president. The General Conference is composed of an equal number of ministers and laymen on the same footing in the conference. The preachers are stationed by the Annual Conference.

In 1858 the Methodist-Protestant Church was divided by the slavery question into two bodies,—the conferences of the North-western States seceding, and forming the Methodist Church; and those of the Southern States continuing as the Methodist-Protestant Church. These were reunited in 1877 under the original name.

There are two "book-concerns" belonging to this church,—one at Baltimore, the other at Pittsburg,—several colleges and academies, and a number of church papers.

V. WESLEYAN METHODIST CONNECTION OF AMERICA.—This church originated in 1839 as an outgrowth of the antislavery agitation. The organization was completed at a convention held in Utica, N.Y., May 31, 1843. The Articles of Religion of the Methodist-Episcopal Church were adopted with considerable changes, though their theology remains strictly Arminian. This body abolished episcopacy; adopted lay-representation in the annual and general conferences; admitted local preachers to membership in annual conferences; made their general rules to forbid "the manufacturing, buying, selling, or using intoxicating liquors (unless for mechanical, chemical, or medicinal purposes), or in any way intentionally and knowingly aiding others so to do;" and "slave-holding, buying or selling slaves, or claiming that it is right so to do;" and declared, that "as, in the judgment of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection, it is inconsistent with our duties to God and Christianity to join secret oath-bound societies, or hold fellowship with them, we will on no account tolerate our ministers and members in holding such connection." The "book-concern" is located at Syracuse, N.Y. They publish two periodicals, and have been interested in the maintenance of several institutions of learning at different times.

VI. FREE METHODIST CHURCH.—This is the youngest of the Methodist bodies, having been organized by a convention at Pekin, N.Y., Aug. 23, 1860. The avowed purpose in founding a new church was to return to the original Methodist simplicity, and adhere more closely to the doctrines and usages of Wesley. Its doctrines are the same as those of the Methodist-Episcopal Church (of which its founders were original members), with the addition of two articles,—one on entire sanctification, and the other on future reward and punishment. Its government is a slight modification of that of the parent church. General superintendents are elected for four years; laymen are admitted on equal terms with ministers to all conferences; none are received on probation except they confess a "saving faith in Christ;" and all who unite with the church are required to lay aside all superfluous ornaments in dress. They have two educational institutions, a monthly magazine, and a weekly church paper.

VII. COLORED METHODISTS IN THE UNITED STATES.—Of these there are several distinct bodies in addition to the colored Methodists in Canada, subsequently noticed. There are also colored members and preachers scattered throughout most of the other Methodist bodies; and some of the conferences of the Methodist-Episcopal Church in the Southern States are almost exclusively colored.

1. African Methodist-Episcopal Church.—Methodism was early employed as an agency in the conversion of the negroes in America, both slaves and free. Vast numbers united with the Methodist societies, and many of them continue as members of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. A number, however, believing that their spiritual interests would be advanced by a separate organization, assembled in convention in Philadelphia, April, 1816, and organized the African Methodist-Episcopal Church. Richard Allen was elected the first bishop, and Morris Brown the second, in 1828. There are now nine bishops. The doctrines are the same as those of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, and the government is very similar. They have several educational institutions, especially Wilberforce University, Xenia, O.; and seminaries at Baltimore, Columbus (O.), Allegheny, and Pittsburg. There are two religious papers,—the Christian Recorder and the Repository.

2. African Methodist-Episcopal Zion Church.—Owing to some resolutions passed by the General Conference of the Methodist-Episcopal Church of 1820, the Zion congregation of African Methodists in the city of New York seceded from that church. They were soon joined by other congregations, and in 1821 organized their first Annual Conference. Their doctrines are identical with those of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, and their government is similar, although their general superintendents are elected by the General Conference every four years, and may be re-elected at the expiration of their term of office.

They have two academies, but no well-sustained periodical.

3. Union American Methodist-Episcopal Church.—This church was organized in 1813, by seceding colored members of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, under the title of the "African Union Church." Its present name was adopted after the close of the late war. Its doctrines are the same as those of the parent church, and its government is similar. Bishops are elected every four years.

4. Colored Methodist-Episcopal Church in America.—Before the civil war in America, the colored people in many of the Southern States were forbidden by law to hold meetings among themselves; and, accordingly, the vast majority of them united with the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. After the war and the emancipation of the slaves, there was an extensive breaking-away of the colored people from this church. Many united with the African Methodist-Episcopal Church, many with the Zion Church, and many with the Methodist-Episcopal Church. The leaders of the Southern church, deeming it wiser for the colored people among them to form separate churches, took measures which resulted in the organization of the above-named church in 1871. Their doctrines and discipline are identical with those of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. They have now four bishops. They publish a paper in Louisville called the Christian Index. Measures are on foot looking toward organic union between this body and the African Methodist-Episcopal Church.

VIII. AMERICO-GERMAN METHODISM. — The large influx of Germans to America was the occasion of great solicitude to the leaders of early Methodism; and measures were adopted, wherever practicable, to give them the gospel. Efforts of this kind have taken three leading directions, as follows:—

1. German Work of the Methodist-Episcopal Church.—In the providence of God, a number of zealous Germans became connected with the church at the time of this solicitude, and were prepared for this great work. Among them were Henry Boehm, William Nast, Adam Miller, John C. Lyon, C. H. Doering, and John Swahlen. A mission was begun in Cincinnati in 1835; and others were established, at subsequent periods in Pittsburg, Wheeling (Va.), Allegheny City, Marietta (O.), Baltimore, Chicago, Detroit, and elsewhere. There are now eight annual conferences in the United States, with a membership of about 50,000. Two periodicals, a weekly paper and a monthly magazine, are published by order of the General Conference. Sunday-school supplies and various standard books are also published in German.

2. The Evangelical Association, or "Albrights," is the outgrowth of the labors of the Rev. Jacob Albright, a local preacher of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. He began to travel and labor among the German population of Eastern Pennsylvania about the year 1790. In 1796 he devoted himself exclusively to evangelistic work; and in 1800, finding his converts scattered abroad, without church homes, he organized them into classes and societies, after the manner of John Wesley. These societies unanimously elected Mr. Albright their superintendent, or bishop. The organization was completed in 1808 by the adoption of a creed, and rules of government. In doctrine and government it is essentially Methodist. Bishops are elected for four years by the General Conference, and presiding elders, for a like period, by the Annual Conferences. They have a college in Napierville, Ill., and several academies. Their publishing-house is located in Cleveland, O., where they print two periodicals in German, and two in English. See EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.

3. United Brethren in Christ.—This society was the legitimate result of the labors of the Rev. Philip William Otterbein, an eminent German scholar and missionary of the German Reformed Church to America. While engaged in the duties of his pastoral charge at Lancaster, Penn., he enjoyed a visitation of divine grace which accorded with the experience of a genuine Methodist. He united with Martin Boehm in evangelistic labors; and these two men of God formed societies, and spread the glad news through a vast territory. In 1800 the societies were united in a church organization, with the above title. A system of doctrines and a form of government were adopted in 1815. These are essentially Methodist, though having no direct connection with any Methodist body. Slavery, and connection with secret societies, are forbidden. One order in the ministry, that of elder, is recognized; the same ecclesiastical bodies are provided for as in the Methodist-Episcopal Church; bishops are elected for a term of four years; presiding elders are elected annually by the annual conferences, and are not limited as to term of service in that capacity in any district, except by vote of the Conference; lay-representation is made optional with each annual conference. They have thirteen colleges and academies, and one theological seminary, a publishing-house in Dayton, O., nine periodicals, and various benevolent societies.

IX. CANADIAN METHODISM.—The Methodists in Canada are now, with the few exceptions noted under a subsequent head, wholly independent of the parent bodies in Great Britain and the United States.

1. Methodist-Episcopal Church in Canada.—The introduction of Methodism into Canada took place as early as 1788, and was fostered by the Methodist leaders in the States for a long period. In 1820 there were 2 districts, 17 circuits, 28 travelling preachers, 47 local preachers, and almost 6,000 members. The Canada Conference was organized, under the authority of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, in 1824; and, by the mutual consent of the Church and the Conference, it was organized as an independent church, with the above title. In doctrine and polity it is like the parent church.

2. Methodist Church of Canada.—This is the largest body of Methodists in the British Provinces of North America, and was formed in 1871 by a union of the Wesleyan Methodists, the New Connection, and the Wesleyan Methodists in the Eastern Provinces; the latter having been connected with the British Wesleyans until 1855, when they formed a separate organization. In doctrine and polity it closely resembles the British Wesleyan Church.

3. The British Methodist-Episcopal Church is composed of the colored Methodists of Canada. It was a part of the African Methodist-Episcopal Church at first, was made a separate conference in 1858, and subsequently organized into an independent church, the separation being completed in 1864. Bishop Nazrey was its first superintendent, and was followed in the episcopal office by R. R. Disney in 1875. They publish a paper called the Missionary Messenger, and sustain a prosperous mission in Bermuda.

X. BRITISH METHODISTS IN AMERICA. — These consist of a few sporadic branches of the Methodist family that strictly affiliate with bodies on the other side of the Atlantic.

1. Primitive Methodist Connection. — Branches of the British form of Methodism were introduced into Canada about 1843, and afterwards into the United States. The Canada Conference is dependent on the British Conference of Primitive Methodists, one of whose members is usually the presiding officer. There are two conferences in the United States, which are mostly independent of Great Britain, — the Eastern and the Western; but the Church has not made much progress here.

2. The Bible Christian Church, a Wesleyan body in Great Britain, has several societies in America, chiefly in Canada and the Northern States, organized into the Canada Conference. They have a weekly paper and a Sunday-school paper.

3. In addition to the above, the Wesleyans of Great Britain have some connectional societies in Canada, which properly belong to the British Conference.

XI. INDEPENDENT METHODIST CHURCHES. — A considerable number of churches in different localities have for various reasons seceded from the parent body, and become independent. At the beginning of the civil war several churches in the city of Baltimore became independent of the Methodist-Episcopal Church on political grounds. There is also another church in the same city originally in the Methodist-Protestant Church. They are mostly congregational in polity. Their present strength, in the aggregate, is indicated in the table of statistics following.

XII. GENERAL STATISTICS OF AMERICAN METHODIST CHURCHES. — The subjoined table gives the numerical force of all its sections:—

XIII. LIT. — Much of this is common with that of the Wesleyans of Great Britain, as the doctrines and standard authorities are the same. The most copious list of Methodist books, especially British, is Dr. GEORGE OSBORN'S Outlines of Wesleyan Bibliography (London, 1869, 8vo); and a similar work for Canada is Rev. HENRY J. MORGAN'S Bibliotheca Canadense (Ottawa, 1867, 8vo). An abstract of the former may be found as an appendix in Bishop SIMPSON'S Cyclopadia of Methodism (Philadelphia, 1878, royal 8vo), a work which gives, in alphabetical order, an account of all leading men, places, and institutions of Methodism universally. Rev. GEORGE R. CORNISH has published a Cyclopadia of Methodism in Canada (Toronto, 1881, 8vo), consisting largely of statistical matter. See also P. D. GORRIE: History of the Methodist-Episcopal Church in the United States and Canada, New York, 1881. The basis of American Methodist economy is contained in the Book of Discipline, a small volume revised quadrennially. The general ecclesiastical record is the Journal of the General Conference, published after each session of that body; and the detailed history and statistics are contained in the General Minutes of the Annual Conferences, published annually from abstracts of the special Minutes printed by each of the annual conferences yearly, with their proceedings in full. A somewhat similar series of publications prevails in all Methodist bodies. The volume of Reports of the Pan-Methodistic Congress held in London in September, 1881, contains much information respecting Methodism of all branches. JAMES STRONG.

METHIDIUS, Bishop, first of Olympus and Patara in Lycia, afterwards of Tyre; martyred at Chalcis in 311, during the persecution of Maximian; has acquired a prominent name in the literature of the early Greek Church by his tenacious opposition to the theology of Origen. He rejects Origen's idea of a pre-existence, protests against his somewhat vague conception of the resurrection, attacks his view of the visible world as a place of punishment for fallen souls, and generally contends against the sharp dualism of spirit and matter, soul and body, which characterizes both the philosophy and the theology of Origen. Of his works, only the Convivium decem Virginum [ed. E. Casel, Paris, 1880] has come down whole to us. It is a kind of ideal symposium, in which ten virgins make speeches, in praise of abstinence, before Arcte (virtue), the daughter of Philosophia. Large fragments, however, have been preserved, by Epiphanius (Har., 61, 12-62) and Photius (Cod., 236), of his De Resurrectione, his most elaborate work against Origen, and of his De Creatis (Cod., 235), De libero arbitrio, etc. His exegetical works have all perished. Collected editions of his works have been given by Combefis (Paris, 1611), Migne, in his Patrol. Græc. xviii., and A. Jahn (Halle, 1865). See LEO ALLATIUS: Diatriba de Methodiorum scriptis, in his edition of Conviv., Rome, 1656. [Complete Eng. trans. of Methodius in CLARK'S Ante-Nicene Library, vol. xiv.] W. MÖLLER.

METHODOLOGY is a part of the theological system corresponding to encyclopædia (see art.), as the how to the what. It is indeed, in a certain sense of the word, the practical application of encyclopædia: the latter showing the connection between the various parts of the system; and the former teaching the order in which, and the means by which, each single part may be most appropriately studied.

METROPHANES CRITOPULUS, a native of Berea in Macedonia; educated at Mount Athos; a pupil of Maximus Margarius, and protosyncellos (i. e., first protector of the seal) to the patriarch of Constantinople; was in 1616 sent to England, with letters of recommendation from Cyril Lucar, to the Archbishop of Canterbury and King James. His object was to study in England and Germany, in order to become better prepared to meet the Jesuits, who at that time made great exertions to get a foothold within the pale of the Greek Church. After a stay of four or five years in Oxford, he went to Germany, where he visited the universities of Wittenberg, Tübingen, Altdorf, Strassburg, and Helmstädt, and became intimately acquainted with Coring, Calixtus, and Hornejus. In 1626 he went to Venice, where for some time he lived as a teacher in Greek. He then returned to Constantinople, and was finally appointed patriarch of Alexandria. The date of his death is unknown, but must fall after 1610. In spite of his intimate intercourse with Protestant theologians, he was by no means, what Nicolaus Comnenus calls him, a Græco-Lutheranus. He did, in that respect, even not go so far as Cyril Lucar; indeed, in 1638 he publicly joined the synod convened against Cyril Lucar by Cyril of Berea. The most interesting monument he has left of himself is the confession which he wrote while in Helmstädt, and which was published (the Greek text with a Latin translation) by J. Hornejus, Helmstädt, 1661. It is a comprehensive, clear, and well-written representation of the doctrinal and ritual system of the Greek Church, not in the strict form of a symbolical confession of faith, but in the free form of a theological treatise. It is full of polemics against the Roman-Catholic Church, but refrains from all criticism of Protestantism. See DIETELMAIER: De Metrophane Critopulo, etc. 1769.

METROPOLITAN denoted, in the ancient Christian Church, the bishop of the metropolis; that is, of the municipal capital of the province. With the title followed, not only a certain rank, the privilege of precedence of the other bishops of the province, but also some real rights and duties: he had a voice in the episcopal election of the province, confirmed and ordained the bishops elected, exercised a general ecclesiastical superintendence and jurisdiction in the province, convened the provincial synods, presided over them, and drew up the canons, etc. The origin of the office is doubtful: Roman-Catholic writers, and even some of the Fathers, — as, for instance, Chrysostom, — date it back to the days of the apostles. The title occurs for the first time in the canons of the Council of Nicea.

MEUSEL, Wolfgang. See MUSCULUS.

MEXICO, a federal republic of North America, lying south of the United States. It has a coastline of 6,000 miles, and an area of 741,790 square miles. The country is an extensive plateau, culminating in a range of mountains running north and south, whose highest peaks are Popocatepetl

(17,540 feet) and Orizaba (17,175 feet). Few rivers traverse the country, and none of them is navigable for large vessels. The forests abound in valuable timber; and the chief articles of commerce are sugar, coffee, tobacco, vanilla, cotton, etc. The silver-mines of Mexico were once proverbial for their wealth; and, at the close of the last century, Humboldt estimated that one-fifth of the silver current in the world had been extracted from one of them, the Veta Madre. The largest cities are the City of Mexico, with a population of 300,000, and Leon, with 100,000 inhabitants. The present population of Mexico is 10,000,000; one-sixth of which is of pure European, three-sixths Indian, and two-sixths of mixed blood. The interest of the United States in the prosperity of Mexico has recently been enhanced by the interference of Louis Napoleon in its affairs (1861-67), the opening of the country to Protestant missionary effort, the projects of a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans to be cut through her territory, and the construction of a railroad connecting the City of Mexico, by way of Monterey, with our own railway system.

The history of Mexico is to a large extent veiled in darkness, but has during the last four hundred and fifty years, until recently, been a history of religious superstition and moral degeneracy. The history may be divided into three periods, — the early period, reaching down to the conquest of Cortez (in 1519); the period of the Spanish domination from 1519 to 1821; and the period of national independence. The original inhabitants of the land were the Toltecs, who came from the north in the seventh century. They were followed by the Aztecs in the thirteenth century. The latter people offered human sacrifices on a large scale, and practised the revolting rite of cutting the heart from the body while it was still alive, and offering it to the gods. They had reached a measure of civilization when the arms of the Spaniard Cortez (1519-21) put an end to their domination; and his barbaric cruelties, which have only been outdone by the Turks and Saracens, and were practised in the name of the Christian religion, crushed their spirit, and checked their development. For three hundred years the land was governed by viceroys sent out by Spain, during which the Roman-Catholic religion was offered to or forced upon the people, until it became all dominant, and the church acquired a vast wealth, even to the extent of one-third of the entire landed property of the country. The first movement towards national independence was inaugurated by Miguel Hidalgo in 1810, and the Spanish yoke thrown off by Iturbide in 1821. In 1821 Mexico was declared a republic, and a constitution similar to that of the United States adopted. It now consists of twenty-seven states, one territory, and one federal district. In 1861 Louis Napoleon conceived the idea of establishing French authority in Mexico; and in 1864 Maximilian, Archduke of Austria, was at his instigation declared emperor. The priesthood of the Mexican Church sympathized with the foreign movement; but the nation refused the interference, executed Maximilian in 1867 at Queretaro, and, seconded by the sympathies of the government of the United States, drove back the invaders. The government is presided over by a Presilent, elected every fourth year indirectly by the people, who also elect a national Legislature of two houses.

Though the dominion of Spain was broken in 1821, the yoke of Rome was not thrown off till 1857 and 1859, when President Juarez ordered the sequestration of the lands and other property of the church, and the abolition of the convents, and granted religious toleration, which up to that time had been strictly denied. The Roman-Catholic Church in Mexico had failed to lift the people out of their ignorance and superstition; and a gross worship of images prevailed, which was only a step removed from idolatry. It has now three archbishoprics and twelve bishoprics.

Protestant missions, in spite of the decree of 1857 tolerating all religions, could get no admittance to Mexico till after the failure of the French enterprise, and to this day are excluded from the state of Guerrero. Bibles had been introduced into the country to a limited extent, when the army of the United States invaded it in 1847. The honor of beginning missionary efforts in Mexico belongs to Miss Rankin, who of her own impulse, and independent of outside help, established a school in Brownsville, and subsequently established herself at Monterey in 1866. She founded more than a dozen schools, with native teachers, and finally consigned her work to the American and Foreign Christian Union. A reform movement from within the Mexican Church itself started with a priest, Francis Aguilar, and a layman, Hernandez, who in 1865 established the so-called "Church of Jesus." In 1867 Aguilar opened a hall for public worship in San José de Real. At his death the church sought aid from the Protestant-Episcopal Church of the United States. In 1869 Rev. Henry C. Riley (a Chilean by birth, but of American parentage), who at the time was preaching to a Spanish congregation in New-York City, went to Mexico under commission from the American and Foreign Christian Union. Since 1878 the Episcopal Church has supported the Church of Jesus. It has acquired by purchase two fine church edifices in the City of Mexico,—the San Francisco, and San José de Garcia. It now has a bishop (Dr. Riley, bishop of the Valley of Mexico, and Mr. Hernandez is bishop-elect of Cuernavaca), twelve Mexican presbyters, and 3,301 average attendants upon worship. The Report for 1881 only gives the number of native communicants in the City of Mexico, which is 125. In 1871 a Dominican friar, Manuel Aguas, the most eloquent preacher in the City of Mexico, who was appointed to resist Mr. Riley from the pulpit, himself became a proselyte under Mr. Riley's preaching. He engaged with Mr. Riley in prosecuting the work of the Church of Jesus, but died, much lamented, in 1872.

The Presbyterian Church established a mission in Mexico, in 1872, at Villa de Cos, Zacatecas. It has been very successful, and at present (1882) employs 8 American missionaries and 30 native preachers and helpers; has 6,010 communicants connected with its churches, 1,141 of whom were admitted in the year 1881-82. The Southern Presbyterian Church likewise conducts a mission in Mexico, with 2 American and 2 native missionaries (in 1882), and 236 church-members. The Congregationalists entered Mexico in 1872, and in 1882 had 2 missionaries, 5 native helpers, and 173 native church-members. The Methodist-Episcopal Church began its work in 1873, and in 1881 had 8 circuits, served by 9 foreign missionaries, 17 native preachers, 5 female and 25 other helpers, 338 communicants, and 388 probationers. It supports one theological school, and in 1881 completed a new Spanish hymn and tune book. The Methodist-Episcopal Church South began missionary operations in 1873, and had 1,094 communicants belonging to its churches in 1882. The Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Friends also have a mission in Mexico (1872), with headquarters at Matamoros, a meeting-house costing $4,000, and 186 members in 1882.

The outlook for Protestant missions is as bright in Mexico as in any other part of the world. During the ten years that have just passed, the progress has been rapid. The missionaries, however, have been called upon to meet opposition, which has been in some cases violent and bloody. The fanatical cry of "Death to the Protestants!" has not infrequently been heard in the streets of Puebla and other Mexican towns. The church has had its martyrs, among whom may be mentioned the Rev. Mr. Stephens (Congregational), who was killed at Aqualulco, March 2, 1874, and a native Methodist preacher, Epigenio Monroy, at Santa Anita, April 8, 1881. See GILBERT HAYES: Our Next Door Neighbor, a Winter in Mexico, especially chap. xv. (an interesting work), N.Y., 1875, and the art. "Mexico," in APPLETON'S Annals. D. S. SCHAFF.

MEYER, Heinrich August Wilhelm, the distinguished commentator of the New Testament, was b. in Gotha, Jan. 10, 1800; d. in Hanover, June 21, 1873. His father was court shoemaker. After passing through the usual course in the gymnasium, he entered the University of Jena as a student of theology. He heard the lectures of Gabler, Schott, Danz, and Baumgarten-Crusius; also studied Arabic under Koenigarten, but was obliged, by his father's failure in business, to content himself with a course of two years and a half, leaving the university in 1820. In 1821 he was appointed teacher in a select school for boys of the higher classes, at Grone, near Göttingen; and in 1822 became pastor in Osthausen, where he married. Transferring his ecclesiastical relations to Hanover, he was appointed, in 1831, pastor at Harste, near Göttingen, with a salary of five hundred and twenty-nine thalers. From here he went, in 1837, to Hoya; in 1841, after declining a professorship at Giessen, was appointed Consistorialrath, and pastor of the Hof- und Schloss-Church, in Neustadt, a parish of five thousand souls. During these years he added to the duties of their offices constant labors upon his Commentaries on the New Testament. In 1848 he resigned his pastorate, and went to Hanover to reside. In 1861 he was advanced to the dignity of an Oberconsistorialrath (member of the highest ecclesiastical court), but at his own request was allowed, in 1865, to retire on a pension. He lived a retired and uneventful life, observed great regularity in his habits, and might be found every morning, by four or five, at his desk. His body lies in the graveyard at Neustadt, and on the slab are the words of Rom. xiv. 8. Frau Meyer preceded her husband to the grave in 1864.

Meyer's was a thoroughly pure nature, truly pious, humble, modest, and honest. The proofs of his eminent scholarship and untiring industry are found in his published works. It was only his regular habits of study that enabled him to accomplish as much as he did. He also understood how to concentrate his attention upon special subjects, and to avoid the diversion of outside studies. With the mention of the part he took in the Church Conference at Berlin, 1816, and his share in the revision of Luther's version of the New Testament, we almost exhaust his activity beyond the sphere of his professional and literary work. As a pastor, he excelled; as a catechist and as a member of the Consistorium, he distinguished himself as an examiner of candidates of theology.

Meyer's reputation beyond Hanover rests upon his Commentaries on the New Testament. Upon this one department he concentrated his literary efforts, and did not turn aside to write review essays, and the like. The original title of his great work was Das Neue Testament Griechisch nach den besten Hilfsmitteln kritisch revidirt mit einer neuen Deutschen Uebersetzung und einem kritischen und exegetischen Kommentar ["The New Testament in Greek, critically edited according to the best helps, with a new German translation, and a critical and exegetical Commentary"]. The original plan included three parts: (1) The text and translation; (2) A Commentary on the Gospels and Acts; (3) A Commentary on the rest of the New Testament. The work was designed for students; and the comments were to be strictly philological, and expressed in terse language. In 1829 the text and translation appeared, in two volumes, at Göttingen. The first volume of the Commentary, covering the three first Gospels (419 pages) followed in 1832. But the original plan was now enlarged; and Commentaries appeared on John (1834), the Acts (1835), Romans (1836), First Corinthians (1839) Second Corinthians (1840), Galatians (1841), Ephesians (1843), and Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon (1847). Unable, on account of the new editions which were called for, of these works, to comment upon the other books of the New Testament, he gave Thessalonians and the Epistles to the Hebrews to Lünemann, the Pastoral and Catholic Epistles to Huther, and the Apocalypse to the undersigned.

The excellency of Meyer's work was acknowledged, not only in his own land, but in England and America, through Clark's translations. The Göttingen faculty (Lücke being dean) conferred upon him the degree of doctor of divinity in 1845. Meyer lived to see many editions of his work appear, and continued, down to the time of his death, to work diligently, making improvements. He grew with his work; and in each stage of his growth he expressed himself, in his Commentaries, just as he felt. His study of the divine word of the New Testament produced in him a more perfect experience of the saving grace and truth of the gospel. With the lapse of time, although he still clung tenaciously to the principles of literary freedom and philological accuracy, he assumed a more and more positive and churchly attitude. The student who compares the last editions of the Commentary with the first, as, for example, the Synoptists, will find wide differences.

Meyer was constantly correcting himself, and with relentless honesty removing from his work what he had come to regard as defects.

Since his death, the continuation of Meyer's Commentary in new editions¹ has been intrusted to Bernard Weiss, who has published Mark and Luke (1878), John (1880), and Romans (1881); Wendt, Colossians and the Acts (1880); Henrici, First Corinthians; Sieffert, Galatians (1880); W. Schmidt, Ephesians (1878); and W. Beyerschlag, James (1882). A biographical sketch of Meyer by his son, Professor Dr. Meyer of Hanover, will be found in the fourth edition of the Commentary on the Philippians. [The English translation of the Commentary, except the Revelation, from the last ed. by Meyer, ed. by Dr. Dickson, Edinb., 1873-82, 20 vols.] FR. DÜSTERDIECK.

MEYER, Johann Friedrich von, b. in Frankfurt, Sept. 12, 1772; d. there Jan. 28, 1819. He studied law and languages at Göttingen 1789-93, and philosophy and natural science at Leipzig 1793-91. In 1802 he settled down in his native city, where he filled various important positions, as president of the Court of Appeals, member of the Senate, mayor, etc. The first period of his literary activity is strongly marked by the rationalism of the age,—his essays in Wieland's Merkur, his romance Kallias, his epic Tobias, etc. But, spiritually dissatisfied, he undertook a serious study of the Bible, learned Hebrew in his thirty-fifth year, and published in 1812 his Bibelentwürfungen, and in 1819 his annotated revision of Luther's translation of the Bible, which had a wide circulation (3d ed., 1855). The somewhat mechanical views, however, of the orthodox supernaturalism, did not satisfy him, either; and during the later years of his life he turned towards mysticism: Schlüssel zur Offenbarung Johannis von einem Kreuzritter, 1833; Blicke in den Spiegel des prophetischen Wortes, 1847, etc. STEITZ.

MEYFART, or MAYFART, Johann Matthäus, b. at Jena in 1590; d. at Erfurt, Jan. 26, 1642. He studied at Wittenberg, and was in 1616 appointed professor at the newly founded Gymnasium Casimirianum in Coburg, whence, in 1631 or 1633, he removed to Erfurt. Of his Latin works, some are dogmatical, Prodomus, 1620 (unfinished); others polemical, Græcorum continuatus, 1623; Anti-Becanus, 1627; and Nodus Gordius Sophistarum solutus, which is an attempt at reconciling Aristotle and Petrus Ramus. But his German works are of much greater interest. They fall into two groups,—speculative-eschatological and practical-reformatory. To the first group belong Tabu novissima (1626), four sermons on Death, the Last Judgment, Eternal Life, and Damnation; Von den himmlischen Jerusalem (1627, 2 vols.); Das höllische Sodoma (1630, 2 vols.), and Das jüngste Gericht (1632, 2 vols.). The sublime visions which these books reveal, and the stream of fresh, sympathetic sentiment, which pervades them, had, as the numerous editions show, a great effect on the desert-like dryness of the Lutheran scholasticism. To the second group belong his Christliche Erinnerung, concerning witchcraft (1636; reprinted in THOMASII: Schriften vom Unfug des Hexenprocesses, 1703), and Christliche Erinnerung, concerning the German universities (1636), in which he gives a very striking description of life at that time, especially among theological students. This latter group of works proves him to be a true forerunner of Philipp Jakob Spener (1635-1705).

MEZUZAH (door-post: plural, Mezuzoth). This article is thus described by Dr. Ginsburg in Kitto's Cyclopædia. "On the inside of a piece of square parchment, prepared by a Jew especially for this purpose, are written Deut. vi. 4-9 and xi. 13-21; while on the outside are written the divine name Shaddai ('the Almighty') on the place where the first passage ends, and the words Kuzu Bemksaz Kuzu ('I go out, and shall prosper') to the left at the bottom. Thus written, the schedule is then rolled up in such a manner that the divine name is outside, and is put into a reed or hollow cylinder made of lead, brass, or silver, varying in costliness according to the circumstances of the people. In this tube there is a little hole, just large enough to show the divine name, which is protected by a piece of glass, forming, as it were, a little window, through which it can be seen. Such a Mezuzah must be affixed to the right-hand door-post of every door in the house by a nail at each end." This is in obedience to the divine command, "Thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates" (Deut. vi. 9). The Mezuzah is supposed to guard the house against malign influences.

MEZZOFANTI, Giuseppe Caspar, b. at Bologna, Sept. 17, 1774; d. in Rome, March 15, 1849. He was educated in the archiepiscopal seminary of his native city, and ordained a priest in 1797. In the same year he was appointed professor of Arabic in the university of Bologna, where he afterwards held other prominent positions, until 1831, when he removed to Rome as a member of the congregation de propaganda fide. In 1838 he was made a cardinal. As a linguist he was a great marvel. It is stated that he knew a hundred and twenty languages, could write seventy-two, and speak with fluency fifty-six; and, upon close examination, the statement does not seem to be so very exaggerated. See RUSSELL: Life of the Cardinal Mezzofanti, London, 1857, and A. BELLESDÈME: Giuseppe Cardinal Mezzofanti, Warzburg, 1880.

MICAH (who is like Jehovah?). Of this so-called Minor Prophet little is known. His birth-place was Moresheth, a town near Gath, in the kingdom of Judah. The scene of his prophetic activity was Judah, — indeed, for the most part at least, Jerusalem; and, as the superscription reads, the time of his prophecies was the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, principally the last; or from before the fall of Samaria (722) to the sixth year of Hezekiah. The theme of his prophecy was the fall of Samaria and Jerusalem. One of his declarations is quoted by Jeremiah (xxvi. 18). From the quotation it has been inferred that Micah, during Hezekiah's reign, gathered up his prophecies into a book, and by the public reading of it ended his prophetic career. The fall of Samaria was the direct judgment of God for the sins of the northern kingdom, specially of their rulers and false prophets (Mic. i. 2-ii. 11). But Jerusalem's turn comes next (ii. 12-iii.); and then the new day will dawn, in which Zion will be obedient to the law of Jehovah, at peace, and the centre of the world. God's scattered people will be gathered; and the destroyed city, rebuilt, will come under the sway of her eternal King (iv. 1-8). Before, however, this brilliant period, the inhabitants of Jerusalem will be carried away to Babylon; and in captivity run the great danger of losing their peculiarity, — their separation from the nations. From this danger Jehovah will deliver them, and restore them to their land. Micah repeats the prophecy of Joel concerning the "gathering of the nations" against Zion, and its extinction. But these events will not be until after the captivity. Then, turning to the nearer future, Micah declares that Zion's King will be maltreated by her foes (iv. 9-13). But from Bethlehem, the city of David, will come the King who will rule and protect the united, restored people, — the King whose coming has been from of old, from everlasting (v. 1-15). [The prophecy of the exact place of Messiah's coming is the most interesting fact about Micah. That the Jews cherished this prophecy is evinced by the ready response the doctors of the law gave to Herod's question (Matt. ii. 5, 6), and the talk of the people about Christ (John vii. 42).] In chapters iv. and v. Micah's prophecy reaches its height. It will be noticed that he three times sets together a nearer and a remoter future: Zion will be destroyed before it becomes the seat of the universal kingdom of peace (iii. 12, iv. 8); the people of Zion will be carried captive to Babylon before they win their victory over the "gathering of the nations" (iv. 9, 13); Zion's king will be given up to his foes before the Son of David arises, who shall found a kingdom of peace, and rule united Israel (v. 1, 8). From the height of chapters iv. and v. he descends in chapter vi. to the then present. Jehovah pleads with his people on account of their sins. He shows them what is good; but, since the people persist in their sins, Micah is inspired to pronounce a fearful curse (vi. 1-16). The believers in Israel utter a prayer of penitence, in which they humbly confess the deep and general corruption, bow before the divine wrath, but express their confidence that Jehovah will still help them, and comfort themselves with the conviction that the divine anger will at last pass away, that Babylon will fall, never to rise again, and in that day the walls of Zion shall be rebuilt, and the scattered children of God shall come thither from Assyria and from Egypt, and shall fill the land from the borders of Egypt even to the Euphrates, from sea to sea, and from mountain to mountain (vii. 1-13). Then they pray for a renewal of the earlier tokens of favor (vii. 14), to which God replies he will repeat in his people the marvels of the former time (vii. 15-17); and the prophet closes with an outburst of praise for the grace and mercy of God (vii. 18-20).

The book falls naturally into three sections, — i. 2-iii. 1; iii. 1-vi. 1; vi. 1-vii. 20. The language is purely classical. In point of rhetorical peculiarity, Micah stands between his contemporaries, Hosea and Isaiah, but nearer to the latter than the former; for although, like the former, he is abrupt, abounding in sudden and quick changes, in depth of spirituality he is the worthy companion of Isaiah, sharing with him the marvellous mingling of mildness and strength, of gentleness and elevation, and the drastic liveliness and preference for artistic turns of expression.

MICHAEL (who is like God?), one of the seven archangels of Jewish post-exilic angelology; is three times mentioned in the Old Testament, but only in Daniel (x. 13, 21, xii. 1), and twice in the New Testament (Jude 9, and Rev. xii. 7). These passages indicate Michael's rank: he was regarded as the guardian of the people of God, their vigilant and efficient protector against all foes, earthly and devilish. In the rabbinical writings, Michael frequently appears in opposition to Samaël. J. A. Fabricius gives the song of Michael and the good angels in triumph over Lucifer and the bad angels, said to have been revealed to St. Amadens (Codex pseudepigraphus Vet. Test., vol. 1, pp. 26, 27, Hamburg, 1723; see English partial translation in BARING-GOULD'S Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, p. 16).

In the Roman-Catholic Church, Michael is a saint; and his festival, called "Michaelmas," is held on Sept. 29 (see art.). He is said to have announced to the Virgin Mary the time of her death, and also to have carried her soul to Jesus after her death. There are several recorded appearances of the archangel: (1) On Mount Gargano, now called Mount St. Michael, on the eastern coast of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, at an unknown year (the day was May 8); (2) At Chonis in Phrygia, near Laodicea, in the ninth century (the day was Sept. 6); (3) On a rock in the Gulf of Avranches, in Normandy, Oct. 6, 706. On each of these sites, churches have been erected in honor of St. Michael. (4) The most celebrated appearance was at Rome, in the year 590. The story is this: Gregory the First (afterwards called the Great), who had then just been elected Pope, was leading a penitential procession about the city in order to offer up prayers for the staying of the great pestilence which followed the inundation of 589, and which was, with famine, greatly increasing the miseries of the city, already threatened by the Lombards. As he was crossing the bridge over the Tiber, directly in front of the tomb of Hadrian, he looked up, and saw Michael standing on the summit of the mausoleum, sheathing a bloody sword, in token that the plague was stayed, and heard a choir of angels around him chanting the anthem, since adopted by the Church in her vesper-service, "Queen of heaven, rejoice, because thou art counted worthy to suffer: he has risen again, as he said. Hallelujah!" To whom the Pope replied, "Pray for us, O God.

Hallelujah!" It is further related, that Constantine built a church in honor of Michael (hence it was called "Michaëlion"), about four miles from Constantinople; and at a later date there were fifteen churches in his honor within the city.

St. Michael is the patron saint of France. It was he who appeared to Joan of Arc (see art.). In 1169 Louis XI. founded the military order of St. Michael. Originally it was composed exclusively of gentry; but afterwards literary men, judges, bankers, and artists, though not of rank, were eligible. The knights wore, pendent from a gold chain about their necks, a medal representing the archangel vanquishing the dragon. The rites of the order were at first held in the Church of Mount St. Michael in Normandy, later transferred by Henry II. to the Sainte-Chapelle, Vincennes, and in 1643, by Louis XIV., to the Grand-Cordeliers in Paris. The number of knights was at first limited to thirty-six, afterwards to a hundred: the king was grand master. The order was suppressed at the Revolution, restored at the Restoration, and ceased to exist in 1830.

Mrs. Clement thus speaks of St. Michael in Christian Art:—

"Michael is always represented as young and beautiful. As patron of the church militant, he is 'the winged saint,' with no attribute save the shield and the lance. As conqueror of Satan, he stands in armor, with his foot upon the Evil One, who is half human, or like a dragon in shape. The angel is about to chain him, or to transfix him with the lance. But the treatment of this subject is varied in many ways, all, however, easily recognized. As lord of souls, St. Michael is unarmed. He holds a balance, and in each scale a little naked figure representing the souls: the beato usually joins the hands as in thankfulness, while the rejected one expresses horror in look and attitude. In these pictures the saint is rarely without wings. When introduced in pictures of the Madonna and Child, he presents the balance to Christ, who seems to welcome the happy soul. The old English coin called an 'angel' was so named because it bore the image of this archangel."—Handbook of Legendary Art, ed. 1881, p. 231.

MICHAEL VIII. (PALÆOLOGUS), emperor of Constantinople, 1260–82; usurped the throne of Nicaea after the death of Lascaris II., 1259, and conquered Constantinople by a stratagem the following year, driving the Latins and their emperor, Baldwin II., out of the city, and thus restoring the Byzantine Empire. In order to escape the revenge of the Latins, and also in order to baffle the intrigues of an ecclesiastical party in Constantinople, the Arsenites (see Arsenius), Michael opened negotiations with the Pope for the reconciliation of the Greek and Latin churches. A Greek embassy, headed by Vecus, appeared at the synod of Lyons, 1274; and in the course of the debate the Greeks gave up all the principal points of dissension.—the procession of the Holy Spirit, the supremacy of the Pope, etc. The reconciliation, however, was never carried out. The majority of the Greeks hated the Church of Rome, and still more a union with her on such conditions. Pope Martin IV. concluded an alliance with Charles of Anjou, king of Naples and Sicily, and the Venetians, for the expulsion of Michael VIII.; and the latter answered with the conclusion of an alliance with the king of Aragon for the expulsion of the French from Sicily. Greece was actually invaded by the Latins, though without any success; and the invasion was followed by the Sicilian Vespers. But both parties were too much occupied with troubles in their own homes to bestow any great attention on foreign affairs, and the union of Lyons was allowed to sink into oblivion.

MICHAELIS, the name of three learned Orientalists and keen theologians, who made valuable contributions in the departments of exegesis and Old-Testament criticism. — I. Johann Heinrich, b. at Klettenberg, July 26, 1668; d. at Halle, March 10, 1738; devoted himself especially to the study of the Oriental languages, taking Æthiopic in 1698, at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, with the celebrated Ludolph. He then began giving lectures at Halle, and in 1699 was made professor of the Oriental languages. He exerted an extensive influence by representing at Halle, the seat of Spener's pietistic school, the critical faculty, and becoming the soul of Francke's Collegium Orientale theologium, as well as by editing a critical edition of the Old Testament (1720) from five Erfurt manuscripts and ten printed editions. He also published some valuable exegetical works on the Old Testament, especially on the Hagiographa (Halle, 1720, 3 vols.). — II. Christian Benedikt, nephew of the former, b. at Elrich, Jan. 26, 1680; became professor at Halle in 1713; acquired an extensive reputation for scholarship, especially in the Oriental tongues; d. at Halle, Feb. 22, 1761. He was not very productive as an author; but his Tractatus criticus de variis lectionibus N. T. caute colligendis et dijudicandis (1719) against Bengel displays his critical acumen. His Dissert. de antiq. æconomice patriarchalis (1728) are also interesting. — III. Johann David, son of the former, and more productive than both of the preceding, — one of those minds which constitute a bridge from their own to a new period; b. in Halle, Feb. 27, 1717; d. in Göttingen, Aug. 22, 1791. He was universally recognized as an indefatigable investigator and honorable man, but he was no pillar for the waning orthodoxy of the day. After studying at Halle, he travelled in England and Holland, and in 1745 went, as professor, to Göttingen, where, honored with titles, he remained till his death. He was very productive as an author. By his Oriental and exegetical Library, begun in 1771, he secured a controlling position in this department. His exegetical works on the Old and New Testaments are very numerous, those being the most valuable which consider the historical environment of the Old Testament. He edited paraphrastic translations of the Old Testament in thirteen volumes (1769–86), with valuable annotations, and of the New Testament, with annotations, in four parts (1790–91). He also published Commentaries on the three most important Messianic Psalms (1759), Ecclesiastes (1751, 2d ed. 1762), etc. Of more importance were his works on the Hebrew, as the Supplementa ad lexica hebr. (1786, 2 vols.), which contain excellent contributions to the knowledge of the language, antiquities, history, etc., of the Old Testament. We have also very important works in his Abhandlung v. d. Ehegesetzen Moses (1755, 2d ed., 1768), and especially Mosaisches Recht (1770, 2d ed., 1775, 6 vols.) and Spicilegium Geograph. exterorum (1769, 2 vols.). He revised Lowth's De sacra poësi Hebræ. (1758, 2d ed., 1768, 2 vols.). Most important among his works were his contributions to the Introduction of the Old and New Testaments. The Introduction to the New Testament appeared first in 1750, and was greatly enlarged in subsequent editions (4th ed., 1788, 2 vols.). He only lived to complete the first part of the Introduction to the Old Testament (Hamburg, 1787). In theology he departed widely from the old orthodoxy of Halle. He was one of those laborious men who started much investigation, and will not be forgotten. See his Autobiography (1793), and his Letters (Leipzig, 1794–96, 3 vols.). MICHAELMAS (Sept. 29) is celebrated, not only in the Roman-Catholic Church, but also in the Greek and various Protestant churches, in honor of the archangel Michael; not with reference to any particular apparition of his, but generally commemorating the benefits which mankind have received from the angels. The origin of the festival seems to be local, but is very old. In the eighth century the celebration was quite common in the Church. The Roman-Catholic Church celebrates three special apparitions of the archangel; namely, May 8, Sept. 6, and Oct. 16. Michaelmas is also known as the Festival of St. Michael and All the Holy Angels. In England it was preceded by a three-days' fast. See BUTLER: Lives of Saints, vol. ii. 537 sqq.

MIDDLE AGE, The, is that period in European history comprised between the date of the fall of the Western Roman Empire (476), and that of the capture of Constantinople by the Ottoman Turks (1453). It occupies that portion of this intervening period when Western Europe was governed by the feudal system in civil affairs and by the Roman Church in ecclesiastical. It is to be regarded as an outgrowth of the fusion of the elements of imperial Roman society and the Roman-Catholic Church with the ideas and habits brought into Western Europe by the Barbarian invasions. These invasions, and the permanent occupation of the Roman territory by the Teutonic tribes, resulting in the gradual assimilation of the conquerors with the conquered, give the characteristic tone and color to the life and society of the middle age. To understand that life and society, we must first consider the condition of Roman and barbarian life at the time when the opposite forces by which they were directed came into conflict, — the epoch of the Invasions.

The first permanent occupation of the Roman territory was made by the Visigoths, under Alaric, in the year 395, who besieged and took the city of Rome A.D. 410. At that time the four most active principles of the Roman imperial organization, so far as they affected the relations with the Barbarians, were (1) Organized Christianity, or the Church; (2) The Roman Imperial organization and administration; (3) The Roman law as affecting the rights of persons and the protection of property; (4) The general use of the Latin language throughout that portion of Europe afterwards occupied by the invaders. The imperial rule was practically founded upon a military despotism. When, therefore, the military power decayed, and was no longer strong enough either to maintain the regular working of the administration of the imperial government over its own subjects, or to protect them from external enemies, the system, having no other support, fell of its own weight, and successful invasions and permanent occupation began. In less than a century (396-486) the whole fabric of the Roman power in Western Europe perished by force of these invasions. Its peculiar civilization, however, was not destroyed with the empire; and Rome was thenceforth to conquer the world by her arts, as she had done by her arms.

The invaders, as we call them (Barbarians, as they were called by the Romans, and as they proudly called themselves), who permanently occupied the Roman territory, were all of the Teutonic race. They came from a vast and ill-defined territory east of the Rhine, and north of the Danube. Their organization was tribal; their mode of life was more or less nomadic, or that of wanderers; and the chief occupation of the most active among them was hunting or war. All these characteristics, to which may be added an inborn love of plunder and love of adventure, prompted them to cross the Roman frontier. They were tempted by the weakness and the wealth of the Roman provinces. They came on in successive waves of destruction during the fifth century. In the year 500 the Ostrogoths occupied Italy, and the Roman territory as far north as the Danube; the Visigoths and the Suevi, the country from the River Loire, south and west, including modern Spain and Portugal; the Burgundians, the south-eastern portion of modern France; and the Franks, the portion of that country north of the River Loire, as well as modern Holland and Belgium. At this time all these tribes were nominally Christian, but all save the Franks were Arians. Their rule in the Roman territory, when they occupied it, was one of simple military force. They retained their old military organization under their tribal chiefs, with officers subordinate to them, afterwards called "dukes" and "counts" in the conquered districts. The Roman provincials were usually permitted to govern themselves in their private relations, according to the forms of the Roman law; but the conquerors appropriated two-thirds of the lands, and all the movable property, of the old inhabitants. The legal condition of these inhabitants was that of slaves, made such by their capture as prisoners of war.

The great change in the condition of life of the Barbarians, on their final occupation of the Roman soil, was that they ceased to be wanderers or invaders, and that, unlike the Romans, they preferred to live in the country rather than in towns. This peculiarity is important as affecting the distribution of population in Europe in after-times.

Of all the Teutonic tribes, the Franks proved the most powerful, and in the end gained possession of the greater portion of Central and Southern Europe. Moving with irresistible force from their country on the Lower Rhine, they defeated in 486, under their chief Clovis, Syagrius, the Roman patrician, and thus destroyed the remnant of the imperial power in Gaul. Ten years later they conquered the Alemanni, seated on both banks of the Upper Rhine, the Burgundian kingdom in the south-eastern portion of France, and the Visigothic kingdom, extending from the Loire to the Pyrenees. Thus was established the first Frankish kingdom under Clovis and his race, known in history as the "Merovingians." These conquests of Clovis were much aided by the influence of the Roman-Catholic bishops in Gaul, who desired to extirpate the heresy of Arianism, then professed by all the tribes in that region save the Franks. Clovis had been baptized into the Roman-Catholic faith; and in the opinion of the clergy, as well as of himself, the Frankish conquests secured the triumph of the Orthodox Roman Church.

It may be said that the Teutonic invaders brought into Western Europe at least five distinct permanent influences, or tendencies: (1) The principle of representative government as first exhibited in their assemblies of freemen; (2) Royalty in a new form, in which the king or chief, although he was supposed to be of divine lineage, had no claim to rule until he was chosen by his fellow-warriors; (3) The sentiment of loyalty to the chief, to whom the warrior was bound by the tie of military patronage; (4) A feeling of personal independence and of equality, founded on the supposed common possession of honor and courage; (5) A strong disposition, at least in later times, to recognize the authority of the Roman Church.

The rule of the Merovingian kings was so feeble, that they are known in history as rois fainçants. Under them the disorganization of the elements of Roman life was so great, that all the institutions which they found in Roman Gaul either perished, or were transformed into instruments of barbarian rule, during more than two centuries (500-730), save the Church, which constantly increased in power, wealth, and independence. Towards the close of that period, owing to the weakness of the kings of the race of Clovis, their stewards, or "mayors of the palace" as they were called, became virtually the rulers of their kingdom. The family of Pepin of Landen furnished the most conspicuous and renowned of these mayors of the palace. After the Austrasian (or Eastern) Franks had crushed the power of the Neustrians at the battle of Testry (687), the former, under the leadership of Pepin of Herstal, conquered the wild tribes east of the Rhine, and later, in 732, when Charles Martel was their leader, destroyed, at the battle of Poitiers, the power of the Saracens advancing from Spain towards Central Europe. Pepin le Bref, the son of Charles Martel, extended the conquests of the Franks, and having deposed Childeric, the last of the Merovingian race, became king of the Franks de jure, as he had been hitherto de facto, being crowned as such by Boniface, Bishop of Metz, by order of the Pope, in 751. Charlemagne, his son, made further conquests, until his kingdom extended from the North Sea to the Mediterranean, and from the River Elbe to the Ebro. In the last half of the eighth century an alliance was formed between these Carolingian kings, Pepin and Charlemagne, and the Pope, the result of which was, that the elements of ancient Roman life were transfused into that of the middle age; and this fusion gave the characteristic color to the history of that period.

The immediate causes of this fruitful alliance were these: the Pope's power, civil and ecclesiastical, in Italy at that time, was threatened by the schismatic Lombards and by the Byzantine emperors, whose nominal subject the Pope was. To secure his independence, the Pope invoked the aid of the Frankish kings, Pepin and Charlemagne, not merely because they were the most powerful kings in Europe, but also because they were Orthodox Catholics. At the Pope's request, these kings made several expeditions into Italy, which resulted in the destruction of the Lombard and Byzantine power in that country, and the annexation of all its territory, save the Exarchate of Ravenna (the sovereignty of which was conferred on the popes), to the Frankish kingdom. As a reward for services previously rendered to the Church, Pepin had received its sanction to his usurpation of the crown of the Merovingians. He was now made patrician of Rome; and the alliance between the Franks and the Pope became complete when Charlemagne was crowned by the Pope in Rome on Christmas Day, 800, as emperor of the world, and the true successor of the Roman Caesars.

This event is known in history as the "Revival of the Western Roman Empire." The new system was modelled after the old pattern. Kings had only a limited territory and authority. The jurisdiction of an emperor was supposed to embrace theoretically the whole world, and practically all Western Europe. There were many kings, but there could be but one emperor. The ancient imperium was divided between two persons: the emperor was Imperator semper Augustus; and the Pope, Pontifex Maximus. Each was designed to be perfectly independent, and sovereign in his own sphere; and each was supposed to be bound to the constant aid and support of the other in the government of mankind. The Church was to have uncontrolled power over the conscience: the emperor was to be lord of every thing else. It was hoped in this way, by the revival of the imperial Roman forms, to secure a return of that peace and order which had been so long characteristic of the Roman rule.

The Pope was then recognized (A.D. 800) in Western Europe as the universal or supreme bishop, and the king of the Franks ruled over all those under the Pope's obedience; so that, when the king became emperor (and it was designed that all the successors of Charlemagne should become such), the principal change, and a very important one, was, that his authority had the special sanction and support of the head of the Church. This theory of the dual government of the world proved impracticable. Neither the Pope nor the emperor would yield his claims to the position which each supposed assigned to him by it, and they both differed widely in their opinions in regard to their respective powers and duties. Under the feeble rule of the descendants of Charlemagne, the imperial office was seized by certain Italian princes; but their rule was one of violence, disorder, and corruption. The danger to the holy see became so great, that, in 962, the reigning Pope, John XII., called upon Otho the Great, king of the Franks, and successor of Charlemagne, to come to Rome, to be there crowned emperor, and to restore order by his imperial authority. The emperor asserted that authority by deposing this very pope, and by substituting for him one whose character gave rise to less public scandal. He claimed the right, by virtue of his authority as emperor, to nominate the Pope; and this claim was put forward, and insisted upon, by many of his successors, not only of the Saxon dynasty, but by those of the houses of Franconia and Swabia as well. This gave rise to constant quarrels between the popes and the emperors. They culminated in the famous controversy known in mediæval history as the "Investitures," in which the question was, whether the Pope, or the emperor, the ecclesiastical, or the civil authority, should give to the bishops throughout Europe, not merely the investiture of their sees, but also the legal possession of the vast feudal estates usually attached to them. This controversy, in which the celebrated Hildebrand, Pope Gregory VII. (1070), and the Emperor Henry IV., were the conspicuous actors, involved the principle of the relations of the civil and ecclesiastical authority during the middle age. The result, so far as this particular question was concerned, was a compromise between the lay rulers and those of the Church; but the limits between their jurisdictions were never accurately defined. Hence we find throughout the middle age the most extravagant pretensions, on the part of the popes, in their claims, not merely to sacerdotal authority, but to supremacy over kings and emperors, and the constant use of the discipline of the Church — excommunication and interdict — to enforce that discipline. Out of these claims grew such disputes, not merely as those of Hildebrand and Henry IV., concerning the investitures (1076), but also the controversy between Henry II. of England and Thomas Becket, in reference to the exemption of the clergy from the jurisdiction of the civil courts; the long struggle between Gregory IX. and Frederick II., as to claims of sovereignty in Naples; between Innocent III. and Philip Augustus of France, where the Pope appears as a champion of the sanctity of marriage; the excommunication and deposition of John of England; and, later, the ignoble quarrel between Boniface VIII. and Philippe le Bel of France. In all these cases, and many like them, the popes claimed supreme and absolute power over the sovereigns, the exercise of which, they insisted, was essential to the maintenance of truth and justice in the middle age.

The empire of Charlemagne was divided among his grandsons in 843. To Charles the Bald was assigned Western Francia, or France; to Louis, Eastern Francia, or Germany; and to Lothaire, the intervening territory, with Italy, and the nominal emperorship over all. The imperial government was practically brought to an end by this treaty, and throughout Europe the feudal system of government was substituted for it. Originally the companions of the Teutonic chiefs who invaded the Roman territory were rewarded for their services by free gifts, generally of lands in the conquered districts. At the dissolution of the empire, the persistent invasions of the Northmen, and the general disorder of the times, made necessary some new method of efficient protection. Lands were granted by the sovereign to his chief warriors, on condition that their possessors should aid the sovereign in the defence of the country. The lands thus conferred were called "fiefs," and their holders, "vassals;" and the relation between the parties was that of reciprocal aid and protection, the lands being held by the vassals on that express condition. Those upon whom these fiefs were conferred directly by the sovereign were called "grand-vassals." They, in turn, parcelled out their grants among their followers, upon condition that they would hold these divided portions subject to services similar to those which their immediate lord owed to the sovereign. During the middle age, nearly all the land in Europe, originally the royal domain, was fenzalized, or held in fief. Power and the possession of land were inseparably connected; and hence the kings who had granted away the larger portion of their private lands became merely nominal sovereigns, the true rulers being the great feudal lords. The object of the feudal system was to combine military efficiency with the Teutonic habits of personal independence; and politically the result was to make the owner of a piece of land, large or small, the absolute sovereign of those who dwelt upon it.

Knighthood, in the feudal age, was the means which the Church employed to teach the rude warriors that it was becoming to their social position to employ their force, not merely to gratify their own selfish desires, but also in the protection of those unable to defend themselves, such as the oppressed, women, and especially the Church. The typical knight was he who served the Church best in these respects, and he became the ideal hero in the popular imagination. Chivalry and the sense of honor were the characteristic outgrowths of knighthood. Whatever was valuable or permanent about them was due to the sentiment which was expressed by the combined pride and gentleness of the knight, when he took for his device noblesse oblige. The Church professed to abhor all war, save that waged against the infidel, or for the extirpation of heresy, and did not look with favor even upon the tournaments, which were such characteristic institutions of chivalry.

Monasticism, in the middle age, formed the highest ideal conception of life, because of its asceticism. The monks were always the right arm of the Papacy: first the Benedictines, with their numerous branches acting as missionaries for the conversion of the northern tribes; then, in the thirteenth century, the Dominicans, whose special business it was to preach, and to instruct the laity; and the Franciscans, who organized more efficiently the charity of the Church.

The Crusades were the result of the one common impulse which moved the people of Western Europe during the middle age. They were the outgrowth of the zeal of the monks, as representing the Church, acting upon the warrior instincts, and the devotion of the knights to their religion. The result of this combination is seen, not only in the wars in the Holy Land, but in those against the Moors in Spain, and against the Albigenses in the south of France.

The free cities, in the middle age, were the centres of civilization in our modern sense. They were called free, because freed from feudal vassalage, except to the over-lord, or suzerain, and because they were governed by their own magistrates, elected, generally, by the trade corporations within them. They grew in wealth and importance by the industry of their inhabitants; and they maintained a considerable commerce with each other, especially in the north of Europe. In France and Germany they usually combined with the kings in resistance to the overgrown pretensions of the great nobles, in order to secure their freedom from feudal subjection to them.

Education was provided for in the earlier period by schools attached to the cathedrals and the monasteries. Out of these schools grew the universities so renowned in the middle age; that of Paris being the principal place of theological instruction, while at Bologna the Roman civil law, so far as it was then understood, was taught; and at Montpellier and Salerno medical instruction after the Arabian methods was given. All the instruction was under the general control of church authority, and was designed to exalt it. Science based on observation or physical investigation was neglected, except in some of the medical schools of a later period.

Life in the middle age, for the mass of the population, was very hard; for it was hemmed in on every side by force, always thoroughly organized, but very severe, and often very arbitrary in its exactions. The serfs and villeins could not change their masters, whose caprice was often the measure of the service to be rendered to them. The workmen of the towns who were not members of the privileged trade corporations resembled the proletariat of ancient Rome: the towns themselves, as well as the traffic between them, was subject to the plundering incursions of the robber knights. The great feudal nobles claimed the right to make war upon each other, as one of their most important privileges. There was no general government to protect the people, or to redress their wrongs: the royal authority was merely nominal, and therefore wholly disregarded. The Church tried hard, by its ministries and discipline, to alleviate the hardships which grew out of this anarchical condition; but in doing so it established a rule of force in another sphere, in which the minds and consciences of mankind were brought under its absolute control. C. J. STILLÉ.

MIDDLETON, Conyers, D.D., an able controversial writer, and author of the famous Life of Cicero; the son of a clergyman; b. at York, Dec. 27, 1683; d. at Hildersham, July 28, 1750. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, and taking orders, was settled at Trumpington, near Cambridge, his only charge. In 1716 he returned to Trinity as a fellow. He won for himself a wide reputation by his intrepid and caustic attacks on Bentley, the master of Trinity, who had called him "fiddling Middleton," with reference to his musical propensities. Bentley, in spite of his great scholarship, was very unpopular on account of his harsh personalities. They came to an open war in 1717, when, by a mandamus of George I., Bentley was obliged to confer the title of D.D. on Middleton. The master, however, showed his spleen by demanding an extra fee of four pounds. Middleton gave it, under protest, and, appealing to the courts, won a complete victory over Bentley, who was deprived of his professorship. He afterwards went too far, and was accused of libel by Bentley, found guilty, and fined. The battle, however, was not over. Bentley in 1720 was about to issue an edition of the Greek Testament, and sent out with great precipitancy some specimens. Middleton's keen eye detected errors; and immediately he assaulted Bentley in a fierce attack, completely driving him from the field, so that he renounced the idea of his New Testament, and winning the applause of the friends of Trinity, who chose him as the principal librarian of the college. In 1724 he visited Rome, and five years later wrote A Letter from Rome, showing an Exact Conformity between Popery and Paganism (4th ed., 1741), in which he boldly proved that the religion of the Roman Church was a continuation of the heathenism of ancient Rome. He had a passion for controversy; and it seemed to be his delight, by sudden attacks upon received opinions, to startle the literary public. The controversies of this doughty champion were not confined to Bentley, but extended to Waterland, Sherlock, and others. In 1725 he assaulted the whole medical profession (De Medicorum apud veteres Romanos, etc.). His controversy with Waterland originated with the latter's attack upon Middleton's assertion that there were "contradictions in the evangelists which could not be reconciled," and that "the story of the fall of man was a fable or allegory." In 1741 he published the great work of his life, the History of the Life of M. Tullius Cicero (2 vols.), written at the request of Lord Harvey, and after the labors of six years. There were three thousand subscribers to the work; and from the receipts he purchased for himself a home at Hildersham, near Cambridge, whither he retired for the remainder of his life. This biography has been condemned as being too partial, and praising, as Macaulay has said, acts as "wise, virtuous, and heroic," which Cicero himself condemned. In 1749 he published Introductory Discourse, etc., to the Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers which are supposed to have subsisted in the Christian Church from the Earliest Ages through Several Successive Centuries. This work, which was received with almost universal condemnation, denies the continuance of miraculous powers in the Church after the deaths of the apostles. In 1750 he attacked Sherlock in An Examination of the Lord-Bishop of London's Discourses concerning the Use and Intent of Prophecy, etc. His Miscellaneous Tracts, published in one volume (London, 1752), comprise Dispute or Dissension between Peter and Paul at Antioch; The Variations or Inconsistencies among the Four Evangelists; Essay on the Gift of Tongues, etc. The complete edition of Middleton's works, except the Life of Cicero, 5 vols., was published in London, 1755. The best edition of the Life of Cicero is that of London, 1818.

MIDDLETON, Thomas Fanshaw, first bishop of Calcutta; b. in Kettleston, Derbyshire, Jan. 26, 1769; d. in Calcutta, July 8, 1822. He graduated with honors from Pembroke Hall, Cambridge; was appointed curate of Gainsborough, and, after several other promotions, was made archdeacon of Huntingdon, 1812, and consecrated first incumbent of the episcopal see of Calcutta,

May 8, 1814. At Calcutta he founded in 1820 the Bishops' College, for the training of missionaries and clergymen for Asia. Dr. Middleton published in 1808 The Doctrine of the Greek Article applied to the Criticism and Illustration of the New Testament (2d ed. by Rev. James Scholefield, 1828, 5th ed., 1855). A posthumous volume of Sermons, Charges, etc., with Memoir, was issued by Bonney, London, 1824. See LE BAS: Life of Bishop Middleton, London, 1831, 2 vols.; and MISS YONGE: Pioneers and Founders.

MIDIAN (strife), the territory from the Elanitic Gulf to Moab and Mount Sinai, or, according to others, from the Sinaitic peninsula to the desert and the banks of the Euphrates. Moses lived among the Midianites (Exod. ii. 15-21); and on the desert they had friendly relations with the Israelites, until they had infected them with their own vices of idolatry and uncleanness; for which sins one thousand men from each tribe, by divine command, attacked the neighboring Midianites, and slew all their males (Num. xxv., xxxi.). The Midianites eventually recovered from this blow, and oppressed Israel, but were miraculously defeated by Gideon (Judg. vi.-viii.), and later were merged with the Moabites. They have no history outside of the Bible.

MIDRASH. The term "Midrash" denotes, in the abstract and general sense, "the study," "the exposition of Holy Writ." After the return from Babylon, the law was the centre of the spiritual life in Israel; and its study became the object of scientific treatment when the temple, the Jewish sanctuary, was destroyed. The "law of Moses" had not only to be adapted to the altered circumstances of life, but had also to be supplemented by more precisely determining that which was undetermined, in order to meet all individual relations and circumstances of life. This investigation and explanation of Scripture was termed Midrash, and was divided into the Halachic ("exegesis"), i. e., embracing law and practice, or doctrine in its whole extent, and Hagadic, i. e., embracing all other scientific products, all the efflux of free meditation, whether its subject-matter might be historical or legendary, ethical, parabolic, or speculative.

The writing down of the Midrash, i. e., of Halachoth and Hagadoth, commenced with the second century of our era, and ended in the eleventh century: since that time, history, religious philosophy, grammatical exegesis, and Cabala, became the objects of study.

Structure of the Midrashim. — A large portion of the Midrashim consists of homiletical lectures introduced by a text not contained in the Pentateuch. This was called p'ticha, or proëm. The most simple form of the proëm is the quotation of a verse, the relation of which to the section of the Pentateuch, or rather its application to the subject, was left to the reader or hearer to be found out. Sometimes more than one text was introduced; and the exposition was given in such a manner, that the last exposition, or its close, served as a connecting link between the introduction and the subject under discussion. Of a more exegetical character are the oldest Midrashim; such as Genesis Rabba, Mechültha, Sifre, Sifra.

LIT. — 1. The three ancient Midrashim, Mechültha, Sifre, Sifra, have this in common, that they contain Halacha or Hagadah, just as the text to be treated requires it. The first two, according to their original portions, belong to Ishmael, the contemporary and opponent of Akiba (first half of the second century).

(a) Mechilta (i.e., "measure, form") is a commentary upon parts of the Book of Exodus; as xii. 1-xxiii. 19, xxxi. 12-17, and xxxv. 1-3. It was first printed at Constantinople in 1515. The latest editions are, Mechilta, with notes by J. H. Weiss, Vienna, 1865, and Mechilta de Rabbi Ismael, with notes, etc., by M. Friedmann, Vienna, 1870. A Latin translation is found in UGOLINO'S Thesaurus antiq. sacrarum, vol. xiv. c. 1-586.

(b) Sifre, a commentary on Numbers and Deuteronomy, printed in Venice in 1515. Latest edition entitled Sifre debé Rab, with notes, etc., by M. Friedmann, Vienna, 1861. Latin translation in UGOLINO'S Thesaurus, vol. xv. c. 1-996.

(c) Sifra, also Torath cohanim [i.e., "Codex of the Priests"], a commentary on Leviticus, first printed at Venice in 1515. Latest editions by M. L. Malbim, with an excellent commentary [Hatara vehamitva], Bucharest, 1860; J. H. Weiss, Sifra, Vienna, 1862, and Warsaw, 1866, with a commentary by Simson, of Sens. Latin translation in UGOLINO'S Thesaurus, vol. xiv. c. 587-1630.

2. Midrash Rabbath. Under the name Midrash Rabbath, or Rabbath, ten Haggadic Midrashim are comprised, which treat (a) on the Pentateuch, and (b) the Five Megilloth (i.e., Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther).

(a) On the Pentateuch.

(a) Bereshith Rabba, on Genesis, divided into a hundred chapters, and composed in the sixth century. The last five chapters, also called Vaichi Rabba, so called from the first word vaichi (Gen. xlviii. 12 sq.), are more modern, probably of the eleventh century. See ZUNZ, pp. 174-179, 254-256; LERNER: Anlage des Bereshith Rabba, in Magazin für die Wissenschaft des Judenthums [Berlin], 1880, 157-174, 197-237; 1881, 30-48, 92-107, [130-160, 178-197]. German translation by Aug. Wünsche, in his Bibliotheca Rabbinica, Leipzig, 1881.

(β) Shemoth Rabba, on Exodus, in fifty-two chapters, probably of the eleventh or twelfth century. ZUNZ, 256-258. German translation by Wünsche, l.c.

(γ) Vajjikra Rabba, on Leviticus, in thirty-seven chapters. Middle of the seventh century. ZUNZ, p. 182.

(δ) Bamidbar Rabba, on Numbers, in twenty-three chapters, by two authors: the latter probably belongs to the twelfth century. ZUNZ, 258-262.

(ε) Debarim Rabba, on Deuteronomy, in eleven chapters. ZUNZ, 251-253. [German translation by Wünsche, l.c.]

(b) On the Five Megilloth.

(a) Shir ha-Shirim Rabba, on the Song of Songs; also called Agadath Chasitha. German translation by Wünsche, l.c. Compare THEODOR: Shir ha-shirim Rabba und seine Quellen, in [FRANKEL-GRAETZ'S] Monatsschrift, 1879, 337-341, 408-415, 455-462; 1880, 19-23; ZUNZ, pp. 263, 264; SAALFELD, in Magazin für die Wissenschaft des Judenthums, 1878, 120-125.

(β) Ruth Rabba, in eight chapters. ZUNZ, p. 265.

(γ) Midrash Echa, or Megillath Echa, and Midrash Echa Rabbathi [on Lamentations]. ZUNZ, pp. 179-181. Seventh century.

(δ) Midrash Koheleth [on Ecclesiastes]. German translation by Wünsche, Leipzig, 1880. ZUNZ, 265, 266.

(ε) Midrash Esther, also Haggadath Megilla, in six sections. German translation by Wünsche, l.c.

This entire collection was first published at Venice in 1545, fol. Convenient editions are those published at Berlin, 1866, and at Wilna, 1878. Compare STEINSCHNEIDER: Catalogus Librorum Hebraeorum in Bibliotheca Bodlejana, Berlin, 1852-60, No. 3753-3784; WOLF: Bibl. Hebr., ii. 1423-1427, iii. 1215, iv. 1032 sq., 1058 sq.

3. Pesikta, also called Pesikta di Rab Cahana [b. about A.D. 330, and d. in 411], comprising a complete cycle of lectures on the pericopes of the feasts and fasts. For a long time it was only known from citations found in the Jalkut and Aruch. The latest edition is that of BUBER: Pesikta, Lyck, 1868. Compare ZUNZ, 185-226; GERGER: Jüdische Zeitschrift, 1869, pp. 187-195; THEODOR: Zur Composition der agadischen Homilien, in [FRANKEL-GRAETZ'S] Monatsschrift, 1879, 97-113, 164-175, 271-278, 337-339, 455-457; [GRAETZ: Geschichte der Juden, iv. 495 sq.; FÜRST: Bibl. Jud., ii. 159 sq.].

Pesikta Rabbathi contains also a collection of lectures on the pericopes, and was compiled, probably, before the ninth century. The earliest edition is that of 1656; the latest, by M. Friedmann, Vienna, 1880. ZUNZ, 239-251.

Lekach Tob, erroneously also called Pesikta suttarta. The Lekach Tob was compiled by Tobia ben Eliezer, in the twelfth century, and comprises comments on the Pentateuch and Megilloth. Of the Pentateuch, only the three last books were extant; but in 1880 S. Buber published the books of Genesis and Exodus. The Midrash on the Five Megilloth is still unpublished. Compare ZUNZ, 293-295; STEINSCHNEIDER: Catalogus, 7304; [FÜRST: Bibl. Jud., iii. p. 427].

Under the title of Pesikta chadatha, A. Jellinek has published a smaller Midrash for the festival days, containing quotations from Genesis Rabba, Pirke Rabbi Eliezer, the Book Jezira, in his Et-ha-Midrash, vi. 36-70.

4. Midrash Tanchuma (also called Jelamdenu, extending over the entire Pentateuch) was probably written about the ninth century, by an author who lived in Greece or Italy. It was first printed at Constantinople in 1520-22; latest edition, Stettin, 1864, with the commentaries Ez Josef and Anaf Josef. See ZUNZ, 226-238; STEINSCHNEIDER, 3795-3801; [WOLF: Bibl. Hebr., i. 1159 sq., iii. 1166 sq., iv. 1035; FÜRST: Bibl. Jud., iii. 409].

5. Jalkut, or Jalkut Shimoni, i.e., a collection of Simon, who flourished in the first part of the thirteenth century. This Midrash extends over the whole Bible. Not to be interchanged with our work is the Jalkut Rubeni and Jalkut Hadush, two cabalistic works. Our Jalkut was first published at Salonichi, 1526-27. [WOLF: Bibl. Hebr., i. 1129 sq., iii. 1138; ZUNZ, 295-303; RAPOPORT, in Kerem chemed, vii. 4 sq. (Hebrew); FÜRST: Bibl. Jud., iii. 327 sq.]

6. Other Midrashim. (a) Exegetical: viz.—

(a) Agadath Bereshith [on Genesis], in eighty-three sections, Venice, 1618. ZUNZ, 256; STEINSCHNEIDER, 3727-3729.

(β) Moses ha-darshan of Narbonne, of the eleventh century, wrote annotations on some books of the Bible. Raymond Martini often quotes him in his Pugio fidei. ZUNZ, 287-293; PUSEY, in Introduction to liii. Chapter of Isaiah, vol. ii., Oxford, 1877; NEUBAUER: The Book of Tobit, Oxford, 1878, pp. vii.-ix., xx.-xxiv.

(γ) Midrash Hashkem, on the Pentateuch; probably of the tenth century. ZUNZ, 281. The part pertaining to Exodus was edited after a Munich manuscript by Freimann, also with the Latin title, Vehishir, Opus continens Midrashim et Halachoth, etc., vol. i., Leipzig, 1873.

(δ) Midrash Jonah, published Prague, 1595. ZUNZ, 270, 271.

(ε) Midrash Tiltim, or Sochar Tob, on the Psalms, with the exception of Ps. xlii., xevi.-xviii., cxv., cxliii., cxvii., published at Constantinople, 1512; later editions, Lemberg, 1851, Warsaw, 1873.

(ς) Midrash Mishle, on Proverbs, Constantinople, 1512, Stettin, 1861; also together with ε.

(ζ) Midrash Shamuel; beginning of the eleventh century, and containing excerpts from older works. Constantinople, 1517, Stettin, 1860.

(b) Halachic Midrashim: viz.,—

She'eloth [i.e., "questions"], of Rabbi Acha of Shabeha (about 750), on laws and usages, as contained in the Pentateuch. Best edition is that published at Dyhrenfurt, 1786, with the commentaries of Isaiah, Berlin. ZUNZ, 56, 96, 343, 351; STEINSCHNEIDER, 4330.

(c) Historical Haggadot: viz.,—

(a) Seder Olam Rabba, ascribed to José ben Chalaphtha, about 150 A.D., and (β) Seder Olam Sutta. Both these works were edited by Meyer, with a Latin translation and notes: Chronicon Hebraeorum majus et minus, Amsterdam, 1699. Compare WOLF: Bibl. Hebr., i. 492-499, iv. 1029 sq.; STEINSCHNEIDER, 5873; [ZUNZ, 85, 135-139; EWALD: *Göttingen Gel. MIGNE, Jacques Paul, a prominent Roman-Catholic theologian; b. at St. Flour, Cantal, France, Oct. 25, 1800; d. in Paris, Oct. 25, 1875. He was educated at the theological seminary in Orléans; became a professor at Châteaudun; was ordained priest 1824; and was curate at Puiseaux, in the diocese of Orléans. In consequence of a lively controversy with his bishop respecting his (Migne's) book upon the Liberty of the Priests, he betook himself to Paris in 1833, and started L'Univers religieux, later called simply L'Univers, but sold it in 1836, and went to Petit Montrouge, near Paris, where he soon built up an enormous printing-establishment, to which he gave the name Imprimerie catholique. From this proceeded, at low prices and with great rapidity, reprints of the works of the Greek and Latin Fathers, mediæval writers, and modern ecclesiastical authors, besides a theological encyclopædia of the most comprehensive description, comprising three different religious dictionaries. The principal of Migne's publications are, Scripturæ sacræ cursus completus and Theologiæ cursus (each 28 vols., published simultaneously from 1810 to 1845); Collection des orateurs sacrés (1846–48, 100 vols.); Patrologiæ cursus completus (Latin series, 221 vols., 1841 sqq.; 2d ed., 1878 sq.; 1st Greek series, 104 vols., 2d, 58 vols., both since 1857); and Encyclopédie théologique (1844–66, 171 vols.). These reprints have done much to spread the patristic and scholastic writings, but are in themselves of no critical value. They were gotten up too rapidly, and not by the right persons, for scholarly work. In the establishment of Migne, printing was only one of the trades carried on: organs, statuary, pictures, and other things found or used in churches, were manufactured there. The Archbishop of Paris, deeming that the commercial element, rather than the spiritual or the ecclesiastical, was the ruling one in Migne's business, forbade him to continue it. Migne refused to stop, and the archbishop suspended him. In February, 1868, his immense establishment, which employed three hundred operatives and many literary persons, was burnt to the ground. In this fire the entire remainders of some volumes of his series were destroyed, but of these a new edition has been prepared. MIKKELSEN, Hans, burgomaster of Malmœ in Skaane; accompanied Christian II. into exile, and died at Harderwick, in Guelderland, about 1532. He was the first to translate the New Testament into Danish (the Gospels from Erasmus' Latin translation, and the Epistles from Luther's German). The translation was published in 1524.

MILAN, The Church of, was, according to legend, founded by Barnabas, and occupied a similar position between the Eastern and Western churches to that Barnabas occupied between Paul and the other apostles. Ambrose, the great archbishop of Milan (374–397), acquired his literary influence chiefly by imitating Greek models; and the Liturgy which he introduced in the Milanese Church, and which was maintained in spite of the exertions of Charlemagne and Gregory VII., originated in the Orient, and deviates considerably from the Roman Liturgy. The successors of Ambrose often appeared as mediators between Rome and Byzantium in their contests of rivalry and doctrinal controversies; and especially in the Three-Chapter Controversy, in the sixth century, the Archbishop of Milan and the Patriarch of Aquileia acted as arbiters between the Orthodox party of Rome and the Eastern Monophysites. Such a position presupposes a considerable measure of independence and power, and for several centuries the Church of Milan enjoyed both in no small degree. Ambrose was elected bishop of the people, and simply confirmed by the emperor; and in the same manner all the following archbishops of Milan were elected, down to the time of Constantius (592-600). He was a friend of Gregory the Great, and went to Rome to be ordained by him; but his suffragan bishops became so indignant at this humiliation before Rome, that they separated from him. After his death, the episcopal election again became independent of Rome, and remained so until the time of Gregory VII. In the mean time, the power of the Milanese archbishop vastly increased. From the Lombard kings, whom he crowned with the iron crown, and from the German kings, whose policy it was to prevent the large fiefs from becoming hereditary, he received extensive estates, and in the ninth and tenth centuries he was the real Duke of Lombardy. To direct an open attack against such a rival would not be prudent, and the Roman curia consequently chose an indirect way. The Milanese clergy generally married (even the bishops), and considered this one of the liberties of the Ambrosian Church. But when the reforms of Hildebrand began to take shape, Roman emissaries appeared in the Milanese territory, stirring up the people, the laity, against the "unholy" clergy. The party of the "Patarini" was formed, a split was produced between the flocks and their pastors, and then Rome could venture upon a plan of direct attack. In 1059, sent by Nicholas II., the famous ascetic, Petrus Damiani, cardinal of Ostia, appeared in Milan, at the head of a Roman committee, to investigate the ecclesiastical method of appointment practised in the diocese; and the result was an enormous number of accusations of simony. The people murmured at this interference from the side of Rome; but the clergy was smitten with terror, and submitted. When Nicholas II. died, in 1061, it was evident to the Milanese clergy, that their cause entirely depended upon the next papal election. Several Lombard bishops, consequently, immediately repaired to the court of the young Henry IV.; and the party succeeded in having Bishop Cadalus of Parma elected pope, and confirmed by Henry IV. as Honorius II. But, in the mean time, the other party, the Roman curia, with Hildebrand at its head, and under protection of the Norman ruler of Naples, had elected Alexander II. pope; and, in the contest which then issued, the latter finally came out victorious, and the spirit of independence which had hitherto characterized the Church of Milan was broken. It ought to be mentioned, though, that when, in the present century, the contest arose in Italy between the national cause and ultramontanism, the Church of Milan was the only portion of the Italian Church which espoused the national cause, and showed any readiness to make sacrifices for its sake. MILDMAY CONFERENCE, a missionary convention held at the Conference Hall in Mildmay

Park, London, Oct. 21-25, 1878. Valuable papers and addresses were presented, discussing the progress of Christian missions in different parts of the world. The Proceedings were published at London, 1879. The conferences are continued from time to time.

MILETUS (incorrectly translated Miletum in 2 Tim. iv. 20), an ancient city on the western coast of Asia Minor, about thirty miles south of Ephesus. In 500 B.C. it was the principal Greek city in Asia, and was the birthplace or home of Thales, Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Hecateus. From that time its importance waned before the growing fame and population of its rival Ephesus. At the present time, only a few ruins remain to attest the site which has been covered up by the silt of the Meander River. In the New Testament, Miletus has importance as the point where Paul stopped on his return to Jerusalem from his third missionary journey. Here he took leave of the elders of Ephesus (Acts xx. 17). The statement in Acts xx. 38 implies, as Hackett says (see Commentary on Acts, 2d ed., p. 344), that the city was some distance from the sea; and the sea has since receded, till its site is ten miles away. The statement that Paul left Trophimus sick at Miletus (2 Tim. iv. 20) favors the view of his double imprisonment. See, on this point, Howson: Life of St. Paul, chap. xxvii.

MILICZ OF KREMSIER, the precursor of Hus; b. at Kremsier, a city near Olmutz in Moravia, in the beginning of the fourteenth century; d. at Avignon, June 29, 1374. It is not known where he made his studies, but he assumed his first office in the service of the church in 1350. In 1360 he was canon of the Cathedral of St. Vitus in Prague, archdeacon and secretary to the emperor, Charles IV., whom he accompanied to Germany. But his whole nature and character inclined towards asceticism; and in 1363 he resigned his offices, and retired to Bishop-Teinitz, a small town at the foot of the Bohemian Forest. Having returned to Prague, he began to preach to the poor in the streets, (?) and in the Bohemian language. This innovation caused, at first, considerable surprise, but soon became the means by which he reached the very hearts of his hearers. To the students he continued to preach in Latin. He afterwards also learned German in order to preach in that language. One of the great practical results of his activity was the cleaning-out of "Benatki," the most notorious street of the city, and its transformation into a benevolent institution,—"Jerusalem,"—in which women who had been rescued from vice were taken care of. The sight of evil prevailing both inside the church and outside of it led him to the view that Antichrist had come. Reform was necessary, but it had to be made from above, by the Pope; and in 1367 he actually repaired to Rome to confer with Urban V. He was well received, but effected nothing. Meanwhile his sincerity and energy had raised him many enemies in his home, and in 1374 they addressed themselves directly to the Papal Court at Avignon with an accusation of twelve articles. Milicz immediately went to Avignon; and the reception which was given to him shows that he would have been declared innocent of any guilt, but he died before the verdict was given. He left several minor treatises in Latin (Libellus de Antichristo, Gratia Dei, Lectones quadragesimales), and a couple of devotional tracts in Bohemian.

LIT. — His life, written by a pupil of his, was published by Balbin, in his Miscellanea, 1682, book 18. Another sketch of his life and character, by MATTHIAS OF JANOW, was used by Palacky, in his History of Bohemia, and translated into German by J. P. JORDAN: Die Vorläufer des Hussitentums, Leipzig, 1816. G. LECHLER.

MILITARY RELIGIOUS ORDERS. The military religious orders (so called) of the middle age grew out of organizations, formed before the crusades of pilgrims to the holy places in Jerusalem, designed to care for and protect those among them who reached the sacred city in a suffering or destitute condition. Pilgrimage to places in Palestine hallowed by the presence or by the events of the life of the Saviour, was long regarded as a high religious duty in Western Europe; and it was often, indeed, a form of penance prescribed by the Church. To the mass of the pilgrims, ill provided with the means of securing their safety or comfort, the long journey amidst populations bitterly hostile was a most formidable undertaking; and it is not to be wondered at that many of them when they reached Jerusalem were better fitted to become inmates of an hospital than worshippers at the holy shrines.

The pilgrims came from every part of Western Europe: but in those days, when a man crossed the frontier of his country, he was beyond the reach, and without the protection, of his own sovereign; so that had not the pilgrims who were feeble and destitute received aid and succor from those who were richer and stronger than they, and who had gone on the same errand, the larger portion must have perished miserably. These pilgrims were all engaged in a common duty prescribed by a common religion; and that religion taught them to help each other in this work. Out of this sentiment grew nearly twenty organized bodies or orders in the Holy Land previous to the Crusades and during its occupation by the crusaders, all of which had, from the beginning, in view the protection and succor of pilgrims; and, as a means to that end, they all sought to maintain the possession of the country in the hands of the Christians.

Of these orders the most famous in history, not only for what they did in Palestine during the Crusades but for their armed advocacy of the Church afterwards against the Mohammedans and the heathen, were the Knights-Hospitalers of St. John, the Knights-Templars, and the Teutonic Knights.

1. The Order of the Knights of St. John (Johannite, Fratres hospitalis S. Johannis, Hospitalarii). — In 1048 some merchants of Amalfi in Italy (then one of the principal seats of commerce between the East and West) gained permission of the caliph of Egypt, under whose jurisdiction Jerusalem then was, to establish in that city a small chapel and a hospital attached to it for the service of pilgrims. These were placed in charge of Benedictine monks, who were called "hospital brethren." After the capture of Jerusalem by the crusaders, these monks were confirmed in their possessions by Godfrey de Bouillon. Large sums of money were given by him to maintain and enlarge their work; and he appointed a provençal Knight, Gerard, their prior. Besides the hospital at Jerusalem, they established hospitals under the charge of the members of the order in the principal seaports whence pilgrims embarked for the Holy Land. In 1118, owing to the dangers which threatened the new Latin kingdom of Jerusalem, the order added to its charitable work proper the services of its members as knights and soldiers in fighting against the Mussulmans. The organization of the order was so modified, that its members became bound thereafter both by monastic and by knightly vows, agreeing to aid and defend the Church, besides receiving and caring for suffering pilgrims. It was called a sovereign order, because Richard Cœur de Lion, on leaving Acre, gave to it his conquests in Palestine. It was made free from any local ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and owed obedience only and directly to the Pope; and this was characteristic of all the military religious orders. Its members were divided into three classes: (1) The Knights, or those from whom military service alone was due; (2) The chaplain, whose duties included ministrations to the sick in the hospitals; (3) Serving brethren, who were assistants to the Knights and to the clergy.

The order spread rapidly, and its riches and power from donations throughout Europe became greatly enlarged. It was organized in seven districts, or langes as they were called; viz., Provence, Auvergne, France, Italy, Aragon, Germany, and England. The distinctive dress of the Knights was at first a black robe, with a cross of eight points of white linen affixed to it, worn on the left breast. This was afterwards changed for a red mantle with a white cross placed upon it. Their legend was Pro Fide ("for the faith"). The chief officer was called "Grand Master of the Hospital at Jerusalem, and Guardian of the Poor of Jesus Christ." The Knights of St. John by their prowess added much to the military strength of the Christians in the East during the era of the Crusades. At Antioch, at Tiberias (1187), and especially at the siege of St. Jean d'Acre, they won great renown by their conduct and valor. After the capture of Jerusalem by Saladin (1189), they retired to Acre, and there carried on their special work in their hospitals until that town was taken by the Mamelukes (1291). They then took refuge in Cyprus. In 1309 they captured the Island of Rhodes, and held it as their headquarters till 1523, maintaining their position as armed defenders of the faith; their special duty at the time being to resist the advance of the Turkish power against Western Europe by way of the Mediterranean Sea. They were unable permanently to withstand this power while they occupied these islands. In 1523 they were forced to surrender the Island of Rhodes to Solymán after a siege which is among the most remarkable in history, and in which the Knights exhibited that same heroic courage and constancy which had been so conspicuous in the early days of the order in Palestine. They had held, in spite of the most formidable obstacles, this bulwark of Christendom against the advance of the infidel for two hundred and twenty years. But their work was not yet done; and they were to earn a still higher title to fame and to the gratitude of posterity, as the armed champions of Christian civilization, by the defence against the infidel of the next advanced post of Christendom to which they were assigned,—the Island of Malta. This island was given to the order with great hesitation, by the Emperor Charles V. in 1530; and the Knights were there placed as the guardian of Christian interests in the Mediterranean,—in a position of extremest danger, threatened on one side by the mighty naval power of the Turks of the East, and on the other by that of the tributary provinces on the African coast. Not disheartened, they fortified Malta until it became impregnable when defended by their heroic valor. They had not long to wait to test the question whether they alone, unsupported by any of the Christian powers, would be able to withstand the naval power of the Turks, then in the height of its glory. In 1565, Solymán the Magnificent determined to capture the last stronghold of these defenders of the faith in the Mediterranean. He knew well the difficulties of the siege of such a place, defended by men like the Knights of St. John; for he had learned to know them thoroughly well at the siege of Rhodes. He therefore sent a fleet and army to accomplish his purpose, unexcelled in numbers and discipline by any military force which the Turks had hitherto directed against the Christians. We cannot here describe the progress of this most famous siege (see PRESCOTT, Philip II., book iv. chap. iv., for a full account of it); but the result was, that the Knights, by prodigies of valor hitherto unsurpassed even by themselves, drove back the Turks, and forced them to raise the siege.

With the siege of Malta ends the heroic age of the Knights of St. John, or of Malta as they were afterwards called. The battle of Lepanto, which took place a few years after the successful defence of Malta, destroyed forever the prestige of the naval power of the Turks in the Mediterranean; and in this engagement the fleet of the Knights took an active part. For more than a hundred years afterwards, they aided in protecting the commerce of the Mediterranean from Turkish corsairs and pirates. But their special work was completed when the decay of the aggressive power of the Turks on that sea began. They remained in Malta, with their organization unimpaired, until the French Revolution; although their revenues were much reduced by the policy of confiscation adopted by the rulers of many of the kingdoms of Europe in which their estates were situated. Henry VIII. of England seized their property, and prohibited the continuance of the order in that country. The kings of Portugal shortly afterwards followed his example; and in France their estates were made, at the Revolution, national property. How much the order must have fallen, at the close of the eighteenth century, from its once high estate, is shown by the offer made by the last Grand Master, Hompesch, in 1797, to Paul I., the Czar of Russia, to become its head and patron. As the czar was the chief of the schismatics in Europe, and the order had been established especially to maintain the Catholic faith, this surrender is very suggestive.

In 1798 Bonaparte, on his way to Egypt, attacked and captured Malta, threatening the French Knights belonging to it with death if they resisted, as he claimed that they were fighting against the armies of their own country. In September of the same year, the island was taken from the French by the English fleet under Lord Nelson, and in the possession of that country it has ever since remained. The Knights thereupon dispersed; and their old organization has never since been revived, although certain benevolent or charitable associations claiming some affiliation with it are still to be found in certain countries of Europe, and even in this country.

2. The Order of the Knights-Templars.—In 1119 Hugh de Payens, a pilgrim of noble birth, joined with eight of his companions at Jerusalem in forming an association, the object of which was purely military, as distinguished from the combined military and religious purpose of the Knights of St. John; viz., to defend and protect, by armed force, pilgrims on their way to the holy shrines. Baldwin II., king of Jerusalem, gave this association, as its headquarters, a part of the sanctuary close to the temple. Its members, who were all Knights, called themselves Fratres militie templi, or Equites templari. Like the other orders (the Hospitallers and the Teutonic Knights), they were at first poor, and without any fixed revenues; but, like the others, they soon became rich through the enthusiasm with which their devotion to their work inspired the faithful throughout Europe. Their costume was originally a white mantle, with a red cross affixed to it. Their banner, called Beauseant, bore as its motto, Non nobis Domine, non nobis, sed tuo nomini da gloriam. In token of their poverty and devotion, their seal represented two Knights riding on one horse. They were from the first strongly supported by the higher authorities of the Church. The Pope, Honorius II., took them under his special protection; and, by a decree pronounced in 1128 at the Council of Troyes, he confirmed them in their privileges, and directed that they should be freed from any ecclesiastical jurisdiction save his own. St. Bernard, at the request of the Knights, drew up their code of laws, in which a spirit of severe asceticism, characteristic of their author, prevails. He imposed upon them what he calls eternal exile for the honor of Christ; he forbids them to flee, even when attacked by three men, and enjoins upon them to give no quarter to their infidel enemies, etc.

The Templars gained a very high reputation for courage and devotion on all the famous battlefields in which the crusaders met the infidel. Their organization, like that of the other orders, was in three classes: (1) The Knights proper; (2) The Armigeri, or Esquires, whose service was that of arms, and famuli, who were concerned in the general administration; and (3) Rich men, who were affiliated to the order, and who, without pronouncing the knightly vows, aided the objects of the order by their money-gifts. The order became so prosperous, that, in less than a hundred and fifty years after its foundation, it is said that there were no less than twenty thousand Knights and nine thousand commanderies, or houses, under its jurisdiction in Europe and the East. Its four provinces in the East were those of Jerusalem, Antioch, Tripoli, and Cyprus; and almost every country in Western Europe contained one, at least, of the provinces of the Templars. The Grand Master was a sovereign prince, and in England the Master of the Temple was a baron in Parliament.

After the capture of Jerusalem (1244), the Templars retired, first to Cyprus, and afterwards (1280) to France. Unlike the Knights of St. John in similar case, their work of fighting against the infidel was now done; and when they gave up the special purpose for which they had been established, and returned to Europe, they presented the spectacle of an enormously rich and powerful corporation, owing no allegiance in the different countries in which they resided, save to the Pope; while the wealth which had been lavished upon them for a special object, that object having failed, was employed by them, according to the popular belief, only to increase their own power and dignity. They were in that position which in all history has proved the most odious to the rulers of nations, — that of possessors of enormous privileges who do not render any adequate or equivalent service for the privileges they possess.

The order of the Templars was abolished by a decree of Pope Clement V. in 1312, — a decree extorted from him by Philippe le Bel, king of France, to whom he owed the office he held. The history of the suppression of an order, which, for nearly two hundred years, had rendered such illustrious service to the Church and to the Pope, forms one of the most curious chapters in the life of the middle age. The object of the king, who was always in need of money, was, no doubt, to gain possession of the wealth of the Templars, and perhaps to provide against a possible abuse of their power in his kingdom. This is very plain; but it is important to know what pretexts were thought necessary at that time to discredit the order in public opinion, and to insure its condemnation by the Church.

On the 12th of October, 1307, the Templars throughout France, without any warning, and pursuant to the secret orders of the king, were arrested, and thrown into prison. The next day Philip issued a proclamation, explaining in a very declamatory form his reasons for so extraordinary an act. "A terrible, horrible, inconceivable form of wickedness has come to our knowledge," he says; and he then goes on to enumerate the charges against the Templars. These charges may be classified under three heads: (1) The denial of Christ; (2) Idolatry; (3) Immoral practices. Their offence, if any, was heresy; and, by the law then existing, it could be inquired into only by the ecclesiastical authority, not by that of the king. As to the charges themselves, it seems generally conceded by historians, that the Templars, during their long residence in the East, had, to a certain extent, become infected with some strange Oriental doctrines and practices. It would appear that some of them professed a belief made up of opinions and rites borrowed partly from recent Mohammedan, and partly from old Christian heresies, which substituted for the spirituality of the Christian system doctrines founded more or less upon the idea of force and materialism. This had its effect, doubtless, upon their ritual, and upon the form of their symbolic ceremonial. There seems to be no doubt, that, in the latter days of the order, the Knight, on his initiation, was required to deny Christ; but this is explained by saying that such a denial was a mere form, the motive of which was to assure the order that the candidate possessed what was then regarded as the highest quality of a member of a religious order, — the spirit of passive obedience to his superior, which was ascertained by the most severe of all tests, — his willingness to renounce his faith. The accusation that they worshipped a copper idol with a long beard, called "Baffomet," and that the priest during an idolatrous service used the word "Allah," seems absurd on the face of it; for the one vice or corruption from which Mohammedanism has been always free is the worship or adoration of idols of any kind. They were said to use disgusting practices at the initiation of a member (Recipiens et receptus sese osculabantur in ore, in uniblico et in fine spinæ dorsæ). Strange as it may seem, this has been explained to be (supposing the practice ever to have existed) symbolical, in accordance with the opinion of the time, of humility and fraternity. It is to be remembered, in considering these charges of the immoral practices of the Templars, that, so far as they are said to rest upon their own confessions, those confessions were extorted by torture, and that they were afterwards, in the most complete manner, retracted by the heads of the order, not only on their last trial, but even at the hour when they were being burned as relapsed heretics, and, moreover, that it is quite possible that there may have been bad men and immoral men among the Templars, without involving the whole body in their crimes, and especially without making the perpetration of those crimes the recognized rule by which the order was governed in the time of Philippe le Bel.

While it is, perhaps, impossible wholly to absolve the Templars from the charges against them, there can be but one opinion in regard to the proceedings of their judges, Philip and Clement V. The condemnation of their predecessor, Boniface VIII., and the suppression of the Order of the Templars, were the price agreed to be paid by Clement V. to Philippe le Bel for his elevation to the Papacy by the direct influence of that king. The trial of the Knights is an illustration of the efforts of the Pope to evade paying the price agreed upon, and of the determination of the king to exact it. The technical offence charged against them was that of heresy; and, by law, the ecclesiastical tribunals had exclusive cognizance of it. But the king submitted the case to the officers of the Inquisition, then recently established in France, under the authority of the fourth council of the Lateran; and the familiar means of torture, and the refusal to confront the accused with witnesses employed by that tribunal, were freely used in this case. The Pope, on discovering that his own jurisdiction, specially reserved to him by the statutes creating the order, had been invaded by the king, suspended the proceedings begun by the Inquisition, and directed that the accused should be tried by a commission of cardinals appointed by him. He seems to have been willing to condemn those members who might be proved guilty of the alleged crimes, but not, on that account, to suppress the order itself. This, however, did not answer the purpose aimed at by the king. After having made public the so-called confessions of the Knights, made under torture, or promises of pardon, he called together (1308) the three orders of the kingdom: and, by his representation of the enormities committed by the Templars, he persuaded them to tell him that it was his duty, in case the Pope hesitated to abolish the order, to do so himself, citing as a precedent the conduct of Moses, who had not waited for the permission of the high priest Aaron to destroy the golden calf. The Pope, unmoved by this exposition of the law, was called upon to meet the king at Poitiers, and there settle the question of jurisdiction. The Pope was abject and servile, but not cruel. He evaded a decision: at one time he proposed that the matter should be referred to a general council of the Church, which he proposed to call. At another he declared his intention to reserve the trial of the higher dignitaries of the order to himself; and at length, wearied by the king's importunity, he even tried to escape in disguise from Poitiers. A compromise was at last effected, by which the inquisitor's powers of trying the ordinary Knights were restored, and the chiefs of the order were sent before a commission of cardinals representing the Pope directly. This arrangement was made upon the solemn promise of the king, that, in case of the condemnation of the Templars, they might withdraw from the country, and retain the possession of their estates within it. From this time the Pope, in abject terror of the king, ceased to take any active part in the defence of the Templars. In 1310 Philip, out of patience with the non-action of the Pope, directed that a provincial council, with the Archbishop of Sens at its head, should be held in Paris. This council continued the proceedings of the Inquisition. The Templars, before it, retracted in the fullest manner the alleged confession of their crimes, insisting that it had been forced from them by torture, or the promise of release, and asserted in the fullest manner the orthodoxy of their belief and the purity of the lives of themselves and their brethren. Under the strange jurisprudence of the Inquisition, they were condemned, on this avowal and retraction, as lapsed heretics. Fifty-four of the most distinguished among them were burned as such in Paris; all maintaining the constancy of their faith and their innocence of any crime, as long as the flames left them the power of speech. Jacques de Molai, the Grand Master, was the most conspicuous of these victims in every way. He had defended the order against the charge of the hideous crimes imputed to it, with the same intrepidity which his predecessors had shown on the bloody battlefields of Palestine; and, as his life was being consumed, he summoned his murderers, Philip and Clement, to meet him within a year at the bar of God, there to answer for their crimes. But Philip was not satisfied with the sacrifice of these illustrious victims. He asked of the general council of the Church, convened at Vienne, in France, a decree formally condemning the order. There were more than three hundred bishops from different portions of Europe present at this council, and their attitude was that of passive nonresistance to the king; but they could not be brought to take any action without better evidence than confessions wrung from the accused by torture. At last the wearied Pope, striving to satisfy the king, held a secret consistory, composed of such of the cardinals and bishops as were favorable to Philip; and on their report he issued a bull, dated April 3, 1312, abolishing the order, giving as his reasons therefor, that the conduct and confessions of the Knights had, at least, laid them open to suspicion; that there were rumors of grave misconduct on their part, and that the charges against them, made with great clamor by the nobility of France, had given rise to public scandal, which could only be removed by the suppression of the order. He therefore abolished and suppressed it provisionally, until better informed. Hence it appears that the question whether the Templars were really guilty of the crimes imputed to them was left unsettled by the Pope, their rightful judge, and by a general council of the Church, before whom the evidence to support the charge was laid.

In the other countries of Europe in which the Templars were established, although their estates were confiscated on the suppression of the order, the Knights were not molested nor ill treated. In France their estates, or what remained of them after the king had appropriated to himself a very large share, were given to the Knights of St. John; and the same disposition of their property was made generally in the other countries in which they were established. (The principal modern authorities for the trial of the Templars are, MARTIN: Histoire de France, vol. 3, chap. 27; BOUTARIC: La France sous Philippe le Bel, chap. 5; and MICHELET: Histoire de France, vol. 3, p. 178.)

3. The Teutonic Knights, or Knights of St. Mary.—After the siege of Acre (1192), in which the German crusaders suffered severely, a hospital for their care was established at Jerusalem by one of their countrymen, quidam Altemanus, as Jacques de Vitry calls him. Out of this hospital grew the Order of the Teutonic Knights, with duties both of the soldier and the nurse. Their statutes did not differ much from those of the other orders. The members were all Germans, and greatly distinguished themselves in the later crusades. After the fall of Jerusalem (1244), their headquarters were removed to Venice. They were invited (1240) by the Duke of Poland to defend the frontiers of his country, invaded on the north and east by the heathen Prussians; and, in order to induce them to undertake the work, the emperor and the Pope granted to them whatever lands they might conquer from the heathen on the frontiers of Germany. They, as a special mark of imperial favor, were allowed to display the imperial eagle on their arms; and from them it has come to their successors and representatives, the present royal house of Prussia. Twelve years later another order, called the "Order of Christ," or "of the Sword," which had conquered the heathen territory of Livonia, was joined with them; and the orders thus united became possessed of all the territory between the Vistula and the Memel, the coast-line reaching from Narva, on the Gulf of Finland, to the south-western point of Pomerania (see maps in Freeman's Historical Geography). The occupation of this country was marked by very harsh and cruel treatment of the heathen by the Knights; and Christianity was presented to these wild tribes very much in the same manner as Charlemagne had adopted towards the Saxons on the banks of the Elbe, when he gave them the alternative of baptism, or of being drowned. Still the country gradually became civilized under the rule of these Knights; and many important cities of the middle age, which carried on an extensive traffic with the rest of Europe by means of the Hanseatic League, grew up in their territory; such as Culm, Thorn, Elbing, Dantzic, Koenigsberg, and Marienberg, the headquarters of the Knights. Prussia under the Knights is said to have contained more than fifty cities and eighteen thousand towns and villages, and more than two millions of people. After nearly two centuries of rule, the power of the Knights was greatly diminished. Samogitia, the northern portion, was taken from them, and annexed to Lithuania in 1410; and in 1446, by the Treaty of Thorn, Culm and Dantzic, and a large portion of the bishopric of Ermland, was added to Poland. The rest of Prussia (the modern province of that name, with Koenigsberg as its capital) was left to the order as a Polish fief. In 1511 Albert of Brandenburg was Grand Master. In 1525 he adopted the Reformed doctrines, and, by the advice of Luther, married. He shortly afterwards surrendered to the king of Poland the possession of the territory which the order held in fief, and received it back from the king as a fief hereditary in his own family. The direct line of descent becoming extinct in 1618, the old duchy of Prussia passed to his collateral kindred, the margraves of Brandenburg; and thus the order became virtually destroyed. It was formally abolished by Napoleon I. in 1809, after his conquest of Prussia.

The substitution of the royal or monarchical authority in Europe for that which the Pope had exercised during the middle age, gradually destroyed the military religious orders; for the original purpose and motive of their existence had then ceased. The orders of chivalry established by the different kings in Europe have, of course, nothing in common with the mediæval military orders. The modern idea is, that these distinctions are conferred upon those whose rank and achievements are in this way publicly recognized by their sovereigns.

MILL, John, b. at Shap, Westmoreland, about 1615; d. at Blechingdon, Oxfordshire, June 23, 1707. He was educated at Oxford; became fellow of Queen's College, November, 1669; doctor of divinity, chaplain to Charles II., and rector of Blechingdon, 1681; principal of St. Edmund's Hall, May, 1685. His title to notice here rests upon his critical edition of the Greek Testament, Novum Testamentum Græcum, cum lectionibus variantibus MSS., etc., Oxford, 1707, folio. It was the issue of thirty years of labor, and contains thirty thousand various readings. The text was that of Stephens (1550). Mill lived only a fortnight after the appearance of the work. For a criticism of it, see BIBLE TEXT, p. 271.

MILL, John Stuart, b. in London, May 20, 1806; d. in Avignon, May 9, 1873; was the son of James Mill (b. April 6, 1773; d. June 23, 1836), the author of the History of British India and the Analysis of the Human Mind, and the friend and collaborator of Jeremy Bentham. Educated with great care, but in a cloistral and pedantic manner which shut him off from all the common impressions of boyhood, and trained his powers along the rules of grammar and logic, he developed a prodigious precocity; and when, in his twentieth year, he entered literature as a contributor to the leading periodicals of the day, he attracted much attention by his power of analyzing facts, his boldness in applying principles, and the conciseness and clearness with which he stated both facts and principles. In 1823 he obtained an appointment in the service of the East India Company, where he gradually rose to a very responsible position, until, in 1858, he retired on a pension at the dissolution of the company. Meanwhile he had become a world-renowned author. In 1843 he published his System of Logic, the third great work in the field after those of Aristotle and Hegel; in 1848, his Principles of Political Economy, new and vigorous both in method and materials, hotly contested on many points, but hardly superseded at any; in 1859, On Liberty, his most popular book, and fully deserving of its popularity; later on, Considerations on Representative Government (1861), Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy (1865), The Subjection of Women (1869), etc. Posthumously appeared an Autobiography (1873), a painful book, and Three Essays on Religion (1874), rather insignificant.

In the history of literature, John Stuart Mill stands as a character almost unique. He is powerful. His argumentation carries the subject like the ocean-waves the vessel. But he is entirely devoid of any charm, even of simple, natural grace; and the dignity, which never leaves him, is always stiff, and sometimes quaint. He is stimulating, and that in a most noble way; for it is the vigor of his endeavors and the greatness of his achievements which allure to imitation. He has none of that sarcasm which irritates, that allusion which excites, that insinuation which seduces. But he is not educating in the full sense of the word. If the reader happens to be unable to accept the results arrived at, he may still admire the iron knittings of the ratiocination, just as he admires the iron knittings of a suspension-bridge, or other mechanical contrivance; but that will be all. Even when he advocates the most advanced ideas, and manages the arguments with the most perfect adroitness, there is a dryness and stiffness about him which often makes an impression almost of barrenness. Generally, this peculiarity is explained as the result of his peculiar education; and, so far as he was conscious of it, he explained it so himself. But the same education, only on another basis, has often produced quite different results. It was not the education which gave him his spiritual character, but the platform on which he was placed, and from which his education prevented him ever to free himself. His stand-point was that of his father, that of Jeremy Bentham, that of the French encyclopedists, — the baldest materialism. But all cynicism, all fantastic recklessness, all levity and frivolity, are here eliminated, and replaced by strong common sense, deep conscientiousness, and perfect sincerity. John Stuart Mill probably indicates the high-water mark of what materialism is able to yield; and for that very reason it should be noticed, that though, in his Autobiography, no word of reproach escapes him, there is a latent regret in his words whenever he speaks of his father, and that though, in his Three Essays, he rejects every specifically Christian tenet, he almost openly recognizes that there is in religion something which he personally does not understand. His more than romantic, almost mystical, relation to his wife (see Carlyle's Memoirs) also indicates a craving for something to worship, if not a direct want of religion. See his remarkable utterances concerning Christ, p. 253, Amer. ed. For biography, see his Autobiography, London and New York, 1873, and A. MILLEDOLER, Philip, D.D., b. at Rhinebeck, N.Y., Sept. 22, 1775; d. on Staten Island, Sept. 23, 1851. He was of Swiss descent; graduated at Columbia College, New-York City, 1793; pastor Nassau-street German Reformed Church, New York (1795-1800), Pine-street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia (1800-05), Rutgers-street Presbyterian Church, New York (1805-13), Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church, New York (1813-25); professor of theology, and president of Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N.J., 1825-41. He was an excellent preacher, and particularly gifted in prayer. He was one of the founders of the American Bible Society, 1816; was moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church at Philadelphia, 1808, and president of the General Synod of the Reformed Church in 1823. His publications were sermons and addresses, for list of which see Coxwin's Manual of the Reformed Church in America, 3d ed., pp. 386, 387.

MILLENARIANISM, MILLENNIUM.¹ The first term designates a Christian doctrine, the main idea of which, in the early Church, was, that there will be a kingdom of peace and joy, in which Christ, after his second coming, will gather all the saints around him, and personally rule over them. It includes the visible appearance again of Christ on the earth to establish his kingdom, the destruction of Antichrist, the distinction of two resurrections, — one of the saints, for the kingdom of a thousand years; and one of the rest of the dead, for the general judgment, — perfection of happiness, and the dominion of the righteous over the unrighteous portion of the earth. It places a period of a thousand years between the second coming of Christ and the termination of this era (æon). The duration of the thousand years was a subordinate question. This kingdom is not the consummation of a process of evolution and development of the Church, but a special implanting of the glory of the hereafter in the imperfection of this world.

The biblical authority for this doctrine is found in the prophecies of the Old Testament, as yet unfulfilled (as Gen. xii. 1 sqq., xv. 3 sqq.), or the words of our Lord (Matt. v. 4, xix. 29; Luke xiv. 12 sqq.), but especially in the prophetic visions of Daniel and Ezekiel, and in the words of Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 25 sqq. The chief authority has always been the Book of Revelation. There is nothing in the sermons of the apostles about an earthly millennium, much less in the words of Christ. When the Lord comes again, it will be to judge the world (Matt. xxv. 31 sqq.). This second coming will be preceded by apostasy, carnal security, and godlessness (Matt. xxiv. 24, 37 sqq.; Luke xviii. 8); and the Church will suffer persecution to the end of time (Matt. xxiv. 13, 21 sqq.). The tares grow up with the wheat (Matt. xiii. 30) until the close of this era, and the Lord knows of only one resurrection, of the evil and the good (John v. 28 sqq.; Matt. xxv. 31 sqq.). The belief of the apostles, that the world was near its end, did not include any millenarian expectations. There are, however, passages, which, if interpreted strictly, and exclusively according to the letter, afford some ground for the millenarian doctrine; as, for example, the sitting at the table with the patriarchs in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. viii. 11), the drinking of the fruit of the vine (Matt. xxvi. 29), and the eating of the passover in the kingdom of God (Luke xxii. 16), etc. Finally, it cannot be disputed that the Book of Revelation (xx. 4 sqq.) contains the fundamental characteristics of millenarianism. The explanation of Augustine, that the thousand years (Rev. xx. 4) had begun before his day, is ruled out by the fact that this period is put after the destruction of Antichrist (xix. 19 sqq.). Nor is the first resurrection (xx. 4), which is set over against the state of the other dead not yet resurrected (xx. 12 sqq.), to be explained of the first stage of blessedness in heaven (Hengstenberg), or of regeneration (Augustine). It can only refer to a bodily resurrection. In view of the difficulty of separating figure from real fact, we conclude that the millenarianism of the Book of Revelation is a hieroglyph whose meaning has not yet been satisfactorily solved.

The ultimate root of millenarianism is the popular notion of the Messiah current among the Jews. The prophecies of the Messiah had affirmed that a period of peace and the triumph of Israel would follow the establishment of his kingdom. The fancy of the Jewish people, misinterpreting these prophecies, revelled in dreams of an external kingdom, in which the Messiah should reign from Jerusalem, and inaugurate an era of inexpressible happiness. Some of these thoughts passed over to the Christians, who, however, made this period of the visible reign of the Messiah on earth only the prelude of a second and final stage of heavenly glory. There is a truth in millenarianism; namely, that Christianity will yet concentrate, as in a focus, in a flourishing period of the Church, the fulness of divine blessing. Its difficulties are the want of clear biblical authority, and the fall, which it affirms will take place at the end of the thousand years, from the elevated plane of Christian experience and life (Rev. xx. 7 sqq.).

History. — Three periods may be distinguished in the history of millenarianism. 1. In the period of its rise, the millenarian doctrine was powerfully influenced by the blood-baptism of the persecutions. In the tribulation of the present, the Church took comfort in looking forward to the certainty of a speedy recompense. The Epistle of Barnabas (c. 15) is the first book having references to it. The doctrine spread from Asia Minor to the other parts of the Church, primarily among the Jewish Christians. It is found in Cerinthus (Euseb., H. E., III. 28, VII. 25), in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Jud., c. 25; Benjam., c. 10), and amongst the Ebionites (Jerome, In Jes., lx. 1, lxvi. 20). The Shepherd of Hermas has at least faint echoes of it (i. 3). Justin Martyr (c. Tryph., 80) knew of orthodox Christians who did not share the expectation of an earthly consummation of the Church, but himself believed it. In the writings of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus of Antioch, there are no references to millenarianism; but the conclusion cannot be drawn with certainty that they did not believe it. Irenæus (Adv. Hæc., v. 32 sqq.) and Papias based their expectation of the kingdom of a thousand years on the assertion of those who had seen the apostles. The first thing to check the tide of millenarianism was the exaggerations of Montanism. Origen, who regarded matter as the seat of evil, regarded an earthly kingdom of Christ, full of physical delights, as a Judaizing fable; while Nepos, an Egyptian bishop who opposed the view of Origen, met with stormy opposition in the churches. Methodius, bishop of Tyre (d. 311), in this, as in other points, the counterpart of Origen, defended the millenarian doctrines (Sympos. decem virginum, ix. 5). The last echo of Apollinaris of Laodicea against Dionysius of Alexandria for it (Basil, Epist., 263; Epiph., Hæres., 77, 26). It maintained itself for a longer period in the West; and Lactantius (about 320; Inst. divin., vii. 14 sqq.) and Victorinus, bishop of Pettau, portrayed the millennial kingdom in the most sensual colors. Even Jerome (In Jes., i. 18) did not dare to condemn the traditional opinion. The fate of the doctrine was decided by Augustine (De civit. Dei, xx. 7, 9), who declared that the Church was the kingdom of God on earth. The new relations of the State to the Church had contributed to the downfall of millenarianism. The protection the Church won for itself from the State deprived the doctrine of its vitality. In the middle ages, neither catastrophes in nature, nor degeneracy within the Church, excited millennial expectations. The clergy possessed the kingdom of the thousand years in the glory of a Church triumphant over emperor and princes. The circles which were prophetic of the Reformation looked for the regeneration of the Church, not from the visible coming of Christ, but in a return to apostolic poverty and piety, or the enthronement of a righteous Pope. Peter de Oliva (Postilla in Apocal., 1297) explained the second coming by the operation of the Holy Ghost in the heart.

2. The second period in the history begins with the Reformation. The growing decline of the antichristian papacy was regarded as one of the sure signs of the approach of the Lord. Others, upon the basis of the doctrine of the invisible

Church, became prophets of the millennial kingdom. Innumerable natural occurrences in the skies and on the earth — constellations, comets, national changes, and the like — were regarded as indications of the end. The Reformers shared in the expectation of its proximity, but indulged in no fantastic dreams. Fanatics announced visions, and promulgated prophecies; and the Anabaptists determined violently to prepare the way by establishing the new Zion at Münster (1531), with the introduction of a community of wives and goods. The Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions condemned this fanaticism, and later theologians generally referred to the thousand years as passed. Much less did the Catholic Church countenance millenarianism. The only work worth mentioning in favor of it is the Œnus ecclesie of Bishop Berthold of Chiemsee (1524, c. 61 sqq.).

There is no name of importance among the millenarians of the sixteenth century. The most curious is that of the Anabaptist David Joris of Delft (d. 1556). Millenarian ideas were made prominent again in the seventeenth century. This was due to the religious wars in Germany, the persecutions of the Huguenots, and the Revolution in England. Ezekiel Meth in Germany, the Bohemian Brethren (e.g., Bishop Comenius in his Lux in tenebris, 1637; 3d ed., 1665), Professor Jurieu of Sedan in France (L'accomplissement des prophéties, 1686), Serarius in Holland (Assertion du règne de mille ans; De Judæorum conversione), Poiret (Economie divine, 1687), and Joseph Mede (Clavis Apocalyp., 1627), Jane Leade, and Thomas Burnet (Telluris sacra theoria, 1680, and De statu mortuorum et resurgentium), in England, advocated millenarian theories. In Germany, Spener was suspected of millenarian views by his Hoffnung künftiger besserer Zeiten, 1693, and no doubt properly; and Joachim Lange (Apokalyp. Licht u. Recht, 1730), the Berleburg Bible, and the translations of Jane Leade, introduced them into pious circles.

3. The third period begins with the middle of the eighteenth century, and opens with the celebrated commentator Bengel, whose Commentary on Revelation (Erklärte Offenbarung, 1740) and Sermons for the People (60 Reden fürs Volk, 1748) made the Book of Revelation the pet study in pious, churchly circles. The theosophists Oetinger (d. 1782), Stilling (Siegesgesch. d. christl. Religion, 1799), Lavater, and others, indulged in similar views. In England the Irvingites (1832 sqq.) declared the proximity of the kingdom of glory. Others, at the advice of Friedrich and Chr. Hoffmann, went to Palestine to be ready for the beginning of this kingdom. In the valley of Salt Lake the Mormons set up their Zion. Bengel's scholars, Leutwein, Sander, and others, continued to pick out the signs of the times, and to solve apocalyptic arithmetic. Millenarianism was an organic part of Rothe's system (Ethik, 2d ed., iii. 189 sqq.), and millenarian theories have been advocated by Hofmann (Weissagung u. Erfüllung, ii. 372 sq.), Delitzsch (Bibl.-proph. Theologie, pp. 6 sqq.), Hebart (D. zweite sichtbare Zukunft Christi, 1850), Auberlen (D. Proph. Daniel u. d. Offenb. Johan., 2d ed., 1857, pp. 372 sqq.), and Volk (D. Chiliasmus, Dorpat, 1869). Others, as Thiersch, J. P. Lange, Ebrard, occupy an indefinite position.

Duration of the Millennial Kingdom. — Efforts to define the time of the beginning of the millennial kingdom and its length have been made from Hippolytus (d. 230) down to the present. The eighteenth century was fruitful in bold systems of apocalyptic chronology, of which Bengel's is the most important. Daniel and the Revelation were the main regulators for these calculations; but the Song of Solomon, astronomy, Jewish cabalistic figures, etc., were also used. The usual view among the Fathers was that the Lord would appear at the conclusion of the sixth millennium. Philastrius (Hæres., 106) placed the time more definitely at 365 A.D., Hippolytus at 500, Jurien at 1785, Bengel at 1836, Stilling at 1816, Sander at 1847. The old view was, that this kingdom, corresponding to the sabbath of the creation, would last a thousand years. Bengel distinguished two periods of a thousand years, — the one covering the kingdom of the saints on earth (Rev. xx. 1-3); the other, of the martyrs in heaven (xx. 4-6). Stilling gave up this distinction, and returned to the old view. Modern scholars, like Rothe, Ebrard, and Lange, regard the "thousand years" as a symbolical number.

Seat and Citizens of the Kingdom. — Rev. xx. leaves it indefinite whether the seat of the millennial kingdom will be heaven or earth, but the great majority of millenarians hold that it will be the earth. The Irvingites connected it with their seven congregations; the Mormons, with the Salt Lake; but the majority again agree in looking upon a renewed Jerusalem (Irenæus, etc.) as its rallying-point. The citizens of this kingdom are defined as all faithful Christians and the saints of the Old Testament (Justin, Irenæus, etc.). Poiret included Pagans like Socrates. The Ebionites, Apollinaris, and, in modern times, Serarius and Oetinger, held that even the Levitical ritual would be restored, as a "symbolical reminiscence" of the salvation accomplished by Christ. The view is widely current that the children of Israel will not only be restored to Canaan, but enjoy a period of the highest prosperity (Hofmann, Auberlen, Volek).

Nature of the Kingdom. — The descriptions of the millennial kingdom are based upon the idea that it is either the consummation, or the prophecy of the consummation. Irenæus sententiously speaks of it as a period in which the saints develop, under the sanctifying influence of the Lord, into immortality and a capacity to see God. The nobler representatives have advocated the view that it is a period of transition. The Lord will be amongst his followers. Its enjoyments have been represented as those of an ever-repeated marriage-feast (Cerinthus), of luxuriously spread tables, and the riches of Cæsar (Ebionites). Even higher natures, like Irenæus and Lactantius, did not completely cut loose from these sensual notions. But the ideal conception of the kingdom was that of a state free from idolatry, immediate perception of religious truth, the contemplation of God, and freedom from all sin and evils, such as poverty, sickness, etc. It was to be a world's sabbath, pervaded by peace, but not by apathy. Some think that a characteristic of it will be the vigorous effort to convert the heathen and Jews. Lange, however, holds this activity will precede the dawn of the kingdom. According to Bengel, there will still be rulers, marriage, agriculture, etc. According to Oetinger, a community of goods, and equality of persons, will prevail. The old Fathers (Barnabas and Lactantius) held that the earth would be free from all sin and evil. Others (Jurien, J. P. Lange, etc.) have taken a different view, that sinners will still continue to be on the earth, but that the saints will be greatly in the preponderance, and the conflict with sin and temptation will still go on (Bengel, Oetinger, etc.). Nature will continue to be subject to change and corruption, as the new heavens and earth (2 Pet. iii. 7; Rev. xxi. 1) will follow the period of the millennial reign.

MILLENARY PETITION (so called because signed by nearly a thousand ministers), praying for the "reformation of certain ceremonies and abuses of the Church," was presented by the Puritan ministers to James I., on his way to London April, 1603. An Answer was presented by the University of Oxford, for which it received the thanks of Cambridge. The Hampton-Court Conference (see CONFERENCE, III.), with its incidental issue, our Authorized Version, was the unexpected and momentous result of the Petition.

MILLER, Hugh, geologist; b. at Cromarty, on the north-east coast of Scotland, Oct. 10, 1802; d. by his own hand, in a fit of insanity, at Portobello, near Edinburgh, Dec. 26, 1856. Born in humble life, he yet was carefully though not classically educated. In 1819 he was apprenticed to a stone-mason, and followed that trade until 1836, when he received a band-appointment at Cromarty. His Letters to Lord Brougham on the Auchterarder Case brought him into notice, and led to his appointment, in 1840, to the editorship of a newly-founded Free Church paper, The Witness, published at Edinburgh. In its columns (1841) appeared The Old Red Sandstone, which gave him immediate rank as a geologist and author. By his Footprints of the Creator (1849) and Testimony of the Rocks (1857) he popularized his favorite science, and defended revelation. His denial of the universality of the Deluge, and of the literal meaning of the word "day" in the first chapter of Genesis, occasioned much adverse criticism. His bold position on these subjects led some even to question his piety. See BAYNE: Life of Hugh Miller, Boston, 1871, 2 vols.

MILLER, Samuel, D.D., LL.D., b. near Dover, Del., Oct. 31, 1769; d. at Princeton, N.J., Jan. 7, 1850. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, 1789; associate pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, New-York City, 1793-1813; first professor of ecclesiastical history and church government in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N.J., 1813-49. Dr. Miller was a staunch Calvinist and Presbyterian. He entered heartily into the defence of his positions, and was particularly prominent in the discussions which led to the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1837. Personally he was a model of a Christian gentleman. He wrote, besides minor publications, A Brief Retrospect of the Eighteenth Century, New York, 1803, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1805, 3 vols., reprinted, London, 1805, 3 vols.; Constitution and Order of the Christian Ministry, 1807, with Continuation, 1809; Memoirs of Rev. John Rodgers, D.D., 1809; Clerical Manners and Habits, Philadelphia, 1827; Office of Ruling Elder, New York, 1831; Infant Baptism, 1834; Presbyterianism the Truly Primitive and Apostolical Constitution of the Church of Christ, Philadelphia, 1835; The Primitive and Apostolic Order of Christ vindicated, 1810; Thoughts on Public Prayer, 1849; and Life of Jonathan Edwards, in SPARKS'S American Biography. See his Life, by his son, Samuel Miller, Philadelphia, 1869, 2 vols.

MILLER, William, b. in Pittsfield, Mass., Feb. 15, 1782; d. in Low Hampton, Washington County, N.Y., Dec. 20, 1819. Limited in his educational advantages, and a farmer by occupation, he yet pretended to interpret prophecy. In 1831 he announced the coming of Christ, and the destruction of the earth in 1813. He gathered, it is said, some forty thousand followers, who were called Millerites. He was esteemed by many as an humble Christian and an honest reasoner. See his life by WHITE, Battle Creek, Mich., 1875.

MILLS AMONG THE HEBREWS. The Hebrews, like other peoples of antiquity, did not originally grind their corn on mills, but beat it in mortars (Num. xi. 8); and, even after the introduction of hand-mills, they continued to present their offerings of first-fruits thus prepared (Lev. ii. 14, xxiii. 14). The hand-mill used was that still common throughout the East. It consisted of two circular pieces of stone, from forty-four to forty-eight centimetres in circumference, and about ten centimetres thick. The "nether" millstone was fastened to the ground; but the upper one, the "rider," could be made to revolve by means of a wooden handle placed vertically near its edge. As only so much corn was ground at a time as was necessary for one day, the mill was an absolutely indispensable piece of furniture in every house, and none was allowed to take it as a pledge (Deut. xxiv. 6). It was generally worked by the women of the house; in large families, by the female slaves (Isa. xlvi. 2; Matt. xxiv. 41). Occasionally, also, male slaves, or prisoners, were used (Judg. xvi. 21). The work was difficult and tedious, but the sound of the mill in the early morning indicated a peaceful and thrifty household (Jer. xxv. 10). In later times a larger kind of mill, worked by asses, came into use; which is referred to in Matt. xviii. 6. RÜETSCHL.

MILLS, Samuel John, one of the earliest promoters of the modern movement of foreign missions in the United States; the son of a clergyman; b. April 21, 1783, at Torrington, Conn.; d. June 16, 1818, at sea, off the coast of Africa. He entered Williams College, 1806. His mind had been deeply interested in the work of sending the gospel to heathen lands; and, while a student at college, he met with several of his fellow-students, under the shadow of a large haystack, to consult and pray with them over this question. In 1809 he entered Andover Seminary, where, together with Newell, Nott, Hall, and Judson, he held consultations on the subject of missions, in which they were all alike interested. In June, 1810, Mills, Judson, Nott, and Newell presented an address to the general association of Massachusetts Proper at Bradford, calling its attention to the claims of the heathen world. Between 1812 and 1815, Mills made two tours to the south-west as far as New Orleans, engaged in distributing and selling Bibles, and organizing Bible societies. Ordained at Newburyport, June 21, 1815, he spent the next several years in the Middle States, and was connected with the Presbyterian Church. The suggestion of the American Bible Society came from him, as well as the project of the United Foreign Missionary Society, — an association in which the Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, and Associate Reformed churches united. In 1816 he suggested to the synod of New York and New Jersey the plan of educating negroes for carrying the gospel to Africa. In 1817 the Colonization Society, which had recently been organized, sent him and Rev. Mr. Burgess as their agents to explore Sierra Leone and Western Africa. Mr. Mills reached his destination, but on the return journey died, and, like Adoniram Judson, was buried in the sea. His name will always be indelibly associated with the history of foreign missionary endeavor in the United States, as one of those to whose early enthusiasm it owed its first impulse. See GARDINER SPRING: Memoirs of the Rev. Samuel Mills, New York, 1820; and ANDERSON: History of Missions of the American Board of Foreign Missions in India, Boston, 1874.

MILMAN, Henry Hart, D.D., church historian; b. in London, Feb. 10, 1791; d. at Sunninghill, near Ascot, Sept. 21, 1868. His father, Sir Francis, was physician to George III. He was educated at Oxford, where he took the Newdigate prize for poetry by his Apollo Belvedere, 1812; and became fellow of Brasenose College, 1815; was ordained a priest, 1816, and appointed vicar of St. Mary's, Reading, where he remained, until, in 1835, he became rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and canon of Westminster. In November, 1849, he was promoted to the deanery of St. Paul's, London. From 1821 to 1831 he was professor of poetry at Oxford; in 1827, Bampton Lecturer, choosing as his subject, The Character and Conduct of the Apostles considered as an Evidence of Christianity. In theology he was a liberal, belonging to the Broad Church School. He was the author of many works. His earliest publications were poems: Fazio, a tragedy, Lond., 1815, 2d ed., 1816 (acted without his consent, and to the scandal of his parishioners, first at Bath, and then, on Feb. 5, 1818, at Covent Garden, London); Samor, Lord of the Bright City, 1818, 2d ed., same year; The Fall of Jerusalem (his most admired poem), 1820; The Martyr of Antioch, 1822; Belshazzar, 1822; Anne Boleyn, 1826; Nala and Damayanti, and other Poems translated from the Sanscrit, Oxford, 1834. A collected edition of his Poetical and Dramatic Works appeared, London, 1839, 3 vols. His poetry attracted considerable attention in its day, but is now forgotten, with the exception of a few hymns, especially two, When our heads are bowed with woe, and Ride on, ride on, in majesty. But, if he disappointed the expectations of his contemporaries as a poet, he more than justified their praises as an historian. As such he published The History of Jews, 1829, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1830, often since, republished in America (it made a great stir, especially because of its so-called rationalism in dealing with the miraculous element; and portions were suppressed. The author was denounced, as by Rev. J. J. Blunt in his Hulsean Lectures for 1832, on the Principles for the proper Understanding of the Mosaic Writings. After a time the excitement ceased; and at present the History is considered as an interesting performance, but defective in needful learning: a new edition, partly re-written, and greatly improved throughout, was issued 1862); The History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire, 1840, 3 vols., revised edition, 1866 (this marked a decided advance: the facts were better marshalled, and the subject was better mastered); History of Latin Christianity, including that of the Popes to the Pontificate of Nicholas V. (A. D. 1455), 1854-56, 6 vols., 2d ed. revised, 1858 (this is one of the best ecclesiastical histories in the English language, based upon ample knowledge, written in a picturesque style, sympathetic, yet outspoken in its judgments). A complete edition of his Historical Works appeared 1866-67, 15 vols. 8vo. Dean Milman edited the works of Horace, illustrated, 1849, and also Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, 1838-39, 12 vols., 2d ed., 1846, 6 vols., revised and enlarged by Dr. William Smith, 1854, 8 vols. (this is now the standard edition of Gibbon, republished, New York, 1880, 6 vols.). Two posthumous volumes of Milman's are Annals of St. Paul's Cathedral, 1868, and Savonarola, Erasmus, and other Essays, 1870. But this long list of volumes constitutes only a partial enumeration of his labors. He took part in religious discussions; and, true to his theological leanings, he advocated "the abolition of subscription to the Articles, and proposed subscription to the Liturgy instead."

MILNER, the name of two distinguished brothers and church historians.—I. Joseph was b. Jan. 2, 1744, in Leeds; d. Nov. 15, 1797, in Hull. By the early death of his father he was left without means, but was enabled, by the kindness of friends, to pass from the Latin School at Leeds to Catherine Hall, Cambridge, where he secured the chancellor's medal for the classics in 1766. The death of his principal friend, and the exhaustion of his means, forced him to quit the university. He became head master of the Latin grammar-school at Hull, vespers' lecturer in the principal church, and vicar of Trinity Church just before his death. In 1770 he underwent a radical spiritual change, and became so powerful a preacher of repentance as to draw upon himself the sobriquet of "Methodist." He, however, overcame all prejudice, and must be regarded as one of the earliest movers in the so-called "Evangelical Movement." Among his published works are Gibbon's Account of Christianity considered, 1781; Some Remarkable Passages in the Life of William Howard, 1785; Essays on the Influence of the Holy Spirit, 1789; two volumes of Sermons, 1801, 1808; and especially a Church History, for which see below.—II. Isaac was b. in Leeds, Jan. 11, 1751; d. in London, April 1, 1820. At the death of his father he was put to work in a woollen-factory, but, with the aid of his brother, became sizar in Queen's College, Cambridge, 1770. Here he rose to the highest academic honors,—fellow-professor of experimental philosophy, 1783, master of Queen's College, 1788, and twice vice-chancellor. In 1780 he was elected member of the Royal Society, and in 1791 appointed Dean of Carlisle. He shared the religious tendencies of his brother, and became one of the founders of the Evangelical party. Two volumes of his sermons were published in 1820. He died in the home of his friend Wilberforce.

The great literary work of the two brothers was The History of the Church of Christ: the three first volumes of which, extending down to the thirteenth century, were by Joseph (1794 sqq.). Vols. iv. and v. were by Isaac (1803-09). A new edition of the whole work appeared in 1816, and a revised edition by Dr. Grantham in 1847. The work was translated into German in 1803, 2d ed., 1849. Joseph Milner wished to present the history of the Church from a practical religious stand-point. He got the idea from John Newton's little book, Review of Ecclesiastic His- tory, 1769. In his Introduction he defines the Christian Church as the "succession of pious persons;" that is, those whose lives were ordered according to the laws of the New Testament. A church history is, therefore, according to this idea, nothing more than a history of these pious people. In the first three centuries, Ignatius and Cyprian appear to him as the two great characters: Augustine stands out pre-eminent in the next two. The third volume covers the period between the sixth and thirteenth centuries. He dwells with peculiar delight upon Bernard of Clairvaux, Anselm, and the Waldenses. The history gives an intelligent and appreciative account of the German Reformation; and Isaac Milner was the first to lay bare before the English the greatness of Luther's personality and work. The book has no critical merits as an independent investigation of the sources; but it did most excellent service in illustrating the power of Christianity, as embodied in its great representatives of all ages, and thus stimulating the age in which it was written to an imitation of their devotion and enthusiasm. By portraying the Christian life of the Church, the brothers filled a gap. For a long time, their work remained the most popular manual on church history, until a German master [Neander], in the same spirit, but with a more comprehensive plan and with greater scholarship, worked over the materials. Joseph's complete works were edited by Isaac Milner, 1810, 8 vols., and again, 1827, 9 vols. For his life, see the biography by Isaac in vol. i. of the Sermons, 1801; and also MARY MILNER: The Life of Isaac Milner, 1842.

MILNOR, James, D.D., b. in Philadelphia, June 20, 1773; d. in New-York City, April 8, 1814. He was admitted to the bar 1794; in 1810 he sat in the House of Representatives, and opposed the war of 1812. In 1814 he entered the Protestant-Episcopal ministry; and from 1816 till his death was rector of St. George's, New York. He published only a few sermons and addresses, but made a deep impression upon his time by his constant and enthusiastic support of every good cause. He was a leader of the Low-Church party. See J. S. STONE: Memoirs of the Life of James Milner, New York, 1848, abridged, 1855.

MILTIADES, a contemporary of Tatian, was, like Justin, a converted philosopher, and made for himself a great name in the Christian Church, in the latter part of the second century, by his writings against Paganism and various heresies, especially Montanism. He is first mentioned by an unknown, anti-Montanistic writer from Asia Minor, of whose work Eusebius gives some extracts (Hist. Eccl., v. 16), as having written a work against the Montanists on the theme that a prophet should not be allowed to speak while in an ecstatic state of mind; then by a Roman writer attacking the Artemonites (EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., v. 28); and finally by TERTULLIAN: Adv. Valentin., 5. But of his works nothing has come down to us. See DERLING: Diss. de Miltiade, Helmstedt, 1746; SCHWEGLER: Montanismus, Tübingen, 1841.

MILTON, John, the English poet, was b. in London, Dec. 9. 1608; d. in London, Nov. 8, 1674.

His father, who abandoned the Roman-Catholic communion, became a copying lawyer, and retired with an independence. Milton's education was strict; but he cultivated a love of music, and became an accomplished organist. He attended St. Paul's School, London; entered Christ College, Cambridge, 1625, and, in spite of an intervening rustication, took the master's degree in 1632. He had been set apart for the ministry, but, on leaving Cambridge, retired to his father's home in Horton, Buckinghamshire, where he spent six years in study, and wrote his first important poetical works, L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, Arcades, Lycidas, Comus, etc. In 1638 he travelled in Italy, his poetical gifts and elegant Latinity winning for him triumphs, and his religious opinions involving him in danger. Returning to London in 1639, he became tutor to his two nephews; but he soon became involved in the controversies between the Episcopalians and Presbyterians, and wrote (1641), Of Reformation, touching Church Discipline in England, and the Causes that hitherto have hindered it, Apology for Smectymnus, etc. He espoused the Presbyterian cause against the Episcopal, whose cry was, "No bishop, no king." In these writings he betrays fine eloquence and an accurate knowledge of antiquity, but often resorts to biting sarcasm, and, after the manner of the age, descends to rude personalities. He was married in 1643 to a royalist lady, Mary Powell, who, after four weeks, returned to her parents, where she remained, in spite of her husband's appeals. This experience led Milton to write the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, etc. (1645), and The Judgment of Martin Bucer touching Divorce (1645), in which he advocated the propriety of divorce when the two parties were uncongenial to one another. In 1645 his wife returned to him. She died in 1652. In 1641 Milton published his famous work, Areopagitica; a Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing.

Milton took an intense interest in the political agitations of the time, and left no doubt of his position, in Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649). The same year he was appointed secretary for foreign tongues. Other works bearing upon the political controversies appeared from his pen: Eikonoklastes (1649), against the Eikon Basilike, which advocated the cause of the royal martyr, Charles I.; Defensio pro populo anglicano (1651), against the learned Salmasius of Leyden, who had asserted the inviolability of kings. Having long suffered from weak eyes, he was warned by his friends against undertaking this work. But as he nobly says, "I did not balance whether my duty should be preferred to my eyes." And indeed this second work cost Milton his eyesight. His enemies saw in this affliction a judgment of God. He himself bore it with wonderful patience and resignation. He continued to hold his public office. He began the work of the day with the reading of the Scriptures. In 1656 he was married a second time, to Catharine Woodcock, who died in fifteen months; and in 1663 he was married again, to Elizabeth Minshull. In 1665 he finished his Paradise Lost. It was published in 1667 [the author receiving five pounds in hand, with the promise of the same sum for every edition of fifteen hundred sold. Three editions had been disposed of by 1678, and in 1681 his widow relinquished all further claims for eight pounds]. In 1671 appeared his Samson Agonistes, which reflects his feelings of disappointment and broken powers; and the Paradise Regained, which falls far below the earlier work, to which it was designed to be a companion. Milton also wrote a History of Britain (3 vols.), a Latin Grammar (1669), etc., and, Of True Religion, Heresie, Schism, Toleration and what best Means may be used against the Growth of Popery (1673). He here asserts that all are heretics who do not draw their religion from the Bible, and urges tolerance for all Protestants, but denies it to the Catholics. He also wrote a system of Christian doctrine (Doctrina Christiana), which was found in manuscript in 1823 [and translated and edited by Bishop Sumner, 1825]. He here approaches very close to Arianism.

Milton was, by his rejection of scholasticism, by his severe biblical and yet free method of thought, by his tolerant spirit, and by his union of ethics and religion, a herald and prophet of modern times. He was a Protestant individualist and idealist. The three daughters left to him by his first wife caused him much trouble. [He himself was somewhat overbearing; yet his manners were urbane, and his conversation delightful. He is the greatest religious poet of modern times, and second only to Shakespeare among all English poets. His prose is even more poetic than his poetry, and sounds like the majestic swell of an organ.]

LIT. — The most important of Milton's poetical works are found in the German translation of BÜTTGER, and some of the prose works by BERNHARDI, Berlin, 1874. MINIMS, The Order of, was founded by St. Francis of Paula, in 1453, and confirmed by Alexander VI., under the name of Minimi Fratres ("The Least among Brethren"), an expression of the humility of the members. In the beginning of the eighteenth century the order numbered about 150 converts, and the brethren penetrated even into the Indies. In the present century, however, the order has completely fallen into decay; and the female branch, which was established in Spain in 1192, and thence passed into France, has ceased to exist. MINOR CANONS are "priests," in collegiate churches, next in rank to the canons and prebendaries, but not of the chapter, who are responsible for the performance of the daily service. The stipend of a minor canon is, in England, fixed by law at a hundred and fifty pounds per annum. The office may be held by a vicar.

MINOR PROPHETS, The ("brief in words, mighty in meaning"), are twelve in number; viz., Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. In the Hebrew canon they constitute only one book. They are called the "Lesser, or Minor Prophets," because their prophecies were briefer, not because they were less important, than those of the four Greater Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel). All these writings together do not equal in length those of Isaiah. Yet Hosea exercised the prophetic office longer than any other prophet; and the study of the Minor Prophets by the Greater is evident from these facts, — that Isaiah adopted a prophecy of Micah (Isa. ii. 2-5; cf. Mic. iv. 1-5); Jeremiah employed verses of Obadiah to denounce anew the punishment of Edom (Jer. xlix. 16; cf. Obad. 3); and a prophecy of Joel was expanded by Ezekiel (Ezek. xxxviii. 22; cf. Joel iii. 2). The first five of the Minor Prophets antedate the earliest of the Greater Prophets, while Malachi post-dates them: so the twelve began and closed the cycle of written prophecy which stretched from the ninth to the fifth century B.C. They are arranged in three groups chronologically, but there is some question as to the order among themselves. Thus the prophets of the pre-Assyrian and Assyrian time (Hosea to Nahum) come first; those of the Chaldaean period (Habakkuk and Zephaniah) come next; and the post-exilic prophets (Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi) come last. It is noteworthy, however, that the Septuagint puts the first six thus: Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, and Jonah. In regard to their contents, they may be said, in general, to present peculiar difficulties, arising, in part, from the obscurity of their allusions; but, on the other hand, they yield to no other portion of Scripture in attractiveness. Nothing elsewhere excels in vividness the description Joel gives of a plague of locusts; no such indignant protest, earnest expostulation, and terrible denunciation, are contained in such small compass as in Malachi; the "burdens" of Zechariah equal in interest the "burdens" of Isaiah; while the swift changes of Hosea from righteous anger to divine love are as characteristic as any thing in Holy Writ. The story of Jonah is as familiar as a nursery tale, while it is a truthful account of a thrilling episode. Nahum's eloquence moves with the rapidity of the chariots whose motion it so graphically describes. Obadiah and Habakkuk are sublime in their poetry and their moral earnestness. To the Christian these Minor Prophets are particularly interesting, because the gospel was preached, and the glory of the latter day proclaimed, by them. And nowhere else are there clearer prophecies of New-Testament events; so that, to learn where Christ was born, the scribes unrolled the scroll to Micah (Matt. ii. 6; cf. Mic. v. 2); John the Baptist was the Elijah whom Malachi had foretold (Matt. xi. 14; cf. Mal. iv. 5); the piercing of the Saviour's side was predicted by Zechariah (John xix. 37; cf. Zech. xii. 10); and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost was a fulfilment of Joel's prophecy (Acts ii. 16; cf. Joel ii. 28).

MINUCIUS FELIX, Marcus, author of the dialogue Octavius, which, in spite of its lack of originality, and profound theological intuition, occupies a prominent place among the ancient apologies of the Latin Church, both on account of its genuine enthusiasm and elegant form, and on account of the clear and pointed manner in which it presents and refutes all the various objections to Christianity at that time circulating among educated Pagans. Of the personal life of the author we only know that he was a successful lawyer in Rome when he was converted to Christianity: even the date of his great work is somewhat doubtful. Formerly critics generally agreed in placing Minucius between Tertullian and Cyprian. Certain parts of Octavius seem to be based on Tertullian's Apologeticus, and certain parts of Cyprian's De idolorum vanitate are evidently borrowed from Octavius. Now, as the Apologeticus was written in 197, and the De idolorum vanitate in 247, Octavius must have been written in the first decades of the third century. In 1762, however, in an epistle Ad Gerhardum Meermann, J. D. Van Hoven drew attention to the fact that the general state of Christianity, and the specific Pagan objections to it, such as represented in Octavius, do not correspond to a period so late as the first decades of the third century; and, in course of time, more and more scholars adopted the view that Minucius preceded Tertullian, and wrote his Octavius in the reign of Marcus Aure-lius. In 1868, finally, A. Ebert produced almost conclusive evidence in favor of this view by showing that there exists a direct relation between Octavius and Cicero's De natura deorum, while all the corresponding passages of The Apologeticus seem to have been derived from Octavius. Of the work of Minucius, there exists only one manuscript, which was presented by Leo X. to Francis I. It was first published by Faustus Sabæus, Rome, 1543, afterwards often; best by Halm, in Corp. Script. Eccl. Lat., ii., Vienna, 1867. MIRACLE-PLAYS. See RELIGIOUS DRAMAS.

MIRACLES. Ancient theology defined a miracle as an act performed by suspending the laws of nature. But the laws of nature cannot be suspended. They continue acting, even in the very moment when a higher power succeeds in overcoming them. I throw a stone up in the air: the force I must use in order to make the stone ascend, and the immediate descent of the stone as soon as that force is used up, prove that the law of gravitation was not suspended, but simply overcome. It will be better, therefore, to consider miracles as phenomena truly belonging to the natural sphere, but resulting from a cause superior to nature.¹

There is a question of principle here, Can such phenomena occur? And there is also a question of history, Have they ever occurred? But, before entering upon the examination of these two questions, we wish to draw attention to certain facts in the history of the world which have a direct bearing upon the subject.

First, Nature exists, but how? Does she exist by virtue of her own laws? That would be to say that she was her own cause, or, in other terms, that she is eternal. But it would also be to say that she is immutable, or, in other terms, to deny the possibility of any progress in the natural sphere; for a progress eternally commenced is also eternally terminated, and is no progress: so that, if science can show that any progress has taken place in the development of nature, that progress proves that nature is not eternal. Nature exists, then, not by force of her own essence, but on account of a power superior to herself and her laws.

Next, in the very lap of nature moves along the life of organic beings, obeying laws infinitely higher than those to which inorganic matter is subject. Geology declares that there was a time when no organisms were found on our globe, and fixes, so to speak, the date at which organic life first made its appearance. Whence did it come? From the very forces of nature? Science says, No. "It is a fact as sure as the law of gravitation, that life can come only from life," was said before the most learned assembly in the world, and by its president.² The first living cell, then, which was ever found on earth, whence did it come? Was it brought hither on the wings of an aerolite, as the president hinted? No. Such an hypothesis cannot be seriously maintained, as it only removes the difficulty a little farther away, without contributing any thing to its solution. The presence of organic life on earth is a second fact which testifies to the existence of a cause superior to nature and natural laws.

Finally, in the midst of organic life there sprang up, at a given moment, intelligent life, the life of freedom. What was its cause? Moral obligation and the feeling of responsibility, the two distinctive characteristics of a free and intelligent being, are phenomena foreign to the world of organic forces, vegetable or animal. In the animal kingdom the individual is only the irresponsible organ and the momentary bearer of the species, obeying its instinct as its supreme law. The free being, on the contrary, can not only resist its natural inclinations, but even sacrifice them in the name of a higher law, — that of duty. In him an order of things appears absolutely superior to that of organic life, as this latter is absolutely superior to that of matter pure and simple. If life can come only from a living cause, in the same way freedom can come only from a free cause: but such a cause does not belong to the realm of natural forces; it belongs to an entirely new sphere, — the spiritual.

These three facts in the history of the universe reveal to us the intervention, at three different points in the development of the world, of a cause not only foreign to, but also superior to, nature. The question then arises, whether this supreme cause has forever exhausted its power of action by bringing forth its most brilliant effect, the free and intelligent human being, or whether it may be supposed still to manifest itself at proper occasions; which is only another form for that question of principle mentioned above.

The objection to the possibility of miracles is this: when once the development of the creation was completed, and the actual order of things definitively established, the Creator could not again interfere with his work, without acknowledging that his work was incomplete, and he himself imperfect. It must be remembered, however, that the culminating point of the development of nature is a free and intelligent spirit, man. There are, then, two free beings face to face with each other, — man and God; and any further intervention of God in the realm of nature, in which he has established man, must depend upon the future relation between those two free beings. If man takes the course which will lead him to the realization of the divine idea, God can confine himself to simply allowing the human race to develop in history, under the guidance of his Spirit, those multitudinous germs which he has planted in it. But if man, on account of his freedom, takes another course, and starts an abnormal development, leading to his own ruin, and frustrating the divine purpose of the creation, God must either destroy that lost creature, and replace him with another, or do something to draw him away from his bad course. In the latter case, the door is opened for divine intervention, even in the form of miracles; and no acknowledgment, from the side of God, of the imperfection either of his work or of himself, is thereby implied. On the contrary, that which makes his renewed intervention necessary, the human freedom, will still continue the most beautiful expression of the perfection of his work.

As the question is here of a problem of freedom, reasoning a priori can give no answer. Experience must be called in to explain; and thus the question of principle becomes a question of history. How has man used his freedom? And how has God used his?

With respect to man, history speaks very clearly. While the animal remains true to the law of its nature, and never falls below itself, man has always a feeling that he has not reached his true standard. He often degrades himself, sinking, not only below himself, but even below the animal; and a feeling of guilt and corruption always pursues him, even though he be one of the best representatives of the race.

With respect to God, history speaks no less distinctly; showing that God has deemed it more worthy of himself to save the fallen race than to destroy it, and replace it with a new. At the very moment when the sin of mankind had reached its acme, and was about to end in complete social dissolution, a reverse movement was started among one of the smallest and one of the most obscure nations, and soon felt as a spiritual elevation, destined to regenerate the whole race. The vital principle of that movement of restoration was a man who lived in a filial communion, never troubled, with the invisible Creator, and submitted his will to the divine will with a fidelity never shaken, either by the allurements of enjoyment, or the miseries of suffering.

This phenomenon, to which, as all agree, no other phenomenon in the moral world can be compared, is the great miracle placed in the centre of the history of the world.¹ From that fundamental miracle proceed, like radiant beams, all the particular miracles which illustrate the life of the Saviour and his apostles; and to that refer, as preparations for the often-predicted and long-expected, all the miracles of the history of the ancient people of God.

The life of Jesus lies before us in four narratives, nearly contemporary with the events they relate. The trustworthiness of those narratives depends principally upon their spiritual character, their holy simplicity, their sublime sobriety, which becomes so much the more striking when compared with the fictitious air and turgid style of the so-called apocryphal Gospels, composed in the first half of the second century. There are, however, two other features, which, when combined, testify most impressively to the truth of the narratives, — their perfect harmony with respect to all that is essential, and their independence with respect to a great number of details, in which they not only differ from each other, but even contradict each other. Finally, it must be remembered that at least the first three Gospels are simply the oral reports of the apostles put into writing, — reports, which, put into circulation immediately after the first Pentecost, very soon, and under the very eyes of their authors, assumed that fixed character which they have retained ever since. See the first four verses of the Gospel of Luke.

At the moment when the events of the life of Jesus were told by the apostles, and written down by the evangelists, thousands of persons who had been witnesses to the ministry of Jesus were still alive; and they would immediately have been changed into so many contradictors of the truth of that which was related, had it not been incontestable,—the more easily so, as they lived in the midst of a community so utterly hostile to the gospel as were the Jewish people. Or how could the preaching of the apostles have vindicated itself in the face of a general denial of the facts on which it was based? The apostles told that a blind man had been cured at Bethsaida; that a demoniac had been cured in the synagogue of Capernaum, and a leper in the neighborhood of the city; that a young man, the son of a widow, had been raised from the dead at Nain. . . . These cities still existed. The inhabitants who had been present at the event were still living. When, under such circumstances, the apostles and evangelists dared to tell and repeat publicly such events, they must have reckoned upon the general recognition of the truth of the events.

But was it not in many cases easy for the apostles, it has been said, to fall into delusions, and take ordinary facts for prodigies? There were so many elements of the supernatural in the life of Jesus, that those who witnessed it might easily be led to consider as miraculous something which in reality was quite natural? Yes; but then, beside them stood Jesus, with his absolute veracity. The imagination of the apostles might have been led astray; but in such a case Jesus would never have failed to correct their conception; he never did. At this point, however, he confirms, instead of correcting, their conception. Before them, and before the whole people, he appeals to the works which his Father has given him to do; and he publicly reproaches the cities of Bethsaida, Chorazin, Capernaum, in which he had staid, that they were not converted, though they had seen so many miracles,—yea, for that very reason he deems them more culpable than Tyre and Sidon (Matt. xi. 20).

Critics have ceased, of late, to deny the extraordinary character of many of the events of the life of Jesus; since, as Reuss says with good reason, "If in the acts of Jesus there were nothing surpassing every-day experience, his history would thereby only become so much the more incomprehensible." But an attempt has been made to reduce the extraordinary cures which Jesus accomplished every day to the peculiar influence which an exquisite character always exercises over diseased nerves (Renan, Keim). Recourse has been had to the idea of relative miracles; that is, effects of natural but still unknown causes. Such explanations, however, would be suitable only on the condition that the persons cured by Jesus had in each case been present; but the daughter of the Canaanite woman lived in the interior of the country when her mother spoke with Jesus in the vicinity of Sidon; and the nobleman's son lay dying on his couch at Capernaum, when, at a distance of many miles, Jesus said to his father, "Thy son liveth" (Matt. xv. 22; John iv. 50). Without laying any stress on the fact that Jesus wrought other miracles than his cures, it will suffice to analyze one single case of his miraculous curing, in order to shew the insufficiency of the above explanations. When the Pharisees accuse Jesus of blasphemy, because he says to the palsy-stricken man, "Thy sins are forgiven thee," he answers them, "Which is the easier to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or, Rise and walk?" Now, it is, of course, infinitely easier to ascertain the effect of the latter words; and consequently Jesus adds, "But, that you may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, I say unto thee, Arise and walk." The dramatic form of this scene, which was evidently taken from life, and has been preserved identical in all the three narratives, proves that Jesus felt absolutely sure that he could cure the sick man who lay stretched on his couch, before the eyes of all present, immediately and completely. But could he have felt so if he had had nothing at his disposal but some natural and even unknown power? Certainly not; a merely psychological effect always depends, to a great extent, upon the disposition of the sick. And let it not be overlooked, that, in speaking as he does, he risks his whole position. If the sick man had not risen in perfect health from his couch, Jesus would, by his own words, have been convicted of lying and blaspheming, and his Messianic claims would have shrunk into an empty pretension.

The true character of the miracles of our Gospels appears in an equally striking light when comparing them with the fictitious miracles of the apocryphal Gospels. Those Roman standards which bend before Mary and her son, that dyer's vat from which the infant Jesus draws up clothes of whatever color he likes, that water spilt on the stairs, and brought back in a napkin, etc.,—that is what man can invent: mere exhibitions of magical power, without any relation to the moral attributes of God. Quite otherwise with the miracles of our Gospels. They combine all the features of a divine character. Omnipotence never acts unless in the service of holiness and love. And is it not singular, that though afterwards, and with such models before her eyes, the church proved so awkward in inventing miracles, it should have been possible, earlier, and without any models, to invent them in a manner so sublime, and so fully in harmony with the nature of God?

Indeed, the reality of the miracles of Jesus, in the full sense of that word, must, to the eyes of wise criticism, be a historical fact beyond doubt. But then the question arises, Why did Jesus divide his daily work between an activity of that kind and the labor of teaching? For it is evident from the reports of our Gospels, that, as Ewald has it, the working of miracles was, almost to the very end of his life, "his every-day task."

It might be said that the miracles of Jesus were the simple and spontaneous effect of his sympathy with human misery, just as the alms naturally results from the meeting between the rich and the poor. It would, however, be a misunderstanding of the true significance of the miracles of Jesus to explain them in that way. However great may have been his sympathy with human sufferings, he wrought his miracles, not from that impulse, but because he was the Sav-

our. His miracles belong to his office as Saviour. Otherwise he would not have cured some blind people and some lepers, raised three persons from the dead, etc.: he would have destroyed all blindness, all leprosy, death itself, forever.

Nor can it for a moment be maintained, that, by his supernatural acts, Jesus thought of producing, or, so to speak, compelling faith. He has never ascribed to miracles the power of conversion. On the contrary, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets," he said of the Jews (Luke xvi. 31), "neither will they be persuaded, if one rise from the dead." He refused those signs in the heavens which the Pharisees demanded of him; and, indeed, the true faith is not an effect of a surprise of the senses, but of the awakening of the conscience and the contrition of the heart. It is the consciousness of sin which leads men to Jesus.

For what purpose, then, were the miracles wrought? Jesus calls them signs; and so they were, — external manifestations destined to make the weaker spirits understand the moral work he had come to accomplish in the race (comp. John vi. 26, 27). As his teaching was a miracle in words, so his miracles were a teaching in acts. By this means he revealed himself as one who had the power of curing the spiritually blind and mute, the spiritual leper and palsy-stricken, — as one who had the power of delivering souls from Satan, and freeing them from the eternal death which threatened them. Each group of his miracles illustrates a special side of that work of spiritual deliverance which he had come to accomplish. But this is not all. When he extends his miraculous power to nature proper, — stilling the storm, multiplying the loaves, etc., — he reveals himself, not only as the curer of the moral miseries of humanity, but also as the future restorer of nature itself, and proves that he has the power of establishing perfect harmony between the whole universe and a sanctified humanity. Thus the miracles serve, not to produce faith in carnal hearts, but to make manifest to souls disposed to believe, or already believing, the riches of the treasure which have been offered them in the person of Jesus.

With respect to the manner in which Jesus wrought his miracles, two quite different points of view may be observed in his own words on the subject. On one occasion it is the Father who accomplishes the work on the demand of Jesus (John xi. 41, 42): at another the miraculous power seems to be inherent in his personality (Luke viii. 46). In order to establish perfect harmony between these two points of view, which appear to be fully reconciled to each other in the consciousness of Jesus, it would be necessary to penetrate into the inscrutable mystery of the miracle. But we have, at least, an analogy in the spiritual miracles which are wrought before our own eyes: on the one side it is the spirit of God which seizes and converts the soul; on the other it is the work of the words of the preacher.

The miracles of the apostles stand in the same relation to those of Jesus as the miracles of Joshua to those of Moses, or the miracles of Elisha to those of Elijah: they are a continuation and a complement. Without going into details, we may simply remark, that, on this point, it becomes absolutely impossible to speak of legends, as Paul himself appeals to the miracles he has wrought, and does so in writing to the very persons before whose eyes he wrought them (2 Cor. xii. 12; Rom. xv. 18, 19). Therefore, if anybody chooses to doubt the reality of the miracles ascribed in Acts to Peter in founding the church among the Jews, and to Paul in founding the church among the Gentiles, he must begin by wiping out those two declarations of the apostle Paul.

The miracles recorded in the Old Testament have accompanied the whole series of revelations by which the way has been prepared for the act of salvation, just as the miracles of Jesus and the apostles have signalized the accomplishment of that act and the foundation of the church. But the latter, as, indeed, the whole apparition of Jesus, would be much more extraordinary, not to say completely incomprehensible, if they had entered history ex abrupto, without any preparation or announcement.

There is an objection often made to the miracles of biblical history, — that no miracles are wrought now; and that objection is generally substantiated by the alleged observation, that miracles are most frequent in the most distant periods of history, but become more and more scarce as we approach the epochs of a higher civilization, and disappear altogether in modern times before a fuller comprehension of the action of natural laws. But here two remarks are to be made. First, miracles serve only as an accompaniment to the work of God for the salvation of the human race. That work was completed by Jesus and his apostles, and what is now left to be done is simply the individual appropriation of God's work. But for that purpose no miracle is necessary, or, rather, the miracle now retreats into the private personal sphere. Second, the alleged decrease in the series of miracles is absolutely false. In the most ancient epoch of the history of mankind (from Adam to Moses, comprising about twenty-five hundred years), biblical history does not record one single miracle, properly speaking; for the divine apparitions accorded to the patriarchs belong to another category. The first miraculous acts in the domain of nature are the signs given to Moses at the moment he entered upon his office. — illustrations of the name Jehovah, expressions of the absolute monotheism founded by him. Then six or seven centuries elapse, and no miracle occurs; but it re-appears at the moment when the existence of monotheism is seriously threatened by the invasion of the grossest paganism, in the times of Elijah and Elisha. Again two or three centuries roll on without any miracle, until the period of the Babylonian captivity, when the reign of God seemed completely wiped off from the face of the earth, and the truth of monotheism had to be vindicated in the most striking manner against the victorious power of paganism: it was the time of Daniel. Finally, an interval of four centuries separates this third epoch of miracles from the fourth, which is also the last, the most striking, and belonging to the full dawn of history, — the epoch of Jesus and his apostles. If we now suppose that miracles are nothing but legendary fictions, why, then, are they concentrated on certain decisive points, instead of being scattered uniformly over the whole surface of biblical history? and why are they most numerous in that epoch which is nearest to modern times?

In spite of the very much which is said to the contrary, the biblical miracles are, nevertheless, according to all laws of historical criticism, true realities. They form the brilliant connection between the first creation which we contemplate, and the second and much more magnificent creation which we expect. They proclaim the eternal omnipotence of the creative spirit over matter created: but they do not occur incidentally, at any moment; they belong, as Weiss has said, to a special history, to a superior history, which runs through ordinary history from beginning to end,—to the history of salvation, which, having begun spiritually here on earth, shall find its consummation in the renovation of the universe (Matt. xix. 28). A glimpse of that truth reaches us, as if through an open eye, from that most glorious of all miracles, the resurrection of Jesus, which surpasses all other events of the kind, not so much because it took place without any human mediation, as because it laid the foundation of the general resurrection, and forms the actual commencement of the final glorification of nature (1 Cor. xv. 20-26).

F. GODET.

MIRACLES, Historical View of. Miracles are such events in external nature or in history as cannot be wrought by natural forces or human means, but only by the immediate exercise of higher, divine powers. This definition excludes from present examination, (1) the creation, because it relates to the world as already in existence; and (2) all spiritual miracles, as they are not in external nature. The older theologians distinguished between miracles of nature and of grace, meaning, by the former, miracles in the usual sense, and, by the latter, spiritual miracles; also, between miracles of power and of foreknowledge, understanding among the latter inspiration respecting the future. Only miracles of power come in here for mention. Of such the Bible gives account in each stage of revelation. Sometimes they are entirely independent of human or natural agency, e.g., voices from heaven; but usually they are manifestations of divine power through some creation. Both classes, however, show how an omnipotent, holy, and especially a gracious God works in his chosen people for the benefit of the whole human family, through their salvation.

Miracle in the Bible.—The usual Old-Testament terms for miracles are: (1) כּוּפְתִים [from אָפַת, that which is distorted]; (2) מִקְלָאוֹת, strange; (3) אוֹתוֹת, signs; (4) גְּבוּרֹת יְהוָה, mighty deeds of Jehovah; (5) גְּדוּלֹת, great deeds. The usual New-Testament terms are τέρατα and σημεῖα. The first of these latter expressions corresponds to כּוּפְתִים, and refers to the first effect of such an exhibition of power; the second, to אוֹתוֹת, and refers to the meaning of the act. Το γְבוּרֹת corresponds δυνάμεις, which points directly to the divine powers at work in the miracle itself, and its instrument. It is, however, a fair question whether the men and writers of the Bible had any such definite conception of a miracle as we have. There is no term in the Old Testament which exactly corresponds to our "Nature," as something of independent existence; but Nature was to them the theatre of the constant operations of God. It is incontestable, that the Bible describes victories, plagues, and extraordinary harvests as if they were miraculous; whereas we should attribute them to what we call "natural causes." But, however this may be, there is a distinction made between the ordinary course of God's providence, and extraordinary actions of God, which are denominated signs: so, although the conception of a miracle may not have been clear, there was still the idea of it.

Miracle in the Early Church.—The Christian theologian and apologist strongly emphasized the miraculous in proof of the divine origin of Christianity, and claimed its continuance in the church. So Irenæus boasts of the wide spread of the gift of miracles among Christians. But at a later period the great difference between the unusual events happening in the church, which were still in the line of natural powers, and the really miraculous events in the apostolic age, was recognized by the church teachers: and Augustine particularly calls attention to it as a wise providential arrangement; since, in consequence of the wide spread of Christianity, there was no further need of the miraculous to awaken faith, and the commonness of miracles would weaken their impressiveness (De civ. Dei, 22, 8; De utilit. cred., 16; De vera Relig., 25). Augustine, however, held firmly to the belief in the existence of miraculous powers, and that on the ground of personal experience. Later still, when Catholicism had settled its idea of "sainthood," miracles were a prerequisite to canonization. At the same time, the possibility of similar actions being performed by heathens and atheists, through demonic agency, was granted. By distinguishing between the latter and the genuine divine miracles, the ethical value of both was determined. Far higher than the miracle which affected the body, such men as Augustine and Origen put that which affected the soul,—the miracle of grace, whereby the soul was healed, and its eyes opened.

With the apologetic use of miracles began the discussion as to their nature. Origen explains the possibility of the operation of God in external nature by supposing it in accordance with the higher, ideal divine order, but at the same time depreciates the value and importance of the phenomenal world. Augustine says that a "miracle is not contrary to nature, but to what we know of nature" (De civ. Dei, 21, 8; Contra Faust, 26, 3). As the context in these quotations respectively shows ("the will of the creator is the nature of each created thing," and, "for whatever is done by Him who appoints all natural order and measure and proportion, must be natural in every case"), Augustine conceives of "nature" as entirely under the control of God. God can, therefore, do in it precisely as he pleases.

Miracle among the Schoolmen.—The schoolmen more sharply define a miracle in relation to nature. Thus Thomas Aquinas: "A miracle is something out of the order of nature" (Summ., p. 1, qu. 110, art. 4). But they do not advance substantially beyond Augustine and Origen in determining whether and how far such a divine action conflicts with the laws of nature. Albertus Magnus denies that God can do any thing against nature, but asserts that God has implanted the possibility of miracles in the very nature of things; cf. Neander [Torrey's trans., vol. iv. 470 sqq.]. This is the most peculiar idea which the schoolmen contributed to the subject. They emphasize the ethical importance of miracles. They also distinguish between miracles and wonders; attributing the latter to human or demoniacal use of natural powers, either unknown, or used in strange, unexpected ways. The belief in the existence of such powers led to their search, and hence the rise of magic.

Luther's Treatment of the Miracle. — Luther loved to think of the apparently chance events of our lives as being wrought by angelic ministrations, both good or bad. He set no limits to this angelic agency; yet he recognized an order in nature, according to which God worked in producing these results. He saw a greater miracle in the growth of the wheat than in the feeding of the five thousand. He assigned to the miracles of Holy Writ their place in the development of the Christian revelation; but, now that Christ has come, he asserted that miracles were no more needed, and therefore maintained that papal miracles were either fraudulent or devilish. Like Origen and Augustine, he put spiritual miracles far above the physical.

The Older Protestant Theologians have nothing especial to contribute to the doctrine of miracles. They merely define a miracle in the scholastic manner, and advance no farther the solution of the problem how an event which is contrary to the visible can yet be in accordance with the invisible order of nature. To the boast of the Roman Church to be the true church, because it still possessed miraculous powers, they replied, that the time of miracles was past, that those claimed by the Roman Church were false, and that the Protestant Church had greater miracles in its amazing success.

The Socinians and Arminians were equally strong in maintaining that God revealed himself in nature by means of supernatural works. Grotius, the great Arminian theologian, made the miraculous the corner-stone of his defence of the divine origin of Christianity.

But opposition to this extreme emphasis of the miraculous set in, partly from anti-Christian philosophical, and partly from so-called "rational," considerations. Leibnitz has a place for miracles in his system of philosophy. He defines them as events inexplicable by natural causes. He affirms that the laws of nature are not necessary and eternal, like logical and metaphysical truths; rather, God can for his own purposes exempt the creature from the operation of these laws, and do something which natural laws of themselves never could do. Finally he puts the miraculous in the divine plan, and makes it part of the pre-established harmony. But he fails to assign to the miraculous its part in the development of God in history.

Spinoza, on the other hand, made a profound and comprehensive philosophical attack upon the possibility of miracles (Treat. theol. polit., cap. vi.). He declared that nature with her laws, and the contents of the will, intelligence, and nature of God, are identical; hence God cannot work contrary to the laws of nature, because that would be working against himself. He therefore denies any interference on God's part with nature.

The English Deists attacked the belief in miracles in another way. They separated God so far from all human and mundane affairs, that a revelation and a miracle are alike unthinkable. It was, however, Hume who gave the most momentous and destructive blow at miracles, when, from the stand-point of the empirical philosophy, he contended that there was not sufficient evidence to prove a miracle. Bearing in mind the uniformity of nature's operations and the commonness of deception, unintentional and intentional, it will be perceived, he said, that the only persons who can give valid testimony to a miracle are those who have never deceived or been deceived. But the persons who are brought forward to testify do not belong to that category. Therefore miracles remain unproved.

In Germany, the early Rationalists followed the English Deists in separating God from the world, and declared that such a union as a miracle implied was detracting to both. On the principles of Kant (Relig. innerh. d. Grenzen, etc. 2. Stück, end), that it was culpable moral superstition to grant authority to the law of duty written upon our hearts, only when it is attested by miracles, the Rationalists declared that a belief in miracles wrought the most serious mischief to true virtue, and impaired the sanctity of the moral law. While willing to grant abstractly that miracles were possible, since they might be wrought by powers, and in accordance with laws in nature, of which we know nought, as a matter of fact the Rationalists believed such powers were never exercised.

Schleiermacher, later on, endeavored to do away with the miraculous, in the interest, however, of piety and religion. In his Christliche Glaube, § 14, he first of all contests the apologetic value of miracles. He argues, that although it is true, that, because of the subjective inclination of his religious nature, man expects peculiar and more decided effects upon nature with each new stage of development of his religious life, still, piety never truly produced the necessity.

The modern opponents of miracles claim that the advance of science has rendered belief in them impossible, but they limit their attention to the material phenomena which science has brought them. They also fall back upon Hume's idea, and insist, that since miracles are contrary to all human experience, while human fallibility and liability to deception is part of universal experience, therefore miracles cannot be proved on human testimony.

Spinoza sought to explain the recorded miracle by natural causes; the Deists would treat them as allegories; the Naturalists hesitated not to declare the record a mixture of self-deception and fraud; the Rationalists claimed the so-called miracle-workers had not intended these actions should be described as miracles, but the recorders, influenced by the spirit of their times, had put them in that shape; and finally the idea found currency that they were myths. See MYTHICAL THEORY.

In the modern believing school of Twisten, Nietzsche, and others, miracles are accepted and defended as part of the divine order of things. At the same time, they are assigned to a different position in Christian apologetics; not being made the principal argument, as by Grotius. These believing theologians lay due stress upon the scientific determination of the uniformity of natural operations, but maintain that there still is room for miracles as part of the order of divine revelation. But the question remains, how far the true idea of a miracle enters at all into their conception.

There are scholars who deny miracles in general, and yet make an apparent exception in the case of Jesus, who, as they say, by reason of his lofty moral character, possessed extraordinary power over natural forces. On the other hand, many who defend miracles seem really to put them on the level of natural events; because the higher law, according to which, as they claim, miracles proceed, is itself a law of nature. But in truth there are miracles which cannot be explained upon the ground of laws inherent in nature: they are only explicable on the supposition of a divine direct action upon nature. It must be allowed that our spiritual nature is acted upon by the personal God, and that in this way God revealed himself in Bible times, agreeably to the spiritual requirements of the age.

Before the last word can be spoken upon miracles, some definite idea must be attached to the phrase "natural laws." It will require a more comprehensive treatment of the subject than the scientists are inclined to give it, before such an idea can be defined; for much more than material nature must be studied.

From what has been said, it will be perceived why miracles can no longer form the foundation, or even the starting-point, of the Christian apology. No matter how well attested these biblical miracles may be, they will not be believed by those who have no Christian faith. Miracles form part of Christianity, and must be taken along with it.

MIRANDULA, Giovanni Pico della, b. at Mirandula, Feb. 24, 1463; d. in Florence, Nov. 17, 1494. In 1477 he entered the university of Bologna to study canon law; and from 1479 to 1486 he visited all the great universities of Europe, studying theology and philosophy, Plato and Aristotle, the Cabala, and Averrhoes. In 1487 he repaired to Rome, and issued nine hundred theses, referring to every branch of knowledge (De omni re scibili, afterwards published under the title Conclusiones philosophicæ, cabalisticæ, et theologicæ), challenging all the scholars of Europe to come to Rome and dispute with him. The motive of this vain-glorious bravado of the young man of twenty-four years was not simply to flaunt his own erudition, which, however, was immense. He had the idea, that, as truth is one, science must also be one; that it must be possible to establish a unity, not only between the different spheres of truth, religion, and philosophy, but also between the individual forms of science, — Plato and Aristotle. For this idea he labored with great enthusiasm and energy, but without being equal to the task. His theses are often very confused. They aroused the suspicion of the curia, and the disputation was interdicted. Disgusted, Mirandula left Rome. He first visited France, and then settled at Florence as a conspicuous member of the circle which gathered around Lorenzo di Medici. In 1493 he was relieved by a papal breve from the odor of heresy which hovered about him. His Heptaplus, a work on the creation, and De Ente et Uno, an attempt of reconciling Plato and Aristotle, caused no offence. The latter part of his life was chiefly devoted to ascetic practices. His estates of Mirandula and Concordia he transferred to his nephew, and his personal property he gave to the poor. The most complete edition of his works is that of Basel, 1601. See DREYDORF: Das System des Mirandula, Marburg, 1858; W. H. PATER: Studies in the History of the Renaissance, London and New York, 1873. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

MISERERE (have mercy) denotes a musical prayer, with text from the Fifty-first and Fifty-seventh Psalms. At occasions of penitence, at funerals, and at the services during Passion Week, it forms part of the Liturgy of the Roman-Catholic Church. Besides its regular Gregorian melody, it has been set to music by a number of the greatest composers. The most impressive melody, however, is that by Gregorio Allegri (1590–1640), always used in the Sistine Chapel in Rome on Thursday and Friday of Passion Week.

MISHNA (doctrine) is the text to which the Gemara is the commentary; and both together form the Talmud. See TALMUD.

MISSA. See MASS.

MISSA. — Missa Catechumenorum and Missa Fidelium denote the two parts of the divine service of the primitive church, from the latter of which, the celebration of the Eucharist, the catechumens were excluded. — Missa Præsanctificatorum. As consecrations were considered feasts, they were forbidden throughout Lent, except on Saturday and Sunday, and, in the Roman Church, also on Good Friday and Easter Eve. Hence those who wished to take the communion on those days received previously consecrated, pre-sanctified elements. — Missa Sicca, a mass without any consecration or communion, is not heard of until the thirteenth century.

MISSAL (Liber Missalis, or Missale), an office-book of the Roman-Catholic Church; contains the Liturgy of the mass. The earliest appearance of this kind of books, the Libri Sacramentorum, or Sacramentaria, dates back to the time of Gelasius I.; the latest development, to the sixteenth century, when, on the instance of the Council of Trent, a complete revision was undertaken. Editions of the Missal in the original Latin have often been published, e.g., Paris, 1739, and Berlin, 1841; and The Roman Missal for the use of the laity, containing the masses appointed to be said throughout the year, appeared in London [n.d.]. See also E. F. ROBERTSON: The Roman Liturgy and Devout Catholic's Companion, Edinburgh, 1792; and art. MASS.

MISSION, among Roman Catholics and Ritualists, is a term for revival meetings, wherein the priest preaches upon the most vital and stirring themes. By direct address, animated music, and fervent prayers, interest is awakened in spiritual things. Such services have been greatly blessed.

MISSION, Inner. See INNER MISSION.

MISSION-SCHOOLS. (1) Institutions for the training of missionaries; several in Germany and Switzerland (Barmen, Bremen, Berlin, Basel). They are usual in connection with the chief mission stations in foreign lands. (2) Schools in poor districts in city or town, supported by gifts; designed to reach with the gospel an outlying class. In connection are various benevolent agencies.

MISSIONS, Protestant, among the Heathen.
I. INTRODUCTORY. — Christianity is through and through a missionary religion. The missionary spirit of the New Testament struck its roots in the Old Testament (against Max Müller: Lecture on Missions, delivered in Westminster Abbey, Dec. 3, 1873); so that in this respect, also, Christ came to fulfil. The missionary spirit is one of the essential features of the gospel. All men stand in need of salvation. God will have all men to be saved, and come to a knowledge of the truth. The gospel must therefore be proclaimed to all nations. This great truth Christ embodied in his last command (Matt. xxviii. 19). But more than this: missionary activity is the vital law of the Christian Church; and the outgoings of the missionary spirit have a healthful and strengthening effect upon the Church itself, as the history of the past hundred years plainly shows.

The most intense and burning missionary spirit existed in the apostolic age. In this period of its first love, the whole Church was a missionary organization; and, although the number of the missionaries was not large, their enthusiasm was all-controlling, and the co-operation of the congregations was vigorous. The missionaries followed the public roads which God himself had laid out, and occupied the stations which his hand had indicated. In this divine preparation lies one of the main reasons for the relative importance of the results of missionary activity. At the close of the first century there were, perhaps, 200,000 Christians; at the close of the third, 6,000,000, or one twentieth part of the entire population of the Roman Empire. (See Warneck: D. apostol. u. d. moderne Mission, pp. 47 sqq.) The Christianization of the Roman and Greek world was not accomplished till after Christianity had been made the State religion, and until the close of the fifth century. National Christianity has been characterized as a misfortune. In some respects it undoubtedly was. But we must not forget that Christ's last command was to "make disciples of all the nations" (Matt. xxviii. 19; compare Matt. xxiv. 14, Luke xxiv. 47, Rom. xi. 25). Nor may we forget that the Christianization of the nations is not attainable without a certain measure of co-operation on the part of the national powers. The truth of this statement is confirmed by the history of modern missionary effort, as in the case of Madagascar, and will be confirmed when the emperor of Japan or of China accepts Christianity, or the British Government in India forsakes its attitude of neutrality in matters of religion; which they will do as soon as the percentage of Christians in these lands becomes sufficiently large to make it safe and politic. The conversion of individuals comes first, and is preparatory; but the Christianization of peoples as such follows properly and necessarily. There are three stages in the history of missionary effort: (1) The despatch of missionaries and the conversion of detached individuals; (2) The organization of the native forces; and (3) The conversion of the masses.

Without going into a description of the missions of the apostolic age and of the middle ages, it is sufficient to say, with regard to the latter, that, while the methods they used for the Christianization of the heathen nations were largely mechanical, they did not lack men of apostolic fervor. On the other hand, they had to deal with rude and barbarous nations; while the missions of early Christianity were among cultivated peoples. Nor may we forget that the standard of spiritual knowledge is far higher to-day than it was in the middle ages. The false conception of the nature of the Church is to blame, if we find armies following the steps of the missionaries, and proselyting orders of monks and princes taking the place of congregations filled with the spirit, and prosecuting the work of missions.

By the thirteenth or fourteenth century, missionary activity in the Church had ceased. All Europe, except Lapland and a part of Spain, was nominally Christian. On the other hand, Mohammedanism had made spoil of the Christian congregations of Western Asia and Northern Africa. An extensive missionary field still existed when the Reformation was effected.

II. HISTORY. I. THE PERIOD OF THE REFORMATION — The discovery of America in 1492 was the occasion for renewed missionary activity in the Roman-Catholic Church, which again fell into the errors of the Church of the middle ages. In his Ecclesiastes sive de ratione concionandi, Erasmus at once sharply criticised this method of evangelization, and strongly urged upon his contemporaries the duty of carrying on missions. Luther with great emphasis denounced the worldly methods of prosecuting missions, but did not, as Plitt (Kurze Gesch. d. lutherischen Mission) and others affirm, definitely urge the despatch of missionaries to the heathen. Nowhere can a fair inference be drawn, from his writings or sermons, that the thought of a mission to the heathen was in his mind. In spite of Ostertag, Plitt, and Kalkar, who agree in asserting that Luther employed every opportunity that a text afforded him of urging the destitution of the heathen and Turks, and the despatch of preachers to them, we must affirm that the great Reformer failed to appreciate the missionary obligations of the Church. [See art, JEWS, MISSIONS AMONGST THEM.] What is true of Luther may also be said of Calvin, who, in his comment on the great missionary commandment (Matt. xxviii. 19), does not speak a word about the present duty of the Church to the heathen. The Reformers were powerful missionaries within the limits of the Church; but, of missions to the heathen world, they did not think.

This defect has been explained on the ground of the heathenism in the Church, which was sufficient to engage all the thought and energies of the Reformers. A better explanation is to be found, so far as Luther is concerned, in his eschatological views. He regarded the world as near its dissolution; and therefore he exclaims, "Let the Turks believe and live as they choose, just as the Pope and other false Christians are allowed to live." It was his energetic purpose to save "the Turks, Heathen, and Jews" within the bounds of Christian lands. Another important consideration, not to be forgotten, is, that the Protestant churches were not brought into direct contact with the heathen world, while the Roman-Catholic churches were. Spain and Portugal at that time had the hegemony of the seas until the latter part of the sixteenth century, and the Jesuits developed an immense missionary activity.

From this review of the period of the Reformation we draw two inferences: (1) A church may have a vigorous spiritual life, and yet not prosecute missionary activity; and (2) A church may be active in missionary operations, and yet spiritually dead. This history further teaches, that there are two conditions of true missionary activity, — spiritual vitality and geographical openings. The latter were not offered to the Protestantism of the Reformation period. The time had not yet come for Protestant missions. This is proved by two enterprises in the sixteenth century, — the mission to the Lapps, inaugurated by Gustav Vasa of Sweden in 1559, which did not bring forth fruit till much later; and the colony established by Durand de Villegaignon in Brazil, 1555. This movement of French Protestants was commended by Coligny. Villegaignon even wrote to Calvin for Reformed preachers. Two ministers, 12 other Swiss, and 300 Frenchmen went out. But Villegaignon, who had in the mean time returned to the Roman-Catholic Church, drove them out of the colony. The majority returned to Europe on a miserable vessel; and, of the five that remained, three suffered death for their faith.

2. THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. — The state of affairs was far more unfavorable for Protestant missions in the seventeenth century than it had been in the period of the Reformation. Especially was this true in Germany. [It can hardly be said to be true of England and the Netherlands.] The Thirty-Years' War, and the unfruitful theological conflicts about orthodoxy in Germany, kept out all thoughts of practical missionary work. In spite of this, however, a star shines out here and there from the dark heavens. Seven jurists of Lübeck bound themselves to obedience to the missionary mandate, and more especially to promote the revival of the Christian churches of the East. One of them, Peter Heiling, actually went forth in 1632 from Paris to Abyssinia, where he arrived in 1631 or 1635, and translated the New Testament into the Amelhar language. The first to make a stirring appeal to the German Church was Ernst von Welz, who in 1661 published two works. The one bore the title, A Christian and Cordial Call to all Orthodox Christians of the Augsburg Confession, concerning a Special Society by which, with Divine Help, our Evangelical Religion may be diffused. The other bore a similar title. In the former, three questions were proposed: (1) Is it right for us Christians to monopolize the gospel? (2) Is it right that we have so many students of theology among us, and do not urge them to labor in other parts of the vineyard? (3) Is it right that we spend so much money in luxuries upon ourselves, and hitherto have not thought of contributing any thing for the diffusion of the gospel? Welz wrote still another tractate, in which he urges the establishment at every university of a faculty of missions (Collegium de propaganda fide), and the instruction of the students in three departments, — Oriental languages, the methods of converting the heathen, and geography. But these appeals went unheeded; and, after receiving ordination at Zwolle in Holland, he set apart 36,000 marks ($9,000) for missions, and went to Dutch Guinea, where he soon died. Welz's pure motives, enthusiasm, and sacrifice of his property, assure him a permanent place in the history of missions.

Hawemann (Christianismi Luminaria Magna, p. 588), Dannhauer, Christian Scriver, and Spener in earnest words reminded the Church of Germany of its duty to the heathen; but Ursinus, who declared the project of Welz visionary, was followed by the Church as a whole. The great Leibnitz, however, was moved with missionary ideas, designated (partly in a scientific interest) China as a suitable field whither Lutheran missionaries ought to go, and even incorporated these thoughts in the constitution of the Berlin Academy of Sciences (July, 1700).

In the seventeenth century the hegemony of the seas passed into the hands of England, Holland, and Denmark. Thus a door was opened to heathen peoples. The Dutch, who deprived the Portuguese of nearly all their East Indian colonies, developed a decided missionary activity. One of the avowed aims of the East Indian Handelsmaatschappij, chartered in 1602, was the conversion of the heathen. The history of these early Dutch missions has not been sufficiently explored; but we know that unevangelical means were soon employed, as in Ceylon, where the Dutch governor made the tenure of even the lowest governmental positions, and even the governmental protection, conditional upon signing the Helvetic Confession. Thousands pressed to baptism, which was denied to no one who could repeat the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments. By the close of the seventeenth century, 300,000 — yea, according to Brown, by 1722, 424,392 — Singalese had been baptized. The same measures were employed in Java, where 100,000 received baptism. Professor Walauus of Leyden sought by his missionary institute (founded in 1622, which collapsed after the despatch of twelve students) to develop a real missionary interest, as also did Heurnius, in his Admonitio de legatione ad Indos capessenda (1618), and Hoverbeek of Utrecht, by various writings. — Summa controversiarum cum gentilibus, Judaicis, Muhammedanis et Papisticis, 1659; De convertendis et convincendis Judaicis, 1665, etc. There were some faithful workers on the mission-fields, but the result of the missions was only a nominal Christianity. The Dutch also carried on a mission for a while in Brazil, where the West Indian Company (founded 1621) established a trading-port. Moritz of Nassau-Siegen, who went out as governor in 1636, sent back for eight ministers, who were to divide their time between the colonists and the natives. Two of these (Doriflarus and Davilus) translated the Catechism; and some Indians were baptized, and schools planted. But the missionary operations came to a close by the cessation of the colony in 1667.

In England the political and religious controversies of the seventeenth century were the occasion of the first missionary operations among the Indians of North America. The Puritans who emigrated to New England made some effort in this direction. [The charter granted by Charles I. to the Massachusetts Company in 1628 expressed the hope that "the colony would win the natives of the country to the knowledge and obedience of the true God and Saviour of mankind;" and the colonial seal bore the impression of an Indian, with a label in his mouth bearing the words, "Come over and help us." In 1646 the Massachusetts Legislature passed an act encouraging missions among the Indians.] The pious John Eliot (see ELIOT) devoted (1646) his life to this work (see FRITSCHL: Gesch. d. christl. Missionen Nordamerikas im 17. u. 18. Jahrh.), and gave to the Indian the first translation of the New Testament. His example was followed by others, among whom the Mayhews have an honorable prominence. These were the first missions to be carried on by Protestants in the true spirit of the gospel, and of permanent value. Sermons were preached, and instruction given, in the Indian languages, congregations organized, and natives trained for the ministry. Up to 1680, 14 well-organized congregations had been established, with 1,100 members. In 1644 a petition was handed to the Long Parliament by seventy clergymen, asking that something be done for the diffusion of the gospel in America and the West Indies. In 1648 Parliament sent a circular to the churches, calling for gifts to missions. One result of this movement was the organization of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England, of whose history, however, hardly any thing is known. It was presumably the mother of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, established in 1701, with which the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, established in 1698, stood in close relations. Both these societies, however, during the first century of their existence, were more concerned for the colonists than for the heathen.

Cromwell made a bold proposition in regard to missions. He proposed that a society (Congregatio de propaganda fide) should be formed, with seven directors and four secretaries, drawing their salaries from the State, and the world divided into four districts. Although this plan was not executed, it attests the awaking interest in the spread of the gospel. The same may be said of several individual enterprises: such as the departure of Oxenbridge, a Puritan clergyman, to Surinam; the translation of the Gospels into Malay by Professor Hyde of Oxford, and of Grotius' Truth of the Christian Religion into Arabic by Pococke; and the appeal of Humphrey Prideaux to Dr. Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury, to found an institute for the training of missionaries.

Denmark manifested no missionary concern in this century. It had established colonies in the East Indies in 1620, and in the West Indies in 1672, and was exceedingly zealous in the interests of orthodoxy of doctrine. In this it resembled Germany, and followed Germany in forgetting to send the gospel to the heathen. Its orthodoxy was a barren tree. It remained for the pietistic circles, in contrast to the strict orthodox circles in the Lutheran Church in Germany, to arouse it to a sense of its duty to the heathen.

3. THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. — The beginning of the eighteenth century was an epoch in the history of Protestant missions. In 1705 Lütken, the court preacher at Copenhagen, who had for seventeen years been in Berlin, and stood in friendly relations with Spener, and carried on a correspondence with Francke, was appointed by the Danish king, Frederick IV., to secure foreign missionaries. Two pietists, Ziegenbalg and Plütschau, students of theology, were recommended to him, and through him to the Danish king, and sent to Tranquebar, India. The king provided for their support, and in 1714 a Danish Collegium de cursu evangelii promovendi was organized. But, in spite of these things, the affairs of the Tranquebar mission were conducted from Halle; and the main leader was August Hermann Francke. This godly man seems to have gotten his first missionary impulse from Leibnitz (see Kramer: Life of Francke), and was the author of that remarkable missionary tractate, Pharus missionis evangelicæ, in which he urges Frederick of Prussia to take up the work of converting the heathen, especially the Chinese. As the principal representative of the pietistic movement, next to Spener, and as the founder of the Orphan House at Halle, he was providentially fitted to induce a spirit of devotion in young missionaries, and to develop a missionary constituency at home. Without Francke, the Danish mission would soon have collapsed. He was the first to edit, from 1710 on, regular missionary reports. In one word, Halle was the centre of the Tranquebar mission; and the first real missionary hymn, that of Bogatzky, was written under this influence. — Wach auf, du Geist der ersten Zeugen. On the other hand, the orthodox party looked with suspicion upon the movement; the Wittenberg faculty calling the missionaries "false prophets;" and others, even Neumeister, the author of Jesus nimmt d. Sünder an, declaring missions to be unnecessary.

The Tranquebar mission continued to do efficient work until the close of the century, when rationalism at home undermined its roots. The English missionary societies, and, later, the Leipzig society, became its heirs. Its most prominent workers were Ziegenbalg and Schwartz, and the visible results were the conversion of 40,000 souls. (See Germann: Ziegenbalg und Plütschau, and the art. SCHWARTZ.)

Denmark also directed its attention to Lapland and Greenland. The self-denying Thomas von Westen made three missionary tours to Lapland (1716-22). Hans Egede is the real apostle of Greenland, where he spent fifteen years with his family. At the close of this period he returned to Copenhagen to train missionaries. In this latter enterprise he was not successful; but there were others to take up his labors, — the United Brethren of Herrnhut, to whose missions we now turn.

In 1731 Zinzendorf visited Copenhagen, and was induced by what he saw to carry out the missionary thoughts a previous visit to Ziegenbalg and Halle had started. A negro returned with him to Herrnhut, and begged the Brethren to send the gospel to his fellows in St. Thomas. Members of the community at once offered themselves for Greenland and the West Indies. On Aug. 21, 1732, Dober and David Nitzschmann, each with eighteen marks for travelling expenses, started for St. Thomas; and in January, 1733, Matthew and Christian Stach, for Greenland. The first Greenlander, Cajarnak, was baptized March 30, 1739. Other missionaries were rapidly despatched, — to St. Croix, 1734 (where ten in a short time became victims to the climate); Surinam, 1735; Guinea and Cape Colony, 1737; the Indians of North America, 1740; Jamaica, 1754; Antigua, 1756; Barbadoes, 1765; Labrador, 1770; St. Kitt's, 1777; Mosquito Coast, 1848; Australia, 1849; the Himalayan region, 1853; Demerara, 1878. Up to 1750, or in twenty years, the United Brethren of Herrnhut had established more missions than the combined Protestant Church in two hundred years. The salvation of the heathen lay, day and night, upon the heart of Zinzendorf. Herrnhut became the salt of the earth, and remains to this day the missionary church par excellence. (See Römer: D. Missionswerk d. evang. Brüdergemeinde, 2d ed., 1881.) The Moravian missionaries started out with the motto, "Venture in faith." They were uneducated, but their humility and fidelity gradually overcame all the prejudices against "the illiterate laymen." They were enjoined to practise rigid economy, and to labor with their hands. They were to use only spiritual means, and to aim at the conversion of individuals. The United Brethren have sent out (up to April, 1882) 2,212 missionaries (male and female), of whom 604 are still laboring, 327 of whom are men (Rückblick auf unsere 150 jährige Missionsarbeit, Herrnhut, 1882). In 1882 the 150th anniversary of Moravian missions was appropriately celebrated in Herrnhut, and all the various Moravian churches of Germany and the United States. See THOMPSON: Moravian Missions, N.Y., 1882.

Unfortunately, the example of the Moravians was not at once followed by the rest of the Protestant Church. The responsibility for this neglect lies with the rationalism and the deism which undermined the faith of England and Germany. In rationalistic soil, missions have not flourished, and never will. Germany was more active in this century than other countries, and no other country can show such noble workers as Francke and Zinzendorf. In Holland, the duty of missionary effort was forgotten. In England, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts was founded in 1701, but it dragged on a sluggish existence till the opening of this century. It did very little for the Indians and negroes of America. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge did somewhat better. Collections were taken up for it at court, and George I. showed his interest by writing a cordial letter to Ziegenbalg and Gründler (Sherring: History of Protestant Missions in India, pp. 9, 13). In Edinburgh, a Scotch Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge was founded in 1709, and also a Corporation for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England. They sent a few missionaries to the Indians, and amongst those sent by the former society was the godly and devoted David Brainerd. [Jonathan Edwards also labored among the Stockbridge Indians.] With the grand opportunities afforded by its Colonies, and domination on the seas, England did next to nothing, during the eighteenth century, for missions. The reason is to be found in the low state of religion and the influence of the deistic movement. Never were such elegant moral sermons preached, and never had immorality reached so high a point. It was with the dawn of a new era of faith in England, at the close of the century, that the missionary spirit of the nineteenth century was begotten.

4. THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. — The great religious revival, starting with the labors of the Wesleys and Whitefield, gave the impulse to recent modern missions. God was opening the doors to the nations, and the period had dawned which he had chosen for the missionary era. Not only had Cook's voyages and discoveries aroused an intense interest in the lands and peoples across the sea, but the missionary societies found in them an argument to which they could appeal. Since that time, down to Stanley's journeys in the Dark Continent, missions and geographical discovery have stood in closest connection; and we may say, with Livingstone, "The close of the geographical discovery is the beginning of the missionary enterprise." To this consideration we must add the remarkable progress in inventions, and the facilities of commerce, such as the world had never dreamed of before. Finally, the national conscience of England began to be aroused. The charter of the East-India Company, as given by William in 1698, and renewed by Anne in 1702, stipulated that there should be a minister at every military station and factory, and that he should learn the native language, and devote some of his time to the instruction of the natives in the Christian religion. But, unfortunately, the chaplains to India did not concern themselves with the natives; nor would the officials of the company have tolerated it. The first storm against the corruption of the East India Company rose in 1783. In 1793 Parliament passed laws requiring it to institute measures which would result in the gradual uplifting of the religious and moral condition of the native population. But the project of sending out missionaries was even then declared to be the most extravagant, mad, useless, and dangerous project that had ever been conceived. The more intemperate, however, the company became, and the more reckless their treatment of the missionaries, the more determined became the conflict at home, until, in 1813, the door was finally opened to missionary operations in India by a parliamentary decree. (See INDIA.) The new missionary interest of England was communicated to Germany; although at first all the official organs of the Church assumed a hostile attitude to missions, so that not the Church as a body, but detached Christian circles, took up the matter. Independent societies were formed, which may be regarded as a substitute for the orders of the Roman-Catholic Church, and may be looked upon, unless all signs are deceptive, as a divine preparation for the ecclesiastical organization of the future. We now turn to the history of the foundation of the several missionary societies, and, first of all, to England. This history forms one of the most refreshing episodes in the annals of the Protestant Church: for it is animated with enthusiastic faith, fraternal love, a childlike spirit of joy, heroic courage, pious prayerfulness, and a holy spirit of self-sacrifice.

English Societies.—The Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel amongst the Heathen was formed in Kettering, Oct. 2, 1792, by a small company, including Andrew Fuller and William Carey the cobbler, to whose suggestion the meeting is mainly to be ascribed. Carey had previously published his Inquiry into the Obligation of Christians to use Means for the Conversion of the Heathen; and on May 31, 1792, preached his famous missionary sermon at Nottingham on Isa. liv. 2, in which he urged the convention to expect great things and to attempt great things. Carey himself was the first missionary of this society, and Fuller its first and most energetic secretary. Carey went to India, and was soon joined by Marshman, Ward, and other laborers. In 1809 the first translation of the Bible into Bengalee was accomplished, and printed at the Baptist printing-press at Serampore. In 1811 this society employed 14 European and 28 native missionaries, and had 500 Indian converts. It undertook new missions in Ceylon in 1812; Jamaica, 1813; Western Africa, 1810; China, 1859; and Japan. Statistics for 1881: Missionaries supported by the Board, 95; pastors of self-supporting churches, 61; evangelists, 258; members, 38,397; income, £60,275. Its offices are 19 Castle Street, London, E.C.; organ, The Missionary Herald. (See Underhill: Christian Missions in the East and West in Connection with the Baptist Missionary Society, and the arts. CAREY, MARSHMAN, etc.) The General Baptists organized their missionary society in 1817, and now employ 6 missionaries in India; organ, Missionary Observer.

The London Missionary Society was formed Sept. 21, 1795. On the three following days, six solemn services were held in the churches of London. It comprised dissenters of the various denominations, as well as members of the Established Church, and had among its incorporators laymen, as well as clergymen. Soon after its organization, the society passed under the control of the Independents. The South Sea Islands were settled upon as the first field of operations; and 29 men were sent out, among whom 4 were ministers. The ship "Duff" was purchased; and on March 1, 1797, she dropped anchor off Tahiti. After many vicissitudes, this mission was carried on to a glorious success, under the leadership of John Williams. (See FIJI ISLANDS, FRIENDLY ISLANDS, WILLIAMS, etc.) The society established other stations in Southern Africa in 1798 (see LIVINGSTONE, etc.), India in 1805, China in 1807 (see MORRISON, etc.), British Guinea and the West Indies, 1821, Madagascar, 1818 (see MADAGASCAR), and many of the Polynesian islands. Statistics for 1882: English missionaries, 142; native ordained ministers, 369; native preachers, 4,826; church-members, 99,382; boys' schools, 1,458; scholars, 69,418; girls' schools, 331; scholars, 12,751; income, £116,012; organ, The Chronicle of the London Missionary Society. Its offices are in Blomfield Street, London.

The Society for Missions to Africa and the East was founded April 12, 1799, by ministers of the Church of England. The movement was earnestly supported by Wilberforce. In 1812 it changed its name to the Church Missionary Society for Africa and the East. By 1825 it had sent out 96 missionaries, of whom 28 were German, and 32 English clergymen; the rest were laymen. In 1815 it founded the Missionary Seminary at Islington, which had, up to 1878, sent forth 420 missionaries. Fourteen of the society's missionaries have reached the honor of episcopal consecration, among whom is one native, Dr. Crowther. It established stations in Western Africa (Rio Pongas and Sierra Leone) in 1804; India, 1814; New Zealand, 1814; Ceylon, 1818; British America, 1823; Eastern Africa, 1843; China, 1815; Mauritius, 1856; Japan, 1869; Persia, 1875; Victoria Nyanza, 1876. The Sierra Leone Church, with its more than 5,000 communicants, is now self-supporting. Statistics for 1882: European (male) missionaries, 230; native, 230; native lay-helpers, 2,569 male, 461 female; native communicants, 36,326; schools, 1,617; scholars, 68,647; income, £221,136; organ, The Church Missionary Intelligencer and Record. Its offices are in Salisbury Square, London. This society, by its tolerant and fraternal Christian spirit, has the confidence and hearty moral support of all Christian denominations.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (S. P. G.), founded in 1701, began a new life in the early part of this century. It has become more and more the representative of the High-Church party and principles, and prosecutes the work of establishing new bishoprics with great zeal. Feeling itself to be the representative of the Church par excellence, it has entered territory already sufficiently occupied by other societies, and has thereby caused not a little trouble. It lays great stress upon the organization of bishoprics. It has opened stations in India (1818), Ceylon, South Africa (1820), the West Indies, Australia, and New Zealand (1839), Borneo (1849), British Columbia (1859), China (1874), Japan (1873), etc.; and has even intruded into Madagascar (1864) and the Fiji Islands (1879). The report of the society does not give separate statistics. The society, perhaps, has 20,000 native communicants, under the care of 250 missionaries; income in 1881, £134,979; organ, The Mission Field. Its offices are 19 Delahey Street, Westminster.

The Universities' Mission to Central Africa stands in close connection with the S. P. G., and was founded in 1860. Bishop Mackenzie was consecrated first bishop on Jan. 1, 1861, and was succeeded at his death by Dr. Steere. In 1881 this mission had 5 priests and 8 deacons in its employ. (See Rowley: Twenty Years in Central Africa, being the Story of the Universities' Mission, London, 1881.)

Other independent missionary societies connected with the Church of England are, The South-American Missionary Society, founded in 1844, which had in 1881 an income of £13,678, and prosecutes work in the Falklands, Terra del Fuego, Argentine Republic, Brazil, Chili, Peru, etc.; organ, The South-American Missionary Magazine. Its offices are at 11 Sergeants' Inn, London. The Moslem Missionary Society was founded in 1861. Its secretary seems to be its only missionary.

The Methodists have, from the beginning of their history, had an intense missionary spirit. Thomas Coke, in 1786, was the first director of their foreign missions; and the Methodists established during his lifetime stations in the West Indies and Western Africa. He died in 1814, on his way to Ceylon, whither he was going to establish a third mission. The Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society was formed after his death in 1817, and opened stations in Southern Africa, 1815, India, 1817, the South Seas (Australia, New Zealand, Fiji Islands), 1822, China, 1831, and also in France, Germany, Italy, Spain, and Malta. Its work in Canada and British America has been taken up by the Canada Wesleyan Society, which also has a mission in Japan. The missions in the South Sea Islands are now likewise independent of the mother-society. Statistics for 1882 (including Europe, India, China, Africa, West Indies): Missionaries and assistant missionaries, 531; other helpers, 10,191; church-members, 89,349; income in 1881, £152,935; organ, The Wesleyan Missionary Notices. Its offices are 66 Paternoster Row, London.

The Welsh Calvinist Methodist Society (1840) has a successful mission in India, with 66 congregations and 2,055 church-members in 1881. The Primitive Methodist Missionary Society was founded in 1843. The United Methodist Free Churches Missionary Society (1856) has stations in the West Indies, China, and Africa, with 16 missionaries and 5,000 communicants. The Methodist New Connection Missionary Society (1860?) has a mission in China; employed (in 1882) 5 European missionaries, 52 local preachers, and numbered 1,131 communicants; income, £4,829. Its office is 4 London-House Yard, London.

The Foreign Mission Society of the Presbyterian Church in England, founded in 1855, has stations in India, China (1856), and Formosa (1865). In 1882 it had 2,570 communicants, and employed 17 clerical and 4 medical missionaries; income, £14,028; organ, The Messenger and Missionary Record of the Presbyterian Church in England. Its offices are 7 East India Avenue, London. The Irish Presbyterian Foreign Missionary Society began its existence in 1840; has stations in India, China, and Spain, and in 1882 employed 10 European missionaries, and numbered about 300 native communicants; income, £9,984. The Friends' Foreign Mission Society (1865) prosecutes missionary work in India, Syria, and especially Madagascar (3,250 church-members). The China Inland Mission (1865), employing 70 missionaries, and numbering 1,000 communicants, and the Congo (or Livingstone) Inland Mission, employing 11 missionaries, are undenominational. In addition to these organizations, there are a number of efficient ladies' associations in England.

Scotch Societies.—The Glasgow and the Scottish Missionary Societies were founded in 1796, and sent missionaries to Sierra Leone, Cape Colony, India, and Jamaica. It was not till 1821 that Dr. Inglis succeeded in bringing the Established Church as a body to prosecute missions. Its first missionary was Dr. Duff (see DUFF), who went to India, and was soon followed by Wilson, Mitchell, and others. These missionaries addressed themselves more particularly to the work of education. At the Disruption, in 1843, two societies ensued. The missionaries in India, however, united with the Free Church; but the missionary property went to the Established Church. The latter soon sent fresh missionaries to India (1845), and has established stations in Eastern Africa (1876) and China (1877). In close connection with it stands the Ladies' Association for the Advancement of Female Education in India. The organ of the Established Church's missions is The Church of Scotland Home and Foreign Missionary Record. Much more extensive has been the work of the Free Church. Besides its Indian stations, it has established missions in Southern Africa, among the Kafirs (1844) and Zulus (1867), in the New Hebrides (1848), Syria (1872), Lake Nyassa, Africa (Livingstonia mission) (1881). Statistics for 1882: Ordained European missionaries, 35; ordained native missionaries, 11; medical missionaries, 9; other European helpers, 26; native, 313; communicants, 4,271; income, £29,587. The Ladies' Society for Female Education in India and South Africa is connected with the Free Church; organ, The Free Church of Scotland Monthly Record. Its offices are in Edinburgh. The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland began operations among the heathen in 1835, and has missions in the West Indies (Jamaica and Trinidad), Kaffraria, Spain, India, China, and Japan. Statistics for 1882: Ordained European missionaries, 47; ordained native missionaries, 16; European medical missionaries, 5; native helpers, 320; European zenana agents and teachers, 17; communicants, 10,215; day schools, 182; pupils, 10,651; income in 1881, £33,816; organ, The Missionary Record of the United Presbyterian Church.

American Societies.—The churches of North America, as has already been noticed, were interested, in the eighteenth century, in the work of carrying the gospel to the Indians. It is characteristic that the modern missionary movement in the United States started in an institution of learning,—Andover Seminary. The first and main mover was Samuel J. Mills (see art.), who was deeply interested in missionary subjects while a student at Williams College. At Andover Seminary, he, together with Hall, Judson, Newell, and Nott, formed a missionary society, and with three of them presented to the Association of Massachusetts Proper, convened at Bradford, an appeal in behalf of missions. The result was the founding, on June 29, 1810, of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. This organization at first proposed a union with the London Missionary Society, but the idea was abandoned; and in 1812 the first missionaries were sent to India.—Judson, Rice, etc. The former became a Baptist, and went to Burmah. The mission was ultimately established in Bombay (1813) and Ceylon (1816). The Board began its mission to the Indians in 1818; in the Sandwich Islands, 1820; in Palestine, by the despatch of Pliny Fisk and Levi Parsons, in 1818; Turkey, 1822; Zululand, 1835; South China, 1847; Micronesia, 1852; North China, 1854; Japan, 1869; Spain and Mexico, 1872; Austria, 1873; Central Africa, 1880. Statistics for 1882: American ordained missionaries, 164; American assistants, male and female, 392; native pastors, 148; native preachers, 438; church-members, 19,755 (exclusive of the Sandwich Islands); high schools and seminaries, 63; schools, 847; whole number of pupils, 36,865; income, $459,700, of which $110,000, was from women's societies. The Hawaiian Evangelical Association of the Sandwich Islands carries on an independent mission in the Micronesian Islands, with (in 1880) 40 stations and 2,904 adherents. Since 1869 the Woman's Board of Missions has co-operated with the American Board. Its organ is Life and Light for Woman. The American Missionary Association of the Congregational Church carries on operations among the Indians, negroes, and Chinese in America, and the negroes in Western Africa. It employs 84 missionaries and 180 teachers in the South, and 8 missionaries and 5 teachers in Africa; organ, The American Missionary. Down to the year 1837, the Presbyterian Church as a whole supported the American Board. At the division of the church at that time, the Old-School body constituted a separate Presbyterian Board. The New-School body continued to support the American Board until the re-union of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church in 1870; so that it is now completely under the control of the Congregational Church. Organ, The Missionary Herald. Its main offices are at 1 Somerset Street, Boston.

The Baptists, at their General Convention in Philadelphia (1814), constituted the Baptist Missionary Union, but in 1815, when the Baptists of the South withdrew, changed the name to the American Baptist Missionary Union. The occasion of the organization of the Baptist Society was the change of views, on the subject of baptism, which Judson and Rice had experienced on their way to India. It has established stations in Burmah, 1813; among the Karens in 1828 (see art.); Assam, 1837; India (among the Telugus), 1840; Siam, 1833; China, 1843; Japan, 1872; Africa (among the Bassos), 1880. Statistics in 1882: American missionaries, 181; native ordained preachers, 190, and unordained assistants, 473; church-members, 46,017; income, $352,000. The society also prosecutes missionary work in Sweden, Germany, France, Spain, and Greece, with 94,879 church-members. Organ, Baptist Missionary Magazine. Its principal offices are in Boston. There are three women's Baptist missionary societies, with headquarters at Boston, Chicago, and San Francisco; organ, The Helping Hand, Boston.

The Freewill Baptists began missionary operations in 1833, and carry on a mission in India, with 6 American missionaries, and 16 native ordained and lay preachers (1882). A Woman's Society co-operates with the main society, and issues a bi-monthly, The Missionary Helper. The Southern Baptists, who withdrew in 1845, on account of the slavery question, carry on missions in Western Africa and China, with 7 missionaries. The Seventh-day Baptists (1842) have a mission in China. The Baptist Church of Canada began missionary operations in 1866, and supports 4 missionaries among the Telugus of India, and numbers 500 communicants.

The two branches of the Presbyterian Church in the North, at the re-union in 1870, united in the support of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, which has its headquarters at 23 Centre Street, New York. It conducts missions in Syria (begun by the American Board in 1818), Persia and India (begun by the American Board in 1836), Siam (1840, and among the Laos, 1867), Liberia and Gaboon in Western Africa (1842), China (1844), Japan (1859), the United States of Colombia, Chili, and Brazil (1856-59), Mexico (1872), and among ten tribes of Indians. Statistics for 1882: 140 American missionaries; 84 ordained native, and 128 licentiate native, preachers; 240 American, and 607 native, female missionaries; 16,484 communicants, and 20,064 scholars in its schools; income, $583,124; organ, The Foreign Missionary. There co-operated with this society 7 women's missionary societies, whose contributions, 1870-71, amounted to $7,327; in 1881-82, to $178,180.

The Presbyterian Church South formed its missionary society in 1862, and conducts missions among the Indians, in Mexico, Brazil, Italy, Greece, and China. Statistics for 1882: Ordained American missionaries, 20; female assistants, 26; medical missionary, 1; native preachers, 13; other native helpers, 34; day schools, 20; scholars, 500; communicants, 1,505; income in 1881, $69,309, $10,984 of which came from ladies' missionary associations; organ, The Missionary.

The Board of Foreign Missions of the United Presbyterian Church of North America has established stations in Egypt (1854) and India (1855). Statistics for 1882: American missionaries, 13; female missionaries, 21; ordained native missionaries, 8; other helpers, 189; communicants, 1,565; schools, 75; scholars, 2,367; income in 1881, $77,872. Its offices are 136 North 18th Street, Philadelphia.

The Reformed Presbyterians in the United States began missionary operations in 1859, and have 6 missionaries in Syria.

The Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church in America was constituted as a separate body in 1858, and established stations in China (1841), India (1851), and Japan (1859). Statistics for 1882: American ordained missionaries, 16; assistant missionaries, 24; native ordained ministers, 13; other native helpers, 147; day schools, 95; scholars, 2,340; communicants, 2,625; income in 1881, $72,960, of which $14,808 came through the Woman's Board; organ, The Sower and Mission Monthly. Its offices are in Vesey Street, New York.

The German Reformed Church is represented by 1 missionary in India; and, since 1880, supports 1 missionary in Japan.

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church began missionary operations in 1876, and has 7 ordained missionaries among the Indians and in Japan.

The Presbyterian Church in Canada has missionary stations in the West Indies, India, Formosa, and the New Hebrides, and employs 14 missionaries.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist-Episcopal Church North came into existence in 1819, and has established stations in Liberia (1833), Montevideo and Buenos Ayres (1836), China (1847), Germany (1849), Scandinavia (1853), India (1856), Japan (1872), Mexico (1873). Statistics of 1881. American (male) missionaries, 99; native ordained preachers, 218; native unordained preachers, 463; employed by the Woman's Board, 39 American and 199 native helpers; church-members, 28,127; day schools, 331; day scholars, 11,161; theological seminaries, 8; income, $327,327. (See J. M. Reid: Missions and Missionary Society of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, New York) Its offices are at 805 Broadway, New York.

The Methodist-Episcopal Church South constituted a missionary society in 1845, and has stations among the Indians and in China (1848), Mexico (1873), Brazil (1876). Statistics for 1882: 15 American ordained missionaries; 60 native ministers, and about 2,500 communicants; income in 1881, $103,741. Its offices are in Nashville, Tenn.

The United-Brethren Church organized a missionary society in 1853, and sustains missions in Germany and Africa.

The Evangelical Association prosecutes missionary work in Japan, with 4 missionaries, and in Germany. In Japan, according to Rev. Dr. Hartzler's report (Aug. 21, 1882), the mission had 51 native members, 3 regular preaching places, 4 Sunday schools with 15 officers and teachers and 117 scholars, and 2 day schools with 72 scholars. The secretary of the Board of Missions in this country is Rev. Dr. Wiest.

The Methodist Church of Canada (1824) has missions among the Indians and in the Bermudas and Japan; employs 32 missionaries, and has 3,600 communicants.

The Board of Missions of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States was constituted in 1821, and prosecutes missionary operations in Greece, Mexico, Western Africa, China, Japan, and Hayti. Statistics for 1881: Native communicants, 2,304; income, $193,265. Its offices are in the Bible House, New York; organ, The Spirit of Missions.

The Disciples of Christ prosecute missionary labors in India, Turkey, and Australia.

The Lutheran Church has thus far done little for the spread of the gospel in foreign lands. The General Synod has 4 missionaries in India and Western Africa; the General Council, 3 in India; the Synodal Conference none.

Continental European Societies. — Under the unfruitful sway of rationalism, the Danish and Halle mission dried up; and the Moravians must attribute the conservation of their missions to their freedom from rationalism. The missionary revival did not begin till thirty years ago. In 1880 they were laboring at 99 stations, with 143 (male) missionaries, and had 24,439 native communicants.

Before the organization of any of the modern German societies, Father Janicke founded with prayer a mission school in Berlin, which flourished till Janicke's death, in 1827, and furnished nearly 80 missionaries to the English societies. Income, 366,861 marks, more than half of which came from foreign lands.

The real mother of the German societies was the Basel Society for the Promotion of Pure Doctrine and Piety, founded in 1780 (Die deutsche Gesellschaft zur Bevörderung reiner Lehre und wahrer Gottseligkeit), which, under England's lead, soon took a deep interest in missions, and through its secretaries, Blumhardt and Spittler, established the Basel Missionary School in 1815. This institution at first only contemplated the training of missionaries, but in 1822 determined to establish stations. This is the real date of the Basel Missionary Society, which has sent missionaries to Persia (abandoned in 1835), West Africa, India, and China, and labors with increasing success. Both Lutheran and Reformed clergymen are employed. This is still the most important among the German societies, and employed in 1880 115 missionaries, and had 6,739 communicants; income, 682,168 marks; organ, Der evangelische Heidenbote. The Berlin Missionary Society was formed in 1824, in response to a call of ten men (Neander, Tholuck, Bethmann-Hollweg, Von Gerlach, etc.). It sent out its first missionaries in 1831 to South Africa, where in 1880 it had 58 missionaries and 4,187 communicants. Quite recently it has opened a mission in China. Income, 256,940 marks; organ, Berliner M.-Berichte.

The Rhenish Society (Die rheinische Miss.-Gesellschaft) was formed at Elberfeld in 1828 (there having been a small society at Barmen since 1818), including Elberfeld, Barmen, Cologne, etc. It sent out 4 missionaries to South Africa in 1829, and since to Borneo (1834), China (1846), Sumatra (1862), and in 1880 had 60 missionaries and 7,000 communicants; income, 304,779 marks; organ, Berichte der rhein. Mission.-Gesellschaft.

The North German society (Die norddeutsche Missionsgesellschaft) was formed in 1836, established a missionary institute in Hamburg, 1837, sent missionaries to New Zealand, 1842, and Western Africa, 1847, where the mission has been carried on at a terrible sacrifice of life, one-half the laborers succumbing to fever. In 1880 it had 11 missionaries and 250 communicants, with an income of 66,143 marks; organ, Monatsblatt der norddeutschen M.-Gesellschaft. Strict (Lutheran) confessionalism led to the formation of this society, as well as to the formation of the Evangelical Lutheran Missionary Society of Dresden, removed to Leipzig in 1846 (Die evangelische Miss.-Gesellschaft). A missionary association had been formed in 1819, at Dresden, to support the Basel society. It declared itself independent in 1836, after having established a missionary institute in 1832. The late Dr. Graul, who became director in 1844, by his energy, grasp of the subject, and missionary enthusiasm, won the support of a large Lutheran constituency for the society. After a passing work in Australia, it became heir in 1840 to as much of the old Danish and Halle mission among the Tamils as the English had not already inherited, and has now 21 missionaries among them, and 4,500 communicants. This is its only mission. Income in 1880, 222,000 marks; organ, Das evang.-luth. Missionsblatt.

The year 1836 was fruitful in the formation of German missionary societies. Gossner, who dissented from his Berlin brethren in demanding a higher literary standard for the missionaries, and who held that they ought to follow the example of Paul in working with their hands, at the age of sixty-three began an independent activity. Without any ostentation, he trained young artisans, until within ten years, 80 missionaries were settled in Australia, India, North America, and Western Africa, who had graduated from his tuition. Gossner was every thing in his society, and pulled harder on the prayer-bell than on the alms-bell (mehr die Bet.- als die Bettelglocke). In the second decennium he sent out 58 missionaries. At his death, in 1858, the management of this society, called the "Gossner Society," was put in the hands of a committee. It now carries on operations on the Ganges, and very successfully among the Kohls. Statistics for 1880: Missionaries, 21; communicants, 8,000; income, 166,929 marks; organ, Die Biene auf dem Missionsfelde. (See Dalton: Johannes Gossner.)

The Hermannsburg Society (Die Hermannsbürger-Mission) likewise owes its origin and peculiarities to the genius and enthusiasm of one man, the pastor at Hermannsburg, Ludwig Harms (see art.). Harms had early begun to co-operate with the North German Society; but, on the impulse of repeated applications from the sons of peasants for missionary training, he erected a missionary institute in 1849, and, four years subsequently, sent out 12 pupils and 8 colonists to Southern Africa. The ship for their voyage was constructed by the people of Hermannsburg (an inland town) themselves. It was Harms's plan to station missionaries in groups, and to colonize towns, among the heathen. Hermannsburg, in Southern Africa, is one of the results. Statistics in 1880: 90 missionaries, stationed in Africa, India, Australia, and New Zealand; communicants, 2,000; income, 288,386 marks; organ, Hermannsbürger Missionsblatt.

The Pilgrim Mission of St. Chrischona at Basel is a missionary institute founded in 1818, and trains up missionaries for the Mohammedans and Oriental churches. In 1877 a German missionary institute was founded in Schleswig-Holstein, which in 1880 despatched 2 missionaries to India; income, 23,000 marks. The Knak Ladies' Missionary Society (1850) has charge of a foundling and orphan house in Hong Kong. The Ladies' Society for Female Education in the East (1812) has sent out 18 female laborers to India, Palestine, and South Africa. The Jerusalem Union, founded in 1815, limits its activity to Bethlehem in Palestine. The Kaiserswerth Deaconesses Institute has 50 sisters laboring in hospitals, orphan-asylums, and schools in the East.

In 1797 the Nederlandsche Zendinggenootschap voor voortplanting en beroudering van het christendom bijzonder onder de heidelen was organized at Rotterdam. The principal mover was Van der Kemp. The first missionary was despatched in 1813, in the person of J. Kam, who has been called the "Apostle of the Moluccas." In 1810 a missionary seminary was founded in Berkel, which was removed to Rotterdam in 1821. The society has confined its operations to the Celebes, Amboyna, and Java, and has to-day 16 missionaries and 20,000 communicants; organ, Muandberigt van het Ned. Zendingg. The other Dutch societies employ about 30 missionaries in the Dutch colonies, but have not been very efficient. Among these organizations are De Doopgezinde vereeniging tot beroudering der Evangelieverbreiding in de Ned. overzeesche bezittingen (1848), Het Java-Comité (1851), De Utrechtsche Zendingvereeniging (1859), etc. It is computed that the Molucca Christians number 40,000, but there is not much vital Christianity among them. In spite of the large number of Dutch missionary societies, it must be said that Holland, which has been made rich by her colonies, has done her Christian duty by them only in a very small degree.

In France, the Société des Missions évangéliques was organized by the various French Protestant denominations in 1824, and has 23 missionaries in South Africa, Senegambia, and Tahiti, and 4,000 communicants; income, 220,000 francs; organ, Journal des Missions évangéliques. In Denmark, the Danske Missions Selskup was formed in 1821, and supported the Basel society till 1864, when it established an independent mission in India, and put itself in connection with the clergy of Greenland. There are, perhaps, 7,000 communicants connected with the Danish missions to Greenland. In Norway, the Norske Missions Selskup zu Stavanger was organized in 1842, and has 15 missionaries laboring in Zululand (100 communicants) and Madagascar (1,200 communicants). In Sweden, the Svenska Missions-Sällskapet was formed in 1835. In 1876 it was turned over to the State Church of Sweden, which supports some missionaries in Zululand and among the Tamiks in India. An independent society, the Evangeliska Fosterlands Stiftelsen, was formed in 1856, and has missionaries in Abyssinia. In all Sweden supports about 12 missionaries. A missionary society was organized in Finland, 1859, and has stations in Ovamboland, Africa.

The following table of statistics may be regarded as approximately correct, and, if any thing, rather an underestimate. The statistics do not include women's societies as separate organizations.

COUNTRIES.	Missionary Societies.	Missionaries sent from Europe and America.	Communicants.	Christians.	Income.
Great Britain . .	21	1,500	345,000	1,200,000	$4,000,000
North America .	25	700	100,000	350,000	2,500,000
Germany and Switzerland .	9	525	59,000	165,000	600,000
Other European States	16	100	28,300	165,700	250,000
Total	71	2,825	532,300	1,880,700	$7,350,000

From the above survey, it becomes apparent that ours is a missionary age, and that missionary activity has increased as the century has progressed. Missions are a matter of voluntary associations. This may be regarded as providential, and perhaps preparatory for the Church of the future. The churches that are independent of the State are by far the most active in the cause of missions, and just because they have been called upon to support their home organization by their own gifts. The methods of carrying on missionary operations are, on the whole, consistent. All Protestant societies are agreed that spiritual agencies must be employed; and in this they greatly diverge from the Roman-Catholic Church. Missions are everywhere the mother of the school, and at least 12,000 schools owe their origin and support to foreign missionary societies. During the century, 230 translations of the Bible have been made, at least 70 of which were in languages theretofore absolutely without a literature. The literary services of missionaries to mission-lands have been simply immense. (See Warneek: D. gegenseitigen Beziehungen zwischen d. modernen Mission und Kultur.) There is a general agreement that the native churches should be brought up as soon as possible to self-support and independence. At present there are no less than 25,000 native helpers, of whom at least 1,500 are ordained ministers or evangelists. The London Missionary Society had, in 1882, 369 native ordained missionaries; the American Board, 148 native pastors, 438 native preachers and catechists, and 1,055 native school-teachers; and the Presbyterian Board (North), 84 native ordained pastors, 128 licentiates, and 607 lay-helpers. Recently, industrial missions, which combine preaching with practical instruction in the arts of civilized life, have been organized in Central Africa. The medical missions are also doing a grand work.

III. SURVEY OF THE MISSION FIELD.¹

North America.—The missions in Greenland began with the labors of Egede in 1721, and the Moravians in 1733. Few heathen remain; but the Christians are still on a low plane of Christian living, and not till within the past ten years have serious attempts been made to train a native ministry. In Labrador, the Moravians established a mission in 1771, and 1,260 Christians are the reward of their toilsome labors. In British America and Canada, the Church Missionary Society is the most active, and has five dioceses,—Athabasca, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Moosonee, and Metlakatla. It began its work in 1820, and has 11,500 communicants connected with its missions. In 1839 the Wesleyan Missionary Society entered the same field. Its work is now carried on by the Methodist Church of Canada.

In the United States, there are three classes who properly come under the head of missionary subjects,—the Indians, Chinese, and Mormons. The negroes (see art.) do not properly belong here, as they are American citizens. John Eliot, the Mayhews, David Brainerd, and others labored with fidelity and success among the Indians. At the present time the different tribes are apportioned to different denominations, which have the sole right of prosecuting religious work amongst them. There are, perhaps, 25,000 Indian communicants in the different churches. For the missions among the Chinese and Mormons, see those articles.

In the West Indies, the unexampled cruelty of the Spaniards exterminated the aborigines, and substituted in their place African slaves. In 1838 England gave freedom to the slaves in her colonies, and the example has been recently followed by Spain. The population of the West Indies is 4,412,700, of whom 2,061,000 are under the crown of Spain. Here, again, the Moravians were the first to begin missionary operations (1732). They now number, on eight islands, 36,800 Christians. The Methodists followed in 1786, at Antigua, and have to-day 41,000 communicants. The Baptists came next, in 1813, and have in Jamaica 23,000, and the rest of the islands 5,160, church-members. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel also carries on a very important work in five dioceses. It has given birth to an independent West Indies' Missionary association, which has sent some missionaries to Western Africa. The London Missionary Society, the American Missionary Society, the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and the Episcopal Church of the United States, also have missions in the West Indies. Mexico was opened to the Protestant churches after the expulsion of the French in 1867, and is now occupied by the Protestant-Episcopal, Methodist-Episcopal, Congregational, and Presbyterian (Northern and Southern) churches of the United States. The labors of the missionaries have been richly rewarded (see art. MEXICO). In Central America, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and the Methodists, have stations in Honduras (4,000 Christians), and the Moravians on the Mosquito Coast (1,080 Christians). The most hopeful missionary fields in South America are Brazil and Chili.

The Islands of the Pacific Ocean.—Here we see a remarkable change in the condition of the natives. The American Board began its mission on the Sandwich Islands. The London Society in 1797 sent missionaries to Tahiti and the Friendly Islands. The work in Tahiti has passed over to the French Church, which has more than 6,000 communicants. The apostle of many of the groups of the South Sea Islands was John Williams. (See WILLIAMS.) The Wesleyan Church is the predominant one on the Samoan, Tonga, and Fiji Islands, where a most remarkable revolution has taken place, transforming cannibals into church-going and school-attending peoples. (See FIJI ISLANDS.) On the New Caledonian, New Hebrides, and Queen Charlotte Islands, the London, several Presbyterian, Methodist, and Dutch societies, and the S. P. G., are laboring. The rude populations of the New Hebrides have at last become accessible. One of them, Eromanga, is famous as the scene of the martyrdoms of Williams and the two Gordons. In 1881 a memorial church was dedicated on the island, and three sons of the murderer of Williams were present. Aneytium is wholly evangelized. The Methodists of Sydney entered New Britain in 1874, with some helpers from the Tonga and Fiji Islands. Four evangelists have been murdered, but converts have been made. To New Guinea two missionaries from the Gossner Institute were despatched in 1855, but in 1871 the London Society began the active prosecution of work. (See Murray: Forty Years' Mission-Work in ¹ This part of the German article has been more abridged than the other parts, as the information is given, even at greater length, under special heads; e.g., CHINA, JAPAN, TURKEY, FIJI ISLANDS, etc.

Polynesia and New Guinea, London, 1876.) Missions in New Zealand were begun by the Church of England in 1814, which was followed by the Wesleyans in 1822. (See NEW ZEALAND.) The aborigines of Australia are being cared for by the Moravian, the Hermannsburg, Presbyterian, and other societies. It is a laborious and discouraging work; but about 1,000 have been won to Christianity, and in 1881 the missionary schools among them received the prize from the Australian Government.

Asia. — Beginning with the Indian Archipelago, we find that very little has been done on Java (only 4,000 Christians) and Borneo, where four missionaries and three of their wives were murdered in 1859. The work at Sumatra, which has been carried on for twenty years by the Rhenish Society is more hopeful; and 6,000 Christians are gathered into 14 congregations. An especially effective work has been carried on, since 1826, on the Celebes, where nearly the whole of the population is under Christian influence. On the way to India we touch upon Ceylon, with a population of 2,500,000. The Buddhists here are in the majority. The Dutch Government Christians, which once numbered 300,000, have pretty much all disappeared. The two Church-of-England societies, the Baptists, Wesleyans, and the American Board, number about 25,000 native Christians. It is on the Island of Ceylon that the exclusive bishop of Colombo (S. P. G.) has his diocese.

In India we tread upon the most important and most vigorously cultivated mission-field of the day. More than 650 missionaries, belonging to 35 societies, divide the territory between them. Recently the number of native Christians has grown very rapidly. Fifty-eight translations of the Bible into its languages have been made. Schools have been planted, until they have an attendance of 150,000. Female workers are beginning to make their influence tell in the zenanas; and year by year the number of native preachers and teachers is increasing. (See art. INDIA.)

In Siam, the American Baptists and Presbyterians have missions; the former (in 1882) with 500 communicants, the latter with 295 (including the Laos).

China, in which the London Missionary Society began its mission in 1807, is one of the most important as well as populous empires of the globe. It has now Christian churches, with 20,000 communicants, and 16 hospitals manned by devoted American and English medical missionaries. Japan, which was opened to commerce by the United States, has been the scene of missionary operations from 1859. The Americans (Hepburn, Verbeck) were the first to occupy the ground. Hopeful as this field has been and is, through the enterprise of the Japanese Government in adopting the ways of European civilization, there is much danger ahead from the spread of materialistic (Darwinism, etc.) views by American teachers at the universities. (See arts. CHINA and JAPAN.)

In the Mohammedan lands of Western Asia and Turkey, the missionaries have, in spite of guarantees of religious freedom, been obliged to confine themselves more or less closely to the remainder of the old Christian sects. The American Board is the most active in the countries of Islam, and is followed by the Church Missionary Society and the Presbyterians. In Persia, where Henry Martyn died (1812), the gospel has a firm foothold at Ispahan, Teheran, Tebriz, and Oromiah. (See art. PERSIA.) The missions in Syria (see art.) have been very successful, although but few Mohammedans thus far have been baptized. The missions of the American Board in Turkey are likewise in a very prosperous condition. The Armenians contribute the largest number of converts. Robert College at Constantinople, as the Presbyterian College at Beirut, etc., stands a shining lighthouse, shedding light over a large area. (See TURKEY.)

Africa. — In Northern Africa, missionary operations are carried on with some success by the United Presbyterians among the Copts in Egypt, and by Miss Whately in Cairo. The first extensive African mission-field stretches along the western coast, from Senegal to Gaboon, from which the Baptists and the Congo inland mission are penetrating towards the Livingstone, or Middle Congo River. More than 200 French, American, German, English, and native missionaries, belonging to 15 societies, are laboring here, amongst peoples deeply sunk in heathenism, and exposed to a deadly climate. They have a population of 90,000 under their immediate care. Sierra Leone, populated in the early part of the century by freed negroes, is now an independent diocese. The Episcopal Church has 18,860 under its care; the Wesleyans, 17,098; Lady Huntingdon's Connection, 2,717, etc. (For Liberia, see special article.) On the Gold Coast, Wesleyan, Basel, and North German missionaries are laboring, the first with 6,038 communicants. The Wesleyans also hold Yoruba, with 1,236 communicants. The Niger mission (begun 1857) has been successful in training up an efficient corps of native workers, at the head of which stands the colored Bishop Crowther. The Bilé mission was begun by the American Board in 1880.

In Cape Colony, including Kaffraria, by the government census of 1875 there were 175,963 colored Protestant Christians. The Church Missionary and the Wesleyan societies have been the most active in this district. The states north of Cape Colony (Orange, Transvaal, Basutoland) were first opened up by Moffat (see his Missionary Labors and Scenes in South Africa, and J. E. Carlyle: South Africa and its Mission Fields, London, 1878) and Livingstone. Different American and European societies have entered into this territory. For the remarkable history of missionary operations in Madagascar, see the special article. Eastern Africa was opened up by Livingstone; and the Church Missionary (1876), London (1878), and the Universities' Mission societies have occupied stations at Zanzibar, and are pressing towards the great lakes in the heart of Africa; thus following the footsteps, and answering the appeals, of the great African travellers, Livingstone and Stanley. Central Africa at the present is the most interesting African missionary-field. The Scotch have two stations on Lake Nyassa, and the Church of England at Blantyre on the Shire River. The London Society, after severe sacrifices, are firmly established on Lake Tanganyika, and the Church Missionary Society, after still severer trials, on Victoria Nyauza

COUNTRIES.	Population of the World.	Protestants.	Christians.
Europe	315,929,000	75,124,000	297,300,000
Asia	834,767,000	430,000 (?)	11,926,000
Africa	205,679,000	740,000 (?)	3,560,000
America	95,577,000	37,380,000	75,735,000
South Seas	4,031,000	1,544,000	2,020,000
Total	1,455,923,000	115,218,000	390,541,000

The whole number of Christians (not communicants) connected with the missionary fields may safely be calculated at 2,000,000. This seems a small number compared with the un-Christian population of the world. But we must remember, that we are still in the first stage of the modern missionary movement. The work hitherto done has been preparatory. Another age will reap the harvest. We must remember again, that the law of the progress of the kingdom of Christ is the law of the mustard-seed's growth now, as much as ever before. And once more we must remember, that numbers do not exhaust the results of modern missionary activity. The gospel has had a wonderful power in civilizing and educating the heathen nations, which cannot be embodied in figures. On the other hand, we must be on our guard against an ideal conception of the results of missions. The most of the Christians are still weak, and in the first stages of Christian experience and morality. It will take time to build up independent native churches.

LIT.—Important works have already been mentioned in the course of the article. The literature of missions is so large, that it is not possible to give here more than a few works of a general character, or more recent publication. Special works will be found in the lists of literature, under the names of countries (as JAPAN, FLI ISLANDS) and missionaries (as DUFF, LIVINGSTONE). MITE, the rendering, in the Authorized and Revised Versions, of λεπτόν, a very small coin of bronze or copper, equal in value to a little more than one mill, but in Christ's time to only half a mill.

MITRE is used in the Old-Testament version as the name of the head-dress of the Jewish high priest, and generally as the name of a peculiar head-dress worn on solemn occasions by the pope, the bishops, the abbots, and other prelates of the Roman-Catholic Church. It consists of a ring or coronet, from which arise, in front and back, two tall, tongue-shaped flaps, referring to the "cloven-tongues" of the first Pentecost. It seems to have originated in Rome; but no certain mention of it is found before the ninth century: in the fourteenth it was generally used throughout the West. It is always made of costly materials, embroidered, and often studded with precious stones.

MIXED MARRIAGES. See MARRIAGE.

MIXED MULTITUDE, the happy expression in the Authorized Version for the riff-raff who followed the Israelites out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 38), and, later, the returning exiles from Babylon (Neh. xiii. 3). They may have been, in some cases, allied to true Israelite families.

MIZ'PAH, or MIZ'PEH (watch-tower), was the name of several places in Palestine.—I. The Mizpeh of Gilead (Judg. xi. 29), probably identical with Ramath-mizpeh (Josh. xiii. 26) and Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings iv. 13), is generally identified with the modern Jebel Osh'a, "Mount of Hosea," three miles north-west of Ramoth-gilead. Here Jacob and Laban set up a heap of stones as a landmark between them (Gen. xxxi. 23, 25, 48, 52), and here Jephthah was met by his daughter (Judg. xi. 31).—II. The Mizpah of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 26) is generally identified with the modern Nely Samwil, situated on a peak three thousand and six feet above the level of the sea, and affording one of the most extensive views to be obtained in Southern Palestine. Here Saul was elected king (1 Sam. x. 17–21), and here Gedaliah was murdered (2 Kings xxv. 23, 25).

MO'AB, the land of the Moabites, was situated along the eastern shore of the Dead Sea and the lower course of the Jordan. Rising more than three thousand feet above the level of the sea and the river, it is mountainous throughout, but well watered and fertile. Not only cattle were raised there in olden times (2 Kings iii. 4), but also corn and fruit and wine were produced; and in times of scarcity the Israelites looked to Moab for supply (Ruth i. 1, 2; comp. Jer. xlviii. 7 sqq., where the richness of Moab is spoken of). In Isa. xv. 1-6 several cities are mentioned, — Heshbon, Medeba, Dibon, Ar of Moab on the Arnon (at one time the capital of the country), Rabbath-Moab, Kir-Moab, Lubith, and Zoar.

Both with respect to descent and with respect to language, the Moabites were closely related to the Israelites on the one side, and the Edomites on the other. Chemosh was the name of their national god (1 Kings xi. 7, 33; 2 Kings xxiii. 13), whence they were often called "the people of Chemosh" (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 46). He was worshipped with human sacrifices (Amos ii. 1), especially with sacrifices of children (2 Kings iii. 27). Besides him, also Baal-peor was worshipped in the time of Moses (Num. xxv. 3, 5; Deut. iv. 3; comp. Hos. ix. 10; Ps. cvi. 28); but it is uncertain whether he gave his name to the mountain Peor, or whether he assumed his surname from that mountain as the principal seat of his worship. The rites of his worship were extremely licentious. It is probable, however, as Jerome states in his Commentary on Isa. xv. 2, that Chemosh and Baal-peor were, like Baal and Molech, simply two different conceptions of the same divinity. However that may be, the Moabitic worship belonged to the lowest stage of the Chaldean-Canaanitic religion. Chemosh is designated as an abomination (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13). The people themselves were addicted to the basest sensuality. Of the valor and warlike fortitude of the Edomites, there is not the least trace among them.

The Emim, the original inhabitants of the country, were subjugated by Chedorlaomer in the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 5); and as, after that time, they seem to have been gradually dying out, the Moabites may not have experienced any great difficulties when settling in the country. It proved more difficult for them to maintain themselves there. In the territory north of the Arnon, the best part of the country, they were subdued by the Amorites under Sihon (Num. xxi. 28); and, after the arrival of Israel on the stage, they underwent the same fate in the territory south of the Arnon (Num. xxxii. 3f sqq.). It is impossible, however, to define the character and the degree of the dependency in which they lived. They had their own kings. They were among Saul's enemies. By David they were punished with great severity (2 Sam. viii. 2). The Psalmist says, "Moab is my wash-pot" (Ps. lx. 8, cviii. 9). When the separation into two kingdoms took place, Moab followed Israel, and King Mesha paid a tribute of a hundred thousand lambs and as many rams (2 Kings iii. 4). For the revolt against Nebuchadnezzar the Moabites were very zealous; but, when he approached to take revenge, they joined him, and could look on in peace while Jerusalem was besieged and taken. After that time, nothing more is heard of them. From Ez. ix. 1 and Neh. xiii. 1, it is even not certain that they existed any more; and when Josephus (Arch., XIII. 15, 4, and I. 11, 5) speaks of Heshbon as a Moabitic city, and of the Moabites as a great nation, he does so simply on account of the descent of the population of the Moabite territory. The country belonged to the empire of the Nabateans until 105 A.D., when it was conquered by the Romans, and the name of its capital, Rabbath-Moab, was changed into Areopolis. In the fifth century, a bishop of Areopolis is mentioned. At the time of Abulfeda, the name of Kerak, or Karrak, occurs for the southern part of Moab, and that of Belca for the northern. At present, all the old cities are in ruins, the country is much depopulated, and the inhabitants have become somewhat brutalized. The whole region was explored by Seetzen, 1806, Burekhardt, 1812, De Sauley (Voyage autour de la mer morte), 1853, Tristram (Land of Moab), 1873, and Conder (Heth and Moab), 1885.

One of the very few remnants of Moabite civilization which have come down to us, and without comparison the most interesting one, is the so-called "Moabite stone," a slab of black basalt 3 feet and 8½ inches high, 2 feet and 3½ inches wide, and 1 foot and 1.78 inches thick, covered with an inscription of thirty-four lines in Hebrew-Phœnician characters. It was discovered in 1868 by Mr. Klein, of the British Missionary Society, near the walls of the old Dibon. The stone is now in the Museum of the Louvre in Paris.

[The inscription has been read by Dr. Ginsburg, M. Gannean, and Professor Schlottmann. The latter's translation is as follows:—

"I Mesa, son of Chamos-nadab, the king of Moab [son of] Yabni. My father ruled over Moab [. . . years], and I ruled after my father. And I made this high place of sacrifice to Chamos in Korcha, a high place of deliverance, for he saved me from all [who fought against Moab].

"Omri, king of Israel, allied himself with all his [Moab's] haters, and they oppressed Moab [many days]; then Chamos was irritated [against him and against] his land, and let it go over [into the hand of his haters], and they oppressed Moab very sore.

"In my days spoke Ch[amos], I will therefore look upon him and his house, and Israel shall perish in eternal ruin. And Omri took possession of the town of Medeba, and sat therein [and they oppressed Moab, he and] his son, forty years. [Then] Chamos looked upon Moab in my days.

"And I built Baal Meon, and made therein walls and mounds. And I went to take the town of Kirjathaim, and the men of Gad [lived] in the district [of Kirjathaim] from days of their grandfathers, and the king of Israel built Kirjathaim. And I fought against the town and took it, and I strangled all the people that were in the city [as a sacrifice] to Chamos, the god of Moab."

(Here follows a lacuna: at the end of it the words, "before the face of Chamos in Kirjathaim." Probably stood here, just as in lines 17, 18 of the stone, a notice of the change of an Israelitish to a Moabite sanctuary.)

"And I destroyed the High Place of Jehovah, and dedicated it before the face of Chamos in Kirjathaim. And I allowed to dwell therein the men of . . . and the men of . . .

"And Chamos said to me, 'Go up. Take [the town of] Nebo against Israel . . . and I went up during the night, and fought against it from the dawn to midday, and I took it . . . and I saw it quite . . .'

(In the rest of this part, more than two lines, there are, besides isolated letters only legible through the gaps, the names of God separated from each other.) to Astar Chamos . . . Jehovah . . . before the face of Chamos."

(It may safely be presumed that mention was made here of the restoration of heathen in the room of the Israelitish worship.)

"And the king of Israel built Jahaz, and sat therein, while he fought against me, and Chamos drove him before my sight. And I took from Moab two hundred men, fully told. And I beleaguered Jahaz and took it, in addition to Dibon.

"I built Korcha, the wall toward the forest, and the wall . . . and I built her gates, and I built her towers, and I built the king's house; and I made store-places for the mountain water in the midst of the town. And there were no cisterns within the town, in Korcha, and I said to all the people, 'Make [you] every man a cistern in his house.'"

(Here follows a sentence with difficult expressions at the beginning, and a gap in the middle. The following is conjectural):—

"And I hung up the prohibition for Korcha [against association with the] people of Israel.

"I built Aroer, and I made the streets in Arnon. I built Beth Bamoth for [it was destroyed]. I built Bezer, for men of Dibon compelled it, fifty of them, for all Dibon was subject; and I filled [with inhabitants] Bikran which I added to the land. And I built . . . the temple of Diblathaim, and the temple of Baal Meon, and brought thither Ch[amos]."

(After a hiatus are the words):—

" . . . the land . . . And Horonaim . . . dwelt therein." . . .

(Probably there followed the name of an Edomite parent tribe or clan. Then again, after a gap):—

"Chamos said to me, 'Come. Fight against Horonaim and' [take it]."

The last gap comprises more than two lines, of which only a few letters can be read.]

This inscription, if genuine, is the oldest Semitic inscription existing. Besides the Moabite stone, some Moabite pottery has been found. It is mostly in the museum of Berlin; but its genuineness is still more doubtful than that of the stone, as the manufacture of antiquities has become quite a flourishing industry of late in many Asiatic cities.

MODALISM denotes the doctrine, first set forth by Sabellius, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit were not three distinct personalities, but only three different modes of manifestation. See CHRISTOLOGY, MONARCHIANISM, SABELLIANISM, TRINITY.

MODERATES, the name given to a party in the Established Kirk of Scotland during the eighteenth century, because of its laxity in doctrine. Their principal members were Hugh Blair and Principal Robertson. In general they preached morals rather than doctrines. Opposition to them resulted in the formation of the Secession and Relief synods, and the final resultant is the Free Church. See SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF.

MODERATOR, the presiding officer of Presbyterian courts (session, presbytery, synod, general assembly). To moderate a call is to preside over the election of a minister. Perpetual moderators for presbyteries were proposed at the introduction of episcopacy into Scotland. For list of moderators in the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, see Minutes of General Assembly, yearly issue.

MOFFAT, Mary (Smith), the heroic wife of the famous missionary, Rev. Dr. Moffat; b. at New Windsor, near Manchester, Eng., May 24, 1795; d. July 10, 1871. She was educated at the Moravian school at Fairfield, near her home, and had her thoughts in early life turned towards the foreign field. She became betrothed to Mr. Moffat ere the latter left for South Africa (October, 1816), and in 1819 followed him thither, and was married to him in Cape Town; and in January, 1820, the couple started upon their joint missionary work, which was pursued for fifty years with extraordinary fidelity and zeal. Their daughter Mary married Dr. David Livingstone. Besides her, they had eight children, of whom two died in infancy. Mrs. Moffat was a woman of rare character. See JOHN S. MOFFAT: Lives of Robert and Mary Moffat, London and N.Y., 1885.

MOGILAS, Peter, b. towards the close of the sixteenth century; d. 1647; descended from the princely family of Moldavia, and began his career in the army, but entered, in 1625, the Pechersky monastery in Kieff, and was elected its archimandrite in 1628, and metropolitan of Kieff in 1632. He drew up the orthodox confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Eastern Church, which, having been revised by the synods of Kieff (1611) and Jassy (1643), was signed by the four Eastern patriarchs, and sanctioned for the whole Eastern Church by the synod of Jerusalem (1672). The language of the first draft, whether Greek or Russian, is uncertain. The Greek text of the Confession, which is a peculiar medley, showing the transition from Old to New Greek, was first published by Panagiotta, interpreter at the Porte, Amsterdam, 1662; the Russian, by the patriarch Adrian, Moscow, 1696. [See Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, i. 58.] The work itself was the result of the commotion which the Reformation produced even in the Eastern Church; and is directed at once against the Roman-Catholic Church, laboring in St. Petersburg through the Jesuits, and the Protestant churches, which found a channel for their influence through Cyril Lucar. Mogilas also published a catechism and a Russian chronicle, and founded a Russian academy at Kieff.

MOHAMMED, MOHAMMEDANISM. I. LIFE OF MOHAMMED.—Mohammed, or Mohammad (i.e., the praised, the illustrious), often misspelled Mahomet, was b. about 570 at Mecca: d. June 8, 632, at Medina, and was buried on the spot where he died, which is now enclosed by a mosque. He was the only child of a poor widow, his father, Abdallah, having died before (according to others, a few months after) his birth. He belonged to the heathen family of the Hāshim, which claimed lineal descent from Ishmael, and was related to the Korashites, the hereditary guardians of the sacred Kaaba. He was nursed by a Bedouin woman of the desert, and suffered much of headache and feverish convulsions. In his sixth year he lost his mother, and was taken care of by his uncle, Abu Tālib, who had two wives and ten children. He accompanied him on a commercial journey through the desert. Palestine, and Syria. He made a scanty living as an attendant on caravans, and by watching sheep and goats. He said, God never calls a prophet who has not been a shepherd before, and appealed to the examples of Moses and David. In his twenty-fifth year he married a rich widow, Chadijah, fifteen years older than himself. He took charge of her caravans, made several journeys, and was faithful to her. She bore him six children, but they all died except Fâtima. He also adopted Ali, who became famous in the history of Islâm. On his commercial journeys he became acquainted with Jews and Christians, and acquired an imperfect knowledge of their traditions. He spent much time in retirement, fasting, and prayer. He was subject to epileptic fits, in which he fell on the ground like a drunken man, and snorted like a camel. He could not read; and his knowledge of the Bible history was derived from hearsay and apocryphal sources, but entered largely into his religion.

In his fortieth year (A.D. 610) he received a call from the angel Gabriel in the wild solitude of Mount Hirâ, a few miles from Mecca. At first he was frightened, and tempted to commit suicide; but his wife predicted that he would be the prophet of Arabia. The angel appeared to him again in a vision, saying, "I am Gabriel, and thou art Mohammed, the prophet of God. Fear not." Now began his public career as a reformer. The revelations of Gabriel, now like the sound of a bell, now like the voice of a man, continued from time to time for more than twenty years, and are deposited in the Koran. For three years Mohammed labored with his family and friends, and made about forty converts. His wife was the first, then his father-in-law Abu Bakr, the young energetic Omar, his daughter Fâtima, his adopted son Ali, and his slave Zayd. Then he publicly announced his mission as prophet, preached to the pilgrims, attacked idolatry, reasoned with opponents, and, in answer to their demand for miracles, pointed to the Koran "leaf by leaf." He provoked commotion and persecution, and was forced to flee for his life with his followers to Medina, July 15, 622.

This flight is called the He'gira, or Hidshra. It marks the beginning of the Mohammedan era and of his marvellous success. He was recognized at Medina as a prophet of Allah. With the increasing army of his followers, he took the field against his enemies, conquered several Jewish and Christian tribes, entered Mecca in triumph (630), demolished the idols of the Kaaba, became master of Arabia, and made it resound with the shout, "There is but one God, and Mohammed is his prophet." In the tenth year of the He'gira he made his last pilgrimage to Mecca, at the head of forty thousand Moslems. Soon after his return, he died of a violent fever, in the arms of his favorite wife Ayesha, in the sixty-third year of his age. He suffered great pain, cried and wailed, but held fast to his faith. Among his last words were, "The Lord destroy the Jews and Christians! Let his anger be kindled against those who turn the tombs of their prophets into places of worship! Let Islâm alone reign in Arabia! Gabriel, come close to me! Lord, grant me pardon! eternity in paradise! Pardon!"

II. CHARACTER OF MOHAMMED. — It is written in the Koran. If restored to chronological order, it shows a gradual change of tone. In the earliest Suras, the wild rhapsodic poetry prevails; in the next, the missionary and narrative element; in the later, he commands as legislator and warrior. This suggests a change in the character of this remarkable man, who ranks with Confucius and Sakya Muni as a lawgiver of nations. He began as a poor and ignorant camel-driver, and ended as the poet, prophet, and king of Arabia, and the founder of a religion which at one time threatened to conquer the civilized world. He was for a long time abhorred in the Christian Church as a wicked impostor, as the Antichrist, as the false prophet of the Apocalypse, as the first-born of Satan. But modern historians give him credit for sincerity in his first period. He started as a religious reformer, fired by the great idea of the unity of the Godhead, and filled with horror of idolatry. He believed himself to be called of God, and endeavored to unite the Jewish and Christian elements into one ruling religion of Arabia on a monotheistic basis. The way was prepared for him by the Hanifs, i.e., converts, or puritans, a sect of inquirers who were dissatisfied with idolatry, and inclined to monotheism as the religion of Abraham. Some of them, especially Waraka (a cousin of Chadijah), were acquainted with the Bible. Mohammed consolidated and energized this reform-movement. At first he suffered much persecution, which would have discouraged any ordinary man. In his Meccan period he revealed no impure and selfish motives. He used only moral means: he preached, and warned the people against the sin of idolatry. He was faithful to his one wife. But his great success in Medina spoiled him. He degenerated, like Solomon. He became the slave of ambition and sensual passion. He first preached tolerance, but afterwards used the sword for the propagation of his religion. He watched in cold blood the massacre of six hundred Jews in one day, and commanded the extermination of all idolaters in Arabia, unless they submitted in four months. After the death of Chadijah, he married gradually fourteen or fifteen wives, and left at his death nine widows, besides slave-concubines. He claimed special revelations for exceptional liberty of sexual indulgence and the marriage of relatives forbidden to ordinary Moslems. In his fifty-third year he married Ayesha, a girl of nine. He maintained, however, the simplicity of a Bedouin sheik to the end. He lived with his wives in lowly cottages, was temperate in meat and drink, milked his goats, mended his sandals and clothes, and aided his wives in cooking and sewing. He was of medium size, broad-shouldered, with black eyes and hair, a long nose, a patriarchal beard, and a commanding look. He had no learning, but a fervid imagination, poetic genius, and religious enthusiasm. He was liable to fantastic hallucinations, and alternations of high excitement and deep depression. His nervous temperament and epilepsy help to explain his revelations, whether pretended or real. Judged in his relation to heathen idolatry before and around him, he was a reformer, and filled his followers with the grand idea of an almighty, omnipresent, righteous maker and ruler of the world. Judged in his relation to Christianity, he was an enemy of the true religion and a scourge of the Eastern Church.

III. THE MOHAMMEDAN RELIGION, so called after its founder, or ISLĀM, so called after its chief duty and virtue (resignation to Allah), is one of the three monotheistic creeds which sprung from the Semitic race. It is an eclectic system, composed of Jewish, heathen, and Christian elements, which were scattered through Arabia before Mohammed. It borrowed monotheism and many rites and ceremonies from the Jews, and may be called a bastard Judaism, descended from Ishmael and Esau. It was professedly a restoration of the faith of Abraham. In relation to Christianity it may be called the great Unitarian heresy of the East. Christ is acknowledged as the greatest prophet next to Mohammed, conceived by the Virgin Mary, at the appearance of Gabriel, under a palm-tree, but only a man. God has no wife, and therefore no son. The doctrine of the Trinity is misunderstood (the Virgin Mary, as the mother of God, being regarded as one of the three), and denounced as idolatry and blasphemy. Jesus predicted the coming of Mohammed, when he promised the Paraclete. He will return to judgment. The Christian elements in the Koran are borrowed from apocryphal and heretical sources, not from the canonical Gospels. With these corrupt Jewish and Christian traditions are mixed, in a moderated form, the heathen elements of sensuality, polygamy, slavery, and the use of violence in the spread of religion. Mohammed also retained the superstitious veneration of the famous black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca, which fell down from paradise with Adam, and is devoutly kissed by the Moslem pilgrims on each of their seven circuits around the mosque.

The fundamental article of Islām is, "There is no God but Allah, and Mohammed is his prophet." It has six articles of faith, — God, predestination (fatalism), the angels (good and bad), the books (chiefly the Koran), the prophets, the resurrection and judgment, with eternal reward and punishment. Absolute submission to the sovereign will of Allah is the first duty of a Moslem (derived from Islām), and his strongest motive in action and suffering. Prayer, fasting, almsgiving, and pilgrimages are enjoined. Pork and wine are strictly forbidden, and Mohammedanism is in this respect a vast abstinence society. Slavery, polygamy, and concubinage are allowed. Ordinary Moslems are restricted to four wives: pachas, caliphs, and sultans, may fill their harems to the extent of their wishes and means. Woman, in Mohammedan countries, is always veiled, and mostly ignorant, and slavishly dependent. In nothing is the superiority of Christianity more striking than in the superior condition of woman and home life. Believers are promised a sensual paradise, with blooming gardens, fresh fountains, and an abundance of beautiful virgins. Infidels, and those who refuse to fight for their faith, will be cast into one of the seven hells beneath the lowest earth and seas of darkness. The sword is the most effective missionary. Infidels (including Jews and Christians) must be slain, or reduced to slavery, and forced to pay tribute. The worship is very simple, like that of the Jewish synagogue. It consists chiefly of reading the Koran, and prayer at stated hours, which are strictly observed, with the face turned to Mecca, at the call of the muëddin (crier) from the minaret. All images are forbidden, and image-worship abhorred as a species of idolatry. There are no priests and no sacrifices. God forgives sins directly as a sovereign act of mercy. Circumcision is observed. Friday is substituted for the Jewish sabbath. The mosques are always open, and frequented by worshippers with covered head and bare feet. Women are seldom seen, and are not required to pray by the Koran. Mecca is the holy city, the Jerusalem of the Moslems. Dervishes (Dancing and Howling) perform once a week extraordinary feats of frantic worship by dancing and howling to the praise of Allah until they are utterly exhausted.

IV. THE KORAN. — This is the Mohammedan Bible, the supreme rule in all matters of religion, and even in law and philosophy. It claims to be given by divine inspiration of Gabriel. Mohammed dictated it "leaf by leaf," as occasion demanded. A year after his death, Zayd, his chief amanuensis, collected the scattered fragments "from palm-leaves, and tablets of white stone, and from the breasts of men," but without regard to chronological order. It consists of 114 suras (chapters or revelations), and 6,225 verses, and is composed in imperfect metre and rhyme, somewhat resembling Hebrew poetry. It is held in the greatest veneration, and too sacred to be translated or printed, or sold like a common book, although in India these scruples have recently been overcome. The finest manuscript copies are found in the mosques, in the Khedive's library at Cairo, and in the National Library of Paris. The material is derived from Talmudic and heretical Christian traditions, and from the poetic imagination and religious enthusiasm of Mohammed. It contains injunctions, warnings, exhortations, and is interspersed with narratives of the fall of Adam and Eve, Noah and the deluge, Abraham and Lot, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, Hagar and Ishmael, Moses and Joseph, John the Baptist, Jesus, and the Virgin Mary (strangely confounded with Miriam, the sister of Moses). It abounds in historical and chronological blunders, and tedious repetitions, but has also passages of great poetic beauty, and is considered the model of pure Arabic. " 't sometimes crawls in the dust, and is sometimes lost in the clouds" (Gibbon). "The style is severe, terrible, and at times truly sublime" (Goethe). Carlyle calls it "the confused ferment of a great, rude human soul, rude, untutored, that cannot even read, but fervent, earnest, struggling vehemently to utter itself; yet a wearisome, confused jumble, with endless iterations." The Koran is the most powerful rival of the Bible, but infinitely below it in purity, interest, and value. The one is of the earth, earthly: the other is from heaven, heavenly. The Koran is sectional: the Bible is universal.

V. HISTORY. — Mohammedanism conquered Arabia during the lifetime of its founder, and spread, after his death, with extraordinary rapidity by fanaticism and the sword. The caliphs (Mohammed's successors as prophet-kings) fired the courage of the wild sons of the desert, used to every privation and endurance, with the battle-cry, "Before you is paradise; behind you are death and hell." The weakness of the Byzantine Empire, the unfortunate rivalry between the Greek and Latin churches, and the distractions of the Greek Church by idle metaphysical disputes, greatly aided the conquerors. They subdued Palestine, Syria, Egypt, North Africa, the south of Spain, and crossed even the Pyrenees, threatening to stable their horses in St. Peter's at Rome, but were defeated by Charles Martel at Tours (732). This battle arrested their western conquests, and saved Europe. But in the ninth century they conquered Persia, Afghanistan, and a large part of India. In the eleventh century the Seljuk Turks conquered the Arabs, but adopted their religion; in the fifteenth century they captured Constantinople, and overthrew the Byzantine Empire (1453). They turned the magnificent Church of St. Sophia into a mosque, and reduced the Greek Church to a condition of slavery. From that stronghold they even threatened the German Empire, until they were finally defeated at the gates of Vienna, and driven back across the Danube (1683). The German diets in the Reformation period were held fully as much against the Turks as against the Lutherans. Luther himself, in one of his most popular hymns, prayed for deliverance from "des Paps's und Türken Mord;" and the Anglican Liturgy, in the collect for Good Friday, invokes God "to have mercy upon all Turks," as well as upon "Jews, infidels, and heretics." The Turks have ruined every country they conquered, and are hated by the subject races, even the Mohammedan Arabs. They are simply encamped in Europe, and ought long since to have been compelled to move their military tents to their native Asia. Under their despotic rule, Christians have no rights: they are simply tolerated, and allowed to fight each other to any extent, but forbidden to convert a Moslem, on the pain of death. After the Crimean war, the death-penalty for apostasy from Islâm was nominally abolished; but the common Moslems are still as fanatical as ever. The fearful massacres in Damascus (1860), in Bulgaria (1877), and in Alexandria (1882), are sufficient proof. The Sultan still holds Constantinople on the bridge of two continents, insulting civilization with his semi-barbarous institutions; yet no more a dreaded conqueror, but a "sick man," kept alive by the policy and jealousy of the Christian powers. Russia would have driven him out of Europe in the Crimean war in 1854, and again in the war of 1878, if it had not been for the interference of Roman-Catholic France and Protestant England, especially the latter, under the rule of Lord Beaconsfield, who had Semitic blood in his veins. By the treaty of Berlin (1878), Bulgaria was made independent, and Herzegovina attached to Austria; while England secured Cyprus by purchase. In a supplementary conference at Berlin, in 1880, the boundaries of Montenegro and Greece were enlarged at the expense of Turkey. Greece had achieved her independence already in 1832, with the aid of England, France, and Russia, which annihilated the Turkish fleet at Navarino, 1827. Egypt is still tributary to the Sultan, but more dependent on England than on Turkey. The defeat of Arabi Pacha by English troops in the short and brilliant campaign of the summer 1882, under Gen. Wolseley, saved the Europeans in Cairo, Damascus, Beirut, and other cities of Turkey, from massacres for which the one in Alexandria gave the signal, and defeated the hopes of a revival of Mohammedan fanaticism. Western civilization, good and bad, is slowly but surely undermining the foundations of Islâm: but it is still a great power, and will die slowly. Its chief training-school is the old University of Cairo, which is said to number at times as many as ten thousand students of the Koran from all parts of the Mohammedan world. Its dominion embraces some of the fairest portions of the globe, as well as a large part of mysterious Africa. The lands of the Bible are still groaning under Mohammedan misgovernment, and are looking to the West for deliverance. Diplomacy and war cannot solve the Eastern question without the moral aid of Christian missions. "The mills of the gods grind slowly, but wonderfully fine." The Mohammedan population is variously set down from a hundred and sixty to two hundred millions; but about one-third of these are under the rule of Christian powers, — Russia, Austria, France, and especially England.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

MÖHLER, Johann Adam, b. at Igersheim, Würtemberg, May 6, 1796; d. at Würzburg, April 12, 1838. He was educated in the lyceum of Ellwangen; studied theology at Tübingen; was ordained priest in 1819; visited, with a stipend from the government, various German universities, not only Roman-Catholic, but also Protestant; and began in 1823 to lecture on church history in the university of Tübingen. A series of essays he wrote at that time in the Tübingen Quartalsschrift, and which after his death were collected and published by Döllinger (Regensburg, 1839-40, 2 vols.), reveals now and then an almost evangelical spirit; and his first larger work, Die Einheit der Kirche oder das Prinzip des Katholicismus (Tübingen, 1825), which attracted general attention among scholars, was not altogether free from giving some offence in Roman-Catholic circles. It was followed, however, next year, with another large work, Athanasius der Grosse und die Kirche seiner Zeit (Mayence, 1827), which proved to be in perfect harmony with the views of the Roman-Catholic Church; and in the same year the author was appointed professor of church history at Tübingen. His lectures drew large audiences, and exercised great influence on the younger generation of Roman-Catholic theologians. They were often frequented, even by Protestants. Nevertheless his Kirchengeschichte (published by P. B. Gams, Regensburg, 1867-70, 3 vols.) is not his chief work. He felt that Roman-Catholic theology was sorely in need of a deeper and more comprehensive understanding of the principles of the Reformation, and of the divergencies between Romanism and Protestantism; and, after an exhaustive study of the symbolical books of the two confessions, he published his Symbolik oder Darstellung der dogmatischen Gegensätze der Katholiken und Protestanten (Mayence, 1832; 5th ed., enlarged and improved by Reithmayer, 1838; 9th ed., 1881 [translated into English by J. R. Robertson: Symbolism, or the Doctrinal Differences between Catholics and Protestants, London, 1813, New York, 1844, 2 vols.]). There is considerable idealization in his representation of Romanism; and his representation of Protestantism is not altogether free from caricature: nevertheless, though represented as a revolutionary movement, breaking up the unity of the Church, the Reformation is conceived of as sprung from a genuinely religious though misguided craving; and the treatment of the details, always moderate and always veracious, is often surprisingly acute. The sensation which the work produced was immense also among the Protestants. F. C. Baur wrote against it, Der Gegensatz des Katholicismus und Protestantismus, Tübingen, 1834; C. J. Nitzsch wrote against it, Eine protestantische Beantwortung der Symbolik Möhlers, 1835; and others. Möhler answered, Neue Untersuchungen der Lehrgegensätze zwischen Katholiken und Protestanten, 1834; and a protracted controversy began. This controversy, especially with his colleague F. C. Baur, made his stay in Tübingen unpleasant, and in 1835 he accepted a call to Munich. The climate of that place did not agree with his constitution, and his health was gradually failing. Shortly before his death, he retired to Würzburg as dean of the chapter. In the Hermetian controversy he took no part, though it was well known that he was not in favor of the movement.

LIT. — His life was written by Reithmayer in the fifth edition of the Symbolik, and by B. Wörner, 1866. See STRAUSS: Kleine Schriften, 1866.

WAGENMANN.

MOLANUS, Gerhardt Walther, b. at Hameln-on-the-Weser, Nov. 1, 1633; d. at Loccum, Sept. 7, 1722. He studied theology at Helmstädt, and was appointed professor in the university of Rinteln in 1659, director of the consistory in Hanover in 1674, and abbot of Loccum in 1677. He was a pupil of Calixtus, and contributed much to soothe down the hatred which prevailed in Germany between the Lutherans and the Reformed. He was very active in aiding the Reformed who were exiled from France by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; but the negotiations which he, together with Leibnitz, carried on with the king of Prussia, concerning a union between the two evangelical churches, failed. Equally fruitless were his negotiations, first with Spinola, and afterwards with Bossuet, concerning a reconciliation with the Church of Rome. It was rumored that he had turned Roman Catholic, and he had to defend himself publicly. His life was written by Von Einem, Magdeburg, 1734. See HERRIG: Geschichte der kirchl. Unionsversuche, 1828, ii., pp. 214 et seqq.

HENKE.

MOLANUS Jan (ver Meulen), b. at Lille, 1533; d. at Louvain, 1585; was professor of theology, canon at St. Peter's, and director of the theological seminary of Louvain. He published De picturis et imaginibus sacris, Louvain, 1570, often reprinted, 1771 at Liège, under the title De historia sacrarum imaginum et picturarum: De fide hæreticis servanda, Cologne, 1584; Theologie practice compendium, 1585; etc. He also published a good edition of Usuard's Martyrologium, Louvain, 1568.

MO'LECH, or MO'LOCH (מֹלֶךְ only once without the article, 1 Kings xi. 7), a divinity worshipped by the idolatrous Israelites. The name undoubtedly designated, like the appellative melch (king), dominion.

1. Moloch in the Old Testament. — With the exception of two passages in Leviticus, and 1 Kings xi. 7, the worship of Molech does not occur before the time of Ahaz. This king offered his son to the fire (2 Kings xvi. 3); and, although Molech is not expressly mentioned, he is undoubtedly referred to (comp. 2 Chron. xxviii. 3). Mention is also made of the offering of one of Manasseh's sons (2 Kings xxi. 6). At the time of Jeremiah, the worship of Molech, who is expressly referred to by name, must have been quite prevalent (Jer. xxxii. 35), and it seems to have con-ruined under Josiah (Zeph. i. 5). It seems, likewise, to have prevailed in Ephraim (2 Kings xvii. 17; Ezek. xxiii. 37). Josiah abolished this form of idolatry in Jerusalem (2 Kings xxiii. 10), and it does not seem to have been practised again by the Jews.

It is not stated from what people the Israelites drew this form of worship. It might seem probable that they got it from the Assyrians (compare 2 Kings xvi. 10 sqq.), inasmuch as they came for the first time in contact with the Assyrians under Ahaz. The Assyrians used the term "malik" as a divine epithet, and nothing more can be said. It is more probable that Molech was a Canaanitish divinity, who was worshipped by the Israelites before the reign of Ahaz (compare 2 Kings xvii. 17); this is proved by the fact that the Phœnicians worshipped a god called Melek (or Malk, Melk, etc.). Another Canaanitish people, the Ammonites, also worshipped a divinity called Mileom (1 Kings xi. 5, 33; 2 Kings xxiii. 13), or Malcham (Zeph. i. 5), whose worship was introduced by Solomon into Jerusalem (1 Kings xi. 5).

The worship of Molech among the Jews consisted of the sacrifice of children (2 Kings xvii. 17, xxiii. 10; Jer. vii. 31, etc.); and the usual expression describing the sacrifice was to "pass through the fire." This does not mean the passage of living persons, but, rather, the offering of the victims after they had been put to death, which is, in several cases, expressly referred to (Ezek. xvi. 20 sq., xxiii. 39). The place of these sacrifices at Jerusalem was Tophet (probably "place of abomination"), in the valley of Ben-Hinnom (2 Kings xxiii. 10, etc.). The term "Gehenna," the designation of the lower world, was at a later time derived from this horrible place of worship.

2. Malk and Melcharth among the Phœnicians. — The Phœnician name of Molech does not appear as the proper name of a divinity, but simply as an epithet. It occurs in names of men, as Malkyathon ("Malk has given"); but this is no proof that Malk was a special divinity, any more than the compound "Hannibal" proves that there was a god Baal. It is more probable that Malk, like Adon and Baal, was an epithet applied to the highest divinity. At Tyre, the derivative Melcharth (Μελκάρθος), meaning "king of the city," was a special divinity, and came to be designated there and at Carthage by the term "Malk," or "Milk." On the inscriptions, Melcharth is called "the Baal of Tyre." Ahab's Baal was, without doubt, this god of Tyre; and the Molech worship of the later kings was only a resumption of that which Ahab introduced, with the addition of human sacrifices. But it may be that the absence of all reference to such sacrifices under Ahab is simply accidental. According to Josephus, there was at Tyre a temple of Zeus, and one of Heracles. Heracles is another designation for Melcharth. (See the inscription, Melit., l., and Philo Byblius, Μελκάρθος ὁ καὶ Ηρακλῆς). Carthage, a Tyrian colony, also had a divinity, Chronos-Saturn, to whom children were offered in sacrifice.

The usual distinction current since Movers, between Baal and Molech as the benevolent and destructive divinities, cannot be made out. The Phœnician religion nowhere institutes a dualism of this kind, but only a dualism of gender. In Melcharth the benevolent element was not altogether wanting, as is apparent from the proper name Gadmelcharth ("fortune of Melcharth"), Malkyathon ("Malk has given"), etc.

Melcharth (or Molech) was the sun-god, as is evident from the festival of his resurrection, and the designation of Carthage's main divinity as Baal Chamman, ("Baal of the sun"). Nonnus Dionys., xl. 370 sqq. calls Heracles of Tyre Helios ("the sun"). Melcharth was represented by some of the ancients with the figure of a bull and horns. The representation in the collection of rabbinical writings (thirteenth century), that the statue of Molech was of brass, with outstretched and burning arms, into which children were thrown, is of doubtful value. Clitarch speaks of living human sacrifices offered to Chronos, which were burned. They were offered, in time of danger or calamity, as the most precious gifts men could make. Sometimes large numbers were offered at once by the Carthaginians, as, on one occasion, two hundred children of the best families (Agathocles).

MOLINA, Luis, b. at Cuenza in New Castile, 1535; d. in Madrid, Oct. 12, 1600. He early entered the Society of Jesus; became a pupil of Petrus Fonseca, the Lusitanian Aristotle; taught theology for twenty years at Evora, and was finally appointed professor of morals in Madrid. His De justitia et jure (1593–1609, 6 vols.), his Commentary on the Summa of Thomas Aquinas (1592), etc., obtained for him a great reputation; but his most celebrated work is his Liberi arbitrii cum gratia donis, divina præscentia, providentia, prædestinatione, et reprobatione concordia, Lisbon, 1588, often reprinted. It is in the form of a commentary on some passages of the Summa of Thomas, an attempt at reconciling the prevailing Semi-Pelagian views with Augustine. But the reconciliation is a mere illusion: under the cover of the bland and subtle words, the conflict continues raging. The book was accepted with ostentatious praise by the Jesuits, but fiercely attacked by the Dominicans; and a long and curious controversy ensued. (See the article, Congregatio de auxiliis gratiæ, and the literature there given). FELT.

MOLINOS, Miguel de, b. at Saragossa, Dec. 21, 1610; d. in the dungeons of the Inquisition in Rome, Dec. 28, 1697. He belonged to a distinguished Aragonese family; was educated for the church, and ordained priest, and settled in 1669 or 1670 in Rome, where his excellent education, the amiability of his character, and his peculiar spiritual tendency, soon brought him into intimate connection with the Pope, the cardinals, and the highest society. In 1676, shortly before his great patron, Cardinal Odeschalchi, ascended the papal throne, under the name of Innocent XI., he published, against his own will as it is said, but at the instance of the Provincial of the Franciscans, Giovanni di Santa Maria, his Guida spirituale, to which, shortly after, was added the Breve trattato della quotidiana comunione. It made an immense sensation. Originally written in Spanish, it was immediately translated into Italian and French, in 1687 also into Latin by Francke [and in 1699 into English anonymously, even without publisher's imprint]. It forms the basis for the so-called "Quietism," and corresponds closely with other phenomena of the age. What Jansenism was in France, and Pietism in Germany, and Quakerism in England, Quietism was in Spain. But it was in many respects a more extreme and consequently a more dangerous movement. Its dying away from the external world in order to serve God internally, by meditation and contemplation alone, led, or might easily lead, to a frivolous enthusiasm, and neglect of morals. No wonder, therefore, that, while it fascinated some, it provoked others. The Jesuits smelt an affinity to the Reformation in it. They understood, that, if such an indifference to the externals of religion became general, the power of the church was broken, and their own occupation gone. They immediately prepared for attack. Paolo Segneri, a member of their order, and a fanatical ascetic and penitence-preacher, published his Concordia tra la fatica e la quiete (Bologna, 1681); and the effect was, that the Inquisition appointed a committee to examine the book of Molinos. But such was as yet the position of Molinos in Roman society, that the examination resulted in an unqualified acquittal. Polemics were then replaced by intrigue. Père la Chaise induced Louis XV. to urge the Pope to interfere. Rumors of people who abstained from confession, of monks and nuns who threw aside, not only rosaries and images, but even relics, etc., were eagerly circulated as evidences of the pernicious influence of Quietism. The Pope gave the case over to the Inquisition; and the Inquisition had the audacity to ask, not the Pope Innocent XI., but the man Benedict Odeschalchi, several embarrassing questions concerning his own personal relation to the affair. In the course of 1685 Molinos was arrested, and all his papers (about twenty thousand letters) were confiscated; and Aug. 28, 1687, the Inquisition publicly condemned his doctrines. The stake he escaped. He recanted, it is said; and the sentence of death was commuted into imprisonment for life. On Nov. 20, 1687, Innocent XI. issued a bull against him. Very severe measures were taken against his adherents.

LIT. — The sixty-eight propositions, on which the verdict of the Inquisition is based, are found as an appendix to FRANCKE'S Latin translation of Guida spirituale. MOLL, Willem, b. at Dort, Feb. 23, 1812; d. in Amsterdam, Aug. 16, 1879. He studied theology at Leyden, and was appointed pastor of De Vuursehe, in the province of Utrecht, 1837, pastor of Arnheim, 1844, and professor of theology in Amsterdam, 1846. Church history was his domain, more especially the history of the Dutch Church before the Reformation; and his Kerkgeschiedenis van Nederland voor de Hervorming (Utrecht, 1864-71, 6 vols.) is a work of the highest merit. He also wrote Geschiedenis van het kerkelijke leven der Christenen gedurende de zes eerste eeuwen, Amsterdam, 1844-46, 2 vols., and a number of minor treatises. He founded the society, which, from 1856 to 1863, published the Kalender voor de Protestanten in Nederland. MOLLER, or MÖLLER, generally called Heinrich von Zütphen, b. 1468, in the county of Zütphen, in the Netherlands; burnt at the stake at Heide, in Holstein, Dec. 11, 1524. In 1484 he entered the order of the Augustines; studied philosophy and theology with great zeal, and visited, in 1515, the university of Wittenberg, where he became intimately acquainted with Luther. In 1516 he was made prior of the Augustine Convent of Dort; but as the first reformatory steps of Luther caused a great commotion throughout the whole Augustine order, and Moller seemed likely to become the centre of that movement in the Netherlands, he was compelled to flee from the country in order to escape from the Inquisition, 1520. He first settled in Bremen, where he was elected preacher at the Church of St. Ansgar, and in a short time introduced the Reformation. But in 1524 he removed to Meldorf, the principal town of the Ditmarsh, on the invitation of Nicholas Boje, the regular pastor of the place; and in the beginning his preaching was received there with much applause. Soon, however, the peasants of the Ditmarsh, who formed a peculiar, half-independent republic in the midst of the dominions of the king of Denmark, became so incensed against him, stirred up by the monks and the Roman-Catholic priests, that one night they broke into his house, carried him to Heide, placed him before the civil council, condemned him as a heretic, and burnt him. MOLOKANI, The, a Russian sect, living, for the most part, in the province of Samara and the adjoining Kirghis Steppe. They condemn image-worship as idolatrous, reject the episcopacy, hold Scripture as the only rule of faith and conduct, have no paid clergy, but only a presbyter chosen by the congregation, and no churches, but hold their meetings of worship in private houses. They have no creed, and their theology is said to be in a vague and unfinished state; but the religious life in the congregation is pure and vigorous, and the discipline exercised in the congregation by its own members is very severe. Concerning their origin and history very little is known. They are mentioned for the first time in an official report to Catharine II. From time to time they have been persecuted, but in the last half-century all persecutions have ceased. See WALLACE: Russia, New York, 1878, p. 295.

MOMIERS (i.e., hypocrites), or MUMMERS, the contemptuous name given to strict Calvinists in the French cantons of Switzerland. The reason was their fervent acceptance of the well-nigh forgotten doctrines of the divinity of Christ, and of man's total depravity. Their leaders were César Malan and Robert Haldane. (See those arts.)

MONARCHIANISM. Down to the end of the second century, not only the Logos doctrine, but also the conception of Christ as the Son of God, pre-existing before the creation of the world, was the exclusive possession of a few theologians. Though it was generally recognized that there should be spoken of Christ, ὡς περὶ θεοῦ ('in the same manner as of God,' II. Clem. ad Cor., 1.), hardly any one, with the exception of the philosophically trained apologists, was thereby led to speculate on the idea of God. All that was developed and defined concerning the personality of the Redeemer during the period between 140 and 180 was based upon the short formula of Matt. xxviii. 19. The acknowledgment of the supernatural conception of Jesus, by which his pre-existence was vaguely but indubitably presupposed, was considered sufficient to distinguish the true Christian from the strict Jewish-Christians and those who in Christ admired only a second Socrates; while, on the other hand, the acknowledgment of a real birth by a woman, and a real human life in accordance with the prefigurations of the prophets, formed a bar against Gnosticism.

During this state of incipency, a multitude of various christological views began to germinate, co-existing, at least for a time, peacefully side by side. In spite of their multitudinousness, however, they may all be reduced to two formulas, — either Christ was considered a man in whom the Deity, or the Spirit of God, had dwelt; or he was considered the Divine Spirit, who himself had assumed flesh, and appeared in the world. For both formulas, Scripture might be quoted. Proofs of the former were taken from the synoptical Gospels; of the latter, from a series of apostolical writings which also claimed absolute authority. Nevertheless, there existed a radical difference between them; and though, for a long time, that difference may have been visible to the theological reflection only, without touching the religious instinct, there came a time when it could not fail to attract the attention even of the masses.

In the contest which then arose, the latter formula had one decided advantage: it combined more easily with those cosmological and theological propositions which were borrowed from the religious philosophy of the time, and applied as foundation for a rational Christian theology. He who was conversant with the idea of a divine Logos as the explanation of the origin of the world, and the motive power in the history of mankind, found in that very idea an easy means by which to define the divine dignity and Sonship of the Redeemer. There seemed to be no danger to monotheism in this expedient; for was not the infinite substance behind the created world capable of developing into various subjects without exhausting itself, and splitting? Nor did the idea itself — the idea of an incarnate Logos — seem insufficient to explain the Godhead of Christ. On the contrary, the more energetically it was handled, the more fertile it proved, able to correspond to any depth of religious feeling and to any height of religious speculation. Nevertheless, in spite of this great advantage, as long as the idea of a divine Logos had not reached beyond such definitions as "the fundamental type of the universe," "the rational system of the laws of nature," etc., the second formula could not help rousing a certain suspicion among those who in the Saviour wanted to see the Godhead itself, and nothing less.

It was, however, not an anxiety with respect to the divine dignity of Christ, which, in the second century, called forth the first direct opposition to the Logos-christology: it was an anxiety with respect to monotheism. For was it not open ditheism, when worship was claimed for two divine beings? Not only uneducated laymen were forced to think so, but also those theologians who knew nothing of the Platonic and Stoic philosophy, and would hear nothing of its applicability in Christian dogmatics. How the controversy began, and who made the first attack, is not known; but the contest lasted for more than a hundred and fifty years, and presents some aspects of the highest interest. It denotes the victory of Plato over Zeno and Aristotle in Christian science; it denotes the substitution, in Christian dogmatics, of the pre-existent Christ for the historical, of the ideal Christ for the living, of the mystery of personality for the real person; it denotes the first successful attempt at subjecting the religious faith of the laity to the authority of a theological formula unintelligible to them.

The party which was defeated in the contest, the representatives of that severe monotheism in the ancient Church which retained the office of the Redeemer in the character of Christ, but clung with obstinate tenacity to the numerical unity in the personality of the Deity, are generally called "Monarchians," — a term brought into circulation by Tertullian, but not perfectly adequate. In order to fully appreciate the position which this party occupies in the history of Christian dogmatics, it must be remembered that it originated within the pale of Catholicism itself, and had a common basis with its very adversaries. In its deviations from what has afterwards been defined as true Catholicism, it is pre-catholic, not a-catholic. Thus, for instance, with respect to the canon of the New Testament. The deviations of several Monarchian groups on this point are simply due to the circumstance that the true canon of the New Testament had not yet been established. Nor should it be overlooked, that, with the exception of a few fragments, the writings of the Monarchians have perished. The party is known only through the representations of its adversaries. The history of Monarchianism is consequently very obscure: indeed, it cannot be written with any continuity. Only the various groups can be pointed out and described. Even the old and generally accepted division into dynamic and modalistic Monarchianism cannot be carried through without straining the texts on which it is based.

I. THE ALOGIANS.—The first opponents to the Logos-christology, the so-called "Alogians" in Asia Minor, were undisputed members of the Church, and were treated as such by Hippolytus and Irenæus. It was only by comparing their tenets with a later development of Catholicism, that Epiphanius found out they were heretics: it was also he who gave them their name. The starting-point of their opposition was the Montanist prophecy, which they rejected. They rejected, indeed, all prophecy as a still existing charisma; but in doing so they were only more catholic than the Church itself. Their disbelief, however, in an age of the Paraclete, led them into a criticism of the writings of St. John; and the result was, that they rejected both his Gospel and the Apocalypse, probably, also, his Epistles. The Gospel, they ascribed to Cerinthus: the Apocalypse, they ridiculed. But, rejecting the Gospel of St. John, they also rejected the doctrine of the Logos; and thus they came into conflict with the new christological issue. Hippolytus, however, who knew them only from their writings, and Irenæus, treated them with much circumspection: they regretted their opinions, and warned against the inferences which might be drawn from their tenets; but they did not condemn them.

LIT.—The principal sources are EPIPHANIUS (Her., 51) and PHILASTRIUS (Her., 60), both of whom have derived their information from the Syntagma of HIPPOLYTUS. On Epiphanius depend Augustine, Isidore, Paulinus, Honorius, and John of Damascus. See also MERKEL: Aufklärung der Streitigkeiten der Aloger, 1782; HEINICHEN: De Alogis, 1829; and the respective chapters in SCHWEGLER: Montanismus, VOLKMAR: Hippolytus; DÖLLINGER: Hippolytus und Kallistus; LIRSUS: *Quellenkritik d. II. THEODOTUS THE LEATHER-DEALER, HIS PARTY IN ROME (Asclepiadotus, Hermophilus, Apollonides, Theodotus the Money-Broker, Natalius), AND THE ARTEMONITES.—Towards the close of the episcopate of Eleutherus, or in the beginning of that of Victor, about 190, Theodotus, a leather-dealer from Byzantium, came to Rome, and began to expound his christological views, which he probably had developed under the influence of the Alogians of Asia Minor. Orthodox in other points, he taught, with respect to the personality of Christ, that Jesus was not a heavenly being, which had assumed flesh in the womb of the Virgin, but a human being, which had been borne by a virgin, in accordance with a special providence and under the concurrence of the Holy Spirit; that, having proved himself worthy by a pious life, he had received in the baptism the Holy Spirit, and thereby the powers (δυνάμεις) necessary to fill his office, etc. Theodotus was thus a representative of the dynamic Monarchianism, which held that the divinity of Christ was only a power communicated to him. It is not known how many adherents he found in Rome, but the number was probably small. Nevertheless, he was excommunicated by Victor between 189 and 199.

Under Victor's successor, however, Zephyrinus (199–218) his pupil, Theodotus the money-broker, probably also a Greek, attempted, in connection with Asclepiadotus, to form an independent congregation, and found an independent church, in Rome. A certain Natalius, a native of Rome, and a confessor, was, for a monthly salary of a hundred and seventy dinari, induced to become the bishop of the new church; but he was afterwards, by visions of "holy angels," who whipped him while he was sleeping, forced back into the bosom of the great Church. Twenty or thirty years later on, a new attempt at reviving the old Monarchian christology was made by Artemas; but he seems not to have identified himself with the Theodotians. Very little is known of him, however. He was still living about 270, as proven by the decision of the synod of Antioch against Paulus of Samosata.

Generally speaking, the dynamic Monarchians of Rome present the same realistic character as their brethren, the Alogians of Asia Minor. They studied Aristotle and Theophrastus, Euclid and Galen; but they neglected Plato and Zeno. They substituted the grammatico-historical method for the allegorical in the interpretation of Scripture; and, as foundation for their Bible study, they employed a very sharp text-criticism. With respect to the canon they were perfectly orthodox. They accepted the writings of St. John, which, however, simply means that the canon of the New Testament in which those writings were contained had now been firmly and finally established. But they remained an army of officers, without any rank and file. For their text-criticism, their grammar, their historical researches, the mass had no sense. Their church in Rome waned away, leaving behind no traces of itself; and it took about seventy years before the school of Antioch was strong enough to throw the dogmatics of the church into one of the most violent crises it ever has had to go through.

LIT.—The principal sources are the Syntagma of HIPPOLYTUS, represented by EPIPHANIUS (54), PHILASTRIUS (50), and PSEUDO-TERTULLIAN (28); his Philosophumena (vii. 35, x. 23); his fragment against Noëtus (c. 3); and, most important of all, the so-called Little Labyrinth, an excerpt preserved by EUSEBIUS (Hist. Eccl., V. 28), dating back to the fourth decade of the third century, and by many ascribed to Hippolytus. See also KAPP: Hist. Artemonis, 1737, and the literature given at the end of the first division.

III. PAULUS OF SAMOSATA.—By the Alexandrian theology of the third century, the dogmatical use of such ideas as λόγος, ὄνσια, πρόσωπον, etc., was not only made legitimate, but indispensable; and, at the same time, the view of the essential nature of the Saviour, as being not human, but divine, became more and more prevalent. Though Ebionitic elements were still found in the intricate christology of Origen, they were present only in a latent and ineffective state; and though he himself taught a Godhead in Christ, to which it was not allowed to address prayers, he directly attacked all those teachers who attempted to establish such a difference between the personality of the Son and that of the Father as seemed likely to destroy the essential Godhead of the former. A few years, however, after his death, Paulus of Samosata, bishop of Antioch, that is, occupant of the most illustrious episcopal chair of the Orient, undertook once more to emphasize the old view of the human personality of the Saviour, in opposition to the prevailing doctrine. The next occasion of the controversy is not known; but it is worth noticing, that, at that time, Antioch did not belong to the Roman Empire, but to Palmyra. Paulus was vicegerent of the realm of Zenobia. To reach such a man was no easy task. Through a common provincial synod, over which he presided himself, it could not be done. But, during the Novatian controversy, the experiment of a general Oriental council had been successfully tried, and it was now repeated. The two first councils, however, failed to accomplish the condemnation of Paulus: at the third, probably in 268, he was excommunicated, and Domnus chosen his successor. But, by the support of Zenobia, he continued in possession of his see until 272. In that year, Antioch was reconquered by Aurelian. An appeal was made to the emperor; and he decided that the church-building should be surrendered to those who maintained communication with the bishops of Italy and of the city of Rome. The deposition, however, and removal of Paulus, did not at once destroy his influence. On the contrary, under the three following bishops of Antioch, Lucian stood at the head of the rising Antiochian school of theology, and he taught in the spirit of Paulus. Yea, in the persons of the great Antiochian Fathers, Paulus may, indeed, be said to have been condemned a second time; and how long the dynamic Monarchianism lived on in Asia Minor may be seen from the christology of the author of the Acta Archelai.

The christology of Paulus is characterized by the total absence of all metaphysical speculation, instead of which he employs only the historical research and the ethical reflection. Essentially it is simply a development of the christology of Hermas and Theodotus, only modified in its form by accommodation to the prevailing terminology. The unity of the personality of God is most severely vindicated. Father, Son, and Spirit are the one God; and, when a Logos or Sophia can be distinguished in God, they are only qualities or attributes. From eternity, God has brought forth the Logos in such a way that the latter may justly be called his Son; but that Son remains, nevertheless, an impersonal power, and can never become a concrete manifestation. In the prophets, the Logos was active; also in Moses, and in many others, more especially in the son of David, born by the Virgin. But Mary did not bear the Logos: she bore only a man, who in the baptism was anointed with the Logos.

LIT.—The principal sources are the acts of the Antiochian synod of 268; that is, the report of the disputation between Paulus and the presbyter Malchian, and the final decision of the synod. In the sixth century those documents were still extant in extenso; but only fragments of them have come down to us, in EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., VII. 27–30; JUSTINIAN: Tract. e. Monophysit., Contestatio ad Clerum C. P.; the acts of the Council of Ephesus; LEONTIUS BYZANTINUS: Adv. Nestor et Eutych., etc.—all gathered together by Routh, in Rel. Sacr., iii. Important are also the testimonies of the great Fathers of the fourth century,—Athanasius, Hilary, Ephraem, Gregory of Nyssa, Basil, etc. See FEUERLIN: De heresi P. S., 1741; EHRlich: De erroribus P. S., 1715; SCHWAB: Diss. de P. S., 1839.

IV. THE MODALISTIC MONARCHIANS IN ROME AND CARTHAGE (Noëtus, Epigonus, Kleomenes, Praxas, Victorinus, Zephyrinus, Kallistus).—In the period between 180 and 240, the most dangerous opponents to the Logos-christology were not the dynamic, but the modalistic Monarchians, known in the West as Monarchiani or Patripassiani; in the East, as Sabelliani: though the name Patripassiani was used there too. They taught that Christ was God himself incarnate, the Father who had assumed flesh, a mere modus of the Godhead: hence their name. Tertullian, Origen, Novatian, and Hippolytus wrote against them.

Like the dynamic Monarchians, the modalistic arose in Asia Minor; and thence they brought the controversy to Rome, where, for a whole generation; their doctrines formed the official teachings of the Church. Noëtus was the first of this group of Monarchians who attracted attention. He was a native of Smyrna, taught there, or in Ephesus, and was excommunicated about 230. Epigonus, a pupil of his, came to Rome in the times of Zephyrinus, about 200, and founded there a Patripassian party. At the head of that party stood, afterwards, Kleomenes, and then, after 215, Sabellius. The latter was vehemently attacked by Hippolytus, but had the sympathy of the great majority of the Christians in Rome: even among the clergy Hippolytus was in the minority. Bishop Zephyrinus tried to temporize, in order to prevent a schism from taking place; and his successor, Kallistus, or Callixtus (217–222), adopted the same policy. But the controversy grew so hot, that the Pope was compelled to interfere. Kallistus chose to excommunicate both Sabellius and Hippolytus, and draw up a formula of reconciliation, as the expression of the views of the true Catholic Church; and, indeed, the formula of Callixtus became the bridge across which the Roman congregation was led towards the hypostasis-christology.

It is a curious circumstance, that Tertullian, in his polemics against the Monarchians, never mentions the names of Noëtus, Epigonus, Kleomenes, and Kallistus; while, on the other hand, the name of Praxas, against whom he chiefly directs his attack, does not occur in the numerous writings of Hippolytus. The explanation seems to be, that, when the controversy was at its highest in Rome, Praxas had been forgotten there, while Tertullian might still find it proper to start from him, because he had been the first to bring the controversy to Carthage. Praxas was a confessor from Asia Minor. In Rome he met with no resistance; but when, in Carthage, he began to expound his Patripassian views, in opposition to the Logos-christology, he was by Tertullian compelled, not only to keep silent, but even to retract. A representation of the individual system of Praxas cannot be given, on account of the scarcity of the sources. It is, nevertheless, evident that a development had taken place from the Noëtians to those Monarchians against whom Hippolytus and Tertullian wrote. The Noëtians said, "If Christ is God, he must certainly be the Father; for, if he is not the Father, he is not God." And this very same passionate vindication of pure monotheism is also found among the later Monarchians. But when the Noëtians went further, and declared, that, if Christ had suffered, the Father had suffered, because Christ was the Father, the later Monarchians avoided this Patripassian proposition by recognizing a difference of subjectivity between the Father and the Son.

V. SABELLIANISM AND THE LATER MONARCHIANISM.—During the period between Hippolytus and Athanasius, Monarchianism certainly developed several different forms; but this whole various development was, by the writers of the fourth and fifth centuries, comprehended under the one term, "Sabellianism." The consequence is, that it would be very difficult to point out in details the propositions which actually made up the individual system of Sabellius. He was probably a Libyan by birth, and stood, even in the time of Zephyrinus, at the head of the Monarchian party in Rome. By Kallistus he was excommunicated, but the excommunication produced only a schism. His party was too strong to be at once suppressed; it lived on in Rome until the fourth century. Of the latter part of his personal life nothing is known. It seems that he was still living in Rome when Hippolytus wrote his Philosophumena. A dim but characteristic reflex falls on him—or, rather, on the Monarchians in Rome—from the works of Origen. The latter came to Rome in the time of Zephyrinus, and sided, as was natural, with Hippolytus. But that circumstance had, no doubt, something to do with his condemnation by Pontianus in 231 or 232; and the hints which he himself throws out, about bishops who can make no difference between the Father and the Son, are, no doubt, aimed at the bishops of Rome. It was, however, in another direction, Origen had to encounter the Monarchians. In Bostra in Arabia, Bishop Beryllus openly taught Monarchianism. His brother-bishops of the province remonstrated with him, but in vain. Then Origen was invited, in 244, to hold a public disputation with him in Bostra, and he succeeded in converting him. Unfortunately, the acts of that synod have perished.

The principal tenet of Sabellius says, that the Father is the same as the Son, and the Son the same as the Spirit: there are three names, but only one being. That being he often designates as υιοπάτωρ,—an expression which he had no doubt chosen in order to prevent any misunderstanding with respect to the strict monotheism of the system. Nevertheless, Sabellius taught that God was not Father and Son at the same time; that he had been active under three successive forms of energy (προσώπα),—as the Father, from the creation of the world; as the Son, from the incarnation in Christ; and as the Spirit, from the day of the ascension. How far Sabellius was able to keep those three forms of energy distinct from each other cannot be ascertained. It is probable that he could not help ascribing a continuous energy (in nature) to God as the Father, even while the energy was active as the Son or as the Spirit. However that may be, the doctrine of three successive forms of energy was at all events a step towards that formula, the Athanasian ὁμοουσία, which finally made Monarchianism superfluous, and founded Trinitarianism.

MONASTERY and MONASTICISM. Monasteries, as the establishment of monasticism in the form of a social institution, or, in the plain sense of the word, as the abode of a community of monks, arose very early, and developed rapidly into one of the most prominent features of Christian life. The later history of the development is tolerably clear in all its movements, but the origins are rather obscure.

I. ORIGIN OF MONASTICISM.—According to a tradition based upon the statements of Jerome and Rufinus, and generally accepted, monasticism arose among the Christian ascetics in the third century. Now, we know the Christian ascetics of the second and third centuries very well,—their fastings and their abstinence from marriage (Athenagoras: Προβεία, 28; Tertullian: De cultu fem., i. 9; Origen: Contra Celsum, vii. 48), their self-sacrificing care for all sick and destitute during the persecution of Diocletian (Eusebius: De mart. Palest., 10, 11). But we know, also, that they lived in the world in close connection with the congregation; and when, towards the close of the third century, they attempted to select domicilia singularia, and insulate themselves from the congregation, the attempt produced much astonishment and dissatisfaction, as may be seen from the De singularitate clericorum 31, ascribed to Cyprian. Consequently, from the Christian asceticism pure and simple, monasticism has not directly developed; nor are there any traces of its existence in the third century.

Paulus of Thebes, "the first hermit," is said to have retired to a hidden grotto in the Lower Thebais, about the middle of the third century, and to have lived there for half a century, unknown to the world. Jerome wrote his life; but Jerome's book is simply an imitation of those novels so fashionable in Rome at his time,—an echo of Apuleius, a kind of religious Robinson Crusoe, well spiced with piquant devotion. To claim historical existence for the hero of that book is entirely out of the question; but it might be surmised that some such character, an anchorite from principle, might have existed at that time. Bishop Narcissus of Jerusalem, for instance, has been mentioned. But he left his congregation, simply because he felt indignant at some infamous calumny; and, when he returned, he was admired, not for his philosophy, or for the long seclusion he had endured, but for the miraculous punishment which had overtaken his calumniators (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., VI. 9). Those have been mentioned, who, according to a letter from Dionysius of Alexandria to Fabian of Antioch (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., VI. 42), fled into the desert in order to save their life during the persecution of Decius. But Dionysius speaks only of such as actually saved their life, and returned, and of such as perished under the attempt, but of none who remained in the desert as anchorites. Still more decisive, of course, it would be for the whole question of the origin of monasticism, if the existence could be proved, not of some single anchorite, but of whole monastic associations, during the third century. The Hierakites and the Therapeutæ have been mentioned; but the former have not the character of monks, and the latter not the character of Christians. The Hierakites were simply the pupils or adherents of Hierakas; and the words of Epiphanius (Hær. 67) do by no means warrant a representation of them as a formally instituted union of ascetics. The Therapeutæ are spoken of only in the book περὶ βίου θεωρητικῶν. They never existed. They are evidently a mere fiction. But the question is, whether that fiction mirrors some other real existence in the Christian world, — a question which no doubt must be answered with “no.” When the book on every occasion argues from an alleged equality of all men as a law of nature, and describes the existing inequality (as, for instance, that between master and slave) as the true cause of all evil, it flatly contradicts one of the fundamental ideas of the Christian Church of the first three centuries; and, when it describes the sacred rites of the Therapeutæ, it often becomes half absurd and half offensive from a Christian point of view. The book, which probably was written shortly after the time of Philo, originated among the agitations of which the Judæo-Hellenic world at that time suffered, and has no reference to Christianity. See KEIM: Urchristenthum, 1878; LUCIUS: Die Therapeuten, 1879.

Descending from the third to the fourth century, in order to discover the first traces of Christian monasticism, the two first great authorities which must be consulted are Eusebius of Cæsarea and the Life of St. Anthony (Vita Antonii). Eusebius finished his Church History in 324; but neither in that work, nor in his Life of Constantine, and Eulogy of Constantine, written between 337 and 340, is the subject ever mentioned. In his Demonstratio evangelica, l. 8, he makes a distinction between a higher and lower form of Christian life; and the former is generally considered as referring to monasticism. But the distinction is simply that one between “knowledge” and “faith” which formed one of the fundamental doctrines of the Alexandrian school. Eusebius knew nothing of a Christian monasticism, because there was as yet nothing to be known of it; and it was, indeed, not until after his death, after the middle of the fourth century, that a rumor of the Egyptian anchorites began to spread into Asia Minor, — as seen from the writings of Gregory Nazianzen and Basil of Cæsarea, — while at the same time they entered into communication with Athanasius. The report that the latter, on his flight to Rome in 340, was accompanied by Egyptian monks, is a mere fiction. With respect to the Vita Antonii, first written in Greek, then translated into Latin by Euagrius, and very early incorporated with the works of Athanasius (in its Greek form), and ascribed to him, two questions present themselves: first, Is its history? next, Was it written by Athanasius? but both must be answered in the negative. Between the plain frame-work of the book, the biography of Anthony and its theoretical part, the speeches and conversations with which it is adorned, the discrepancies are irreconcilable. The Coptic monk who understood no Greek, and the Greek philosopher who quotes Plato and Origen, the coarse recluse who never washed himself, and the delicate saint who blushes when anybody sees him eating, will not harmonize in one character. The hero is a psychological impossibility. And when to this circumstance is added the absolute silence of Eusebius about the whole affair, the historical character of the book must be given up. Nor is the authorship of Athanasius better established; though it has been warmly defended by Bellarmin, Natalis Alexander, the Benedictines, Hase, and others. The wild and fantastic confusion of the book, when compared with the crystalline clearness and sublime mental repose of the author, such as he is known from his other works, produces an open self-contradiction. The whole doctrinal system of Athanasius would have to be modified in order to assimilate the demonology of the Vita Antonii. The relation between the monks and the clergy is represented very differently in the Life of St. Anthony and in the indubitably genuine works of Athanasius. In the former the monks profess the sincerest devotion to the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and place themselves on a lower and humbler stage than the clergy; while from the latter we learn that the monks often were in opposition to the hierarchy, and generally looked down upon the clergy. Under such circumstances, the external evidences of the authorship of Athanasius must be perfectly irreproachable in order to be decisive; but they are not. In his Eulogy of Athanasius (380), Gregory Nazianzen directly ascribes the book to him; but in the very same year he happened, in his Eulogy of Cyprian of Carthage, to confound that great Christian Father with the heathen sorcerer, Cyprian of Antioch. In literary questions, Gregory Nazianzen is no great authority. Jerome also ascribes the book to Athanasius, but only in his later works: when he first mentions it, he does not seem to know the author. Now, of course, it is not the idea to deny the existence of St. Anthony altogether, but only to deny the historicalness of the representation given in the Vita Antonii. Indeed, the only legitimate inference which can be drawn from that book is, that monasticism originated in Upper Egypt, towards the middle of the fourth century, but nothing more. What else is told of monasticism and monasteries in the time of Constantine is later fiction.

Singularly enough, the genuine works of Athanasius give no information at all about the origin of monasticism; and when, after his second exile, in 316, he entered into closer communication with the Egyptian monks, his Historia Arianorum ad Monachos shows that monasticism had already spread through the whole country. Some information is found in the works of Rufinus and Palladius, both of whom had lived for some time among the second generation of Egyptian monks; but neither the one nor the other is reliable, when speaking of what he pretends to have seen with his own eyes, and heard with his own ears; and the unreliability increases, of course, when investigation and research become necessary to the treatment of a subject. It is impossible, however, to pass from Eusebius and Athanasius to the Vita Antonii and the monks of Jerome, without being struck by the difference. It is an entirely new and strange world which opens up to the reader; an entirely new and strange ideal of Christian life which is held forth to him; and when an attempt has been made to explain that ideal as a direct development of the asceticism which already existed in the primitive Christian Church, caused by such extraordinary circumstances as the persecutions of Decius and Diocletian, the attempt has been utterly baffled by the decisive circumstance, that not one of the numerous hermit lives from the fourth or fifth century can be put in any historically possible connection with the persecutions. Hence, already Mosheim was prepared to seek for the origin of Christian monasticism outside of Christianity, in Neoplatonism. Now, we learn from Porphyry, and his extracts from Chairemon, that in the Egyptian temples, and wholly secluded from the people, there lived a kind of ascetics, who slept on palm-leaves, ate no meat, drank no wine, never laughed, etc. Furthermore, Philostratus tells us, that Apollonius of Tyana visited the Egyptian wise men in the mountains of the Upper Nile, where they lived naked, and always on the point of starvation. Finally, the recent decipherment of the Greek papyrus-rolls in the libraries of London, Paris, Leyden, and the Vatican, presents us with a full picture of those ascetics, or penitents, or monks, who belonged to the worship of Serapis. (See Letronne: Matériaux pour l'histoire du christianisme en Egypte, 1832; and Brunet de Presle: Mémoire sur le Sérapéum de Memphis, in the Mémoires de l'académie des inscriptions, i. ser. tom. ii., 1852, and Notices et Extraits des Manuscrits, etc., 1865.) Next to the worship of Isis, that of Serapis occupied the most prominent place in the Egyptian religion. We know of no less than forty-two Serapis temples in Egypt, of which the most celebrated seem to have been those of Heliopolis and Alexandria. In the Serapis temples there lived, completely secluded from the world, whole congregations of monks. After giving away their property to the poor, they retired to the temple, where they lived upon the bread which their relatives brought to them. The purpose of this renunciation was wholly ethical, — the purification of the soul; and, as the whole form of the asceticism of the Serapis monks corresponded peculiarly well with the sombre character of the Egyptian worship of the dead and the graves, they were much revered by the Egyptian people: indeed, like the bulls of Apis, they were considered as incarnations of the deity. No wonder, then, that, when Christianity became the popular religion of Egypt, that peculiar form of Egyptian religious life, but one in which a deep popular instinct had found its adequate expression, silently glided into the Christian Church. Just as the Christian stylite saints of the fifth century were a mere imitation of the stylite saints of the Syrian Astarte, so the Christian monks of the fourth century were a simple imitation of the Egyptian monks of Serapis. It might be difficult to point out any thing specifically Egyptian in the original Christian monasticism; but it would be equally difficult to point out any thing specifically Christian in the phenomenon. The highest moral ideal of original Christian monasticism was complete dying away from the world of the senses, complete ἀνάθεα. But that ideal has not one single Christian feature in its character, not the least trace of that humble love with which Christianity originally conquered the world, not the slightest connection with the Pauline doctrine of living and dying with Christ; and, when Gregory Nazianzen undertakes to praise the Christian monasticism at the expense of the asceticism of the Greek philosophy, he can, indeed, make none other distinction between them, theoretically or practically, than a quantitative one: there were a thousand monks, where there was one philosopher. Thus it becomes probable, that, in its origin, Christian monasticism is not a Christian product at all, but a direct development from the previously existing Egyptian monasticism.

That the Christian monasticism in its first form was Coptic, and not Hellenistic, may be inferred from the very names of the first monks: Paphnutius means, in Coptic, "the divine;" Pachomius, "the eagle;" Sauses, "agriculturists;" Renuoth, "peasants," etc. The organization of the anchorites into large communities is generally ascribed to Pachomius, who himself had been a Serapis monk. (See Revillout: Le reclus du Sérapéum in Revue égyptologique, 1880.) The Greek designations of such an institution are, besides λαῖρα (see LAURA), μοναστήριον and κοινόβιον, of which the former refers to the house, the latter to the association (Cassian: Collat. xviii. 18): the Latin are monasterium, cenobium, claustrum, conventus, etc. The organization seems to have been almost military in its regularity and severity. Nevertheless, its success was very great; though, of course, the stories of Rufinus and Palladius, about monastical paradises with ten thousand monks and twenty thousand virgins, are mere fables, utterly incompatible with the actual state of affairs in the country. H. WEINGARTEN.

II. HISTORY OF MONASTICISM. — From Egypt the institution spread to Palestine, Syria, Asia Minor, and, with less success, to Northern Africa. In the Occident, Italy, with Milan and Rome, took the precedence; next followed the islands along the coast of Italy and Dalmatia; then Southern Gaul, with its celebrated monasteries at Turonum, Massilia, Pictavium, etc. An influence similar to that which Basil the Great exercised on Eastern monasticism, Western monasticism received from Monte Casino, founded in 529. From that time the movement pursues a double course, partly following the track of the Christian missionary among the heathen nations, partly endeavoring to keep alive and satisfy certain instincts within the Church itself. Monasteries were founded all along the frontier of Christendom, like fortresses, to defend the conquered territory, or like colonies, to bring fresh soil under cultivation; and monasteries were founded at the very centre of civilization, in the great cities, forming an outlet for the strong impulses of asceticism and penitence. Never completely incorporated with the ecclesiastical organization, nor ever wholly absorbed by the civil organization, the monastery occupied a peculiar intermediate social position, which must never be lost sight of during the study of its history. Its relation, however, to the Church, was the closer and more intimate; and from the Church and her councils it received its constitution. The Council of Chalcedon, 451, decreed that the monastery and its abbot should be under the authority of the parochial bishop, who alone was allowed to perform the acts of confirmation, ordination, and consecration. Without his assent, no prayer-chapel or monastic house could be built; and, without a permit from him, neither the abbot nor the monks could leave the monastery. The vagrant monks should be seized, and shut up in the monasteries; and no one should be allowed to settle down as a hermit, without having gone through a probation-term of two years in a monastery. The abbot was to be elected by the monks; but, as soon as he was elected and confirmed, he bore absolute sway over them. Double monasteries, in which recluses of both sexes lived together, such as had arisen even in the fourth century, were continued; but very strict rules for their management were issued. In the Eastern monasteries, the monks often lived in separate cells constructed around the κοινόβιον: in the Western, all the members were gathered into the same building, the effect of which was a more rigid seclusion.

On approaching the middle ages, all relations of the institution become more intricate. The Church became dependent on the State: even her bishops and synods succumbed to secular influences. Nor did the monasteries escape the danger. They increased in number and reputation, but were, nevertheless, dragged into the vortex of violent changes which characterized the age. They became rich. To the produce of their soil were added magnificent donations. But their very wealth made them a welcome prey to jealousy and avarice. In the sixth and seventh centuries, the bishops began to levy such exorbitant taxes on them for ordination and consecration, that the councils had to step in, and free them from such unjust burdens (Concil. Tolet., X. can. 3). Of course, the relation between episcopacy and monastery developed differently in the different countries. In England and Germany, the conversion to Christianity was effected by the monks; and the whole work of civilizing the people devolved upon the monasteries. The people, consequently, felt great reverence for them; and it held hard for the hierarchy to get the ascendancy over them. In France and Spain, on the contrary, the hierarchy had grown strong before the monks came; and there it took a long time before the monasteries could begin to emancipate themselves. Some monasteries of great fame, such as those of St. Gall, Reichenau, St. Emmerau, etc., entered into open contest with their bishops, but in vain. Nowhere the monasteries obtained real independence: they acquired only a certain measure through exemptions and privileges granted them by the princes or the popes. When a prince was the founder of a monastery, it was only natural that he should place it under his special protection. But, while he might be willing enough to defend it against any encroachments from the side of the bishop, he did, generally, not hesitate to utilize it for his own advantage, appointing some favorite or unruly vassal lay abbot of it, or even abandoning it to be plundered by some troublesome creditor. At what period the intimate connection between the monasteries and the bishops of Rome began, it is difficult to decide. Gregory the Great was their warm friend; but the Privilegium S. Medardi, ascribed to him, is, like many other documents of the same kind, evidently a forgery of the monks. Even the grant of Pope Zacharias to the Monastery of Fulda is very doubtful. The first reliable instance of a pope granting great immunities to a monastery is that of Pope John XV. and the abbeys of Hereford and Corvey; and the first monastery which really became independent of the episcopal authority by placing itself immediately under the Pope was that of Cluny, 1063.

The monastery culminated together with the Papacy. Its development received a most powerful impulse from the foundation of monastic orders. Hitherto each single monastery had been a unit by itself; belonging, it is true, to a certain rule, a certain diocese, etc., but not, therefore, maintaining any kind of connection with any other monastery. Now, the Cluniacenses formed a union, not of monks, but of monasteries; and that arrangement was then adopted by the Cistercians, the Mendicants, etc. Thus arose huge organizations, which stretched their colonies across many countries, without weakening the connection between the members and the centre. The constitutions adopted by these orders were different, — sometimes more aristocratic, sometimes more monarchical. In the Cistercian order the mother-monastery enjoyed the precedence of age. There the chapter-general assembled; thence the visitors were sent forth; but, in the formation of a resolution, all abbots had equal votes. In the mendicant orders, the centre was not placed in the local starting-point, but in the elected general, who resided in Rome, and ruled through provincials and priors. At the same time that this change took place in the organization of the monastic institution, an equally important change took place in its functions. The mendicant orders received the most comprehensive ecclesiastical privileges. They were allowed to hear confession, to say mass, to visit the sick, etc.: the Church was, indeed, near being absorbed by the monastery. The number of ecclesiastical foundations increased immensely. They were found in every large city. They were scattered through all countries. In England alone, a hundred and fifty-six monasteries arose in the period between William I. and John Lackland; and each such monastery was a little world by itself, in which most interests of human life, both temporal and spiritual, were represented. The number of inmates might vary from three hundred to over two thousand; and for this huge population provisions of all kinds had to be at hand. The building should contain rooms for guests, for the sick, for the school, store-rooms, stables, etc. Generally the difference between Byzantine, Roman, and Gothic style, made itself felt also in monastic architecture; though a regard to the wants of the inmates, of course, predominated in the constructions. Partly for the sake of perfect seclusion, but also as a means of defence, the whole structure was surrounded with a wall. On the ground-floor were the refectory, the guest and assembly rooms, the school, library, etc.; on the second floor, the cells. In some old monasteries there were no cells, but only one large dormitory, in the middle of which stood the abbot's bed. As for centuries the monastery was the true home-stead, not only of science, but also of art, artistic ornaments — paintings and carvings — were not wanting. Some monasteries, as, for instance, that of Certosa, near Pavia, and that of St. Marco at Florence, are overloaded with the most exquisite specimens of mediæval art. In those immense beehives, life went on pretty nearly as it does in any other household. Between the canonical hours, the exercises of the school and the labors in the garden or the field followed with unbroken regularity; and variation was not wanting, as guests — often strange ones, often interesting ones — might come in at any moment. Some institutions, as, for instance, that of St. Gall, stood in steady and lively communication with knights, merchants, etc.

In this state of affairs the Reformation produced a great change. In the Protestant countries, the secularization began immediately, and the monasteries soon disappeared. The revenues were used for educational or scientific purposes; and the buildings were turned into hospitals, asylums, barracks, etc., or they were allowed to fall into decay. In the Roman-Catholic countries, the change came more slowly, but not less decisively. Though the Benedictines, the Congregation of St. Maur, the Fathers of the Oratory, distinguished themselves most brilliantly by their scientific researches, the monastery, as a general rule, occupied a very modest place in the Church. The monastical ideal is so utterly incongruous with the ethical ideal of modern times, that it caused no very great sensation, when, in 1789, all monastic orders were dissolved in France, and all monasteries closed. Joseph II. followed the example, though in a less radical manner; and so did Portugal in 1821, and Spain in 1835. Afterwards a re-action took place in favor of the monasteries; but, as the articles on the special orders show, the institution, which has been waning since the Reformation, is now everywhere dying out. MONASTICISM. See MONASTERY.

MONEY AMONG THE HEBREWS. From the earliest time the Hebrews used as money pieces of metal, to which a fixed weight was assigned, so as to make them suitable for the various articles presented in trade (Gen. xxiii. 16; cf. also 2 Kings xii. 4 sq.), and which were recognized as such, either in an unwrought form, or from certain characters inscribed upon them. The representative coinage was the shekel, originally meaning "weight." There were also the half-shekel, the third part and fourth part of the shekel (1 Sam. ix. 8). From Josh. vii. 21, Judg. xvii. 2–4, we may suppose that the shekel was not a weighed mass, but a certain piece of metal, used as a representative of property, and medium of exchange. That larger sums, the correct weight of which was of great importance, were weighed again, is but natural (Gen. xxiii. 16; Exod. xxii. 17; 2 Sam. xviii. 12; 1 Kings xx. 39; Jer. xxxii. 9). The shekel was of silver: hence the word "shekel" is often omitted, and only the metal itself is mentioned (Gen. xx. 16, xxxvii. 28, xlv. 22; Judg. ix. 4, xvi. 5, xvii. 2–4, 10; 2 Sam. xviii. 11, 12; 1 Kings x. 29; 2 Kings vi. 25). It was used in trade; e.g., in buying and selling of real estate (Gen. xxiii. 15, 16; 2 Sam. xxiv. 24; Jer. xxxii. 9), of slaves (Gen. xxxvii. 28; Hos. iii. 2). It was used for paying civic and sacerdotal taxes (1 Kings xv. 19; Neh. v. 15, x. 32; Exod. xxx. 15, xxxviii. 26; 1 Macc. x. 40, 42), as estimation of vows (Lev. xxvii. 3–7; Num. iii. 47), as amount for damages and expiation (Gen. xx. 16; Exod. xxi. 32; Deut. xxii. 19, 29), as reward for services rendered (Judg. ix. 4, xvi. 5, xvii. 10; 2 Sam. xviii. 11, 12; Zech. xi. 12), as lease-money (Song of Sol. viii. 11), and as a present (Gen. xlv. 22). The value of certain articles was expressed by shekels (Lev. v. 15; 2 Kings vi. 25). From the common shekel is distinguished "the shekel of the sanctuary" (Exod. xxx. 24, xxxviii. 24–26; Lev. v. 15, xxvii. 3; Num. iii. 50, vii. 13, 19 sq., 86); its weight was twenty gerahs (Exod. xxx. 13; Lev. xxvii. 25; Num. iii. 47, xviii. 16; Ezek. xlv. 12). The half of the "shekel of the sanctuary" was called bekah (Exod. xxxviii. 26), and was equal in weight to the common shekel. There existed, also, the third part of a shekel (Neh. x. 32) and the fourth part of a shekel (1 Sam. ix. 8). [The value of the (silver) shekel was about fifty-four cents of American money.] For larger sums existed the manah, or pound (as in the Authorized Version, Ez. ii. 69; Neh. viii. 71, 72), which was equal to fifty sacred, or one hundred common, shekels; also talents, or kikkar (1 Kings xvi. 24; 2 Kings v. 5, 22, 23; xv. 19), equal to three thousand shekels. Both the manah and talent were weighed (1 Kings xx. 39, marg; Esth. iii. 9). Another coin was the kesitah (Gen. xxxiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32; Job xlii. 11), the meaning of which is obscure. Bertheau supposes it to be a signification for coins in general, whilst Gesenius values the same at four shekels.

During the exile the Jews undoubtedly made use of the monetary system then current in Babylon; whilst after the exile they availed themselves of Persian coins, as may be seen from Ez. viii. 27, ii. 69, Neh. vii. 70–72, where darichs (rendered "drachms"), a Persian gold coin, is mentioned. [Their value corresponded to about five dollars of American money.] Under the Seleucidæ, Græco-Syrian coins were used by the Jews, till the time (B.C. 143) of Simon the Maccabee, who received of Antiochus VII. (Sidetes), the son of Demetrius Nicanor, the right of coining money

(1 Macc. xv. 6). Of such Maccabæan coins some are still extant, with inscriptions in ancient Hebrew characters. Besides these Asmonean coins, there also existed coins of bronze, made by Herod and his successors, and small coins of bronze of the first Roman emperors, from Augustus to Nero, which are regarded as having been stamped in Judea. Side by side with these genuine Jewish coins, Greek money was continually circulated. Thus, not only in the time of the Maccabees, but also in the time of Jesus, the drachma (about eightpence) was current (Luke xv. 8, 9). Later Jews valued the shekel at four didrachmæ (Joseph., Antt. III. 8, 2): hence the didrachma, or double drachma, was asked as tribute-money, in place of the legal half-shekel (Matt. xvii. 24; Joseph., Wars, VII. 6, 6). Another Greek coin was the stater of gold and silver, equal to a Hebrew shekel, and given as tribute-money for two persons (Matt. xvii. 27). The smallest Greek coin was the lepton, or the mite (Mark xii. 42; Luke xii. 59, xxi. 2). Of Roman coins, the New Testament mentions, (1) the denarius, of about the same weight as the Greek drachm. It bears the head of the Roman emperor, and served as tribute-money (Matt. xxii. 19; Mark xii. 15). Its worth was about eightpence halfpenny. (2) The assarion, or farthing (Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6), a copper coin, the sixteenth part of the denarius; and (3) the quadrans, the quarter of an assarion (Matt. v. 26; Mark xii. 42; Luke xxi. 2).

As to the worth of money among the ancient Hebrews, its standard was very high, judging from the few indications we have. Thus a ram was estimated two shekels of silver (Lev. v. 15), [or about one dollar and nine cents]. A fine Egyptian horse was bought for a hundred and fifty shekels (1 Kings x. 29; 2 Chron. i. 17). Two sparrows were bought at the time of Jesus for one assarion (Matt. x. 29), and five for two assaria (Luke ii. 6). Abraham and Jacob buy an acre of land for four hundred shekels (Gen. xxiii. 15, 16, xxxiii. 19). David purchases Araunah's threshing-floor at fifty shekels (2 Sam. xxiv. 21); and Omri buys the hill Samaria for two talents of silver (1 Kings xvi. 24). A slave was redeemed at thirty shekels (Exod. xxi. 32), which seems to have been the usual price paid for slaves; and thus Judas was paid thirty pieces of silver for the betrayal of Jesus (Matt. xxvi. 15; cf. also Zech. xi. 12). The amount for services rendered was (according to Judg. xvii. 10) ten shekels of silver by the year, and a suit of apparel, and victuals. Tobit pays the servant of his son one drachma daily; and laborers were paid a drachma (denary) a day (penny in E. V., Matt. xx. 2).

MONGOLS, Christianity among the. It is doubtful whether Christianity ever penetrated among the Mongols while they kept confined within the boundaries of their native country, south of the Baikal Sea; but, as soon as they began to push forward to the west, they came in contact with Christian tribes, mostly of the Nestorian confession, occupying the elevated plateaus of Central Asia; and, as they extended their conquests, Armenians, Georgians, Russians, etc., came under their rule. They were tolerant; yea, they showed even an inclination to abandon their own religion (a kind of coarse deism, accompanied with a still coarser spirit-worship), and adopt foreign ones. The Nestorians, however, and the Armenians made no impression upon them; but great expectations with respect to their conversion were aroused when they entered into communication with Western Europe. Europe and the Mongols had a common foe, the caliph of Egypt; and to the eyes of Europe the conversion of the Mongols seemed to be the most effective means of crushing him. In 1245 Innocent IV. sent two embassies to them, and in 1248 St. Louis sent a third one; but nothing seems to have been achieved thereby. Some impression, however, must have been produced by Rubruquis, also sent out by St. Louis. He went in 1253 to Khan Sertak (at that time encamped between the Don and the Wolga), and from him to the Great-Khan Mangy, with whom he staid half a year, and in whose presence a great disputation was held between Christians, Mohammedans, and Buddhists. But practical results were not reached until after the destruction of the caliphate of Bagdad, in 1258, and the establishment of a great Mongolian-Persian empire. Several missionaries were sent by the Pope to the new capital of Sultanieh; and in 1318 Ricoldus de Monte Croce established there a Roman-Catholic archbishopric, with a series of suffragan bishoprics, and with monasteries for Franciscans and Dominicans. But the Roman-Catholic Church made her converts among the Nestorians, Armenians, Jacobites, and other Christian schismatics; while the Mongols were converted by the thousands to Islam. The result was, that the Mohammedan fanaticism very soon could institute persecutions against the Christians, and the Roman-Catholic mission was brought to an end. Some missionary work was also done in the khanates of Kiptshac and Dshayatai, but without any effect. Most successful was the Christian mission among the Mongols in China. Nestorian congregations, numbering about 30,000 souls, existed from old times in the country; and, when the Mongolian dynasty ascended the throne, Roman-Catholic missionaries took up the work. John of Monte Corvino was sent to Peking by Pope Nicholas IV. He preached in the native tongue, converted about 6,000 people, and was in 1307 made archbishop of Peking by Clement V. But he did not succeed in converting the dynasty. The Mongolian princes, like most of their subject countrymen, became Buddhists in China. Finally, in 1370, the Mongolian dynasty was overthrown by the Ming dynasty; and, shortly after, the Roman-Catholic mission was expelled from China. W. HEYD.

MONHEIM, Johannes, b. at Clausen, near Elberfeld, 1509; d. at Düsseldorf, Sept. 9, 1561. He studied at Cologne, and was appointed rector of the school at Essen in 1532, and of that of Düsseldorf in 1545; which latter institution he brought into the most flourishing condition, so that it far surpassed most of the German universities in number of pupils. Originally Monheim belonged to the Erasmusian camp, but gradually he completely adopted the doctrines of the Reformation. His Catechism (1560) is nothing but a condensation or abbreviation of Calvin's Institutiones, and was vehemently attacked by the Cologne Jesuits. They also accused him before the Pope, the emperor, the Council of Trent, etc.; and the great teacher spent the last years of his life under very trying circumstances. C. KRAFFT.

MONICA, or MONNICA, the mother of Augustine; b. about 332; d. at Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber, May 4, 387. Her parents are said to have been Christians. She was married at an early age to Patricius, a Pagan of Tagaste, to whom she bore three children,—Augustine, Navigius, and an unnamed daughter. Her husband was apparently coarse, unsympathetic, choleric, and unfaithful; but such was her beautiful Christian life, that she was the means of his conversion. He was baptized in 371, and shortly thereafter died. Monica shared Patricius' ambition respecting Augustine's career as a scholar, but was deeply grieved when he abandoned the Catholic faith. For many years she followed him with her prayers, and at last made the journey to Milan to be with him. There the one wish of her life was met. Augustine was converted 386, and was baptized by Ambrose, Easter (April 25), 387. Monica shared the society of the little company of friends Augustine had gathered around him immediately before and after his baptism, and added much to the spiritual value of their intercourse. After the purpose of their meeting was accomplished, viz., his conversion and baptism, they set out for Africa. On the way, Monica fell sick, and died. As the mother of the greatest of the Latin church Fathers, and as herself a wise, loving, and Christian woman, she will always be remembered. Many a mother will derive comfort from her life, and faith to believe that the sons of prayer will not perish.

In 1430 her remains were removed by Pope Martin V. from Ostia to Rome, and buried in the Church of St. Augustine. Her most imperishable monument, however, is the Confessions of her illustrious son, who has written of his unfilial conduct with a candor unsurpassed, and who ends his biography of his mother with an outburst of sorrow over her death, and a prayer for her eternal welfare. To be mourned by such a man was praise enough. There is, indeed, as Pressensé says, "no one in the ancient church more worthy of our affectionate veneration" than Monica. See BRAUNE: Monnika u. Augustinus, Grimma, 1846; SCHAFF: Life and Labors of St. Augustine, New York and London, 1854; BUTLER: Lives of the Saints, May 4; Mrs. JAMIESON: Legends.

MONOD, Adolphe, beyond dispute the first pulpit orator of the Protestant Church of France in our century; was b. in Copenhagen, Jan. 21, 1802; d. in Paris, April 6, 1856. He was the fourth of the twelve children of Jean Monod, pastor of the French Church at Copenhagen, and, after 1808, in Paris. The son, after studying at the Collège Bonaparte in Paris, went to Geneva, where he graduated in theology in 1824. But he did not yet fully rest upon the great facts of the gospel. He became conscious of the revelation of divine grace to himself on a journey to Italy in 1825. He became founder, and remained pastor, of the Protestant Church in Naples till 1827. He was then called to Lyons; but his evangelical preaching, and especially a sermon upholding the necessity of a Christian faith and life to partake of the communion, (Qui doit communier?) aroused such opposition, that he was deposed by the Catholic minister of education, before whom he was accused by the consistory. Monod did not forsake Lyons, but began preaching in a hall, then went to a chapel, and labored so effectually, that the results of these labors remain in a large church (served by two pastors) and several chapels. In 1836 he followed a call to a professorship in the theological seminary of Montauban, and continued to labor there for eleven years, spending his vacations preaching to large audiences in the churches of Southern France. At the end of this period, he was called as pastor to Paris, where for nine years he preached to large and eager congregations in the Oratoire.

Adolphe Monod was distinguished for his eloquence, but especially for the purity and piety of his life. He was gifted with a clear intellect, vivid imagination, and a sympathetic nature. His theology was drawn from the Bible, of which he was a constant student, and which he read daily in the original. He was every inch a Christian. From the moment that he was apprehended of Christ, he devoted his whole heart and energies to his service. The purity of his Christian character was transparent. His conscientiousness was sometimes almost painfully exact, and his humility was apparent to all. He was, moreover, a man of prayer, to which he had constant recourse as a remedy against melancholy, to which he was somewhat inclined.

As a preacher, Monod's aim was to save men from destruction. His sermons were essentially biblical, and by the full treatment of the texts, and the earnestness, fervor, unction, and modesty of the preacher, won and persuaded the hearts of his hearers. His style was pure and classic; his voice melodious, full, and clear; so that one would have gone away with only an impression of beauty, had it not been for his earnestness. His first three printed sermons appeared in 1830; and in 1844 a volume appeared, the first sermon of which, entitled La crédulité de l'incrédule, covering sixty-eight pages, is a masterpiece of apologetical sermonizing. Many more of his sermons appeared; but the finest of all were two on the vocation of woman, and five on the apostle Paul. In his last sickness, two volumes of his sermons appeared (1855), and since then two more.

Monod's last days were days of much pain on a sick-bed. He knew his hour was at hand; but brighter shone forth his Christian character, and stronger was the hold his faith took on Christ. Every Sunday afternoon he gathered his friends about him; and, after listening to the reading of Scripture, he uttered short homilies of great power, which were afterwards collected in the volume, Adieux d'Adolphe Monod à ses amis et à l'Église. He passed away on a Sunday. Well has Professor De Félice said, "Adolphe Monod was twice over the first of the Protestant preachers of France in our day,—first for the excellency of his oratorical genius, and then for the holiness of his life. In the midst of the instability of religious life, every one looked to him, as the sailor in the storm, at the lighthouse." L. BONNET.

MONOD, Frédéric, elder brother of Adolphe Monod; a devoted and distinguished pastor in France; was b. May 17, 1794, at Monnaz, Canton de Vaud, Switzerland; d. Dec. 30, 1863, in Paris. He studied theology in Geneva (1815-18), and came under the influence of Robert Haldane. In 1820 he became an associate pastor in Paris, where he edited, with great talent, the Archives du Christianisme. In 1848, when the synod refused to make an explicit affirmation of the faith of the Church, he withdrew from the State Church, resigned his position at Paris, and founded, with Count Gasparin, the Union of the Evangelical Churches of France (l'union des églises évangéliques de France). He made a trip to the United States in 1855, to collect money for a church-building in Paris, and returned to France, having accomplished the object of his mission. During the American civil war he was a staunch friend of the Union cause. He was one of the chief instruments in the religious awakening of France, and left behind him an example worthy of imitation.

MONOGRAM OF CHRIST. See CHRIST, MONOGRAM OF.

MONOPHYSITES, those who held the doctrine that Christ had but one composite nature. The christological statement of the Chalcedonian synod of 451, based upon the famous letter of Pope Leo I., and pursuing an intermediate course between Nestorianism and Eutychianism, was intended to be the last word in the whole controversy. (See Marcian's decrees of Feb. 7 and July 28, in Mansi: Council Coll., viii. 176 and 198.) The adherents of Cyril, however, though very far from willing to accept the views of Eutyches, considered the doctrines of the synod of Chalcedon as Nestorian heresy, and rose everywhere in opposition. In Palestine, the monk Theodosius fanaticized the whole swarm of monks, took possession of Jerusalem, filled the city with murder and robbery, and expelled the bishop, Juvenal. After the lapse of twenty months, Juvenal was restored: but Theodosius fled to the monks of Mount Sinai; and there, out of the grasp of the imperial authority, he continued to work against the Chalcedonian doctrines. In Egypt a large party refused to recognize the deposition of Dioscurus; and the appointment of Proterius as his successor caused an insurrection in Alexandria, during which a number of soldiers were burnt alive by the mob in the former temple of Serapis. Proterius could be maintained only by military force; and when the Emperor Marcian died (457), the party of Dioscurus, which gathered around the presbyter Timotheus Ælurus and the deacon Petrus Mangus, at once revolted, and killed him. Ælurus was chosen bishop; and a synod, which he immediately convened, condemned all his adversaries, also the bishop of Rome, Leo I., and the patriarch of Constantinople, Anatolius. The power which the party displayed on that occasion made an impression even upon the emperor, Leo I.; and he contented himself with simply asking the opinion of the bishops of christendom with respect to the legitimacy of the election of Ælurus. Of course, only such reports have been preserved as go against Ælurus; but, even from these, it is evident that a large portion of the clergy was strongly opposed to the decree of the synod of Chalcedon: thus, the bishops of Pamphylia Secunda declare that the Chalcedonian Confession is, like the Epistle of Pope Leo I., only an individual argument, and by no means a general creed. Ælurus was deposed, but he was allowed to go to Constantinople to defend himself; and his successor, Salophacialis, was a neutral figure, who could give no offence to the Monophysites. In Antioch, the monk Peter Fullo, openly supported by Zeno, the son-in-law of the emperor, opposed the Chalcedonian decree with great vehemence, and finally expelled the bishop, Martyrius. Everywhere in the East the Monophysites were strong; and when Basiliscus ascended the imperial throne in 475, they gained the upper hand. In an encyclical letter of 476 he formally condemned the synod of Chalcedon and the epistle of Leo I. In the very next year, however, Basiliscus was dethroned by Zeno; and Zeno's great object was to compromise matters. In 482 he issued his famous edict, the so-called Henotikon, in which Nestorius and Eutyches were condemned, but without any formal recognition of the Chalcedonian Confession; while, on the contrary, the twelve chapters of Cyril were accepted. For a moment the storm seemed to have been allayed.

It could not, however, long escape the jealous eye of the Roman pope, that, practically, the Henotikon was entirely in favor of the Monophysites. Not only the Chalcedonian Confession, but even the Epistle of Pope Leo I., and thereby the prestige of Rome, were in danger. When Pope Felix III., in 483, sent legates to Constantinople to announce his accession, they carried with them grave admonitions to the Emperor Zeno, and severe reproaches to the Patriarch Acacius. But, before they reached Constantinople, they were seized, deprived of their papers, and frightened into abject compliance with the schemes of Acacius. They even took the sacrament in his church, in company with Petrus Mongus of Alexandria, known as a rank Monophysite. In revenge, Felix III. deposed Acacius, and put him under the ban, and induced a Constantinopolitan monk to pin the bull to his clothes while in the church. Thus it came to an open breach between Rome and Constantinople. In 489 Acacius died; but, as his successors refused to erase his name from the diptychs, no reconciliation could be effected. On the contrary, the hostility became more pronounced, when, in 491, Anastasius succeeded Zeno as emperor. Before his accession to the throne, he had committed himself to the Monophysites; and his partiality to them finally caused riots and bloodshed in Constantinople. In order to appease the orthodox party, the emperor promised to convoke an œcumenical council, which should settle the whole question, and re-establish the community with Rome. But when Anastasius opened negotiations, in 515, with Pope Hormisdas, the Pope demanded, as conditions of his participation in the council, the full recognition of the synod of Chalcedon and the open condemnation of Acacius; and, as the emperor could give only an evasive answer, the negotiations were completely broken up in 517. (See Mansi: Concil. Coll., viii. 324, 389, 524; and Jaffé: Reg. Pontif., 101.) A great change took place, however, when Justin I. ascended the throne, in 518. He was a mere tool in the hands of his nephew, Justinian; and Justinian belonged to the orthodox party. In Constantinople, in Jerusalem, in Tyre, and in many other places in the East, the friends of the synod of Chalcedon once more came to the front. The negotiations with Rome were reopened; and, without great difficulties, the Patriarch Johannes of Constantinople was induced to erase the name of Acacius from the diptychs,—the chief condition of a reconciliation. The Henotikon was not mentioned at all in those negotiations. It was quietly buried; and thus community was re-established between the churches of Rome and Constantinople. Rome had conquered, and she used her victory with energy: she immediately set to work to have orthodoxy re-established in Antioch and Alexandria.

It proved impossible, however, to eradicate Monophysitism. Especially in its home, Egypt, it was too powerful to be subdued: it had to be managed. Such was also the plan of Justinian, who in 527 succeeded Justin on the imperial throne. But, in the mean time, the arrogance of Rome had everywhere called forth a re-action; and at the imperial court the Monophysite party formed once more, under the protection of Theodora, the wife of Justinian. Petrus of Apamea, Zoaras, Anthimus of Trebizond, and other Monophysite leaders, lived in Constantinople; and, by the intrigues of Theodora, Anthimus was even made patriarch after the death of Epiphanius, in 535. For a moment, the wrath of the emperor was once more turned against the Monophysites by the visit of Pope Agapetus to Constantinople: Anthimus was deposed, and Mennas appointed his successor. But Agapetus died in Constantinople, 536; and his successor, Vigilius, placed on the pontifical throne by Theodora, and kept there by Belisarius, was himself a Monophysite. Though he publicly professed submission to the decrees of the synod of Chalcedon, he sent a secret confession of faith to Anthimus and other Monophysites, in which he rejected the doctrine of two natures in Christ, etc. (See Liberatus: Breviarium, 22.) In the last year of his life, the emperor was even induced by Theodora to sanction the extreme Monophysite views of the Aphthartodocetæ; and he was prepared to force those ideas on the Church, when he suddenly died, 555. Justin II. his successor, dropped the matter, and took up a somewhat different attitude in the controversy. In the sixth year of his reign, when the Monophysites had lived for about forty years in and about the capital, unmolested, and even recognized, persecutions were instituted against them. Their churches were closed; their bishops and priests were imprisoned, their monasteries inspected, and the inmates compelled to take the sacrament in the churches of the orthodox. The persecutions were at no period so very severe, but they lasted till the time of the Emperor Mauritius and the Patriarch John Jejunator. Meanwhile, the Monophysite party had itself split into several fractions. The above-mentioned Aphthartodocetæ held that the body of Christ was made incorruptible by its union with his divine nature; while another fraction went still farther, and declared that the body of Christ had not been created, but had existed from eternity. Thus the contest with the Orthodox Church had lost much in interest, and consequently in ardor; and the result was, that the Monophysites gradually and quietly separated from the Orthodox Church,—the State Church,—and formed independent churches,—the Armenian, Jacobite, Coptic, Abyssinian, etc. [For the dogmatical development of the controversy and the pertaining literature, see article on CHRISTOLOGY.] W. MÖLLER.

MONOTHELITES, those who held that Christ had but one will, as he had but one nature. Monothelism was the simple and natural consequence of Monophysitism, and originated from the endeavors which the State Church made, in the seventh century, of conciliating the Monophysites. The Emperor Heraclius (610-641), pressed as he was on the one side by the Persians and on the other by Islam, had a vital political interest in the reconciliation; and in the Constantinopolitan patriarch Sergius, a Syrian by birth, and probably of Jacobite descent, he found an eager ally. The principal objection of the Monophysites to the Chalcedonian Confession it seemed possible to meet, without infringing upon the doctrine of two natures in Christ, by an adroit development of the idea of one divine-human energy in Christ, in which the two natures melted together; and it was with that tool in their hands the emperor and the patriarch set to work. During his stay in Armenia, in 622, Heraclius opened negotiations with Paulus; and, though the latter hesitated, some years later a union between the State Church and the Armenian Church was actually brought about at the synod of Charrum. In 626, during his visit to the Lazians, Heraclius succeeded in gaining Bishop Cyrus of Phasis for the new doctrine and the union; and when, in 628, he returned from a victorious campaign against the Persians, bringing back the true cross to Jerusalem, he entered into communication with the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, Athanasius. The Orthodox patriarch of Antioch, Anastasius II., had died in 609 or 610, and his chair had remained vacant since that time. The emperor now proposed to elevate Anastasius to that see, on the condition of his recognizing the Chalcedonian Confession, such as explained by the new doctrine. Athanasius accepted. Shortly after, in 630 or 631, Cyrus of Phasis was appointed bishop of Alexandria; and in 633 he reported to Constantinople that thousands of Monophysites were by the new doctrine won for the union. In Alexandria, however, the first opposition arose. A monk, Sophronius, a native of Damascus, who had lived for some time in Rome, came to Alexandria, and was much startled by the new doctrine, which he designated as rank Apollinarianism. He immediately repaired to Constantinople; but Sergius and Pope Honorius succeeded in appeasing him for a time. The remarkable letter which the pope on that occasion wrote to Sergius is still extant in a Greek translation (Mansi: Con. Coll., xi. 537), and proves, beyond doubt, that he was a Monothelite; that is, a heretic. Shortly after Sophronius was elected bishop of Jerusalem; and the official announcement of that event he accompanied with a confession, the so-called Synodicon (Mansi: Con. Coll., xi. 461-509), in which he rejected the doctrine of one energy in Christ. In order to prevent any further discussion of the subject, the emperor issued in 638 a kind of encyclical letter drawn up by Sergius, the so-called Ecthesis, in which he proposed to avoid both the expression "one energy" and the expression "two energies;" the former, because it might lead to a fatal rejection of the doctrine of a double nature in Christ; the latter, because it might lead to an absurd acceptance of a doctrine of a double will in Christ. See, for this whole first part of the controversy, besides the correspondence between Sergius and Honorius, and between Cyrus and Sergius, in Mansi, l.c. xi., the notes of Anastasius Presbyter, edited by A. Mai, in his Script. Vet. Nova Coll., vii. 192-206.

The Ecthesis was accepted by Cyrus of Alexandria with complete submission; while in Rome, where, in the mean time, Honorius had died, it met with decided opposition. In January, 641, Pope John IV. formally condemned Monothelism. In the North African Church it also caused much dissatisfaction: nearly all the bishops declared against it. Under those circumstances, the emperor, Constans II., who wished to restore peace and order in the church, withdrew the Ecthesis, and issued the Typus, 648. The Typus differed from the Ecthesis chiefly in the form. It was an imperial edict; it contained no theological expositions; it simply forbade the use of the controverted terms, and fixed very severe penalties, ecclesiastical and civil, for any disobedience. The first effect of the Typus was that the doctrine of two wills in Christ, dyothelism, was formally defined and accepted by a synod of the Lateran (Oct. 5-31, 649), presided over by Pope Martin I. One hundred and five bishops were present, most of them from Southern and Central Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia, though some also from North Africa. As all attempts of enforcing the Typus in Rome were frustrated by the Pope, and all negotiations between Rome and Constantinople failed, the emperor ordered the Exarch Calliopas to take the Pope prisoner, and send him to Constantinople. June 17, 653, Martin was arrested in the Church of the Lateran, and secretly brought on board an imperial vessel. Sept. 17, he landed in Constantinople, and for more than three months he was kept in prison, suffering many indignities and even cruelties. In March, 654, he was transferred to Chersonesus; and there he died, Sept. 16, 655. His successor, Eugenius, ascended the papal throne with the consent, perhaps with the aid, of Constans II.; and a modus vivendi was then established between Rome and Constantinople, according to which it should be permitted to speak both of a single and of a double will in Christ. A true peace, however, was not obtained; and when, in 678, the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus invited Pope Agatho to participate in a great œcumenical council, which should settle the whole question, he received for a long time no answer at all. Finally, however, Nov. 7, 680, the council was opened in the imperial palace, Trullus, in Constantinople: it lasted till Sept. 16, 681. The monothelite views were defended by Macarius of Antioch, who derived his chief arguments from the writings of Honorius, Sergius, and Cyrus: the dyothelite views were defended by the Roman legates, and they finally conquered. March 28, 681, Monothelism was formally condemned by the council; and Honorius, Sergius, Cyrus, and others were anathematized. From that day, dyothelism became the official doctrine of the Orthodox Church, both in the East and in the West; and in the eighth century it found a most subtle expounder in John of Damascus. Monothelism continued, however, to be professed by all the Monophysite churches; but all the attempts which afterwards were made of introducing it in the Orthodox Church failed. MONSTRANCE (Latin, monstrantia, monstrum, ostensorium, expositorium) denoted originally any receptacle in which relics were shown off to the people. From the thirteenth century, however, when the doctrine of transubstantiation had been defined, the elevation of the host introduced as a part of the mass, and the festival of Corpus Christi established, the name was restricted for the receptacle of the consecrated host. The form was at first that of a Gothic tower; afterwards, during the period of the renaissance, that of a radiant sun; in the Greek Church, that of a casket. The materials were gold or silver, or some costly stuff. The place of the monstrance was the high-altar of the church. No one but an ordained priest was allowed to touch it. To steal it was punished with death.

MONTAIGNE, Michel Eyquem de, b. at the Château Montaigne, in the department of Dordogne, France, Feb. 28, 1533; d. there Sept. 13, 1592. He studied law, and was in 1551 appointed councillor to the Parliament of Bordeaux, but retired in 1569, after the death of his father, to his estate, and devoted himself to the study of philosophy. Once more, however, he was called back into practical life. In 1581 he was elected mayor of Bordeaux, which position he filled with great honor for four years. The book which made his fame — besides a kind of diary kept on a journey in Germany and Italy in 1580, but not published until 1774, also the only book he wrote — was the celebrated Essays, of which the first part appeared in 1580, the second in 1588. It has often been reprinted, and translated into foreign languages. The best edition is that by Le Clerc, Paris, 1865. His life has been written by Bayle St. John (London, 1857) and Bigorie de Lasehamps (Paris, 1860). The foundation of Montaigne's philosophy is an absolute scepticism. Nothing can be known with certainty, — not a fact in history, not a law in nature. This scepticism, combined with a natural indifference, made him in religion a staunch conservative. Since nothing can be known with certainty, it is proper to accept what the Church teaches; and practically he stuck to this maxim, though his brother became a Protestant, and he himself was an intimate friend of Henry of Navarre. In his moral system, too, his scepticism prevailed. He recognized no absolute moral authority. Duty and conscience were to him merely incidental and shifting forms. Do as your nature tells you to do was his highest moral principle. But, in analyzing the various forms of conscience and the various conceptions of duty, he shows a wonderful keenness and knowledge of human nature. See J. GOGUEL: Essai sur la morale de M., Geneva, 1874; THIMME: Der Scepticismus M., Göttingen, 1875; HENNING: Der Scepticismus M., Jena, 1879.

MONTALEMBERT, Charles Forbes René, Count de, b. in London, April 15, 1810; d. in Paris, March 12, 1870. He was educated in England by his grandfather, James Forbes; and the great Irishman O'Connell seems to have exercised considerable influence on his development. In 1828 he accompanied his father to Stockholm; and while there he made his literary debut by a remarkable article on Sweden, in the Revue Française. In 1830 he joined Lamennais as contributor to the Avenir; and a campaign was opened against the educational monopoly of the state and the university, for the purpose of bringing the whole popular education into the hands of the Roman-Catholic clergy. In connection with Lamennais and Lacordaire, he founded a free school, in which he himself taught; but the school was immediately closed by the police. As peer of France, he was cited before the Chamber of the Peers; and Sept. 19, 1831, he defended his cause in a most brilliant speech. He was sentenced, however, to pay a fine; and the school remained closed. A still heavier blow was struck at him by the papal encyclical of Aug. 15, 1832. He stood as one of the leaders of that peculiar movement which endeavored to unite ultramontanist in the Church with radicalism in the State; but the encyclical disapproved in very severe terms of the whole movement. Dec. 8, 1834, Montalembert gave in his profession of unconditional submission, retired from public life, and went travelling. During his stay in Germany, he became deeply engaged in the study of mediæval literature and art, the results of which were Du Vandalisme et du Catholicisme dans l'Art and Vie de Ste. Elizabeth. After his return to France, he again took a very active part in political life. The reforms of Pius IX. he hailed with great enthusiasm, also the revolution of 1848. But he was soon disenchanted both by the Pope and the emperor, and the last part of his life he devoted to literary pursuits. In 1860 his Histoire des Moines d'Occident (6 vols.) began to appear, translated into English by Mrs. Oliphant (Monks of the West, Edinburgh, 1861-67, 3 vols.); but it was never completed. It is a plea in a case, rather than an historical representation; for as an historian the author lacked the critical faculty, as, in practical politics, he lacked judgment. He had eloquence and enthusiasm. Among the interests which called forth his sympathies was the civil war in the United States; and "his last pamphlet was a hymn of triumph over the success of the Union arms" (La victoire du Nord aux États-Unis, Paris, 1865, Eng. trans., Boston, 1866). He earnestly opposed the papal-infallibility dogma, and, by so doing, won only abuse from the church which he had so faithfully served. He submitted, however, when the dogma was promulgated. An edition of his complete works appeared in 9 vols., Paris, 1861-68. His life was written by AUGUSTIN COCHIN (1870), A. PERRAUD (1870), and CH. FOISSET (1877). See also MRS. OLIPHANT: Memoirs of Count de Montalembert, Edinburgh and London, 1872, 2 vols.

MONTANISM. About the middle of the second century (in 156, according to Epiphanius: Har., xlviii. 1) Montanus appeared as a new prophet in Phrygia, at Ardaban on the frontier of Mysia, and found many adherents, among whom were Aleibiades and Theodotus. Under him, also, prophetesses appeared, — Priscilla and Maximilla. Prophecy was, indeed, the most prominent feature of the new movement. Ecstatic visions, announcing the approach of the second advent of Christ, and the establishment of the heavenly Jerusalem at Pepuza in Phrygia, and inculcating the severest asceticism and the most rigorous penitential discipline, were set forth as divine revelations, of which the prophet was only the bearer, and proclaimed as the direct continuation and final consummation of the prophetic gift of the apostolic age. In spite of the sensation it created and the discussion it caused, the movement remained for a long time within the pale of the Church; but as it grew in strength, penetrating from Asia Minor into Thrace, it naturally foused a stronger opposition, and, in several places, synods were convened against it. Some persons considered it to have been caused by a demon, and employed exorcism against it, such as Sotas of Anchialus, Zoticus of Comane, and Julian of Apamea. Others attacked it in a literary way, such as Claudius Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and Miltiades. Gradually the very contrast to it developed, — a party which rejected all Christian prophecy, and even denied the authenticity of the Gospel according to John on account of the Paraclete therein promised. At last, towards the close of the eighth decade, it became necessary for the Montanists to separate from the Orthodox Church in Phrygia, and form a schismatic congregation, organized by Montanus himself, which, however, did not stop the vehement literary polemics carried on against them by Serapion, Theodotus, and the Anonymous.

The first time the Montanists are spoken of in Western Europe is in those letters, which, during the persecution of Marcus Aurelius, the confessors of the congregations of Lugdunum and Vienna sent from their prisons to Asia Minor and Rome. Between Asia Minor and the Gallic congregations there existed very intimate relations. Among the martyrs of Lugdunum and Vienna were several Phrygians. The principal object of the letters was, consequently, simply to inform the Christians of Asia Minor and Phrygia of the sufferings which their brethren in Gaul had endured. But, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., V. 1), a kind of statement was added to the letters, of the view which the Gallic congregations took of the Montanist prophecy; and the presbyter Irenæus, who carried the letters to Rome, was enjoined to beg the Roman pope, Eleutherus, to continue in peaceful communication with the Asiatic congregations. Characteristically enough, Eusebius omits the statement; but every thing seems to indicate that the view it contained was very kind and mild. Now, in his book Adversus Praxeam, Tertullian speaks of a Roman pope, who, in opposition to the example of his predecessors, felt inclined to make peace with the Phrygian and Asiatic congregations, and recognize the prophecy of the Montanists, but was persuaded by the calumnies of the Monarchian Praxeas to change his mind, and condemn Montanism. That Roman pope was probably the very same Eleutherus (174-189) to whom Irenæus was sent; and a condemnation of Montanism by Eleutherus would go far to explain the harsh measures which his successor, Victor, chose to employ in the paschal controversy. A Montanist congregation was at all events not formed in Rome; but the Montanist views of church discipline took, nevertheless, root there, and came more than once in conflict with the somewhat laxer practice of the Roman popes.

Condemned in Rome and in its native country, Montanism found a new home in North Africa, and its most prominent representative in Tertullian. He adopted all its views, and further developed them. The speedy advent of Christ, and the establishment of the millennium, are the fundamental ideas of his theology. A Christian church, which governs the world by slowly penetrating it, he does not understand. The living gift of prophecy, according to the divine plan of salvation, constitutes the true mediator between the times that are and the coming millennium; and the true preparation from the side of the Church is the establishment of a moral discipline which forces her members away from the whole merely natural side of human life. Science and art, all worldly education, every ornamental or gay form of life, should be avoided, because they are tainted by Paganism. The crown of human life is martyrdom. Fasts were multiplied, and rendered more severe. The second marriage was rejected, and the first was not encouraged. Against a mortal sin the Church should defend itself by rigidly excluding him who committed it, for the holiness of the Church was simply the holiness of its members. With such principles, Tertullian could not help coming into conflict with the Catholic Church. To him the very substance of the Church was the Holy Spirit, and by no means the episcopacy, whose right to wield the power of the keys he even rejected. Soon the conflict assumed such a form, that the Montanists were compelled to separate from the Catholic Church, and form an independent or schismatic church. But Montanism was, nevertheless, not a new form of Christianity; nor were the Montanists a new sect. On the contrary, Montanism was simply a re-action of the old, the primitive Church against the obvious tendency of the Church of the day,—to strike a bargain with the world, and arrange herself comfortably in it.

MONTE CASINO. The celebrated monastery of Monte Casino, situated on a mountain of the same name in the province of Terra di Lavoro, fifty-five miles north-west of Naples, was founded in 528 by Benedict of Nursia; which article see. In 580 it was totally destroyed by the Lombards; the monks barely escaping to Rome, where they remained for a century and a half, having been installed in the palace of the Lateran by Pope Pelagius II. Restored in 720, under the reign of Gregory II., by abbot Petronax, it soon took rank, both in wealth and in literary and artistic distinction, beside its sister-institutions of St. Gall, Reichenau, and Corvey. Paul Warnefried, once the chancellor of the last Lombard king, Desiderius, became one of its inmates, and wrote there his Historia Longobardorum. Abbot Bertharius (856-881) founded the hospital and the medical school, which for centuries were the chief institutions of their kind in the world. During his reign, however, the monastery was captured and plundered by the Saracens; and the monks were expelled. They lived for some time in Naples, then at Capua, and were finally brought back to Monte Casino by abbot Aligerus, 949-985. Under Frederic of Lorraine (1056-57), who became pope under the name of Stephen X., and his successor, Desiderius (1059-87), who became pope under the name of Victor III., the prosperity of the institution reached its point of culmination. The number of monks and pupils was much increased; the church was rebuilt with great splendor; and the place became, indeed, one of the centres of civilization. Under abbot Bruno (1107-11), Leo of Ostia wrote his Chronicon Casinense, and in the same century Petrus Diaconus wrote there his De viris illustribus Casi- ensisibus. In 1349 the magnificent buildings of the institutions were destroyed by an earthquake, and about the same time the moral decay began. In the sixteenth century the monastery was principally known on account of its wealth. Four bishoprics, two principalities, 20 countships, 350 castles, 440 villages, 23 harbors, 33 islands, 200 mills, and 1,662 churches belonged to it: the annual revenue of the abbey amounted to half a million of ducats. In 1866 the monastery was secularized. See GATTULA: Historia Abbatia C., Venice, 1733; LUIGI TOSTI: Storia della Badia di M.C., Naples, 1813, 3 vols.; ANDREA CARAVITA: Prefetto del Archivio Casinense, Naples, 1870, 2 vols. ZÖCKLER.

MONTES PIETATIS (Italian, Monte de Pietà; French, Mont de Piété, Table de Prêt) were a kind of charitable institutions where poor people could obtain small loans, on the security of pledges, without paying any interest. The first institution of the kind was founded by the Minorite Barnabas at Perugia, in 1464, for the purpose of rescuing poor people from the claws of the usurers: it was confirmed by Paul III., not, as often said, by Leo X. From the States of the Church the institution rapidly spread into Lombardy and Venetia, and thence into France, Germany, England, and Spain. Where the State has taken the control of the institution, a small interest is generally paid, sufficient to defray working expenses. NEUDECKER.

MONTESQUIEU, Charles de Secondat, Baron de, b. at the Château La Brède, near Bordeaux, Jan. 18, 1689; d. in Paris, Feb. 10, 1755. He studied law; was appointed councillor to the Parliament of Bordeaux in 1714, and became its president in 1716, but resigned his office in 1726, and devoted himself wholly to study and literature. After travelling for several years in Germany, Italy, and England, in order to make himself acquainted with the state of social and political development in those countries, he settled at La Brède, from which he only made occasional visits to Paris. In 1721 appeared his Lettres persanes; in 1734, his Considérations sur les causes de la grandeur des Romains et leur décadence; and in 1748, after twenty years' preparation, his Ésprit des Loix (of which twenty-two editions were sold in eighteen months), Eng. trans. by Thomas Nugent, new ed., Cincinnati, 1873, London, 1878, 2 vols.; and of all his works, London, 1777, 4 vols. The best collected edition of his works are those of Lefèvre (Paris, 1816, 6 vols.) and Lequieu (Paris, 1819, 8 vols.). Montesquieu is generally mentioned among the so-called "Encyclopedists," and he was, indeed, a contributor to the Encyclopédie Française; but spiritually he differed very much from that coterie. Though not a theologian, he was a student of religion, and well aware of its decisive influence on the character and history of a people. He accepted the doctrines of the immortality of the soul and of a divine revelation in Scripture, and his contempt of atheism was as pronounced as his contempt of superstition. His principal influence, however, he exercised, not on the science of religion or morals, but on social and political science.

MONTFAUCON (Montefalconius), Bernard de, b. at Soulatgé, a village of Southern France, Jan. 13, 1655; d. in Paris, Dec. 21, 1741. He entered the army in 1672, and made two campaigns in Germany under Turenne, but joined the Congregation of St. Maur in 1675, after the death of his parents, and took the vows, May 13, 1676, in the monastery La Daurade in Toulouse. Having resided for some time at Sorèze (where he studied Greek), La Grasse, and Bordeaux, he settled in 1687 in St. Germain-des-Prés, the literary centre of the order. In 1688 he published his Analecta Græca; in 1690, his La vérité de l'histoire de Judith; and in 1698, his excellent edition of Athanasii Opera Omnia, 3 vols. fol., with biography and critical notes. He then went to Rome, where he staid for three years; and while there he published with brilliant success his Indicia editionis S. Augustini a Benedictinis adornate against the attacks of the Jesuits. As shown by his Diarium Italicum (Paris, 1702), his visit to Italy considerably widened his studies, drawing also the monuments of antiquity within their range. The results thereof were, Palæographia Græca, 1708 (a masterpiece, by which he at once founded and perfected a new department of science); Bibliotheca Coisliana, 1715; L'Antiquité expliquée et représentée en figures, 1719, 10 vols. fol. (with about 40,000 illustrations); Les Monumens de la monarchie françoise, 1729-33, 5 vols. fol. (unfinished). Meanwhile he did not neglect his work as an editor, publishing his Collectio nova Patr. Græc., 1709, 2 vols. fol.; Hezaplorum Origenis quæ supersunt, 1713, 2 vols. fol.; and J. Chrysostomi Opera Omnia, 1718-38, 13 vols. fol. See TASSIN: Hist. litt. de la cong. de St.-Maur, 585-616. GEORG LAUBMANN.

MONTFORT, Simon de, one of the leaders of the fourth crusade; protested against the employment by the Venetians of the crusading army in their war with the Byzantine Empire; and finally separated from the crusaders, and went on his own hook as a pilgrim to the Holy Land. By Innocent III. he was made leader of the crusade against the Albigenses; beginning his career with the capture of Beziers (July 22, 1209), where every living soul was slaughtered, and ending it by the siege of Toulouse (June 25, 1218), where he was struck by a stone thrown from a catapult, and killed. He was one of the most cruel and unscrupulous soldiers known to history; but he was daring and dashing, and fanatically attached to Romanism. He has, consequently, by Roman-Catholic writers been exalted as the true champion of Christ; and his followers even reproached God with his death. See his biography in GUIZOT: Mémoires relatifs à l'Histoire de France.

MONTGOMERY, James, an English religious poet and hymn-writer; b. at Irvine, Ayrshire, Nov. 4, 1771; d. at Sheffield, April 30, 1854. His father was a Moravian missionary; and both he and Mrs. Montgomery died at Barbadoes in 1783, while the son was at school in Fulneck, the chief Moravian settlement in England. He resisted the thought of becoming a clergyman, and was apprenticed to a grocer in Mirfield. Running away, he became a shop-boy at Wath, Yorkshire; from there went to London, and, after returning to Wath, finally settled at Sheffield (1792), where he became proprietor and editor of a paper, — The Iris. In 1789 he was sentenced to prison for three months, and to pay a fine of twenty pounds, for having printed a poem, — The Bastille, — surmounted by a woodcut representing Liberty and the British Lion. He was soon after again sent to prison for six months, on account of reflections upon a colonel of militia, published in his paper in spite of these exhibitions of judicial condemnation, when he retired from the editorial care of his paper, in 1825, he was entertained at a public banquet, and at his death received the honors of a public funeral. In 1830-31 he delivered a series of lectures, on poetry and literature, before the Royal Institution. In 1846 a life pension was settled upon him, of a hundred and fifty pounds. Like Cowper, he was never married. He made no public profession of religion till his forty-third year, when he united with the Moravians, but ever afterwards prominently advocated the work of missionary societies and other Christian institutions. He was eminent for his piety; a "character in whom was as much of the beauty of holiness as it is ever given to any one mortal to attain and exhibit" (Dr. A. P. Peabody, in North-American Review, 1857).

Mr. Montgomery was one of the best sacred poets of his day; and although Jeffrey, in 1807 (Edinburgh Review), condemned the shallow taste which read his poems, and prophesied speedy oblivion for their author, Southey, Professor Wilson, and others, spoke enthusiastically of the blending of piety and a fine imagination in his productions. Professor Wilson, in Blackwood's Magazine, said, "His poetry will live, for he has heart and imagination profound. . . . Montgomery, of all the poets of this age,—and we believe, also, out of it,—is in his poetry the most religious man. All his thoughts, sentiments, and feelings are moulded and colored by religion. A spirit of invocation, prayer, and praise, pervades all his poetry; and it is as sincere as it is beautiful." Among his larger poems are Prison Amusements, 1797 (written during his first imprisonment in York Castle); The Ocean, 1805; The Wanderer of Switzerland, etc., 1806 (condemned unsparingly by Jeffrey, but known by heart by William Cullen Bryant); The West Indies, 1810 (commemorating the abolition of the slave-trade); The World before the Flood, 1813; Greenland (founded on the history of Moravian missions, 1819), etc. Mr. Montgomery is now known chiefly by his hymns, which have passed into all collections. Many of them first appeared in newspapers, and were collected in The Songs of Zion, being Imitations of the Psalms, 1822; The Christian Psalmist, or Hymns, Selected and Original, Glasgow, 1825; and Original Hymns for Public, Private, and Social Devotion, London, 1853. Among his best are the missionary hymns, "O Spirit of the living God," "Hail to the Lord's Anointed" (read by the poet at the close of a speech at a missionary meeting in the Wesleyan Chapel, Liverpool, April 11, 1822, and put by Dr. Adam Clarke, who was presiding, in his Commentary on Ps. lxxii.), the fine advent hymn, "Angels from the realms of glory," "Forever with the Lord," etc.

Editions of Mr. Montgomery's works were published between 1818 (3 vols.) and 1855 (4 vols.); a Memoir, with extracts from his writings and journals, by HOLLAND and EVERETT, London, 1755-56, 7 vols.; and an abridgment of this work, by MRS. KNIGHT, Boston, 1857.

MONTGOMERY, Robert, an English religious poet; b. in Bath, 1807; d. at Brighton, Dec. 3, 1855. In 1828 appeared his poem, The Omnipresence of the Deity (28th ed. 1855), which gained a rapid popularity; which was soon followed by other poems, as Satan (1829). In 1830 he entered Lincoln College, Oxford; took orders; was appointed curate of Whittingham, 1835; preacher at Percy Chapel, London, 1836, where his preaching was very popular, and preacher of St. Jude's Chapel, Glasgow, 1838. Among Montgomery's other numerous poetical works are, A Universal Prayer; Death; A Vision of Heaven; A Vision of Hell (1828, 4th ed., 1829); The Messiah (1832, 8th ed., 1842). His poems were the subject of a withering criticism by Macaulay (see Essays), but received the commendation of Southey. Collected edition of his Poetical Works, London, 1841-43, 6 vols. Mr. Montgomery also assisted in the translation of Nitzsch's System of Christian Doctrine, 1849.

MONUMENTAL THEOLOGY denotes the study of artistic monuments of various descriptions,—inscriptions, coins, medals, statuaries, paintings, architectural constructions, etc., so far as they are expressive of theological ideas. A mere glance at the mediæval cathedral of Europe and the modern meeting-house of America shows, that though, in the congregations which built those houses of worship, the piety may have been the same, the theology was certainly not; and a further comparison cannot fail to lead to a definite conception of the theological differences, since the very outlines of the structures show that they were made to meet different wants, built to realize different ideas. Thus, the study of the literary monuments of theology may at every point be aided by the study of the corresponding artistic monuments. In some cases it will be supplemented (a great portion of the history of the Church of Rome during its first centuries has been dug out of the Catacombs): in others it will be strikingly illustrated. It is impossible to visit, for instance, a royal burial-place in a Protestant country in Europe without being struck at the glaring difference between the tomb of the last Roman-Catholic prince and the tomb of the first Protestant prince; and an impression of what the Reformation was and meant will, like a stream of living blood, gush, with its vivifying power, through the shadowy ideas derived from the reading of the literary documents of the event. Intuition is the one great spiritual fertilizer. Two plain tombstones from some out-of-the-way village cemetery—one from 1783, and one from 1883—may tell more impressively than any heavy volume could do, what rationalism and evangelicism really are, and how they affect human life.

It was the great excavations and comprehensive archaeological researches which were undertaken in Rome during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and more especially the works of Onufrio Panvinio (De præcipuis urbis Roma sanctioribus basilicis, 1554), and Antonio Bosio (Roma sotterranea, 1632), which first drew attention to the theological importance of many artistic monuments: and already Baronius, in his Annales (1588-1607), not unfrequently derives his proofs from coins, paintings, etc. The enthusiasm with which classical archaeology was studied from the very first days of the renaissance benefited also the study of ecclesiastical archaeology. The great works of Montfaucon — Antiquité expliquée, 1719 (reaching down to the fifth century of our era), and Les Monuments de la monarchie française, 1729 — contain much of specific theological interest. Special art subjects of distinct theological character, such as sacred painting, attracted general attention, and were frequently treated. (See Rohr: Pictor errans, Leipzig, 1679; and Ayala: Pictor christianus, Madrid, 1730.) When illuminated manuscripts were printed, the miniature pictures were reproduced. (See the Greek Menologium, edited by Cardinal Albani, Rome, 1727, the Syrian Evangeliarium, edited by Assemani, Florence, 1742, etc.) Indeed, in the second half of the eighteenth century, the artistic monuments of the Church become not only a recognized, but also a highly-valued portion, of the materials employed by the theologian, especially the church historian. (See Pelliccia: De ecclesie politia, 1777.) In the nineteenth century the study has been developed into an independent branch of the theological system. (See Piper: Einführung in die Monumentale Theologie, Gotha, 1867.) Museums have been formed in Berlin, 1851, at Cologne, 1860, etc.; and, though very rarely taught as a peculiar department, monumental theology everywhere receives great attention, both in lectures and text-books. See J. P. LUNDY: Monumental Theology, New York, 1876, new edition, 1881; J. N. DIEFOLDER: Theologie u. Kunst in Urchristenthum, Augsburg, 1882; cf. art. by F. PIPER, Theologie, monumentale, in the first edition of Herzog, vol. xv. pp. 752-807.

MONUMENTS are found among all peoples and in all ages. They are generally very simple, — a stone set up, or a heap of stones. Many such reminders of important events are mentioned in the Bible. Thus Jacob and Laban made a heap of stones to "witness" their covenant (Gen. xxxi. 45-48). Moses ordered the elders to set up stones on Mount Ebal, upon which the "law" was inscribed (Deut. xxvii. 2-4). Joshua fulfilled the request (Josh. viii. 32). Twelve stones out of the midst of Jordan, and twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, commemorated the passage (Josh. iv. 3, 9). Samuel and Saul erected stones in memory of victories (1 Sam. vii. 12, xv. 12). Monuments were also erected in memory of the dead (Gen. xxxv. 20; 2 Kings xxiii. 17). In old times, as now in the East, stones were thrown upon the graves of enemies (Josh. vii. 26, viii. 29; 2 Sam. xviii. 17). Heaps of stones also marked the way (Jer. xxxi. 21). WOLF BAUDISSIN.

MOON, The, played quite an important part in the life and history of the Hebrews, not only as a measurer of time, but also as an object of idolatrous worship. Its very conspicuous and regularly occurring changes led all people in ancient days to use it for measuring time. In Arabic, its name means "the measurer;" in Egypt, the god of the moon, Thoth, is the god of measure, consequently of science; and by the Greeks, Thoth was identified with the cunning and much-knowing Hermes. Like so many other ancient peoples, the Hebrews also used the period during which the moon accomplishes its changes as a unit of time, — the month. Whether the week of seven days originated as a simple division of the month into four, or whether it was formed with a regard to the seven planets, is questionable.

(See Schrader: Der babylonische Ursprung der sieben tagigen Woche, in Studien und Kritiken, 1874.) But it is certain that their year was made up of twelve moon-months of twenty-nine and a half days. Some passages, however, as, for instance, the account of the age of Enoch (Gen. v. 23), indicate, that, at a very early time, the Hebrews were also acquainted with the solar year; and it cannot have been a long time before they observed that the seasons depended on the revolution of the sun (according to old parlance), and not on that of the moon. The discrepancy between the solar and the lunar year they then smoothed over by means of an intercalary month. (See the art. YEAR.) The day of the return of the new moon was always, from the oldest times, a day of note, and is mentioned along with the sabbath in Amos viii. 5, 2 Kings iv. 23; but only the seventh new moon was celebrated as a special day of festival (Lev. xxiii. 24; Num. xxix. 1). All the great annual festivals, however, — Passover, Pentecost, the Feast of Tabernacles, the Day of Atonement, etc., — were celebrated on fixed days of the month. Of the idea, so very common among the peoples of antiquity, that the moon was the cause of the dew, and generally exercised a mysterious influence on vegetation, there is no direct trace in the Old Testament; but passages like Ps. cxxi. 6, Matt. iv. 24, xvii. 15, show that the Jews supposed a connection between the moon and certain diseases. With respect to the worship of the moon, very old among the Shemitic peoples, — according to some, even older than the worship of the sun, — it was forbidden in Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3. Nevertheless, Josiah put down a number of idolatrous priests who burnt incense to the sun and the moon and the planets (2 Kings xxiii. 5); and Jeremiaah complains (viii. 2) that there were people in Jerusalem who worshipped both the sun and the moon. Job xxxi. 27 speaks of another form of the moon-worship, — throwing kisses at her, instead of burning incense to her, which chimes well in with the general Shemitic idea of the goddess of the moon. MOORE, Clement Clarke, LL.D., b. in New York, July 15, 1779; d. in Newport, R.I., July 10, 1863. His father was Bishop Benjamin Moore, of the diocese of New York (1748-1816). He was graduated from Columbia College, 1798; and from December, 1821, to June, 1850, he was professor in the General Seminary of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, New-York City, — first of Hebrew and Greek, afterwards of Oriental and Greek, literature. The ground upon which the seminary now stands was his gift. He was the author of the first Hebrew lexicon published in the United States (Hebrew and Greek Lexicon, New York, 1809, 2 vols.), and of the famous ballad, familiar to American children, called the "Visit from St. Nicholas," beginning, "Twas the night before Christmas, when all through the house." He also edited a collection of his father's sermons, 1824, 2 vols.

MOORE, Henry, an early Wesleyan minister; b. in Dublin, Dec. 21, 1751; d. in London, April 27, 1844. He joined the Wesleyan movement, and in 1780 was an itinerant upon the Londonderry circuit; but later in London, as the constant companion of John Wesley, he did most efficient service. After Wesley's death, he figured promi-nently in the discussions from 1791 to 1797 upon a permanent ecclesiastical organization, and personally favored the episcopal form. "He also defended the itinerant system, and the right of Wesleyan ministers to administer the sacraments. He was the last survivor of those whom John Wesley had ordained." He wrote, in connection with Dr. Coke, a Life of John Wesley (London, 1792), and alone, Life of John and Charles Wesley, and Memoirs of the Family (London, 1825, 2 vols.), Memoir of John Fletcher (New York, 1836), and of Mary Fletcher (London, 1817, 2 vols., New York, 1837, 1 vol.), and an Autobiography (1830). See Mrs. RICHARD SMITH: The Life of Rev. Henry Moore, including his Autobiography, London and New York, 1844.

MORAL LAW. The meaning of the word "law," when applied to the sphere of moral action, is by no means identical with the juridical sense of the term. On the contrary, whenever an attempt has been made, theoretically or practically, at establishing perfect congruity between morality and legality, the results have proved disastrous; for the word "law" changes its sense as it moves from one sphere into another.

In nature and natural science, law means simply a formula expressing the invariable recurrence of the same effect from the same cause. It involves a necessity which admits of no exceptions, — a must which cannot be resisted. When rising from the realm of natural forces to the sphere of social agencies, the law may still be said to involve necessity, but only so far as, on the principle of justice, it is enforced by the state. The difference is apparent. While the laws of nature accomplish themselves, as inherent, constitutive elements of the very forces in action, the laws of the state can be accomplished only by the free will of man. Their necessity depends upon the power of compulsion and punishment which the state is possessed of, — upon something outside themselves. Their must is in reality simply a shall.

On the same basis stands the moral law; and yet it differs more widely from juridical law than does the latter from natural law. Juridical law recognizes the free will of man, but only as it recognizes any other natural fact. In principle it rejects it, being willing, under all circumstances, to transform its shall into a must, and, by compulsion and punishment, to enforce itself in spite of the freedom of the human will. Moral law, on the contrary, recognizes the free will of man, not only as a fact in nature, but as the very condition of its own realization. Under no circumstances can it dream of transforming its shall into a must, for where the must begins there morality ends. Compulsion, punishment, and other means of enforcing a law, can reach the act only in its external manifestation, not in its inner motive and purpose; and there lies its morality. Even when moral law demands with absolute authoritative-ness to be obeyed, it demands in the same voice that obedience to it shall be the very manifestation of the freedom of the will.

But whence does this shall come? Is not its very existence an inextricable enigma? A feeling of compulsion is quite comprehensible when produced by external forces which affect the soul in a certain way. All our sensations come to us under this form. We are impressed from without; we become conscious of the impression; we feel that the act of consciousness is a necessary result of the impression: but that feeling of compulsion has nothing strange about it. Quite otherwise with the moral shall. It does not come to us from without; it cannot be reduced to an impression from some external object; and, what is still more extraordinary, in spite of its authoritative and obligatory character, it does not impress us with a feeling of compulsion. From the very depths of the soul it seems to rise; and it sounds like an appeal to our freedom, or, rather, like a hint at the right use of the freedom, accompanying its hints, as it were, with light shadows of pleasure and pain. How is it, then, to be explained?

Every creature has a purpose for which it was created, and which is expressed in its organization, and shall be realized in its life; and from the very purpose of man's existence and life, inherent in his organization, bodily and spiritual, the moral shall arises. It is the spark produced when the soul is touched by her own purpose. Representing the goal of all human development, so far as that goal can be reached by free human activity, the moral shall indicates at every point what we have to do, or not to do, in order to develop in consistency with our own nature, and accomplish the purpose of our being; and, as we accept or neglect its hints, the shadows of pleasure and pain enter our conscience, and fill it with light or darkness. The sceptic, the sensualist, the materialist, may ask, How can such a thing as the purpose of human nature and of human life — that is, a thing which is not, but only shall be — produce a feeling, and make felt its own existence, though it is not existing? The answer cannot be given directly. But all those wants and cravings and impulses, on which organized life in general, the whole activity of plants, animals, and men, depends — what are they but movements of the inherent purpose of the organization towards realization? H. ULRICL.

MORAL PHILOSOPHY is a term generally used to designate philosophical ethics, in contradistinction from theological or Christian ethics. Its object is to find an absolute rule of conduct outside of religion, independent of divine revelation, in the very nature of man. The problem arose in Greece, when the Greek mythology (that is, the Greek religion) had lost its hold on the civilized portion of the people; and the Greek philosophy produced two typical solutions, — the Epicurean and the Stoic, — which, in the course of time, have exercised an incalculable influence, not only on ethical speculation, but on the practical morals of individuals, classes, and ages.

Both these systems agree in determining the happiness of the individual as the final goal of moral conduct; but, in the definition of what individual happiness is, they differ widely from each other. To the Epicurean, happiness is enjoyment, the greatest possible amount, consequently prudent, and even calculating; while to the Stoic, happiness consists in an inner self-sufficiency, which not only can afford to despise enjoyment, but which also enables to endure sufferings. Epicureanism (most easily accessible to the student through the works of Horace, Lucretius, and Cicero, who, however, was not an Epicurean, but an eclectic) has always exercised its greatest attraction on men of a light and sanguine temperament, and found the most adherents among rich and elegant people. It is, however, not only the elegance and comfort of life which are deeply indebted to Epicureanism: also art, poetry, and science owe much to it. On the other hand, it has been the father of unspeakable debaucheries, and the cause of great ruin. Stoicism (most easily accessible through the works of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius) attracts chiefly characters of a more serious and sombre hue, and has found its most eminent disciples among practical people, men of power, statesmen. Its influence on art, and even on science, has been comparatively small; but it has produced not a few great ideas, political, social, and moral, which Christendom has recognized and adopted.

In the history of Greek philosophy, the Epicurean and Stoic schools, respectively founded by Epicurus and Zeno, were preceded, the former by the Cyrenaic school (founded by Aristippus), the latter by the cynic school (founded by Antisthenes). The centre of the whole development, however, is occupied by Plato and Aristotle; and especially the latter is of paramount importance in the history of moral philosophy. He also determines the highest moral end as happiness; he is, indeed, the father of the happiness-principle. But he defines happiness as activity, not as enjoyment or self-sufficiency, — as an activity which at every point hits the mean between two opposite excesses, such as is determined by the intellect. To him, man is principally a political being, and can realize his highest moral aims only in the state. Thus the individual becomes absorbed by the family, and the family again by the state; that is, morals become absorbed by politics. Though the direct influence of Aristotle on practical life may be rather small, all ethical speculation borrowed for centuries its method, its scheme, even its materials, from him.

The middle ages had, properly speaking, no moral philosophy. Though the forms, and, with some modifications, also the ideas, of the Aristotelian ethics, were retained by the schoolmen, the subject was generally treated as an appendix to dogmatics. (See ETHICS.) But the renewal of the study of antiquity, and the enthusiasm which the classical literatures, and more especially their philosophy, produced, soon called forth a desire to construct an independent philosophical foundation for the ruling moral code; and in the seventeenth century modern moral philosophy was fairly started by Hugo Grotius and Hobbes, though in an indirect way, and from a rather political point of view. The gross and outspoken materialism of Hobbes, amounting almost to a formal denial of all morals, gave rise to a vehement opposition; and, in the treatises of Cumberland and Cudworth, the idea of Grotius, that natural law as a part of divine law may be deduced a priori from the conception of human nature, and a posteriori from the fact of its universal acceptance, appeared in a more definite shape and with a more direct moral bearing. The moral law, they protest, is an inherent part of human nature: and it is inscrutable and authoritative, because, as a part of human nature, it is a creation of God. With Hobbes there began in England a very lively debate on moral philosophy, which has not yet ended, and which, especially in the eighteenth century, produced a very rich and varied literature. It is characteristic of this debate, that the question is not so much about the end of morals as about its sources. — Whence comes the feeling of duty? what is duty? Answered in various ways, the question generally leads to the assumption of a special moral organ, — a moral sense (Francis Hutcheson), a conscience. The existence of a moral sense, a conscience, cannot be doubted: but, unfortunately, the question is not thereby fully answered, because, irrespective of the different degrees of development, the moral sense is never perfectly alike in any two individuals; and when a longer interval, for instance, a period of some centuries, is allowed to intervene, conscience may give, and has given, completely contradictory decisions.

With Kant's "categorical imperative," moral philosophy made a great conquest. That principle broke the backbone of the happiness-principle, and utterly destroyed the reigning eudæmonism. It demonstrated obedience to duty, regardless of happiness, as a peremptory demand of reason. It determined, once for all, the whole subjective or formal side of duty; but of the objective side of the idea, of the contents of duty, it tells us nothing. One may learn from Kant to obey his duty; but he cannot learn what his duty may be, if he happens to be uncertain on that score. A principle was still wanting from which positive duty could be deduced with the same authority to reason as divine revelation exercises over faith. After the time of Kant, however, two remarkable attempts have been made of demonstrating such a principle, and establishing moral philosophy on a basis independent of religion; namely, Utilitarianism, and the application of the theory of Evolution to ethics: which two articles see.

MORAVIAN CHURCH, the name by which the United Brethren (Unitas Fratrum) are generally known.

I. HISTORY. — This church, which must not, as is often done, be confounded with the United Brethren in Christ, is a resuscitation, in a new form, of the Bohemian Brethren (q. v.), who flourished from 1457 to 1627 in Bohemia and Moravia, and from 1549 to 1700 in Poland. At the beginning of Luther's Reformation, they numbered about 400 parishes and 200,000 members, were using their own Hymnal and Catechism, and employing two printing-presses for the spread of evangelical literature. In spite of frequent persecutions on the part of the Roman Catholics and Utraquists, they increased in number, and grew in influence, until they obtained legal recognition (1609). One of the ends for which they labored was a closer fellowship among Protestants. They succeeded in effecting an alliance, based on the Consensus Sandomiriensis, among those of Poland (1570). This alliance, however, bore no abiding fruits. The anti-Reformation, inaugurated by Ferdinand II., overthrew the Brethren as a visible organization in Bohemia and Moravia (1627); but they continued in Poland and Hungary to the end of the seventeenth century. At the same time there was preserved in their original seats a "hidden seed," which kept up, as far as possible, the tenets and usages of the fathers, held religious services in secret, and prayed for a resuscitation of the church. Such prayers were heard. In 1722 two families named Neisser, led by Christian David, "the servant of the Lord," fled from Moravia, and, by invitation of Count Zinzendorf (q. v.), settled on his domain of Berthelsdorf in Saxony. About three hundred Brethren, in the course of the next seven years, emigrated from Moravia and Bohemia to the same place. They built a town called Herrnhut, or "The Watch of the Lord," and were joined by a number of other Protestants from various parts of Germany. This settlement became the centre of the Renewed Brethren's Church. In addition to the fact that its nucleus consisted of descendants of the Bohemian Brethren, such a renewal was brought about by the adoption of the leading features of their constitution; by the introduction of their discipline, as set forth in the Ratio Disciplina of Amos Comenius, and of much of their liturgy as found in their German hymnals; by appropriating their doctrinal tendency in so far as to hold fast to essentials, but not to bind the conscience with regard to non-essentials; and, finally, by the transfer of their episcopate, which had been carefully continued in the hope of a resuscitation. On the 13th of March, 1735, David Nitschmann was consecrated the first bishop of the Moravian Church by Bishop Daniel Ernst Jablonsky, with the concurrence of Christian Sitkovius, these two being the survivors of the old succession. As concerns the doctrinal tendency, the noteworthy fact may be added, that the Lord's Supper is still defined by the Moravians, as it was defined by their fathers more than four centuries ago, simply in the words of Scripture, without attempting any human explanation. The resuscitation of the Brethren's Church was, however, not accomplished in accordance with a pre-arranged plan; nor was Herrnhut built with such an end in view. The renewal was the work of God, who gradually led both the Moravian refugees and Zinzendorf to recognize his divine will. When Zinzendorf permitted the Brethren to settle on his estate, he knew little or nothing of the church of their fathers; and the projects which he had formed for the extension of God's kingdom looked in a different direction. It was only after these projects had failed, that he was made to see that Herrnhut, to use his own words, constituted "the parish to which he had from all eternity been fore-ordained." By that time, however, there was gathered a body of Christians, not exclusively descended from the Bohemian fathers, but representing a union of the Slavonic element of the Ancient Brethren's Church with the German element of pietism. In the very nature of the case, therefore, a new and different development began. It was shaped by Zinzendorf. He had, indeed, declared that he would do all in his power to fulfil those hopes of a renewal of the Brethren's Church which filled the heart of its aged bishop Comenius; but at the same time he was by conviction a Lutheran, and had adopted Spener's idea in its deepest import, — of establishing ecclesiola in ecclesia. This idea he carried out to ends of which its originator had never thought. On the one hand, the Brethren were to constitute an independent church; and yet, on the other, they were not to interfere with the State churches, but to set forth within the same a union of believers representing the old Brethren's, the Lutheran, and the Reformed elements, — or τρόποι παιδείας, as he called them, — in one Unitas Fratrum. Accordingly he did not allow the Brethren to expand as they had expanded in their original seats; but exclusive Moravian towns were founded, where no one but a member owned real estate, and the Church controlled, not only their spiritual concerns, but also their industrial pursuits. In such towns a high type of piety was developed. They fostered a missionary spirit, which sent messengers of the gospel to the most distant parts of the heathen world, and found fields at home, through the so-called "Diaspora," on the continent of Europe, and, through domestic missions, in Great Britain and America. They educated in their boarding-schools thousands of young people not connected with the Moravian Church; and, during the long and dreary period of rationalism, they afforded a sanctuary for the old gospel, with its blessed promises and glorious hopes. At the same time there occasionally appeared a self-satisfied spirit, which, on the one hand, looked upon the Moravians as "a peculiar people" in an extraordinary sense, and, on the other, took acceptance with God for granted, as belonging of necessity to all the members of a church in which the Saviour was pre-eminently made the central figure of theology and of practical religion, and his name literally constituted a household word. For a brief period (1745–49), known as "the time of sifting," and in a few of the settlements, a far greater evil manifested itself. Fanaticism broke out among ministers and people. It did not lead them into gross sins, but gave rise to the most extravagant conceptions, especially as regarded the atonement in general, and Christ's wounded side in particular; to the most sensuous, puerile, and objectionable phraseology and hymns; and to religious services of the most reprehensible character. Such fanaticism Zinzendorf himself unwittingly originated by the fanciful and unwarranted ways in which he expressed the believer's joy and the love which the pardoned sinner bears to the Saviour. But, when he and his coadjutors began to realize the magnitude of the evil, they earnestly labored to bring back the erring ones to the sober faith and reverent love taught by the Scriptures. Such efforts were crowned with success; and the entire restoration of the church to spiritual health formed the best answer to the many attacks made upon it at that time and for a long period afterward, in part by well-meaning theologians, and in part by scurrilous enemies.

Zinzendorf was consecrated a bishop in 1737, and during his lifetime practically stood at the head of the church, although he had many assistants; and synods, of which he had the principal control, were often held. After his death, the synods assumed their proper position, and the executive power was vested in elective boards. The polity which he had introduced kept the Unitas Fratrum numerically small; but it was gradually established in Saxony, Prussia, Denmark, Baden, Switzerland, and Russia. In all these countries, except Switzerland, the exclusive system was introduced: on the part of their governments, liberal concessions were granted. There are fifteen exclusive settlements on the continent of Europe, and nine other Moravian churches.

Turning to Great Britain, we find that the Moravians established themselves in that kingdom in 1738, chiefly through the labors of Peter Boehler, who became God's instrument in leading John Wesley to a knowledge of the truth. In 1779 they were acknowledged, by an act of Parliament, as "an ancient Episcopal Church." Four exclusive settlements were founded; but the rest of their churches, thirty-four in number, never introduced the German polity.

Georgia was the colony in which the Moravians began their work in North America (1735); but they soon relinquished that field, and came to Pennsylvania (1740), where they built Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Lititz, in which three towns the exclusive system was introduced. Subsequently, they established, on the same plan, Hope in New Jersey (which enterprise proved a failure), and Salem in North Carolina. Their other churches were free from the trammels of this polity. It was totally relinquished in 1844 and the subsequent years. During the century in which it continued, it necessarily kept the church small in this country also: since its relinquishment, the Moravians have increased rapidly, and during the last twenty years have doubled their membership. The number of their churches is seventy-eight.

II. GERMAN MORAVIAN TOWNS. — Although the exclusive system on the continent of Europe has undergone modifications which seem to point to its eventual abolition, its essential features are still maintained. The membership, "according to difference of age, sex, and station in life," is divided into classes, called "choirs," from χορος. At the head of each choir stands an elder, or, in the case of a female class, a deaconess, charged with its spiritual interests. Special religious services are held, and an annual day of covenanting and praise is observed. Such classes, or choirs, are maintained in other Moravian churches also. Every settlement has a Brethren's, a Sisters', and a Widows' House, which supply the inmates with comfortable homes at moderate charges. A Sisters' House is inhabited by unmarried women, who maintain themselves by work suited to their sex; and a Brethren's House, by unmarried men, who carry on various trades. There are two superintendents for each house, — the one looking after the religious concerns of the inmates, who are bound by no vow, and can leave at option; the other managing the temporal affairs. The financial and municipal interests of a settlement in general are directed by the Board of Overseers, with the warden as its president; while spiritual matters are looked after by the Elders' Conference, with the senior pastor as its president. Religious services for all the inhabitants are held every evening in the church.

III. THE CONSTITUTION, MINISTRY, RITUAL, AND USAGES. — (a) In 1857 the entire constitution of the Unitas Fratrum was remodelled. It embraces three provinces, — the German, the British, and the American. They are locally independent, but together constitute one organic whole in regard to doctrine, the fundamental principles of discipline and ritual, and the foreign missionary work. Hence there is a general and a provincial government. The former consists of a General Synod (meeting every ten years at Herrnhut, and attended by delegates from all the provinces, as also from the foreign mission-field) and of an Executive Board. This Board is called the "Unity's Elders' Conference," and has four departments, two of which (the Departments of Missions and of the Unity) are elected by the General Synod; and, as this conference is at the same time the executive board of the German province, the other two by its Provincial Synod. The Department of Missions superintends the foreign missionary work; and the Department of the Unity, the British and American provinces, in all such matters as come within the legislative scope of the General Synod. In the British and American provinces, provincial concerns are managed by their own synods and executive boards, known as Provincial Elders' Conferences.

(b) The ministry consists of bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Unordained assistants, whether men or women, are formally constituted acolytes. The Moravian episcopacy is not diocesan, but represents the entire Unitas Fratrum. Hence bishops have an official seat, both in the synods of the provinces in which they reside, and in the General Synod, and can be appointed only by this body, or by the Unity's Elders' Conference. In the bishops is vested exclusively the power of ordaining. They constitute a body whose duty it is to look to the welfare, and maintain the integrity, of the Unitas Fratrum in all its parts, and especially to bear it on their hearts in unceasing prayer before God; and although they are not, ex officio, connected with the government, they are, as a rule, elected to the governing boards over which they preside.

(c) The ritual is liturgical in its character. A litany is prayed every Sunday morning. Special services, at which offices of worship are used, distinguish the festivals of the ecclesiastical year, certain "memorial days" in the history of the Moravian Church, and the annual days of covenanting of the choirs. The hymnology is rich, and church music very fully developed. Some of the most celebrated Moravian hymnologists are Zinzendorf, Countess Zinzendorf, Spangenberg, Louise von Hayn, Gregor, James Montgomery, Garve, Albertini, etc. Love-feasts, in imitation of the agape of apostolic times, are celebrated. The pedilavium, or foot-washing, was formerly practised within limited circles, but has long since been abolished. At one time the lot was employed in the appointment of all ministers, and marriages were contracted in the same way. Its use in the former case has been greatly restricted; the rule with regard to marriages was abolished in 1818.

IV. DOCTRINE. — The Moravian Church does not set forth its doctrines in a formal confession of faith, as was done by its Bohemian fathers; but the cardinal points are found in its Catechism, in its Easter Morning Litany (Schaff's Creeeds, iii. p. 799), and in its Synodical Results, or code of statutes drawn up by the General Synod. The doctrines of the total depravity of human nature, of the love of God the Father, of the real God-head and real humanity of Jesus Christ, of our reconciliation to God and our justification by faith through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, of the Holy Ghost and his operations, of good works as the fruit of the Spirit, of the fellowship of believers, of the second coming of the Lord, and of the resurrection of the dead unto life or unto condemnation, are deemed to be essential. (SPAN-GENBERG: Exposition of Doctrine, London, 1784; PLITT: Glaubenslehre, Gotha, 1863; PLITT: Zinzendorf's Theologie, Gotha, 1869-74, 3 vols.)

V. ENTERPRISES OF THE CHURCH. (a) Schools. — There are in the three provinces 47 boarding-schools for young people not connected with the Moravian Church, at which schools about 2,500 pupils of both sexes are annually educated. Each province has a theological seminary.

(b) Foreign Missions. — Although three Protestant missions existed prior to the Moravian missionary work, such enterprises were all undertaken in connection with the planting of colonies. The Moravians were the first Protestants who went among the heathen with no other purpose in view than that of saving souls. In 1732 Leonard Dober and David Nitschmann (q.v.) inaugurated on the Island of St. Thomas that work to which the church still chiefly devotes itself, and which God has wonderfully blessed. At various times, missions—in the service of which large amounts of money were spent, and many lives sacrificed, but which eventually proved unsuccessful—were undertaken in the following countries: Lapland (1734-36), shores of the Arctic Ocean (1737-38), Ceylon (1738-41), Algiers (1740), Guinea (1737-41 and 1767-70), Persia (1747-50), Egypt (1752-83), East Indies (1759-96), and the Calmuck territory (1768-1823). The field, at the present day, embraces the following seventeen mission provinces: Greenland (1733), Labrador (1771), Indian Country of North America (1734), St. Thomas and St. John (1732), St. Croix (1732), Jamaica (1751), Antigua (1756), St. Kitts (1775), Barbadoes (1765), Tobago (1790, renewed, 1827), Demarara (1835, renewed, 1878), Mosquito Coast (1818), Surinam (1735), South African Western Province (1736, renewed, 1792), South African Eastern Province (1828), Australia (1849), and West Himalaya (1853). The annual cost of this extensive work is about $260,000. This amount is made up by the contributions of the members of the church, by gifts from friends of the cause, by grants from missionary societies in the three provinces, by the interest of funded legacies, and by the missions themselves through voluntary donations and the profits of trades. The London Association in aid of the Missions of the United Brethren, founded in 1817, is composed of members of various churches, not of Moravians, and contributes about $25,000 a year. The Brethren's Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen, founded in England in 1741, supports the mission in Labrador, and owns a missionary vessel, which has now been annually sailing to that distant coast for a hundred and thirteen years without encountering a serious accident. The converts are divided into four classes,—new people (or applicants for religious instruction), candidates for baptism, baptized adults, and communicants. In the year 1889 the extensive field in the West Indies will cease, in consequence of an enactment of the General Synod of 1879, to be a mission, and will be constituted the fourth self-supporting province of the Unitas Fratrum. According to the latest statistics, the seventeen mission provinces comprise 115 stations and 307 additional preaching-places; 7 normal schools, with 70 scholars; 215 day schools, with 15,616 pupils, 215 teachers, and 634 monitors; 94 Sunday schools, with 13,355 pupils and 884 teachers; 312 missionaries, male and female; 1,471 native assistants; and 76,646 converts.

(c) Bohemian Mission. — This work was begun in 1870. At first it advanced very slowly, on account of the restrictions imposed through the Austrian laws. In 1880 these restrictions were removed, and the Unitas Fratrum was legally acknowledged by that same government at whose hands it received its death-blow in the anti-Reformation. This mission embraces 4 stations, an orphan-house, 4 missionaries, and 246 members.

(d) Lepet Hospital. — In 1881 the Moravians took charge, in Jerusalem, of a hospital, previously established, for lepers. This institution is supported by contributions from the three provinces.

(e) Diaspora (from διασπορά, in 1 Pet. i. 1), a work carried on by the German Province, and having for its object the evangelization of the State churches on the continent of Europe, without depriving them of their members. Evangelists itinerate through the various countries of Germany, through Switzerland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Poland, Livonia, Esthonia, and other parts of Russia, visiting, preaching, and organizing "societies." This mission embraces 61 central stations, 62 laborers, and about 80,000 "society members."

VI. STATISTICS. — The Three Home Provinces: 269 bishops, presbyters, and deacons; 97 unordained assistants, male and female, in various departments of church-work, not counting teachers; 30,741 souls. Foreign and Bohemian Missions: 145 bishops, presbyters, and deacons; 25 unordained assistants; 116 female assistants; 1,471 native assistants; 76,892 souls. The Unitas Fratrum, therefore, numbers in all 414 bishops, presbyters, and deacons; 1,739 male and female assistants (together, 2,153 laborers); and 107,633 souls; and has, besides, about 80,000 souls in its Diaspora societies.

BISHOP E. DE SCHWEINITZ.

MORE, Hannah, Miss (often printed Mrs., i.e., Mistress, — a term of respect formerly given to ladies, married and unmarried); b. in Stapleton, Gloucestershire, Feb. 2, 1715; d. in Clifton, Sept. 7, 1833. She was educated at Bristol by her father, who was the village schoolmaster. At the age of sixteen she produced a pastoral drama, entitled The Search after Happiness (not published until 1773), and in 1774 the tragedy, The Inflexible Captive (which was acted for one night at Bath), and several poems; in 1778, a tragedy, Percy (brought out by Garrick, and played for fourteen nights); and in 1779 her last tragedy, The Fatal Falsehood: both the latter were played at Covent Garden. But, her views having changed, she declared that she did not "consider the stage, in its present state, as becoming the appearance or countenance of a Christian; on which account she thought proper to renounce her dramatic productions in any other light than as mere poems." Henceforth she turned her attention to religious themes and non-dramatic poetry, and wrote very many pieces, long and short. Of these the most famous are the popular tales in the monthly publication entitled The Cheap Repository, begun at Bristol, 1795. Such stories as Parley the Porter, Black Giles the Pouch-er, and, above all, The Shepherd of Salisbury Plains, have not only been very widely circulated, but have endeared their author to many households. Not read much to day, but once very popular, are Thoughts on the Manners of the Great, 1788; Religion of the Fashionable World, 1795; Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education, 1799; Hints toward forming the Character of a Young Princess, 1805 (she had been recommended by Bishop Porteus for governess to the little Princess Charlotte, daughter of George III.; but court-etiquette required a lady of rank for this position); Cælebs in Search of a Wife, 1809 (ten editions sold in first year); Practical Piety, 1811; Christian Morals, 1812; Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul, 1815; Modern Sketches, 1819.

When she gave up writing for the stage, she also turned her back upon the fashionable and brilliant society in London, in which she had lived as a favorite for five years, and retired to Bristol, and then, in 1786, to her "little thatched hermitage" at Cowslip Green, at Wrington, ten miles from Bristol. There, in 1790, she was joined by her sisters, who had long kept school at Bristol. In 1802 they all moved to Barley Wood. In 1828 Hannah More, who survived her sisters, removed to Clifton, where she died.

Hannah More was in every way a remarkable woman. She was considered one of the great reformers of contemporary manners and morals. Her philanthropic labors were abundant and successful. In conjunction with her equally devoted sisters, she "devised various schemes of benevolence and usefulness; not the least of which was the erection of schools, which, though at first confined to the children of their immediate surroundings, soon extended their operations over no less than ten parishes where there were no resident clergymen, and in which upwards of twelve hundred children were thus provided with the benefits of moral and religious education." The More sisters, aided by their friends, also distributed Bibles and prayer-books. Hannah More received, it is said, upwards of thirty thousand pounds sterling for her writings, and bequeathed ten thousand pounds sterling for pious and charitable purposes. A writer in the Encyclopædia Britannica (8th ed.) thus speaks of Hannah More as a writer:—

"The works of Hannah More have always been highly esteemed by the religious world; and she is generally considered as one of the most distinguished of that class of writers who unite great piety with considerable literary talent, and dedicate the creation of fancy, as well as the deduction of reason, to the service of religion. Her poetry is not much prized. Her prose is justly admired for its sententious wisdom, its practical good sense, its masculine vigor, and the dignified religious and moral fervor which pervades it."

The Complete Works of Hannah More appeared, London, 1830, 11 vols.; a Selection, 1847-49, 9 vols.; Miscellaneous Works, 1840, 2 vols. There are two American editions of her works, Philadelphia (Lippincott's) and New York (Harper's). Her life was written by WILLIAM ROBERTS (1834, 4 vols.; 3d ed., 1838, 2 vols.), also by H. THOMPSON (1838), and by Mrs. R. SMITH (1844).

MORE, Henry, the Cambridge Platonist, b. at Grantham, Lincolnshire, Oct. 12, 1614; d. at Cambridge, Sept. 1, 1687. He was educated at Eton, whence he passed (1631) to Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took his B.A., 1635, and M.A., 1639, followed immediately by a fellowship. He spent the remainder of his life in the university, acting as private tutor, frequently to persons of rank. From his father he inherited the advowson of the rectory of Worthington, and seems to have for a little time held this living for himself, but speedily appointed a successor. He was offered the mastership of his college in 1654, but refused it, as he did the provostship of Trinity College, Dublin, and the deanery of St. Patrick's. He also declined to accept a bishopric which his friends had obtained for him. For a very short time in 1675 he held a prebend's stall in Gloucester's cathedral, and this was his single preferment.

A great charm attaches to this modest and devoted man. He passed through a remarkable religious experience, — from strict Calvinism to theosophy and mysticism, — yet without injury to his profoundly pious nature. He lived a very secluded life, but by no means a selfish or lazy one. "His very chamber-door was a hospital to the needy;" and "work after work sprang with easy luxuriance from his pen." He was very learned, although much was merely curious and really worthless lore. He delighted in Cabalism, and in discovering secrets and mysteries where none existed. But, withal, he made real progress in things divine, and was by more than one holy man considered as the "holiest person upon the face of the earth." Principal Tulloch calls him the "most poetic and transcendental, and, on the whole, the most spiritual looking, of all the Cambridge divines." Like some other geniuses, e.g., Calvin, he formed his system of thought in early manhood, and maintained his loyalty to it through life. More's Philosophical Poems, published in 1647, when he was thirty-three, contains the germ of most of his speculations. He belonged to that select school known as the Cambridge Platonists (see art.), and vigorously advocated the rights of reason. Christianity to him was "the deepest and choicest piece of philosophy that is." But "more noble and inward than Reason itself, and without which Reason will falter, or, at least, reach but to mean and frivolous things," is what he calls "Divine Sagacity;" i.e., we cannot apprehend the divine unless we already share in the divine.

President Porter says, "The leading principle of More's ethical system was, that moral goodness is simple and absolute; that right reason is the judge of its nature, essence, and truth; but its attractiveness and beauty are felt by a special capacity, not unlike the moral sense of later writers. Therefore all moral goodness is properly termed intellectual and divine. To affect this as supreme gives supreme felicity. By the aid of reason we state the axioms or principles of ethics into definite propositions, and derive from them special maxims and rules. In his philosophical works, More states and defends, in the main, the principles of Descartes, stating, at great length and with great minuteness, the doctrine of innate ideas, and defending it against misconception and objections. He qualifies Descartes' opinion, that the soul has its seat in the pineal gland, and contends for the extension or diffusion of the soul, at the same time arguing that this does not involve its discrepability. He contends at times for the reality of space as an entity independent of God, and again makes space to be dependent on God (anticipating the argument of Samuel Clark). He argues the existence of God from the moral nature of man. In his speculations concerning the Philosophical Cabala, he argues that the principles of the Platonic philosophy were derived from the Hebrew revelation, and yet contends for an independent power in man to apprehend rational and divine truth. In his Enthusiasmus Triumphatus, [or a Brief Discourse of the Nature, Causes, Kinds, and Cure of Enthusiasm, 1656], as well as in his theological writings, he argues against the false and pretended revelations and inspirations which were so current in his time. His [Explanation of the Grand] Mystery of Godliness [1660] is an attempt to construct the Christian theology after those subjective ethical relations and beliefs which were taught by Plato and Plotinus, and at the same time to recognize the reality of the supernatural in the Christian history" (Ueberweg, History of Philosophy, Eng. trans., ii. 359).

More wrote, besides those already mentioned, Antidote against Atheism, 1652; Conjectura Cabalastica, 1653; Immortality of the Soul, 1659; Enquiry into the Mystery of Iniquity [the Roman Church], 1664; Enchiridium Ethicum, or Manual of Ethics, 1666; Divine Dialogues, 1668; Expositio Prophetica septem Epistolarum ad septem Ecclesias Asiaticas, una cum Antidoto adversus Idolatriam (explanation of the Epistles to the seven churches in Asia, and criticism of the Roman Church), 1669; Philosophiæ Teutonice Censura (criticism of Jacob Böhme's philosophy); Enchiridium Metaphysicum (manual of metaphysics), 1671. His works in Latin appeared at London in collected edition — Theologica, 1675; Philosophica, 1678. A collected edition of his philosophical works in English appeared in 1662, 4th ed., 1712. In 1708 appeared his Theological Works, according to the Author's improvements in his Latin edition. In 1692 appeared his Discourses on Several Texts of Scripture. His Life was written by Rev. Richard Ward, London, 1710. See particularly the exhaustive study of Henry More by Principal TULLOCH, — Rational Theology in England in the Seventeenth Century, vol. ii., 303–409 — and President PORTER, in Ueberweg as above; also MULLINGER: Cambridge Characteristics in the Seventeenth Century, London, 1867, chap. iv.

MORE, Sir Thomas, the author of the Utopia, and martyr of the old faith; the son of a judge of the King's Bench; was b. in London about 1480; suffered on the block July 6, 1535. He was educated, in part, in the home of Cardinal Morton, who sent him to Oxford. He became closely identified with the advocates of the new culture, — Grocyn, Linacre, and Collet, — and entered into intimate relations with Erasmus. At his father's solicitation, he studied law at New Inn and Lincoln's Inn, and in 1503 became a member of the House of Commons; but, drawing upon himself the anger of Henry VII., he retired for the time from political life. Erasmus found him translating sayings of Lucian, writing biting epigrams, engaged in ascetic exercises, and contemplating the assumption of the cowl. But his healthy nature led him to marry in 1507, and resume the practice of law. He translated the works and life of Pico of Mirandola, defended Erasmus and his New Testament against the attacks of the Louvain professor Dorpins, and secured a royal order making the study of Greek obligatory at Oxford (1518). Henry VIII., whose accession he had welcomed in a poem, attached him to his court in 1518.

In 1516 More wrote his famous work, the Utopia, the type of many national romances. In the form of a dialogue with one Raphael, who has visited the Island of Utopia in the South Seas, he criticised the national and social state of England, and promulgated a new system. Plato's republic was in his mind. He affirms perfect freedom in his island, the equal obligation of work, and a communion of goods. The marriage relation he left untouched, but women were to have the equal privilege of exercising the functions of the priesthood and arms. Religious freedom also existed in his island, and differences in religious forms; and the only condition of citizenship was a belief in immortality and God. The Utopia, written at a time when More had already been urged by Wolsey to enter the service of the king, was a programme of political and social reforms.

Luther appeared between the completion of More's Utopia and the beginning of his political activity, and there is little doubt that the doctrinal principles and stormy agitation of the German Reformation changed More's position. He soon became the champion of the Catholic party in England, and published, in answer to Luther's reply to Henry in 1523, the Responsio ad convincia Lutheri, which demonstrated that he could use more condemnatory epithets in good Latin than any other man in Europe. He defended the doctrines and all the ceremonies of the Catholic Church in his Dialogue (1529) and smaller writings against Tyndale, Frith, and others. The king held him in high estimation, and at the fall of Wolsey, in 1529, delivered to him the great seal of chancellor. In the matter of the king's divorce with Catharine of Aragon, More at first refused to give a judgment on its lawfulness, and referred him to the theologians. He, however, consistently refused to assent to the marriage with Anne Boleyn; and, when it became apparent that Henry was going to break with the Pope, he resigned his office (1532) on the plea of ill health. He was allowed to live quietly, in spite of his refusal to attend the coronation of Anne. Later he was accused, with Bishop Fisher, of having been mixed up with the Maid of Kent; but it appeared that he had merely visited her as a saint, and given her some money to pray for him, and he was exonerated.

More and Fisher were now recognized throughout the land as the heads of the Catholic party. In March, 1534, they were summoned to swear to the Act of Succession. More was willing to assent to the transfer of the succession to Elizabeth, but refused to acknowledge the legality of the divorce. He was condemned to the Tower. In the spring of 1535 he was called upon to take the oath of supremacy. He refused, and was tried. His trial lasted nine weeks. The Pope's nomination of Bishop Fisher to a cardinalship determined the fate of both. More exhibited firmness and a cheerful spirit to the last moment of the execution.

He employed his time in the Tower with the composition of ascetic works (Quod pro fide mors fugienda non sit, etc.) and a work on the passion of our Lord. His character was above reproach. He was of a noble and amiable nature; but he displayed a strange admixture of clear reasoning, critical acumen, and narrow religious prejudice. His execution made a great stir all over Europe. It was, in spite of the legal process, a legal murder. In his trial, abnormal charges were preferred; but he was not by any means a sacrifice to the personal hatred of the sovereign. The larger part of the nation was on the king's side; and, after the parliamentary decrees favoring the Reformation, the measures against More were justifiable according to the standard of the time. He was rather the victim of a mighty struggle, not of the personal bitterness of Henry VIII.

LIT — The Utopia, published first in Louvain, 1516, appeared in English translations by ROBYNSON (London, 1551), BURNET (1684), CAYLEY (1808), new ed., with BACON'S Atlantis, and copious notes by St. John, 1845. Lives of More by ROPER (his son-in-law), Oxford, 1716, new ed., 1822; RUDIARDT, Nürnberg, 1829, new ed., Augsburg, 1852; WALTER, London, 1840; SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH, 2d ed., London, 1844; SEE-MOREL, Jean, b. at Tilleul, in Normandy, in 1538; d. in Paris, Feb. 27, 1559. Though he was very poor, he contrived to gather some knowledge, and pursue some studies in Paris and Geneva; in which latter place he embraced the Reformation. After the custom of poor students, he entered the service of some scholar; and in the house of the Reformed minister in Paris, Antoine de Chandieu, he was arrested, and accused of heresy. By means of the rack he was induced to recant, but immediately repented, and retracted his recantation. As new attempts of conversion failed, and the Roman-Catholic clergy loathed to bring his case out before the public, he very conveniently died in his cell from poison. He was, nevertheless, burned the next day in the Place Notre Dame. See CRESPIN: Histoire des Martyrs, Geneva, 1619, 2 vols. fol.

MOREL, or MORELLI, Jean Baptiste, a native of Paris, who, having embraced the Reformation, sought refuge in Geneva towards the middle of the sixteenth century. Of his personal life very little is known; but he became suddenly noted by the publication of his Traité de la discipline et police chrétienne, 1561. In direct opposition to Calvin, but closely imitating the constitution of the first Christian church, he demanded that all great questions of doctrine, morals, or government, which might arise in a congregation, should not be decided by a more or less hierarchically organized consistory or presbytery, but by the congregation itself, by the application of universal suffrage. Calvin, to whom he presented the manuscript, declined to read "so long an exposition of a subject already decided by the word of God;" and Morelli, who realized the danger of publishing the book in Geneva, went to Lyons, and had it printed there. It produced an immense sensation, and was immediately rejected and condemned by the national synod of Orleans, 1562. Having returned to Geneva, Morelli was summoned before the consistory, convicted of heresy, and excommunicated; after which the case was handed over to the civil authorities. His book was publicly burned by the hangman; and any one who owned a copy of it was ordered to deliver it up immediately, under penalty of the severest punishment. Meanwhile the author himself had been prudent enough to leave the city, but he did not altogether escape the wrath of Calvin and Beza. He obtained a position at the court of Navarre as tutor to the son of Jeanne d'Albret; but the remonstrances of Beza induced her to dismiss him, 1566. The synods of Paris (1569) and Nîmes (1572) also condemned the book, but at the same time it evidently began to arouse the interest of the laity. See WASHINGTON: Ramus, Paris, 1855. Of the author nothing further is heard. He seems to have died some years later in England.

MOREL, Robert, b. at Chaise-Dieu in Auvergne, 1653; d. at St. Denis, Aug. 29, 1731; entered the Congregation of St. Maur in 1672, and was appointed librarian at St. Germain-des-Prés in 1680, and afterwards prior of the convent of Meulan, but retired to St. Denis in 1699, having become completely deaf. Several of his devotional books are still read, — Effusion de cœur, 1716; Entrée des spirituels (three collections), 1720–22; Imitation de Jésus Christ, 1722, etc.

MORELSTSHIKI (self-immolators), a fanatical sect of Siberia and other portions of Russia, so called from their practice of voluntary suicide in a pit filled with combustibles on fire. Such a death is believed to insure a happy immortality. The ceremony of self-immolation takes place once a year in a retired spot.

MORÉRI, Louis, b. at Bargemont, in Provence, March 25, 1613; d. in Paris, July 10, 1680; studied literature under the Jesuits at Aix, and theology at Lyons, in which latter city he was ordained a priest, and preached for several years with success. He published a collection of poems, a translation of Rodriguez's Christian Perfection, a new edition of the Lives of Saints, etc.; but his great work, which at once made him a literary lion, was his Dictionnaire Historique (1673, 1 vol. fol.; last ed. by Drouet, 1759, 10 vols. fol.). It was translated into Spanish and English. The latter translation is by Jeremy Collier, London, 1701, 2 vols.

MORGAN, Thomas, one of the exponents of the later English deism; d. at London, Jan. 14, 1743. Little is known of his life. He was for a time pastor of a Presbyterian church, but lost his position in 1726, on adopting Arian views. He practised medicine for a time, especially in Bristol, and then went to London, where he gave himself up to literary work. He is remembered by his theological work, The Moral Philosopher (3 vols., London, 1737–40), in which he vigorously advocates the belief in God as the creator, preserver, and regent of the world, and combats atheism. But he recognizes only one infallible proof of the divinity of a doctrine, — its moral truth and inherent reasonableness. That which distinguishes him from the other deists is, that he finds a great gulf between the Old and New Testament. The Mosaic religion is a very low type of religion; and the Mosaic law a narrow national code, extending only to external conduct; and the ceremonial law an oppressive system, in which there is nothing true or good. In general, he minimizes the dignity of the religion, history, and God of the Old Testament. The Christianity to which he pays homage is a purely rational system, consisting of ethical elements, and purified of the dregs of Judaism. In his view, every thing that is untrue and impure in traditional Christianity was derived from Judaism. Paul was the truest Christian, because the least a Jew; and he was a veritable free-thinker. In his system, Morgan approached very close to Marcion. See Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Whiston, 1719; Leland: Deistical Writers; Lechler: Gesch. d. Deismus. G. LECHLER.

MORGANATIC MARRIAGES are those between a man of superior and a woman of inferior rank; in which it is stipulated that neither the latter nor her children shall enjoy the rank, or inherit the possessions, of her husband. The adjective comes from morganatica, a corruption of the old High-German morgungeba ("morning gift"), a kind of dowry paid on the morning before or after the marriage.

MORIAH (appearance of Jehovah), the hill upon which Abraham offered Isaac, according to divine direction (Gen. xxii. 2), and on which, later, the temple was built (2 Chron. iii. 1). By "the land of Moriah," in the first passage, is meant the "land in which Mount Moriah was" (cf. "the land of Jazer." Num. xxxii. 1). Moriah was probably not the usual designation of the temple hill, because it does not occur in the pre-exilic books. See TEMPLE.

MORIGIA, Jacobo Antonio de. See BARNABITES.

MÖRIKOFER, Johann Kaspar, b. at Frauenfeld, Thurgau, Switzerland, 1799; d. at Zürich, Oct. 17, 1877. He was successively rector of the city school of his birthplace (1830), pastor in Gottlieben (1853), in Winterthur (1870), and in Zürich. He wrote several valuable and laborious books upon Swiss literary and ecclesiastical history, based upon previously unused or little-used sources, and written in a sober but attractive style. The chief of them are Die schweizerische Literatur des achtzehnten Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1861; Bilder aus dem kirchlichen Leben der Schweiz, 1864; Ulrich Zwingli nach den urkundlichen Quellen, 1867–69, 2 vols. (an excellent work); Johann Jacob Breitingen, Zürich, 1874; Geschichte der evangelischen Flüchtlinge in der Schweiz, 1876.

MORIN, Etienne, b. at Caen, Jan. 1, 1625; d. in Amsterdam, May 5, 1700; studied theology and Oriental languages at Sedan and Geneva; was pastor of the Reformed Congregation of St. Pierre sur Dive, near Lisieux, afterwards at Caen; and became, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, when he sought refuge in Holland, professor of Oriental languages in Amsterdam. Of his numerous writings, the principal are Dissertationes (Geneva, 1683), Exercitationes de lingua primæva (Utrecht, 1694), Explanations sacre (Leyden, 1698), a life of Bochart, in the Opera Bocharti, etc.

MORIN, Jean, b. at Blois, 1591; d. in Paris, 1659; belonged to a Reformed family, and studied theology at Leyden, but was disgusted at the controversies between the Calvinists and Arminians; embraced Romanism, and entered the Congregation of the Oratory. He was for many years employed by Urban VIII. in his negotiations with the Greek Church, but acquired his greatest fame as a writer; though the violence with which he attacked the Masoretic text of the Old Testament, and exalted the Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch, caused much opposition. His principal works are Exercitationes in utrumque Samaritanorum Pentateuchum (1631), Exercitationes de hebraica græcique textus sinceritate (1633), Antiquitates Ecclesiarum Orientalis (1682), with his life, etc. He also edited and translated the Samaritan Pentateuch in Le Jay's polyglot.

MORLEY, George, D.D., b. in London, 1597; d. at Chelsea, Oct. 29, 1684. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1621; was chaplain to the Earl of Carnarvon, 1628–40, then to Charles I., who made him a canon of Christ Church, Oxford. He remained with the king through his troubles, and declined to sit in the Westminster Assembly. He was imprisoned in 1648, left England the following year, nor returned until he was sent by the Royalists, during the protectorate of Richard Cromwell, to win over the Presbyterians to the episcopal form of government and to the use of a liturgy. This mission was all the more congenial to him, as he believed Charles II., whose chaplain he had been at The Hague, to be a sincere Churchman. He had also to employ all his dexterity in keeping the Royalists, naturally impatient and restless on the eve of the Restoration, from ruining his design by injudicious actions. Dr. Morley was rewarded by Charles II. with the successive appointments, in the same year, to the deanery of Christ Church and the bishopric of Worcester. In 1661 he sat in the Savoy Conference, and led on the bishops' side in the debates. In 1662 he was appointed dean of the chapel royal, and was transferred to the see of Winchester. He laid himself open to the charge of intolerance by his advocacy of such a modification of the Test Act as should compel sworn allegiance to the Church of England. He had, indeed, two hatreds, — Romanism and Dissent. His benefactions were very large. His writings, although numerous, are controversial and of little interest.

MÖRLIN (Mörle, Möhrlein, Morlinus, Maurus), Joachim, b. at Wittenberg, April 6, 1514; d. in Königsberg, May 23, 1571. He studied theology at Marburg, Constance, and Wittenberg, and was in 1540 appointed superintendent of Arnstadt; but the combativeness and vehemence of his temper soon brought him into violent conflict with the burgomaster of the place, and in 1543 he was discharged. Next year he received a call as superintendent of Göttingen; but when, after the end of the Smalcaldic war, the Interim was to be established in that city, he offered so virulent and indiscriminating an opposition to the imperial order, that he was not only expelled, but actually had to flee for his life (1550). Appointed preacher at the cathedral of Königsberg, he was at first on terms of great intimacy with Osiander, but afterwards turned against him in the rudest manner from the pulpit, the result of which was that the Duke of Prussia dismissed him, and ordered him to leave the country. As superintendent of Brunswick (1553-67) he labored with great success, though he continued to participate in all the theological controversies of the day in the same way as formerly. In 1567 he was recalled by the Duke of Prussia, and made bishop of Samland. He was one of the leaders of the Gnesio-Lutheran party, but he became more conspicuous as one of the coarsest and most passionate theological controversialists of his age. A list of his works (controversial pamphlets, sermons, letters, etc.) is found in his biography by WALTHER, Arnstadt, 1856 and 1863 (two dissertations).

WAGENMANN.

MORMONS. Mormonism is the name given to the religious belief of the Mormons, a sect having their headquarters in Utah, one of the Territories of the United States. These people call themselves "Latter-Day Saints," and their organization, "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints;" but by the rest of the world they are known as "Mormons." The word "mormon," in their etymology, is a hybrid term, from the reformed Egyptian "mon" and the English "more," and means more good. The man Mormon, in their ecclesiastical history, was the last of the sacred prophets of ancient America, who, a leader of the Nephites, perished, in a battle between them and the Lamanites, in A.D. 420. Both Nephites and Lamanites were descendants from the family of Lehi, an Israelite of the tribe of Manasseh, who emigrated from Jerusalem to America in B.C. 600, during the reign of King Zedekiah. In the battle alluded to, the Nephites were exterminated, with the exception of a few individuals. The descendants of the victorious Lamanites are the North American Indians. The Book of Mormon is claimed to be the condensed record, made on golden plates by the prophet Mormon, of the history, faith, and prophecies of the ancient inhabitants of America. These plates he intrusted to Moroni his son. Moroni survived the awful battle of extermination. He died the last of the Nephites, but, before dying, "hid up" the golden plates in the hill Cumorah, the very site of the final battle between the Nephites and Lamanites, where two hundred thousand of the former had been slain. Among the records of the Book of Mormon are accounts of three migrations to the American continent: 1. Of Jared and his family, soon after the flood, from the confusion of tongues about the Tower of Babel; 2. Of Lehi, as mentioned above; 3. Of a number of Israelites who came over from Jerusalem about eleven years after Lehi. The book also contains accounts of the coming of Christ among these early Americans, about A.D. 34 and 35, and his repeating to them of his Sermon on the Mount, and his appointing of twelve American apostles, and his giving orders to them personally touching baptism by immersion, and his holy communion.

The buried golden plates in Cumorah, in the Western part of New York State, were discovered by Joseph Smith, Sept. 22, 1823; and on Sept. 22, 1827, he secured them, took them to his home, translated their contents, which were said to be in "reformed Egyptian," and printed and published them as the Book of Mormon. In discovering and securing the treasures, it is claimed he was guided and helped by an angel, perhaps by the spirit of Moroni himself, who had died fourteen hundred years before. And, after the translation was completed, it is understood that the angel resumed the custody of the original plates.

Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon sect, was born in Sharon, Windsor County, Vt., Dec. 23, 1805. He had six brothers and three sisters. In 1815 his father moved to Palmyra, and afterward to Manchester, contiguous towns in Ontario (now Wayne) County, N.Y. In 1820 an unusual religious excitement prevailed in Manchester and the region round about. Five of the Smith family were awakened, and united with the Presbyterians. Joseph, in his own account of his early life, says he "became somewhat partial to the Methodist sect." He says he prayed to be guided aright; and that finally two heavenly messengers bade him not to join any sect, and, three years afterwards, another celestial visitant outlined to him about the golden plates he was to find, and the prophet he was to be. This was on Sept. 22, 1823; and from this time on, he avers, his days and nights were filled, and his life was guided, by "visions," "voices," and "angels." The hill Cumorah was about four miles from Palmyra, between that town and Manchester. Here, in the fall of 1827, he claims he exhumed the golden plates. For more than two years, by the aid of the "Urim and Thummim" found with them, he was engaged in translating their contents into English. In March, 1830, the translation was given into the printer's hands. This is his history of himself. In what light he appeared to others may be gathered from the following extract, never before published, from the records of the proceedings before a justice of the peace of Bainbridge, Chenango County, N. Y. :—

"People of State of New York vs. Joseph Smith. Warrant issued upon oath of Peter G. Bridgman, who informed that one Joseph Smith of Bainbridge was a disorderly person and an impostor. Prisoner brought into court March 20 (1826). Prisoner examined. Says that he came from town of Palmyra, and had been at the house of Josiah Stowel in Bainbridge most of time since; had small part of time been employed in looking for mines, but the major part had been employed by said Stowel on his farm, and going to school; that he had a certain stone, which he had occasionally looked at to determine where hidden treasures in the bowels of the earth were; that he professed to tell in this manner where gold-mines were a distance under ground, and had looked for Mr Stowel several times, and informed him where he could find those treasures, and Mr. Stowel had been engaged in digging for them; that at Palmyra he pretended to tell, by looking at this stone, where coined money was buried in Pennsylvania, and while at Palmyra he had frequently ascertained in that way where lost property was, of various kinds; that he has occasionally been in the habit of looking through this stone to find lost property for three years, but of late had pretty much given it up on account its injuring his health, especially his eyes—made them sore; that he did not solicit business of this kind, and had always rather declined having any thing to do with this business.

"Josiah Stowel sworn. Says that prisoner had been at his house something like five months. Had been employed by him to work on farm part of time; that he pretended to have skill of telling where hidden treasures in the earth were, by means of looking through a certain stone; that prisoner had looked for him sometimes,—once to tell him about money buried on Bend Mountain in Pennsylvania, once for gold on Monument Hill, and once for a salt-spring,—and that he positively knew that the prisoner could tell, and professed the art of seeing those valuable treasures through the medium of said stone; that he found the digging part at Bend and Monument Hill as prisoner represented it; that prisoner had looked through said stone for Deacon Atteon, for a mine—did not exactly find it, but got a piece of ore, which resembled gold, he thinks; that prisoner had told by means of this stone where a Mr. Bacon had buried money; that he and prisoner had been in search of it; that prisoner said that it was in a certain root of a stump five feet from surface of the earth, and with it would be found a tail-feather; that said Stowel and prisoner thereupon commenced digging, found a tail-feather, but money was gone; that he supposed that money moved down; that prisoner did offer his services; that he never deceived him; that prisoner looked through stone, and described Josiah Stowel's house and out-houses while at Palmyra, at Simpson Stowel's, correctly; that he had told about a painted tree with a man's hand painted upon it, by means of said stone; that he had been in company with prisoner digging for gold, and had the most implicit faith in prisoner's skill.

"Horace Stowel sworn. Says he see prisoner look into hat through stone, pretending to tell where a chest of dollars were buried in Windsor, a number of miles distant; marked out size of chest in the leaves on ground.

"Arad Stowel sworn. Says that he went to see whether prisoner could convince him that he possessed the skill that he professed to have, upon which prisoner laid a book open upon a white cloth, and proposed looking through another stone which was white and transparent; hold the stone to the candle, turn his back to book, and read. The deception appeared so palpable, that went off disgusted.

"McMaster sworn. Says he went with Arad Stowel to be convinced of prisoner's skill, and likewise came away disgusted, finding the deception so palpable. Prisoner pretended to him that he could discern objects at a distance by holding this white stone to the sun or candle; that prisoner rather declined looking into a hat at his dark-colored stone, as he said that it hurt his eyes.

"Jonathan Thompson says that prisoner was requested to look Yeomans for chest of money; did look, and pretended to know where it was, and that prisoner, Thompson, and Yeomans went in search of it; that Smith arrived at spot first (was in night); that Smith looked in hat while there, and when very dark, and told how the chest was situated. After digging several feet, struck upon something sounding like a board or plank. Prisoner would not look again, pretending that he was alarmed the last time that he looked, on account of the circumstances relating to the trunk being buried came all fresh to his mind; that the last time that he looked, he discovered distinctly the two Indians who buried the trunk; that a quarrel ensued between them, and that one of said Indians was killed by the other, and thrown into the hole beside of the trunk, to guard it, as he supposed. Thompson says that he believes in the prisoner's professed skill; that the board which he struck his spade upon was probably the chest, but, on account of an enchantment, the trunk kept settling away from under them while digging; that, notwithstanding they continued constantly removing the dirt, yet the trunk kept about the same distance from them. Says prisoner said that it appeared to him that salt might be found at Bainbridge; and that he is certain that prisoner can divine things by means of said stone and hat; that, as evidence of fact, prisoner looked into his hat to tell him about some money witness lost sixteen years ago, and that he described the man that witness supposed had taken it, and disposition of money.

"And thereupon the Court finds the defendant guilty."

While digging for treasure at Harmony, Penn., he boarded in the house of Mr. Isaac Hale. On the 18th of January, 1827, he married the daughter, Emma Hale, much against her father's wishes, having been compelled to take her away from her home for the wedding. In 1828 Martin Harris, a farmer of Palmyra, was amanuensis for him. In 1829 Oliver Cowdery, a school-teacher of the neighborhood, filled the same office. On May 15, 1829, by command of an angelic messenger calling himself John the Baptist, Smith baptized Cowdery, and then Cowdery baptized him. Afterwards he ordained Cowdery to the Aaronic priesthood, and Cowdery ordained him. And, in process of time, it is claimed, Smith received the Melchisedec priesthood at the hands of the apostles Peter, James, and John. Some of the prophet's family, and some of a family named Whitmer, in Fayette, Seneca County, N. Y., became converts; and on April 6, 1830, in Whitmer's house, the Mormon "Church" began its history. That day it was organized, with a membership of six,—the prophet and two of his brothers, two Whitmers, and Oliver Cowdery. Within a week or two the first miracle of the "new dispensation" was wrought; the prophet casting out a devil from Newell Knight of Colesville, Broome County, N. Y., whose visage and limbs were frightfully distorted by the demoniacal possession. In December, 1830, Sidney Rigdon, a Campbellite preacher in Ohio, became a convert. Rigdon was erratic, but eloquent; self-opinionated, but well versed in the Scriptures; and in literary culture and intellectual force was the greatest man among the early Mormons. He was born in Pennsylvania, and was twelve years older than Smith. Thereafter the new sect strengthened and spread. Joseph was a veritable Numa Pompilius in the frequency and fitness of the "revelations" he received for the guidance of his people in things great and small. Kirtland, O., two miles from Rigdon's previous cure, was the first "gathering-place" of the saints. In 1831 the settlement was made there; and in the same year Jackson County, Mo., became the seat of another rendezvous. But, wherever the Mormons "gathered," in no long time quarrels ensued between them and the surrounding Gentiles. These arose, for the most part, from the claims of the Mormons to be a chosen people and under special divine direction. They shrank not from urging such prerogatives, and acting upon them. They were the saints, and all other people "Gentiles," in euphony for "heathen." They were the Lord's saints, and the earth is the Lord's. They were led by an inspired prophet. Therefore, whenever the day of election for civil officers came, they must vote solidly the Whig or the Democratic ticket, as the leader should indicate. It is obvious to any one knowing of the fierce zeal of partisan politics, how this course on the part of the Mormons would subject them to constant embroilments with surrounding citizens. In 1843 the Saints carried their arrogance so far as to nominate Joseph Smith for President of the United States. And everywhere the outcome was the same, — expulsion and banishment, with more or less of outrageous violence. Those that had settled in Jackson County were driven out (1200 of them) into Clay County, in 1833; thence, after three years, into Caldwell County; and in 1839 from Missouri entirely. Meanwhile those that settled at Kirtland were also driven from Ohio in 1838; then all fled, and gathered at Nauvoo, a place built by them, on the Mississippi River, in Illinois.

Here they remained for five years, and built up a considerable town, and erected a spacious temple. But the animosities engendered and perpetuated by the theocratic claims of the Saints culminated in the cruel murder of their prophet Joseph and his brother Hyrum, by a mob, in the jail at Carthage, near Nauvoo, June 27, 1844. The two were defenceless prisoners, and the governor of the State had pledged to them safe conduct to the jail and before the court; and their murder was a most foul assassination.

The martyr-like death of Joseph Smith threw a mantle of dignity over his person and a halo of consecration around his character, that could in no other way have been secured. And it is reasonable to believe, that, had Smith lived on, his own many weaknesses, the vulgarizing of "revelation" at his hands, the growing suspicions and disaffections of the faithful, and the fierce rancor and dissensions of the factions, would have shivered Mormonism into pieces, and sunk the fragments into depths too obscure for the searching of further history.

The people, leaders and led, with a rare self-control, sought not to take into their own hands any measures of vengeance for the murder of their chief. After recovery from the first consternation over the awful tragedy, they began to ask themselves, Who shall rule the church?

The "First Presidency" had been Joseph Smith, with Hyrum Smith and Sidney Rigdon his counsellors. Rigdon alone was left. Of the "twelve apostles," Brigham Young was one, and their president. Young hurried to Nauvoo from a "mission" that he was conducting in the Eastern States. By his shrewd sense, firm will, and practical ability he carried all before him. Rigdon, who had been charged with disaffection, even in Joseph's day, was put down, and cut off. The quorum of the twelve was pronounced to be the earthly guide of the church, and Brigham became at once the acknowledged leader.

Brigham Young was born in Whitingham, Windham County, Vt., June 1, 1801, and was one of a family of eleven children, — five sons and six daughters. His father removed to Sherburne, Chenango County, N.Y., in 1804, and the family grew up in the latter State. In his twenty-second year, Brigham became a Methodist. In 1831 and 1832 all the members of the family joined the Latter-Day Saints. On the 11th of February, 1835, at Kirtland, Brigham was made one of the newly organized quorum of the apostles. In 1844, when forty-three years old, he became the Mormon chief. He was strong where Smith was weak; viz., in prudence, sagacity, common sense, practical energy. These natural Cromwellian qualities he brought to the front, and put and kept in force. He wasted no time in getting and giving "revelations." Only one "revelation" proper is on record as promulgated by him.

After the prophet's death, the Gentiles were not a whit more willing for the Mormons to sojourn among them. Contentions, existing and threatened, waxed rather than waned. Brigham's practical sense promptly decided that his people must flee away to some remote region, where collisions and conflicts should cease; and his sturdy will and untiring energy bent themselves to carry out the decision. Early in 1846 he and his people began to leave Nauvoo. Gradually they were massed on the Missouri River, near what is now Council Bluffs. Their chief encampment there they called "Winter-Quarters." And in 1847 Brigham and a hundred and forty-two "pioneers" pushed resolutely westward over a wilderness track of eleven hundred miles, and arrived in the Great Salt Lake Valley on July 24. Ever since, that day is the great day for celebration to Utah Mormons, quite eclipsing July 4. A few wintered in the valley: most, including Brigham, returned to "Winter-Quarters." In 1848 he led four thousand of the faithful to Utah; and there he lived and ruled in a right kingly manner for thirty years, dying Aug. 29, 1877.

At his death the quorum of the twelve apostles became the ruling body of the church. Brigham Young, as "president," had two counsellors, or vice-presidents, who with him constituted the "First Presidency." But it is now an understood thing, that, when a president dies, the First Presidency falls, and rulership devolves upon the quorum of the twelve. John Taylor, who was in jail with the Smiths when they were killed, and who was himself wounded, was president of this quorum, and as such was chief of the church from Brigham's death until Oct. 10, 1880. At this last date he was chosen president of the church, and George Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith his counsellors. The present (1881) quorum of the twelve consists of the following, with one vacancy:—

Wilford Woodruff (president), Orson Pratt (made one of the first quorum at Kirtland, Feb. 14, 1835, and the only member of the present twelve who was a member of the first twelve), Charles C. Rich, Lorenzo Snow, Erastus Snow, Franklin D. Richards, Brigham Young (son of the late president), Albert Carrington, Moses Thatcher, Francis M. Lyman, John H. Smith.

THE BOOK OF MORMON, AND BOOK OF DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS.—These comprise the inspired writings, which, as modern "revelations," the Mormons place by the side of the ancient Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. Their own account of the Book of Mormon has been given above. The usual belief is, that the most of it was written by one Solomon Spaulding, a Presbyterian clergyman of Western Pennsylvania. He had been accustomed to maintain that the aborigines of America were the descendants of some of the tribes of Israel; and, in a time of infirm health, he wrote a kind of romance supporting this view. This he called the Manuscript Found, and tried to publish. In his work was much repetition of phrases common in Scripture, such as, "and it came to pass," and also the use of the names Lehi, Nephi, Moroni, Lamanites, etc. There is substantial evidence of the above-named facts. It is supposed that this manuscript fell into the hands of Joseph Smith, and that he, and perhaps Sidney Rigdon and others, introduced into it, and appended, in a style savoring strongly of revivalism, the large portion found in the Book of Mormon, touching the Lord Jesus Christ's descent in America soon after his ascension from Judea, and his organization of another apostolate, and establishment of another church, and his reiteration and enlargement of his wishes, doctrines, and commandments. The Book of Doctrine and Covenants is the collection of all the multifarious "revelations" that Joseph Smith claimed to receive, and promulgated, together with the one only written "revelation" put forth by Brigham Young, viz., at "Winter-Quarters" in 1847, to inspire and guide the Saints in their projected western pilgrimage through the wilderness.

Theoretically the Mormons hold the Bible and these two books to be the divinely inspired "Scriptures," of authority, and for guidance,—the Old Testament as addressed particularly to the Jewish Church; the New Testament, to the Judaic and European Christian Church; the Book of Mormon, to the "American" Christian Church; and the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, to the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints."

But practically, authority and guidance for them emanate from their living leaders; and few of either chiefs or masses read any of the four sacred books in order to know and ponder and follow the recorded teachings.

ORGANIZATION.—The hierarchy in the Mormon Church is of two classes of priesthood: the Melchisedec, which is the higher; and the Aaronic, which is the lesser. The Melchisedec priesthood includes the offices of apostle, seventy, patriarch or evangelist, high priest, and elder. All of these officers are elders; and their duties are to preach and baptize, to ordain other elders, and also priests, teachers, and deacons, to administer the Lord's Supper, to lay on hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, to bless children, and to take the lead of all meetings.

The Aaronic priesthood includes the offices of bishop, priest, teacher, and deacon. The bishop's is a spiritual office, the chief of the Aaronic priesthood, and yet is of most importance in its care of the temporal interests of the church. The priest's duty is to preach, baptize, administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and visit and exhort the Saints. The "teacher" is to the Mormons what the class-leader is to the Methodists, and the deacon is to help him.

In practical administration the president of the church, with his two counsellors, forming the First Presidency, is the sovereign authority. Then follow the twelve, the seventy, etc. In matters judicial, the Mormons have a system of their own of courts and appeals, somewhat on this wise:—

If two brethren cannot settle by themselves, or by the help of friends, any difference arising between them, then they come before their own bishop's court (a bishop is chief administrator over a ward in a city, or a certain territory in the country): this court consists of the bishop and his two counsellors. Every city, or "stake," including a chief town and surrounding towns, has its president, with two counsellors; and this president has a high council of chosen men. If the litigants before the bishop's court are not satisfied, they may appeal to this high council, and, if not satisfied there, they may appeal to the High Council, consisting of twelve high priests pertaining to the First Presidency; and, if still unsatisfied, one more appeal remains,—to the First Presidency itself.

DOCTRINES.—The Saints adopt the Bible and their own two sacred books as their inspired Scriptures. They believe in and carefully practise baptism by immersion, and baptism for remission of sins may be repeated whenever needed. They bless little children, but baptize none under the age of eight. They confirm by the laying-on of hands of the elders. They celebrate the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, usually every Sunday, and using water instead of wine, in accordance with one of Joseph Smith's "revelations," that, where they could not use wine of their own making, it was not an essential to the sacrament. They are anthropomorphists, teaching plainly that God exists in form of a man. Brigham once boldly preached, "Adam is our Father and our God, and the only God with whom we have to do." They are Arians, making Jesus Christ the Son of God, but of another and different substance from the Father. They are Macedonians, esteeming the Holy Spirit as no person, but only an influence or emanation. They believe in the pre-existence of human spirits. Multitudes of these spirits are now in a waiting-place, desiring to come to earth; for it is only through the way of fleshly embodiments that they can reach the final bliss of their perfected being; hence it is a work of great benevolence to provide earthly bodies into which they may come to tabernacle. They are millenarians; many of the devout believing, that, when the great temple in Salt Lake City is finished, the Lord Jesus Christ will descend to earth again, and reign with his saints for a thousand years. They practise baptism for the dead. The disembodied spirits of those who were not privileged to know on earth this gospel of the last dispensation may know of it now in the spirit-world, and by repentance and faith may be saved by it unto the perfection of bliss, if only some kinsman or friend yet in the flesh shall be baptized for them, for the remission of sins, by the earthly priesthood. They keep the first Thursday of every month as a day of fasting, on which the earnest ones gather together for prayer, and "bearing testimony," and bring the food saved by self-denial to the bishop, to be given to the poor of his cure. They believe in and practise polygamy. In the Book of Mormon polygamy is forbidden: in the earlier "revelations" of Joseph Smith it was distinctly reprobated; but it was sanctioned in a "revelation" claimed to have been given to Smith at Nauvoo, July 12, 1843, though the said "revelation" was not promulgated till in the fall of 1852, in Salt Lake City, by Brigham Young. They practise certain secret and mysterious ordinances known as "endowments." To the faithful Mormon these are made to seem precious initiatory rites, whereby he is advanced in his knowledge of the true faith, and exalted by the possession of new privileges: in reality, they are a sort of crudely acted religious drama, not unlike the "miracle-plays" of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

The Deity and Satan, Adam and Eve, and others are persons of the drama. In its course there is a jumble of washings and anointings, of grips and key-words and new names, and of the investiture of each of the initiated in an endowment robe; which sacred undergarment is always thereafter to be worn next to the person, carefully shrouding it at the last for its burial. There are also prayers and solemn promises, and awful oaths, with penalties more awful appended. And only by taking their "endowments" is the marriage of man and wife so consecrated as to be fully authorized and thoroughly blessed. It has been charged against the endowment rites, that they are scenes of indeecency and licentiousness; but probably the charge is false. Absurd, irreverent, and even blasphemous, doubtless they are, but, it is to be believed, not indecent. Among the oaths taken is one of resentful hostility to the American nation for not avenging the death of Joseph Smith, or righting the persecution of the Saints. The drama is continued for nearly a whole day, and these Mormon "mysteries" are well calculated to imprint themselves deeply and sternly upon the fanatical persons admitted to them. It is not too much to claim the secret "endowment" ceremonies as a powerful agency in weaving around the participants an iron band of awe and dread, of slavish obedience and compulsory brotherhood, and in ministering an unpatriotic, if not treasonable, bent to the Mormon system.

Brigham said, endowments are "to receive all those ordinances in the house of the Lord, which are necessary for you, after you have departed this life, to enable you to walk back to the presence of the Father, passing the angels who stand as sentinels, being enabled to give them the key-words, the signs and tokens, pertaining to the holy priesthood, and gain your eternal exaltation in spite of earth and hell."

They believe the day of miracles has not ceased, but that many such have been wrought, especially healings of the sick, in the time and by the power of this "Latter-Day" dispensation. And they believe in giving one-tenth of their income and increase to the building of the temples, and insuring the progress of the church.

SCISMMS.—One only that is of any considerable importance now exists, known as the "Josephite." The Josephites are so called after Joseph Smith, the son of the prophet, their chief. They call themselves the "Re-organized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints." They have headquarters at Plano, Ill., and maintain a few preachers in Utah, who do not, however, make much headway. They repudiate polygamy (say that the prophet never taught it), brand Brigham as a usurper, and claim that Smith the son is the rightful successor of the father in the leadership of the church. Just after the prophet's death there were Rigdonites and Straughtes, resisting Brigham's assumption of the succession. And in Utah there have been Morrisites, reproaching Brigham that he was so barren of "revelations;" and Godbe-ites, refusing to submit to Brigham's dictation in the domain of matters civil and commercial. But the Josephites alone, as an organized body, have been able to withstand dissolution.

STATISTICS.—When the Mormons entered the Valley of the Salt Lake, in 1847, the region belonged to Mexico. By the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, in March, 1848, it and a good deal of other territory was ceded to the United States; but no civil government was provided by Congress until the Organic Act, of Sept. 9, 1850, created the Territory of Utah. More than a year before this, the Mormons organized for themselves the "State of Deseret" (a word meaning honey-bee in "reformed Egyptian"), elected Brigham governor, and sent a delegate to Washington to ask admission into the Union.

Utah has an area of 84,476 square miles. By the United States census of 1880, its population is 74,470 males, and 69,436 females; total, 143,906. Of these, perhaps 18,000 are Gentiles. Then, besides the 125,000 Mormons in Utah, probably there are 25,000 more in the Territories of Idaho, Arizona, and Wyoming, and in the States of California, Nevada, Iowa, and Illinois. And, in addition to the 150,000 in America, doubtless as many more of the Saints are to be found in the Kingdom and Colonies of Great Britain, and in Scandinavia, Germany, Switzerland, and the Sandwich Islands, making about 300,000 of them in all. Mormonism was first preached in Great Britain by the apostles Kimball and Hyde, in 1837. And from the first, the British mission, and of late the Scandinavian mission, have been most vigorous and fruitful nurseries for their church. In 1842 there were 8,265 Mormons in Great Britain; and in 1852, 32,339. And from 1,000 to 3,000 "gather" annually to Utah from Europe.

Salt Lake City has about 21,000 inhabitants, is situated nearly twenty miles from the Great Salt Lake, and is 4,300 feet above the level of the sea.

The corner-stone of the great temple at Salt Lake, to be built of splendid granite, and with foundation-walls twenty feet thick, was laid April 6, 1853. It is about half finished, and has already cost more than $1,500,000. The 125,000 Saints in Utah pay nearly $1,000,000 of tithing yearly. A perpetual emigration fund is managed by the authorities of their church. As early as 1853, there were in it $34,000. From this fund loans are made to the poorer Saints abroad to make possible their emigration. When they get to Utah, they are obligated to pay back the loan into the fund as promptly as possible.

PRESENT SOURCES OF THE STRENGTH OF MORMONISM.—It may suffice to mention three principal ones.

1. Religious Earnestness.—It is a mistake to count the Mormons a mere horde of sensualized barbarians. Sidney Rigdon was a type of the fervent religious enthusiasm which pervaded the belief and obedience of the early converts. And the British mission especially has always had, and now has, in its large numbers of devout, God-fearing people. The exodus from Nauvoo presented itself as a winnowing van, and the fair-weather followers disappeared. It is remarkable how much of contentment, temperance, heroism, and strivings after the golden age of a real brotherhood, remained, and pushed hopefully westward. It is true, that the religious fanaticism of the Mormons entails deplorable results. It calls for implicit obedience to the "priesthood;" and that kind of obedience changes fair-minded and kind-hearted men into unjust and unfeeling agents of a despotic system. Witness the exceptional favor with which the "blood atonement" idea, viz., that it is good to slay the body to save the soul, is regarded in the Mormon community. And the same "obedience" fired the whole people, in 1857, to the fierce resolve not to allow their governor, Brigham Young, to be superseded by his lawfully appointed successor, Cumming, and not to suffer the United States troops, under Col. Sidney Johnston, to enter their territory. And witness the atrocious massacre, in the fall of 1857, at Mountain Meadows, of a hundred and twenty men and women, emigrants of Arkansas en route to California; and also the dastardly murder of Dr. J. K. Robinson in Salt Lake City, in October, 1866. So fanaticism outworks frenzy and cruelty. And yet, without doubt, the element most promotive of vigorous unity among the Mormons, making them strong to bear, and tenacious to hold, and powerful to act, is the firm belief in the hearts of the masses, that these are the "latter days," and they are the chosen saints thereof, wielding the powers, and holding forth the knowledge, of the true faith for this world, and getting ready for a no distant supreme exaltation in the next.

2. Organization.—One need not study long to note how thoroughly and skilfully organized for power the Mormons are. One will direct. (In Brigham's time this was pre-eminently true.) And by ecclesiastical communications and telegraphic wires the direction is speedily known unto the utmost limit of the land of their habitation, and promptly the entire massed body moves in the line directed. Meetings of the high councils, quorums, bishop's courts, teachers, etc., are everywhere held with great frequency. So a vivid and intelligent interest in the "church" is perpetuated throughout all the valleys and outlying districts. Petty offices abound in the system: greater offices are rewards. Twice every year, on the 6th of April and 6th of October, general conferences of the whole body are held. At each and every one of these, the people, by a show of hands, vote to sustain the principal officers of their organization; but the "quorums," in private sessions, have arranged all these names beforehand. At each conference, also, scores of names are promulgated of those called as missionaries to go abroad to preach the "gospel." And within a month or two all these go, largely without purse or scrip; and they do preach fervently, and successfully make converts. And the income from tithes builds meeting-houses and tabernacles and temples, and furnishes supplies to fill up gaps, and tide over difficulties in working the system.

The Perpetual Emigration Fund is of most practical efficiency to swell their numbers, and increase their strength.

There is no organization on earth, unless it be that founded by Ignatius Loyola, that is so well fitted as the Mormon to interest and keep loyal its members, to combine their faculties and forces, and to move that combination with efficiency and power whithersoever one master will dictates.

3. Polygamy.—In one sense, polygamy is a weakness to Mormonism. It arrays woman's nature in rebellion to the system, and arouses the detestation of Christian civilization. And since 1862 it has put the Mormons in the attitude of disobedience and defiance to the laws of their country. There are no laws of Utah Territory against polygamy, and, indeed, no territorial laws whatever about marriage anyway. All the members of the territorial Legislature being Mormons, this is to be expected. From 1817 to 1862, therefore, it may be said that the Mormons in Utah violated no statute law in practising polygamy. But in 1862 Congress enacted a statute prohibiting polygamy in the Territories of the United States. Since then, at least, all who have contracted plural marriages in Utah are plain violators of law. With decency, civilization, Christianity, and statute law arrayed against polygamy, it may seem strange that it can be rated else than an element of weakness in the Mormon institution, and destined one day to draw destruction upon the system. And yet there are senses in which polygamy contributes unity and strength to Mormonism. Because, first, it ostracises the Mormons from all the rest of civilized mankind; and the forces of repulsion from "the world" drive the Saints in upon themselves, to be welded closer together, and to stay each other up for countenance and protection. And again: the unfortunate women committed to the practice of polygamy, and the children begotten from it, even if they become, as often they do, malecontent and fiercely hating, know themselves to be caught in a net from which they see no escape; and they remain in their place and practice, because, though their hearts are broken, their homes are saved by a religious sanction from foul disgrace. And once more: the thousands who are not polygamists (for be it remarked that not more than one Mormon married man out of six Mormon married men in Utah is a polygamist) will uphold polygamy heartily, because some near kinsfolk, as sisters or daughters, are practisers of it. Such as these, therefore, though not in polygamy (and many of them disliking it, and some detesting it), will yet stand up for it; and for them, too, with the actual practisers, it becomes a bond, binding all together into a unity amazingly compact and unbreaking.

[THE MORMONS AND THE UNITED-STATES GOVERNMENT. — In March, 1849, the Mormons organized their territory into the State of Deseret ("the land of the honey-bee"); but Congress refused to recognize it, and, instead, called their country Utah Territory. President Fillmore appointed Brigham Young governor, and United-States courts were set up. The next year Brigham Young led in an open revolt against United-States laws, drove out the United-States officials, and successfully resisted all attempts to supersede him in the governorship, until in 1858, through the diplomacy of Mr. Thomas L. Kane, an understanding was effected between the Mormon leaders and Gov. Cumming, the nominee of President Buchanan, whereby the governor was allowed to take his seat in the capital of the Territory. For the first two years an armed force was kept up in the Territory, but in 1860 it was withdrawn. In 1879 the secretary of state for the United States addressed a circular to the United-States ministers in Great Britain, Germany, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, instructing them to call the attention of the governments to which they were accredited to the laws of the United States against polygamy, and to request that the governments take steps to prevent Mormon efforts to gain converts. In 1882 the Edmunds Bill to legislate polygamy out of existence passed Congress.]

DANIEL S. TUTTLE
(Missionary Bishop of Idaho and Utah, Salt Lake City, Utah).

MORNING LECTURES. Neale gives the following account of these famous sermons, which have been declared to be "one of the best compends of theology in the English language," and which were published under the title Morning Exercises at Cripplegate, St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and in Southwark, being divers sermons preached A.D. 1659-1689, by several ministers of the gospel in or near London, London, 8 vols. quarto, republished, London, 1844, 6 vols., under the editorial care of James Nichols. "The opening of the war [between Parliament and King Charles I.] gave rise to an exercise of prayer, and exhortation to repentance, for an hour every morning in the week. Most of the citizens of London having some near relation or friend in the army of the Earl of Essex, so many bills were sent up to the pulpit every Lord's Day for their preservation, that the minister had neither time to read them, nor to recommend their cases to God in prayer: it was therefore agreed, by some London divines, to separate an hour for this purpose every morning, one half to be spent in prayer, and the other in a suitable exhortation to the people" (Hist. Puritans, Harper's ed., vol. i. p. 424). These services were held in various churches consecutively, and, after the end of the war, were continued, until the Revolution, in a modified form; the sermons taking up points of practical divinity.

MOROCCO, a sultauate of north-western Africa, bounded by Algeria, the Mediterranean, the Atlantic, and Sahara, comprises an area of about two hundred and sixty thousand square miles, with a population variously estimated at from two to fifteen millions. The bulk of the population are Moors, Berbers, Arabs, and negroes, who have been brought into the country from the Soudan as slaves: all those tribes are Mohammedans. In the cities live some thousand Jews and a few hundred Spanish Roman Catholics and English Protestants. No missionary attempts have as yet been made in the country.

MORONE, Giovanni de, b. at Milan, Jan. 25, 1509; d. in Rome, Dec. 1, 1580. He pursued his studies at Padua, and was appointed bishop of Modena in 1536, cardinal in 1542, bishop of Novara in 1548, and dean of the Sacrum Collegi un in 1561. Like Contarini, Fregoso, Reginald Pole, and others, he arrived, independently of Luther's teaching, to the evangelical doctrines of justification by faith, of the insufficiency of good works, of the superstition of the worship of saints and relics, etc.; and his stay in Germany, whither he was sent in 1536 by Paul III. as nuncio to King Ferdinand, could not but confirm him in his views. Protestants had appeared in his diocese as early as 1530. By Paolo Ricci they were formed into a congregation, and in 1541 Luther addressed a letter to that congregation. Meanwhile the bishop did not interfere; nay, he even authorized the spreading of the book, Del beneficio di Gesu Christo crocifisso verso i christiani, printed at Modena in 1542, among his flock. Nevertheless, that strength of character which makes a man a reformer he had not; and when the Italian Inquisition was established, in 1542, he began to waver. Under Paul IV. (1555-59) he was, nevertheless, accused of heresy, and imprisoned; and he was not released until the accession of Pius IV., who declared him innocent, and re-instated him in his offices. Very characteristic is the remark with which, in the next last sitting of the Council of Trent, he summed up what the council had accomplished: "Perhaps something more could have been expected; but God will make out of that which has been done a way to something better." See FRICK, in SCHELHOORN's Amanitates literariæ, vol. 12; MÜNCH: Vermischte hist. Schriften, ii. C. SCHMIDT.

MORRIS, Thomas Asbury, b. in Kanawha County, Va., April 28, 1794; d. in Springfield, O., Sept. 2, 1871. He was brought up in the Baptist faith, but joined the Methodists, and was licensed 1814, and received as a travelling preacher into the Ohio Conference, 1816. He travelled as an itinerant over Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee until 1834, when he became the first editor of the Western Christian Advocate. In 1836 he was elected bishop, and labored successfully until 1868, when he retired in old age and weak health. He issued from the Methodist Book Concern a volume of Sermons, of which fifteen hundred copies had been sold up to 1852 (Allibone), Miscellany, 1837, and Church Polity, 1859. Marlay says, "As a presiding officer he was the beau ideal of a Methodist bishop. He had rare practical wisdom, quick and accurate judgment, and inflexible decision." See MARLAY: Life of Bishop Morris, New York, 1875.

MORRISON, Robert, the father of Protestant missions in China; b. at Buller's Green, Morpeth, Northumberland, Jan. 5, 1782; d. at Canton, Aug. 1, 1834. His father was an elder in the United Presbyterian Church, and, after giving his son a primary-school education, took him into his shop, his business being last-making. The boy, however, had a decided inclination for study; took up Latin, Hebrew, and theology, under a Presbyterian minister, and afterwards attended Hoxton Academy in England. His mother died in 1802. In 1801 he offered himself to the London Missionary Society; was appointed the first missionary to China; entered their training-institution at Gosport; took up the study of Chinese under a Chinaman resident there; and on Jan. 31, 1807, sailed, by way of New York, for Canton, where he arrived Sept. 8. He at first dressed in Chinese costume, but subsequently removed it. He became interpreter for the East-India Company, and engaged assiduously in the translation of the Bible into Chinese, the preparation of Chinese tracts and a dictionary. In 1808 he was married to Miss Morton, who died in 1821. He revised and published a Chinese version of the Acts in 1811; issued an original Chinese catechism, and in 1815 a Chinese grammar, which was printed by the Serampore presses in India. In 1813 he completed, with the assistance of Rev. Mr. Milne, the translation of the entire New Testament. The Gospels, the closing Epistles from Hebrews, and Revelation, were the work of Mr. Morrison's hand. In conjunction with the same fellow-missionary, he made a version of the Old Testament; so that the entire Bible was printed in 1819. He also made a translation of The Morning and Evening Prayers of the Church of England. His most laborious literary work was his Chinese Dictionary, published by the East-India Company, at an expense of twelve thousand pounds, in 1821. It is a work of great industry and scholarship. The type, which Professor Williams says was "by far the most expensive font of type ever made," was burned up in 1856. Mr. Morrison also founded the Anglo-Chinese College at Malacca, which, however, was never very successful, and was removed in 1845 to Hong Kong. In 1817 he was made doctor of divinity by Glasgow University, and in 1824 paid a visit to England, returning, two years later, to China, having married a second time. Mr. Morrison added to his literary and civil labors private efforts to spread the gospel. The public proclamation of the gospel was forbidden. In 1814, "at a spring of water issuing from the foot of a lofty hill by the seaside in Macao, away from human observation, he baptized his first Chinese convert, Tsai-Ako, a man twenty-seven years of age." In 1830 he welcomed Messrs. Bridgman and Abeel as his first fellow-missionaries from the American churches. After his death, his remains were taken to Macao, where they still rest; the site being marked by an appropriate inscription testifying to his devotion as a missionary and his eminence as a Chinese scholar. Although his translations and dictionary have been superseded by better ones (Professor Williams), his name will always have an honorable place beside those of Martyn, Judson, Carey, Williams, and other workers in the heroic age of modern missions. Morrison, D.D.*, compiled by his widow, with Critical Notices of his Chinese Works by SAMUEL KIDD, 2 vols., London, 1839; MILNE: Retrospect of the First Ten Years of the China Mission; S. MORSE, Jedediah, D.D., b. at Woodstock, Conn., Aug. 23, 1761; d. in New Haven, June 9, 1826. He was graduated at Yale College, 1783; acted as tutor there, and ministered to the First Congregational Church of Charlestown, Mass., from 1783 to 1820. He was especially prominent in the Unitarian controversy. From 1806 to 1811 he edited The Panoplist, a religious magazine which he had founded. He is "the father of American geography," having issued in 1784 at New Haven, for the use of schools, the first work of the kind in America. He later on much improved upon this first book. He also wrote, A Compendious History of New England, Cambridge, 1804; Annals of the American Revolution, Hartford, 1824. See WILLIAM B. SPRAGUE: Life of Jedediah Morse, New York, 1875.—Sidney Edward, son of the preceding; b. at Charlestown, Mass., Feb. 7, 1794; d. in New-York City, Dec. 23, 1871. He was graduated at Yale College, 1811; studied law; entered journalism; established two religious newspapers, The Boston Recorder (1815), and, in connection with his brother Richard Cary Morse (Charlestown, June 18, 1795; d. at Kissingen, Germany, Sept. 22, 1868), The New-York Observer, 1823. The two brothers edited the paper jointly until 1858, when the control passed to Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D.D. Mr. S. E. Morse issued several atlases. His brother was Samuel Finley Breese Morse, the inventor of the electric telegraph; b. at Charlestown, Mass., April 27, 1791; d. in New York, April 2, 1872. See his Life by Dr. PRIME, New York, 1875.

MORTAR. See MILLS.

MORTIFICATION. "Any severe penance observed on a religious account" is held in some branches of the Church to be an effectual way of winning the favor of God. But such austerities are often considered substitutes for obedience to God's commands; and the doers of them relax their effort to serve God continually, hoping by future austerity to atone for present sin. The truth is, God does not call upon us to mutilate or injure our bodies in any way, but does ask us to give him our hearts. To one who loves God, penance is superfluous, while penitence is continual. See PENANCE.

MORTMAIN (French, mort, "dead," and main, "hand") denotes a peculiar placement of property, so that it becomes more or less completely withdrawn from circulation, and, so to speak, held by a dead hand. Thus in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the Roman-Catholic Church was in possession of nearly one-half of the whole national wealth of Germany, of more than one-third of all real estate in England, etc. In order to prevent such an accumulation of wealth, so utterly destructive to the economical balance of society, laws of amortisation, limiting the right of an institution to acquire and hold landed property, were enacted in Germany from the thirteenth century, in England beginning with the Magna Charta; and so necessary were such laws, that they were adopted even in the ecclesiastical principalities of Germany, as, for instance, in Mayence, 1574, 1650, 1660. In English legislation, a long series of mortmain statutes reaches from Magna Charta to George II.

MORTON, John, b. at Bere, Dorsetshire, Eng., 1410; d. at Knoll, Kent, Sept. 15, or Oct. 16, 1500; studied canon and civil law in Baliol College, Oxford, and began to practise law in the Court of Arches, London. Having been introduced to Henry VI. by Cardinal Bouchier, he was made a member of the privy council, and received, after his ordination, a prodigious number of ecclesiastical benefices. By Edward IV. he was made bishop of Ely (1478); but Richard III. suspected him, and put him in prison. He escaped to the Continent, where he made the acquaintance of Henry VII., after whose accession to the throne he returned to England. In 1486 he was made archbishop of Canterbury, and in 1493 a cardinal. He was a man of great practical ability, and a shrewd politician. Nor was his reign as archbishop of Canterbury without influence on the history of the English Church, though his investigations of its then corrupted state led to no actual reforms. See WILLIAMS: Lives of the English Cardinals, London, 1862, 2 vols.

MORTON, Nathaniel, b. in England, 1612; d. at Plymouth, June 28, 1685; came to America in 1623; and was in 1645 appointed secretary of the Plymouth Colony. He wrote, besides an Ecclesiastical History of the Plymouth Church, in its records, New England's Memorial, or a brief Relation of the Providence of God manifested to the Planters of New England (1620-46), Cambridge, 1669, edited with notes by Judge Davis, 1826, and with notes by the Congregational Board, 1855.

MORTON, Thomas, b. at York, March 20, 1561; d. at Easton Maudit, Northamptonshire, Sept. 22, 1659; studied theology in St. John's College, Cambridge, and was appointed chaplain to the Earl of Huntingdon, 1599, and to James I., 1606. In 1615 he was made bishop of Chester, in 1618 of Lichfield, and in 1632 of Durham; but from this last position he was dismissed by the dissolution of the episcopate, and lived afterwards in retirement. He was a learned man, and an ardent champion of Protestantism against Romanism. Of his writings, the principal ones are Apologia Catholica, 1605; An exact Discovery of Romish Doctrine in the Case of Conspiracy and Rebellion, 1605; A Catholick Appeal for Protestants, 1610; Causa Regia, 1620 (against Bellarmine), etc. His life was written by John Barwick, 1660, and by Richard Baddily and John Naylor, 1669.

MORTUARY, in the ecclesiastical law of England, denotes a present offered by a parishioner to his minister upon the death of some member of his household. In the time of Henry III. it was brought into the church together with the corpse, whence it was called "corpse-present." Having afterwards become the occasion of much exaction from the side of the clergy, the whole matter was finally settled by a statute of Henry VIII., which fixed a scale for mortuaries.

MORUS, Samuel Friedrich Nathanaël, b. at Laubau in Upper Lusatia, Nov. 30, 1736; d. at Leipzig, Nov. 11, 1792; studied theology and philology at Leipzig, and was appointed professor there in classical languages, 1768, and in theology, 1782. He was a pupil of Ernesti, and one of the most prominent representatives of the historico-grammatical method of exegesis inaugurated by him. He published a volume of sermons (1786), an Epitome Theologie Christiane (1791), a number of Dissertationes, i., 1787, ii., 1794, etc. See BECK: Recitatio de Moro, Leipzig, 1793; and HÖPFNER: Über das Leben des Morus, Leipzig, 1793.

MANGOLD.

MOSAIC LAW. See DECALOGUE, MOSES.

MOSCHUS, Johannes (also called Ἐγκρατής, Eucrata, corrupted Eviratus), lived, according to notices scattered through his own writings, during the reigns of Tiberius II., Mauritius, Phocas, and Heraclius. He was probably a native of Palestine, and spent many years as monk in the monastery of St. Theodosius in Jerusalem, as a hermit of the desert east of the Jordan, and as an innate of the laura of St. Sabas. Driven away by the invading Persians, he visited Egypt, where he staid for some time in Alexandria, Cyprus, and Rome, where he died, 619 or 620. His book (Λεγών, pratum spirituale) is a description of the lives and exploits of pious monks, hermits, and ecclesiastics, and was for centuries the favorite reading in all monasteries, both in the East and the West. It is written with great credulity, and without the least trace of critical sense, but contains, nevertheless, much valuable information concerning the history of the Church. According to Photius, it comprised 304 chapters: the editions now extant contain only 219. The best edition is that in Migne: Patr. Græc. 87. There is an Italian translation (1488), a Latin (1422), French, Arabic, etc. (See Fabricius, ix. p. 168.) An old life of him is found in Migne. WAGENMANN.

MOS'ES (מֹשֶׁה, "drawn out"), the liberator of Israel from the bondage of Egypt, and the founder to whom history, without a dissenting voice, ascribes the religious institutions of the Israelitish people; received the name "Moschah" on account of his wonderful deliverance in infancy (Exod. ii. 10). It is probable, from the fact that no other biblical character bears this name, that it was of Egyptian origin. The old derivation, still followed by many scholars, is the Egyptian mo ("water") and ulsche ("saved"), or mou ("water") and shi ("to take"): hence the spelling of the LXX., Μωϋσῆς ("Mouses"). All modern Egyptologists, however, declare themselves against this combination, and prefer the derivation mes, mesu ("child"). Born of the tribe of Levi, at a time when the Egyptian oppression was most severe, and an ordinance had gone out to destroy all the male children of the Israelites, he was placed by his mother, Jochebed (Exod. vi. 20), when he was three months old, in an ark in the Nile, where he was found by an Egyptian princess. It is probable that she was Bint-antha or Meri, daughters of Rameses II., whose residence seems at this time to have been Tanis (Zoan), where he was constructing large public works; or perhaps Thermut. According to Eusebius, the deliverer of Moses was called Merris; according to Josephus, Thermouthis, who is called Thermut on the monuments, and is identified by Ebers with the daughter of Setis I., who was at the same time the sister and wife of Rameses II. It was while the princess was bathing in the sacred Nile, to which the Egyptians attached much efficacy, that she found the child. By a happy combination of circumstances, its mother was appointed its nurse. This deliverance may be compared with the legendary deliverances of Semiramis, Cyrus, Romulus, etc., in infancy; but the circumstances of it accord exactly with the national customs and history of Egypt (Ebers), and it is not improbable that legends of similar deliverances were formed upon the basis of it (Ewald).

The deliverance and training of Moses were a providential preparation for his future work. He was "instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts vii. 22). Philo (Vita Mosis) exaggerates this statement when he says he was schooled in all the learning of Greece and the Orient. It is, however, altogether probable that he came into intimate relations with the priesthood, the patron of all learning; and Manetho (see Josephus: Contra Apion., I., 26, 9; 28, 12) affirms that he was at first priest of Osiris, and bore the name Osarsif, which was subsequently exchanged for Moses. The Bible knows nothing of the military career and the successful campaign against the Ethiopians, of which he was the leader, which Josephus ascribes to him (Antiq., II. 10). This historian even speaks of his marriage with an Ethiopian princess, Tharbis; and the Egyptologist Lauth finds a confirmation of this statement in a romantic episode related in the papyrus of Anastasi I. The fable, as Ebers has shown, may have come from confusing Moses with a certain Messi, "prince of Cush." The only circumstance which the Bible relates of this period is his murder of an Egyptian taskmaster (Exod. ii. 11 sq.), which forced him to flee to Midian in order to escape the wrath of the Pharaoh. In Midian—that is, the south-eastern portion of the Sinaitic peninsula—he acted as herdsman, and married the daughter of a priest called Reuel ("friend of God," Exod. ii. 18), or Jethro ("excellency," iv. 18, xviii. 1); one of which names was probably a title of honor.

The forced sojourn in the solitude of the wilderness was, like his life at court, adapted to prepare Moses for his work. He was taught his own impotency. The voice from the burning bush, which typified, not the continuance of Israel in spite of the oppressions of Egypt, but the condescension and indwelling of the holy God in mercy among his sinful people without consuming them (Hofmann, Kurtz, Lange), announces to him his mission, and the deliverance of the children of Israel, who should go forth from Egypt with a rich booty and many honors. Exod. iii. 21, xi. 2, xii., 35 do not at all refer to a mere borrowing of precious things. Moses, resisting at first, ultimately yields to the divine word of command, and receives signs attesting his mission, in the transformation of the rod into a serpent, and covering his hand with the marks of leprosy. Moses' last scruple on the score of his want of eloquence was met with the assurance that his brother Aaron should supply this defect (iv. 11 sqq.). Returning to Egypt with Aaron, they deliver their message; but the Pharaoh replies by increasing the oppression (Exod. v.); and finally they resort to the ten plagues, after Moses had transformed his rod into a serpent before the Pharaoh. The Egyptian magicians attempted to do the same thing, but the Hebrew does not necessitate the meaning that they actually succeeded in changing their rods into serpents (Kurtz, Köhler). The first nine plagues were in accord with the conditions of the country, and can be illustrated by natural calamities, but cannot be explained as mere natural phenomena. The tenth, the destruction of the first-born, probably by a pestilence, induced the Pharaoh to hearken to Moses' demand; and the people went forth enriched with gifts. The exodus occurred on the 15th of Abib, and started from the city of Rameses, which is not to be identified with Heliopolis (Josephus), but with Tanis (Brugsch, Köhler), which Rameses adorned with magnificent structures. [For the locality of the passage of the Red Sea, and other circumstances of the exodus, see Exod. v.] The Egyptians, repenting of their emancipation of the enslaved people, pursued after them, and followed into the open channel the waters had left. A panic, however, ensued in the darkness. A strong east wind suddenly started up, bringing the water down again with tremendous speed, and ingulfing chariot and rider. This wonderful deliverance at the Rêd Sea, Moses commemorated in the "Song on the Sea" (Exod. xv. 1 sqq.), whose authenticity ought not to be an occasion of dispute. This, the first national Hebrew song, has an unsurpassed majesty. It sings of the arm of the Lord and his mighty power as having accomplished the marvellous rescue.

The wanderings in the wilderness that followed were peculiarly well adapted to educate the people by forcing them to trust in God. They murmured incessantly; and only the divine care and provision of the pillar of cloud, the manna, the water from the rock, the quails, the victory over Amalek, through the mighty intercession of Moses and the sublime manifestation of God on Mount Sinai, could preserve and quiet the people. Arrived at Sinai, the people had a wonderful manifestation of the divine glory, and heard the divine voice. The covenant was established between Jehovah and his people through the mediation of Moses, and the law was given. The people fell away to the worship of the golden calf; but Moses found an occasion of showing the greatness of his nature, and, without regard to personal consequences, placed himself in the breach, offered himself as an expiation (Exod. xxxii. 30 sqq.), and rested not till the Lord had promised to lead the people on (Exod. xxxiii. 14 sq.). The people left Sinai after a year's encampment (comp. Num. x. 11 with Exod. xix. 1); but their murmuring against their leader continued, and they finally refused to go farther northwards towards Canaan, made timid by the report of the spies. Moses' earnest prayer now does not succeed in moving the divine mercy to alter the sentence that that generation should die without entering into the land of promise. The other years of the fruitless wanderings are almost entirely passed over by the sacred writer. (See WANDERINGS OF THE WILDERNESS.) In the first month of the fortieth year the Israelites were in Kadesh. They were still to meet with opposition from the Moabites and Edomites before crossing the Jordan. Both Aaron and Moses lost courage. The people's discontent was again punished by the visitation of the fiery serpents (Num. xxi. 6), the terrible destruction of whose bite was counteracted by the contemplation of a brazen serpent set up on a pole by Moses. But the life of Moses also came to a close with the conclusion of the forty years of the wandering. After dividing the transjordanic country, which had been conquered, amongst Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, and, according to Deuteronomy, once again repeating the precepts of the law, he prophesied to them in a song their ways and the ways of God (Deut. xxxii.). He was permitted to look down from Mount Nebo over the promised land, the goal of his hopes, but not to enter into it. He died there as he had lived,—in communion with God. His grave remained unknown, but the children of Israel bewailed him for thirty days as the greatest of their race.

Josephus follows the biblical account in his life of Moses (Antqq. II. 9–IV. 8), but adds new traditions. Philo, in his Life of Moses (Vita Mosis), contemplates him from the four aspects of king, lawgiver, high priest, and prophet. He draws his matter from the Pentateuch, and interprets the details allegorically. In a post-biblical age the life was furnished with legends, especially upon his childhood and death. The Assumption of Moses contains revelations purporting to have been given by Moses to Joshua before his death. The rabbinical book Petirat Mosche (edited by Gaulmyn, 1627, and Fabricius, 1711) dwells especially upon the latter point. Fantastic details are narrated in the Koran, and current among the Mohammedans, which were derived from rabbinical sources.

Looking at his personality as he is portrayed in the Bible, Moses appears before us animated, from his youth up, with a sense of justice and burning love for his people, educated in the school of God to become the "servant of the Lord" as there was none other in the Old Testament, and learning to check his own violent temper, and submit his will entirely to the Lord. Great was the burden he had to bear as the leader and father of a thankless and obstinate people. The fact that he was able to lead them for forty years without possessing any human power is an undying witness at once to his great intellectual ability and his patience and goodness of heart. He gave himself up without reserve to the welfare of his people; but he received little thanks, and sparse human co-operation in his work. He who was so wonderfully illumined of God, did not hesitate to take the counsel of his father-in-law (Exod. xviii. 13 sqq.), and magnanimously wished that all the people might receive the divine spirit (Num. xi. 29), found only a small hearing for his simplest revelations among the people. His brother Aaron proved unreliable (Exod. xxxii.), and, with his sister Miriam, intrigued against him (Num. xii.);—but he did not become angry. Most properly is he, therefore, called the meekest of all men (Num. xii. 3). This humility, however, was not weakness; and, where the divine honor was in the balances, he could be intensely severe (Exod. xxxii. 27). His office and mission were the greatest, Christ excepted, ever intrusted to a man.

Moses was prophet, a mouthpiece of the living God. The sublimity of the divine spirit is noticeable in all his words and acts. This spiritual and moral greatness elevates him far above Mohammed. Of him it is said more frequently than of all other mortals together, that God spoke with him. More often than any other is he called by the name "servant of Jehovah." He was incomparably the prophet (Num. xii. 6 sqq.; Deut. xxxiv. 10), great alike in word and deed. With him the Lord spake face to face. The divine glory beamed from his face (Exod. xxxiv. 29 sqq.). He, however, like other mortals, dared not look upon the face of God (Exod. xxxiii. 17 sqq.); and Spinoza properly says, "If Moses spoke face to face as a man does with his friend, Christ communed directly through the mind with God." But to Moses was accorded a plainer knowledge of the divine will, and more constant communion with God, than to any of the other prophets of the Old Testament.

It is impossible to exaggerate the historical importance of Moses. He not only brought to Israel deliverance, and helped it to a national existence; according to the uniform tradition, he was the human founder of the theocracy, the mediator between Jehovah and Israel. From his time on, Israel's God was Jehovah, — that sublimest of the divine names, which designates the divine being as a living person who makes himself known to his people by word and deed, and desires their worship (Exod. xix. 6). The conception which Moses had of Jehovah was not that of a national God, but of Him to whom the whole earth belongs, before whom all peoples must bow (Exod. xix. 5), and whose glory must fill the earth (Num. xiv. 21). The will was expressed in the law given to Moses on Mount Sinai, which included rules for secular and religious life, for public and private conduct. They constitute an organic whole. The Decalogue, which was engraved on stone tables, introduces them both in the Books of Exodus and Deuteronomy, and was designed to be made prominent as the fundamental law. The law of love to God (Deut. vi. 4 sq.) is likewise underscored, and often repeated (x. 12, xi. 13, xxx. 6, 20); while the law of love to one's neighbor is not forgotten (Lev. xix. 18). It was this system of law which made Israel a nation.

It is not possible to determine that the Pentateuch is of Mosaic origin with the same certainty as that Moses was the founder of the Israelitish nation. It must be granted that he possessed peculiar talents, and enjoyed peculiar advantages, for writing the code of laws; and that he wrote down the divine laws which he received, is to be assumed in one brought up at the Egyptian court. The law, as it is found in the Pentateuch, contains reminiscences of Egypt (Exod. xx. 2; Deut. v. 6, 15; Lev. xix. 34, xxv. 42, xxvi. 45; Num. xv. 14), although the Egyptian influence on the law and worship of the Israelites has usually been exaggerated since Spencer. A large portion of the law also presupposes the sojourn of Israel in the wilderness. There is nowhere evidence of an advanced stage of national life. The people is nomadic, agricultural, and unrefined (Exod. xxi., xxii., etc.). Notwithstanding this, the law does not seem to have come from one mould, and may have been altered or augmented in some details, even after Moses' death. In this case we must hold, that, from time to time, men of God incorporated precepts into the body of the Mosaic code. The trunk, however, of the law of the Pentateuch is Mosaic; and we believe that a sound criticism will return to the view that the regulations of worship in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, are of Mosaic origin. [See PENTATEUCH.] Moses is properly regarded as the father of Jewish historiography, although the entire description of his own life did not originate with him.

As the mediator of the old covenant, Moses is accorded a place of peculiar pre-eminence by Christ and the apostles. The essential point is, that he was regarded as the founder of the theocracy. The entire old covenant is personified in him (John v. 45 sq.). He is mentioned with the prophets as the lawgiver (Luke xvi. 29), and especially in conjunction with Elijah (Matt. xvii. 3). He also represents the entire old covenant, in which the law predominated, in contrast to the new. The law was given by Moses; grace and truth came by Jesus Christ (John i. 18).

MOSÉS CHORENENSIS, b., probably, in the beginning of the fifth century, at Chorni, a place in the Armenian province of Taron; was one of the young scholars sent by Sahak and Mesrob to Athens and Alexandria, to study Greek, and became then bishop of Bagrevaud, after the death of Eznik, but retired into solitude between 460 and 470, on account of the Persian invasion, and died, it is said, a hundred and twenty years old. A great number of translations from Greek into Armenian is by the Mekhitarists ascribed to him. More certain, however, is his original authorship. His chief work is his History of Armenia, in four books, of which, however, the last one has become lost. Though this work has lost much of its authority since A. von Gutschmid subjected it to a minute examination (see the memoirs of the Kön. Sächsisch. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaft, 1876, 1–43), it is still the principal source of Armenian history, and interesting in various respects. It was first published in Amsterdam, 1695, then, with a Latin translation by Whiston, London, 1736, and last, with a French translation by Le Vaillant de Florival, Venice, 1836. Among his other works are a Handbook of Geography, first printed at Marseille, 1683, then by Whiston, London, 1736, last, with a French translation and commentary by St. Martin, Paris, 1819; a work on rhetoric, published, with notes and commentaries by Zohrab, Venice, 1796; a number of hymns still used in the Armenian Church, etc. VON SPIEGEL.

MOSHEIM, Johann Lorenz von, the most learned theologian of the Lutheran Church of his age, and author of a History of the Christian Church; b. at Lübeck, Oct. 9, 1693 or 1694 (or perhaps later); d. at Göttingen, Sept. 9, 1755. He entered the university of Kiel in 1716, and as a student attracted not only the attention of his professors, but also of men like Leibnitz and Buddens, by his German and Latin writings. In 1719 he became a member of the faculty of philosophy, taught logic and metaphysics, and preached, exciting much admiration by his sermons. In 1723 he accepted a call as professor (ordinarius) to Helmstädt. Among his other writings up to this time were the Indicia Antiquæ Christianorum Disciplinae (Kiel, 1720) and Observationes Sacre (Amsterdam, 1721). During his residence at Helmstädt, honors and ecclesiastical sinecures were lavishly heaped upon him by several administrations. He became more and more the main support and pillar of this university, whose influence was rapidly waning before the newly established institution at Göttingen. After refusing repeated invitations to the latter, he accepted a call in 1747, the office of chancellor being created especially for him. He, however, did not enjoy the same freedom and authority at Göttingen as at Helmstädt; and he frequently wished himself back in the old position.

Mosheim was not only the most learned theologian in the Lutheran Church of his day, but was also one of the first German authors and scholars of his age. There was no one who wrote such a pure style, with such elegant fluency, and so much felicity of expression, as he. He was also master of an elegant Latin style. This æsthetic quality was ministered to by his early acquaintance with the literature of England, France, and Italy. As a theologian he occupied an intermediate position between the extremes of pietism and deism. He was opposed to the confessional orthodoxy on the ground that theology would thus be excluded from scientific culture. He occupied a position similar to that occupied by Calixtus.

Among his many writings, those on historical subjects display best the range of his learning and his general view, as well as the particularity of his observations and the reproduction of the smallest details, his art of terse delineation, and his faithful representation of the lights and shadows, with a partiality, however, for the former. His work on universal church history [written in Latin under the title, Institutiones Hist. Eccl. N. T., Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1726-55; Eng. trans. by Maclaine, 1765-68] was not finished till the year of his death. In his preface to the revised edition [eighth] of the earlier volumes (1755), he states that he thought seriously of entirely setting aside the arrangement according to the subject-matter which he had chosen in the first place, and making the arrangement to conform solely to chronological divisions, as his friends had urged him, on the ground of its convenience for teaching purposes. Church history had usually been written in the interests of the orthodox party as against the heretical sects. Arnold, on the other hand, had reversed this method. Mosheim, in his work, took the stand-point of an impartial observer and critic. He was specially prepared to write the sections on the history of doctrines by his previous studies in Greek philosophy, and his Latin translation (with notes, Jena, 1733) of Cudworth's Intellectual System. He also wrote a larger work on the first three Christian centuries, under the title, De rebus Christianorum ante Constantinum Magnam Commentarii, Helmstädt, 1753 [Eng. trans. by Murdock, New York, 1852, 2 vols., 5th ed., New York, 1854, 3 vols.], and a history of heresies, under the title, Ketzer-Geschichte, 2d ed., 2 vols., Helmstädt, 1748. Mosheim left no school of church history behind him: Schröckh, however, was an admiring disciple of his.

Mosheim also made contributions to nearly every branch of theological science. His most important work in the department of systematic theology was his Sittenlehre d. heil. Schrift., 5 vols.,

Helmstädt, 1735-53, etc., in which he considers the matter under two heads: (1) "The internal holiness of the soul," and (2) "The external holiness of conduct which the law of Christ requires from a Christian." As a preacher, Mosheim was much admired by his contemporaries; and his sermons, published in 7 vols. (1725 and often), were highly esteemed as models of sermonic method. For other writings of Mosheim, see BAUR: Epochen d. kirchl. Geschichtschreibung, pp. 128 sqq. Compare LÜCKE: Narratio de Moshemio, Göttingen, 1837. HENKE.

MOSQUE (from Arabic masjéd, "a house of prayer") is the Mohammedan place of worship. The first one was built by Mohammed himself at Medina, in a graveyard opposite to the spot where his camel knelt on his public entrance into that city. The most famous mosques are Masjéd el Nebi ("the Mosque of the Prophet") at Medina, replacing the original one; El-Hamram at Mecca, enclosing the Kaabah; Santa Sophia in Constantinople, originally a Greek basilica; the Mosque of Achnud, in the same city; that of Omar, in the Haram enclosure at Jerusalem; the Great Mosque, at Damascus; the mosque at Hebron; and the alabaster mosque of Mehemet Ali, at Cairo. The most elaborate mosque is the Great Mosque at Delhi, built by Shah Jehan (1631-37). Mosques are found, of course, in every Mohammedan settlement, and vary as much in cost and beauty as do our churches; but in general features they are alike, and consist of a domed building, a court with a fountain, in which ablutions are performed prior to entering (and often several of these), a minaret or tower, from which the muezzin calls the faithful to prayer. Inside they are open spaces, devoid of pictorial ornamentation, except by quotations from the Koran, often beautifully done, upon the walls. They contain the mihrab (a niche surmounted by a vaulted arch), towards which the faithful pray, because it is placed in the direction of Mecca; and the menber, or platform-pulpit, upon which the ministers stand during service. Frequently, if not always, one sees a number of ostrich-eggs suspended from the ceiling directly before the mihrab: these symbolize immortality. The bareness of a mosque — no seats, no pictures, no statues — is in striking contrast with the ornate though tawdry ornamentation of the Roman and Greek churches; for instance, as they exist side by side in Jerusalem. The mosque is a composite building, in that its dome is Byzantine, its minaret is the Christian campanile, without its bell, forbidden in Mohammedan worship (see art. BELLS), while the court is like a khann. Women are occasionally seen in the fore part of mosques. The Mohammedan removes his slippers before entering: the Christian puts on huge slippers over his shoes. Formerly only Mohammedans were allowed in them; but now the "infidel dog" enters them with much impunity, although liable to curses, and sometimes to opposition. In connection with them are schools where the Koran is taught. In the Mosque El-Azhar at Cairo is the great university of the Mohammedans, whither students come from all parts of their world; as many as ten thousand, it is said, being congregated there at one time. Other establishments, benevolent in character, are also connected with mosques.

MOUNT HOLYOKE FEMALE SEMINARY is situated in South Hadley, Mass., amid the charming scenery of the Connecticut Valley. It was opened in 1837, and during the forty-five years ending in June, 1882, has sent forth 1,780 graduates. At a period when there existed no permanent school of a high order for girls in the United States, it was founded by the personal efforts of one far-seeing and large-hearted Christian woman.¹ In those days there were no princely gifts from millionaires to educate the daughters: it was by small offerings from many slender purses that the enterprise was begun. There was in it, however, a hidden vitality, which has kept it growing ever since. The first edifice, a four-story brick building ninety-four feet by fifty, now forms part of a quadrangle, whose buildings placed in line would extend some 375 feet. In 1870 there was added to these a fire-proof library building, now containing 11,000 volumes; in 1876, the Lyman Williston Hall, for science and art; and in 1881, an astronomical observatory, completely equipped with new instruments of the best make. The grounds, also, have been much enlarged, and now include fifty acres.

To establish a permanent institution offering the best educational advantages at a moderate expense was but a part of Miss Lyon's design. It was to be so planned and carried on, that its entire culture should result, not merely in thorough and extensive intellectual attainments, but also in symmetrical and efficient Christian lives. The course of study, being solid rather than showy, has always required some maturity, and considerable advancement, in order to enter upon it. There is no preparatory department. In addition to the regular curriculum, extensive courses in French, German, or Greek, may be pursued; and instruction is also provided in drawing, painting, and music. Thoroughness has marked the school from the first. Classes are subdivided, so that the number reciting together is not large. Text-books are made but the starting-point, not the limit of research; the library being a constant and indispensable resort. The natural sciences are amply illustrated by extensive cabinets and superior apparatus; the history of art, by paintings, casts, photographs, and engravings.

It is a noteworthy feature of the family life, that the ordinary housework is done by the young ladies, with the supervision of the teachers and matrons. About one hour a day is thus employed. Each pupil has her own definite duties, and retains the position assigned her for a term or more, unless some personal reason requires a change. If ill, she is excused; and her place is supplied, for the time, from a reserve corps. Several considerations had weight in deciding upon this plan. It promised to be at once more economical and more independent than to employ scores of servants; it would give healthful exercise; it would tend to preserve and increase a taste for home duties; and its practical testimony to the dignity of useful labor would do good. Thus it has proved; and time has shown other advantages not so clearly foreseen. Observing how smoothly the domestic affairs of this family of three hundred are carried on without servants, the pupil is strongly impressed with the value of system, co-operation, and prompt activity. She learns how to take responsibility, and to enjoy it. She sees how the comfort of all comes from the fidelity of each to her brief task; and by degrees it becomes her habit to look out for the general good rather than her own ease.

"Our whole system," remarked one of the earlier teachers, "is really an arrangement for gaining and applying moral power." The shaping of character may, indeed, be considered its special work. The impress of the Holyoke training is clearly visible upon a large majority of the women educated here. Favored by the retired location, as well as by the family life, with its constant and familiar intercourse between teachers and pupils, more work of this kind can be done than would be possible under other conditions. Much is effected by regulations tending to insure habits of promptness and diligence, of order and system, of self-control and thoughtfulness for others; while religious influences, unsectarian yet positive and strong, underlie and crown all the rest. Pupils soon observe, that, while it is not asked what church they are wont to attend at home, it is considered a question of the utmost consequence whether their talents shall be given to selfish aims, or consecrated to Christ. They hear much of the various benevolent enterprises of the day, and learn to look forward to an active and useful life. The sabbath Bible lessons, and those studies of the prescribed course which may be termed religious, make a good basis in preparing for the Christian activities of future years. Fully three-fourths of the whole number of students have subsequently taught more or less, and many have done missionary work in foreign lands or at home.

The seminary is not yet endowed. Its ordinary expenses are usually covered by the receipts for board and tuition, moderate as are the terms; and, for needful improvements, it never looks in vain to its numerous friends. A small annual income from funds bequeathed for the purpose is used in assisting, to some extent, deserving pupils who need such aid.

MARY O. NUTTING.

MOURNING AMONG THE HEBREWS. It is characteristic of all Oriental people, that while they freely vent their vehement feelings, more especially that of grief, in violent though wholly involuntary gesticulations, they at the same time try to express those feelings by means of symbolical and often merely conventional signs. In Scripture, where the act of mourning such as performed by the Hebrews is often described, the same double mode of expressing a feeling also occurs: now the involuntary and purely pathological utterance of the sorrow, such as crying, wringing the hands, etc.; and then the symbolical and merely conventional sign, such as dressing in sackcloth, sprinkling ashes on the head, etc. It must be noticed, however, that in many cases, as, for instance, in that of rending the clothes, the conventional symbol evidently originated as a simple and natural expression.

Among the most conspicuous purely pathological utterances of sorrow, such as occur among the

Hebrews, are tearing off the hair, and plucking out the beard (Ez. ix. 3; Job i. 20; Josephus, Ant., 15, 3; 9; 16, 7; 5), running the head against the wall (Josephus: Ant., 16, 10; 7), spreading the hands, and laying them on the head (Lam. i. 17; 2 Sam. xiii. 19), beating the breast (Isa. xxxii. 12; Nah. ii. 7; Luke xviii. 13, xxiii. 48), and smiting upon the thigh (Jer. xxxi. 19; Ezek. xxi. 12). Actual torturing, and even maiming of the body seem also to have occurred, at least at a later period, among the Hebrews, though they were strongly forbidden (Lev. xix. 28; Deut. xiv. 1). Among the most conspicuous symbols or conventional signs of sorrow employed by the Hebrews are sprinkling the head with ashes, or dust, or sand, or throwing such things up in the air, and allowing them to fall down, and cover the head (Josh. vii. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 19, xv. 32; Jer. vi. 26; Job ii. 12); dressing in sackcloth (2 Sam. iii. 31; Ps. xxxv. 13; Joel i. 8) of sombre colors, and without folds or fawns (Isa. iii. 24); covering the lower part of the face, or the whole head, as a token of silence (2 Sam. xv. 30; Ezek. xxiv. 17; Jer. xiv. 3); shaving off the beard and the hair, the proud ornaments of the Eastern man (Isa. xv. 2, xxii. 12; Jer. vii. 29); laying aside all ornaments (Exod. xxxiii. 4; Ezek. xxvi. 16), even the sandals (2 Sam. xv. 30). Among the mourning-symbols which may be considered as having originated as simple pathological expressions are fasting (which article see), neglect of the usual care of the body, the clothes and other appearances, and more especially rending the clothes (Gen. xxxvii. 29, xlv. 13; Matt. xxvi. 65). With respect to the last-mentioned ceremony, very minute rules were given by the rabbis: it should be performed standing, in public, sometimes from the left and sometimes from the right.

Mourning for the dead lasted for seven days (according to the law, the days of uncleanness), or in special cases longer. The national mourning for Moses and Aaron lasted thirty days (Num. xx. 29; Deut. xxxiv. 8; comp. Josephus: Bell. Jud., 3, 9; 5); the Egyptian, for Jacob, seventy or seventy-two days (Gen. l. 3; comp. Herodot., 2, 85). The Rabbins made different degrees of mourning, — a severer, for the first three days; a milder, for the next four days; and a still lighter, for the period from the seventh to the thirtieth day, during which, however, it was not allowed to take a warm bath, or to shave. According to rabbinical precepts, a widow could not marry again until after the lapse of three great festivals, and, if she had a sucking babe, not until after the end of two years; but a widower could marry after the lapse of thirty days. Parents were mourned by their children a whole year, during which time a son was not allowed to partake in a banquet or any other kind of social feasts. The death-day of a parent was always kept sacred by the children as a day of mourning. On the days of mourning, the house or the tomb resounded with the wailings of men and women. Songs of lamentation, such as were sung at those occasions, have been preserved in 2 Sam. i. 17, iii. 33; Jer. ix. 17; 1 Kings xiii. 20; 2 Kings ii. 12, xiii. 14; and a rabbinical collection is found in Ugolino: Thesaurus, vol. xxxiii. p. 1300. Sometimes the songs of lamentation were accompanied with instrumental music, especially by flutes (Matt. ix. 23). Rich people hired mourners, — men and women who were trained to perform the ceremony (2 Chron. xxxv. 25; Jer. ix. 17); and so great expenses were often incurred by the display of mourning-clothes and by mourning-banquets, that laws were issued against the reigning prodigality. According to Hos. ix. 4, however, participation in a mourning-banquet made a man unclean (comp. Esth. iv. 2). A number of monographs on the subject are found in Ugolino: Thesaurus, vol. xxxiii. LEYRER.

MOYER'S LECTURES, a course of eight sermon-lectures in defence of the divinity of Christ, founded by Lady Rebecca Moyer (d. in London, 1720), who ordered her heirs to pay twenty guineas annually to some able minister for the purpose. The courses ended about 1774, the lease having then expired of the estate (a dwelling-house in London) out of which the annual payment was made. Darling (Cyclopadia Bibliographica) gives a list of the lectures.

MOZARABIC LITURGY, a form of service of venerable age, once in use in some churches of Spain. The designation is a participial form of the word "Arab." Muzarab, or Mostarab, seems to have been almost a name of ridicule given to certain Christian congregations in Spain who were tolerated by the caliphs. At the close of the fifteenth century, there were six such congregations in Toledo alone. These had their own Liturgy, which was ascribed to Isidore of Seville, but which, without doubt, is of earlier date, and was only revised or confirmed by him and the other members of the Fourth Council of Toledo, in 633. Some Roman-Catholic authors (see Preface to Migne's edition, vol. lxxxv.) attribute its composition to the apostles who founded the Church in Spain. Its divergence from the Gallian Liturgy precludes the view that the latter was the original and model. Through the middle ages it held its place in spite of the Roman Liturgy. Popes John X. (in 918) and Alexander II. (in 1064) sanctioned its use; and Cardinal Ximenes edited the first printed edition (1500), with some changes. Two years later, the Breviary was printed. Both editions were set up in the establishment of Peter Hagenbach in Toledo. Pope Julius II. gave his sanction to these two editions. In order to assure the perpetuity of its use, Ximenes founded in Toledo a chapel, with an abbot and twelve chaplains, in which the Mozarabic Liturgy was to be followed.

The main peculiarities of this Liturgy are the following: (1) The order of festivals is somewhat different from that of the Roman Liturgy; for example, there are six Advent Sundays (as was the case in the old Milan and Greek churches), and two festivals of the Annunciation of Mary, on March 24 (like the Roman Liturgy) and Dec. 18. The latter bears the strange name of Sancta Maria de la O, because "all present shout a long 'O' in order to signify that great longing with which all the saints in limbus, the angels in heaven, and the whole world, observe the nativity of the Redeemer" (Migne's Patrology, lxxxv. p. 170). (2) The lessons or pericopes differ; e.g., the parable of the rich man and Lazarus precedes Lent in order to counteract the excess of this period. Instead of having merely two lessor-for the main service from the Epistles and Gospels, it has three lessons from the Epistles, Gospels, and prophets. (3) It gives prominence to homiletical matter, and in this respect it stands alone. After each of the three readings, there is a short homiletical discourse to the people, in which the hortatory element predominates. (4) The use of the Agios three times after the Benedictus, the breaking of the host into nine parts, each of which has a special name and meaning, etc., recall the custom of the Greek Church. (5) The Mozarabic Chant differs from the Gregorian by being more melodious, etc. It is called the "Eugenian," after a certain archbishop of Toledo, Eugenius. In general, we may say that this Liturgy is one of the most venerable products of Christian antiquity, that it draws largely upon the Scriptures, and is equal to any other Liturgy in the purity, dignity, and warmth of its tone and language. See MIGNÉ: Patrology, vol. lxxxvi. [The "Church of Jesus" in Mexico has adopted the Mozarabic Liturgy.] PALMER.

MOZLEY, James Bowling, D.D., canon of Worcester, regius professor of divinity in the university of Oxford, and theological author; b. at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, Sept. 15, 1813; d. in Oxford, Jan. 4, 1878. He was educated at Grantham, and subsequently at Oriel College, Oxford, where he was graduated bachelor of arts in honors in 1834; elected to a fellowship at Magdalen College in 1840, where he resided until 1856, when, on his marriage, he accepted the living of Old Shoreham, Sussex. On Mr Gladstone's recommendation, he was made canon of Worcester in 1869; and two years later, in 1871, he was, on the same recommendation, made regius professor of divinity,—an office which he held, in conjunction with his vicarage, until his death. He was appointed Bampton Lecturer for 1865; and his work on the Miracles, which was the outcome of that lectureship, attracted great attention. While Mozley was a student at Oxford, the influence of Newman, Hurrell Froude, Keble, and Pusey, was in the ascendant; and he was an enthusiastic yet independent follower of those early leaders in the Tractarian movement. But, when Newman entered the Church of Rome, Mozley kept firm in his allegiance to the Anglican Church. As the editor of his Essays has said, "However deep his early-formed reverence for the leader of the movement, and unbounded his recognition of his intellectual power, his natural independence of judgment, indeed, the very make of his mind, held him where he was." So it came about that he was separated very much from the party with which he was originally identified, and occupied a position that was somewhat peculiar. To borrow again the words of his editor, "He found himself in agreement with the predestinarianism of St. Augustine; and, in the expression of doctrine which was the watchword of his party, he found himself at issue with them. He threw himself with characteristic ardor and patient labor into the task of reconciling the Christian tradition about baptism with the theology of what is called Calvinism." Thus he stood very much alone as a theologian. With the evangelicals he never quite sympathized in their general spirit and tone. He never ceased to be a Churchman, and in a very real sense a High-

Churchman; but the developments of that party were not to his taste, and he found no other that he could join. That this is a true statement of the case may be seen in his writings, which may be classified under the three heads of critical, theological, and apologetic. Under the critical we should range his Essays on Strafford, Laud, Cromwell, Luther, Arnold, etc., in which one sees very clearly the strong Tractarian bias of the author; although even in these he rises above party, into the discussion of principles, always with great power, and often with the conviction of his readers. Under theological we place his elaborate Treatise on the Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination, 1855 (perhaps the ablest modern English book upon the subject); his work on The Primitive Doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration, 1856; and a Review of the Baptismal Controversy, 1862. Under the apologetic may be put his answer to Newman, entitled The Theory of Development, which, along with the well-known letters of Archer Butler, furnished an antidote for the evil in his former teacher's work; his lectures on Miracles; and his Ruling Ideas in the Early Ages, together with his masterly essays on The Argument of Design and the Principle of Causation. His University Sermons, too, deserve to be particularly mentioned. The London Spectator, in commenting upon them, affirmed that there were some of them "the reading of which would be enough to change the whole character and life of a man." This is emphatically true of that on the Reversal of Human Judgments, which we, for our own part, are inclined to put higher than any sermon published in this century.

Mozley's mind was at its best in argument. He had evidently drunk deeply at the fountain of Butler, and may be called, indeed, "the Butler of his generation." For a long time he was known only as a contributor to The Critic and The Christian Remembrancer. He was late in reaching his maturity; but, when he did reach it, he was at once recognized as one of the best theological thinkers of his day. Besides the works already referred to, there were published, after his death, Essays, Historical and Theological, London and New York, 1878, 2 vols.; Practical and Parochial Sermons, 1878; and Lectures and Other Theological Papers, 1883.

WM. M. TAYLOR.

MUEDDIN, or MUEZZIN, an official attached to a Mohammedan mosque, whose business it is to call the faithful to prayer five times in the twenty-four hours. He chants these words each time, as he walks around the little balcony outside the minaret: "Allah is most great. I testify that there is no God but Allah. I testify that Mohammed is the apostle of Allah. Come to prayer. Come to security." "Prayer is better than sleep" is added in the morning.

MUFTI (Arabic, "expounder of the law"), a Turkish official of half-ecclesiastical, half-civil, character. As the Koran is not only the spiritual, but also the material, foundation of all law among Mohammedans, the expounder of the law, the mufti, is at once priest and judge. There is a mufti in every large town in the Turkish Empire.

MUGGLETONIANS, the followers of Ludowick Muggleton (b. 1609; d. March 14, 1697) and John Reeve, journeyman tailors. These two professed to be the "two witnesses" of Rev. xi. 3-6, and announced that the last days had come, and they were divinely commissioned to prophesy, and had also authority to curse all who opposed them. Muggleton declared that he stood in the same relation to Reeve that Aaron did to Moses, i. e., he was his "mouth." They gathered a large following; and the Muggletonians, as the sect was called, existed in England down to our day, Mr. Joseph Gander, who died in 1868, being, it is said, the last adherent. Their doctrines are thus stated in Blunt's Dict. of Sects, s. v.: "Earth and water were not created, but self-originated; the Evil One became incarnate in Eve; the Father was the sufferer upon the cross, having left Elijah to govern heaven while he came to earth to die." They also taught that God has a human body, and that there is no Trinity, properly speaking. See A Complete Collection of the Works of Reeve and Muggleton, London, 1756, reprinted, 1832, 3 vols.

MÜHLENBERG, Heinrich Melchior, D.D., the patriarch of the Lutheran Church in Pennsylvania and adjacent States; b. Sept. 6, 1711, at Eimbeck, Hanover; d. Oct. 7, 1787, at New Providence (Trappe), Montgomery County, Penn. With the foundation of the Lutheran Church in the North American Colonies, and especially in Pennsylvania, the name of H. M. Mühlenberg is most honorably connected. Three imperfectly organized congregations in Pennsylvania (New Hanover, New Providence, and Philadelphia) sent (1733) three delegates to England, Holland, and Germany, to solicit donations for the erection of churches and schoolhouses, and to petition for the sending of a suitable pastor for themselves, and of missionaries for the German Lutherans, in considerable numbers settled in diverse places of the eastern portion of Pennsylvania. Those delegates met with much sympathy, especially from the Rev. Fr. Mich. Ziegenhagen (1722-76, chaplain of the royal St. James Chapel at London), and from the directors of the benevolent institutions founded by the Rev. Dr. Aug. Herm. Francke at Halle (and after his death, 1727, continued by his son Dr. G. A. Francke), Dr. Freylinghausen, and other representatives of the Pietism of Philipp Jacob Spener, who were also professors of Halle University, and took a lively interest in the work of missions. That delegation and subsequent correspondence resulted (1742) in the sending of H. M. Mühlenberg to Pennsylvania, where he at once came into collision with Count Zinzendorf, who, having arrived in the fall of the preceding year, had assumed the character of a superintendent of the Lutheran congregations, but now began to establish Moravian churches. H. M. Mühlenberg, assisted by other missionaries sent from Halle, and by a number of suitable men whom he met with in the Colonies, founded during his lifetime a large number of congregations in Pennsylvania and beyond its boundaries. The German Evangelical Lutheran ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States, organized 1748, became the mother-synod of a considerable number of synods in the United States.

H. M. Mühlenberg had devoted himself to the study of theology, 1737 and 1738, at Göttingen; identified himself with the Spenerian Pietism, began as a student the instruction of poor and neglected children; enjoyed the respect of some young men of the same turn of mind, but of aristocratic families (Counts Reuss and Henkel); continued his studies at Halle, where he at the same time was employed as a teacher in the Orphan Home of Francke; served, after having been ordained at Leipzig, from 1739 to 1741 as pastor of Grosshennersdorf, Lusatia; published there a defence of Pietism, which occasioned a number of controversial writings; and followed, 1742, the call offered to him by Dr. Francke in behalf of the German Lutherans in Pennsylvania. On his voyage he spent two months in England; took, in crossing the ocean, much interest in the spiritual welfare of his fellow-passengers; preached to them in the English language (he was able to proclaim the gospel in four languages); arrived, Sept. 22, 1742, at Charleston, S. C., and paid a visit to the Lutherans, who, on account of cruel persecution, had left Roman-Catholic Salzburg and its neighborhood, and colonized at Ebenezer, near Savannah, Ga. On the 25th of November, after a perilous voyage, he arrived at Philadelphia; entered at once upon his work; administered, under great difficulties, to the three congregations which had petitioned for a pastor, and extended his usefulness to other localities, receiving, 1745 and in later years, additional strength, especially through colaborers sent from Halle (P. Brunnholtz, Nic. Kurtz, J. H. Schaum, J. F. Handschuch, J. D. M. Heinzelmann, W. Kurtz, J. L. Voigt, J. A. Krug, Fred. Schultz, J. H. Chr. Helmuth, Chr. Em. Schultze, J. Chr. Kunze, J. Fr. Schmidt). April 23, 1745, H. M. Mühlenberg married a daughter of Col. Conrad Weiser of Tulpehocken, a man well known in the colonial history of Pennsylvania. With H. M. Mühlenberg, and the other missionaries sent from Halle, a number of other Lutheran pastors, laboring at diverse localities in the North-American provinces (J. Chr. Hartwich, B. M. Hausle, J. S. Gerock, etc.), connected themselves in the course of time, and the field of labor was extended. Shortly after the middle of the last century, that field extended from Frederick, Md., through Pennsylvania and New Jersey, to the shores of the Hudson and to New-York City. It must be admitted that this result was eminently owing to the practical tact and persevering energy of H. M. Mühlenberg, who for a long time had more or less the supervision of the Lutheran congregations of that large territory, and, whilst strictly attached to Lutheran doctrines, maintained a friendly relation to representatives of other Protestant denominations, among those particularly to the Rev. M. Schlatter, the patriarch of the German Reformed Church in the United States. A. D. 1748, the first Lutheran synod was organized, which proved a blessing for the proper foundation, organization, and discipline of congregations. This synod stood in very friendly relations to the Swedish Lutheran ministers, who, under a superintendent appointed by the higher authorities in Sweden, served a considerable number of congregations in the present states of Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey.

H. M. Mühlenberg resided during the years 1745-61 at New Providence, Montgomery County, Penn. In 1751 and 1752 he was, during the summer months, active in the city of New York and its vicinity. He repeated his visit there in 1759 and 1760, at the same paying attention to a number of congregations in New Jersey. Difficulties in the rapidly increasing congregation at Philadelphia moved him to take charge of this important field. He introduced there a new constitution, under which the congregation still is ruled, and which formed the model for the constitution of many Lutheran congregations. In Philadelphia the second house of worship for the German Lutherans (Zion Church) was erected from 1766 to 1769, and for a long period admitted to be the finest and largest church-edifice in Pennsylvania. The winter 1774-75 H. M. Mühlenberg spent in Ebenezer, Ga., where he succeeded in re-establishing peace and order in that congregation, in settling some legal difficulties concerning its property, and in introducing an improved constitution. In July, 1776, he, with the permission of the Philadelphia congregation, again took up his residence at New Providence. Having, with his whole family, pronounced in favor of American independence, he was exposed to many inconveniences. He continued to preach, as circumstances demanded his services, and to assist the congregations with his counsel. In 1784 the University of Pennsylvania honored him with the title D.D. In his latter years he suffered from various bodily ailments. At his death the Lutheran synod of Pennsylvania numbered twenty-four clerical members. The synod, as well as the congregations, were established on the unaltered Augsburg Confession and on all the other symbolical books of the Lutheran Church. The rigor of the doctrinal position was modified by Pietism as it prevailed at Halle. Halle ceased, after the death of H. M. Mühlenberg, to exercise its specific influence on the Lutheran Church in the United States.

Of three sons of Dr. Mühlenberg who received their preliminary education for the sacred service in Germany, the most renowned is J. Peter C., major-general of the United-States army; b. Oct. 1, 1746; d. Oct. 1, 1807. Having returned from Germany, 1766, he was (1768) ordained, and served for a time Lutheran congregations in New Jersey. Having received a call from Lutheran congregations in Virginia, he needed episcopal ordination in that province to be recognized, according to law, as a minister. He therefore travelled to England, and was ordained, April 21, 1772, by the bishop of Ely, a deacon; April 23, 1772, by the bishop of London, a priest (with him was ordained a priest, Mr. White, afterwards bishop of Pennsylvania); and now began his pastoral labors in Virginia, which, however, by the war-ery, were soon to be ended. The love of independence and liberty carried J. P. G. Mühlenberg, as "the time for fighting had come," into the political arena and the field of battle. After the battle was won, he did not return to the service of the church. H. A. MÜHLENBERG: *The Life of Major-Gen. Peter Mühlenberg of the Revolutionary Army, Philadelphia, 1819. — Fred. Aug. Conrad, b. Jan. 2, 1750; d. June 1, 1801; returned with his brother, G. Henry Ernst, from Germany, 1770; assisted, for some time, various congregations in Pennsylvania. In the years 1773-76 he served the Lutheran congregation at New-York City. On account of his political proclivities, he had (1776) to leave New York in haste to escape the British. Returned to his family at New Providence, Penn., and quitting the service of the church, he was intrusted with very honorable public offices in his native State. He was repeatedly chosen to Congress, and twice served as Speaker of the House. — Gotth. Henry Ernst, D.D., b. Nov. 17, 1753; d. May 23, 1815, after having most successfully served the Church of the Holy Trinity at Lancaster, Penn., for thirty-five years. As an eminent naturalist, excelling especially in botany, he carried on correspondence with many scientific men of Europe, and was a member of various philosophical societies.

MUHLENBERG, William Augustus, D.D., LL.D., b. in Philadelphia, Sept. 16, 1796; d. in New York, April 8, 1877. "A rare and original character; a man without pretence and without guile, the purity of whose principles was equalled by the sanctity of his life." He was a great-grandson of Dr. Henry Melchior Mühlenberg, the Lutheran patriarch (see that art.), and was baptized in the Lutheran communion, for which he always retained a sincere affection, but early made choice of the Episcopal Church. He was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1814, and at once entered upon his theological studies under Bishop White, by whom he was ordained deacon, Sept. 18, 1817. He passed his diaconate as assistant, or chaplain, to the bishop. On his ordination as presbyter (Oct. 22, 1820), he accepted a call to the rectorship of St. James's, Lancaster, Penn. Here he remained six years, adding to his pastoral labors much zealous and successful effort for the advancement of public education in the town. He occupied himself, also, at this time, in church hymnody; wrote a Plea for Christian Hymns, that was circulated at the special General Convention of 1821, and which, with other measures, resulted later (1826) in the adoption of a collection of hymns prepared by a committee, of which he was a member and the chief worker. His own well-known hymn, I would not live away, was written in Lancaster in 1821, and first printed in the Philadelphia Recorder of June 3, 1826. See I would not Live Away, and Other Verses, published by A. D. F. Randolph & Co., New York, 1859.

Among his multitudinous labors the most important may be classed as follows: (1) The Christianizing of education; (2) Church unity, or his lifelong aim and desire for the union, in some practical form, of the evangelical bodies of Christendom; (3) Christian brotherhood, exemplifying itself in institutions of charity and beneficence for the poor and oppressed. He gave himself predominantly to Christian education from the time of his leaving Lancaster (1826) till he entered upon the pastorate of the Free Church of the Holy Communion, New York, in 1846. Bishops, doctors, judges, and merchant-princes are among his scholars; and his methods are perpetuated in a multitude of schools throughout the land, patterned after his. In the early years of the Church of the Holy Communion, many noble charities had their birth. Scarcely an important movement in the Episcopal Church during the last fifty years can be named that did not, more or less directly, originate with him. It was during his ministry in the Church of the Holy Communion, that he enunciated most emphatically those "Evangelical Catholic" principles which he believed to be the true theory of the Christian Church. His most signal expression of these principles is found in what is known as The Muhlenberg Memorial. See Evangelical Catholic Papers, New York, T. Whittaker, 1875.

His grandest exemplifications of Christian brotherhood are the institutions of St. Luke's Hospital in New York, and the Church Village of St. Johnland on Long Island, N. Y. St. Luke's Hospital was begun, as to the foundation-stone, in 1851, completed for occupancy in 1858. St. Johnland was incorporated in 1870, but came into preliminary operation three or four years earlier.

The whole of Dr. Muhlenberg's long life was one stream of blessed charity. "His faith was not a theological formula, but a living conviction and power. It was a free, joyous allegiance to Jesus Christ. The incarnation was the central idea of his theology and the inspiration of his Christian life,—brotherhood in Christ, brotherhood through Christ."

He never married, and, though born to affluence, did not leave money enough for his funeral. He died in St. Luke's Hospital, and was buried at St. Johnland. See ANNE AYRES: Life and Work of William Augustus Muhlenberg, New York, Harper Brothers, 1880. ANNE AYRES.

MULLENS, Joseph, a distinguished foreign missionary, and secretary of the London Missionary Society; b. in 1820; d. near Mwapwa, Eastern Africa, July 10, 1879. He labored as a missionary in India from 1843 to 1866. In 1866 he was appointed secretary of the London Missionary Society, in 1870 visited the United States, and spent the year 1873-74 in a journey and visit to Madagascar in the interest of missionary work. He was active in securing the convention of the Mildmay Conference, held in London, 1878. His last great desire was to establish the missions of the London Society in Ujiji, Africa, on a permanent basis. In this interest he accompanied several missionaries to Africa. Starting from Zanzibar, and with his face set toward Lake Tanganyika, he reached the halfway station Mwapwa, where he died of peritonitis. There his remains lie buried on a conspicuous eminence; and his tablet will continue to be in Eastern Africa what Bushnell's is on the Western coast,—a sacred appeal and encouragement to further effort for the enlightenment of the Dark Continent. Dr. Mullens was a man of great earnestness, and rare gifts as a speaker. Among his works are Louisa and Calcutta, 6th thousand, London, 1869; Twelve Months in Madagascar, 2d ed., London, 1875.

MÜLLER, Heinrich, b. at Lübeck, Oct. 18, 1631; d. at Rostock, Sept. 23, 1675; studied theology in the latter place, and was appointed professor of Greek there, 1659, professor of theology, 1662, and superintendent, 1671. He published a Methodus politica, 1643; Harmonia veteris et novi testamenti chronologica, 1668; Theologia scholastica, 1670, etc. But it was as a preacher and devotional writer, and not as a theologian, he exercised so deep and wide an influence. His dogmatical stand-point is the centre of Lutheran orthodoxy; but he is, nevertheless, a precursor of Pietism, and his devotional books—Himmlicher Liebeskuss, 1659 (1848); Apostolische, 1663 (1855), Evangelische, 1672 (1853), Festevangelische Schlusskette und Kraftkern; Geistliche Erquickstunden, 1664 (1851), etc.—have been often reprinted. See O. KRABBE: H. M. und seine Zeit (Rostock, 1866) and C. GOTTL. SCHMIDT: Geschichte der Predigt (Gotha, 1872, pp. 106-110). H. BECK.

MÜLLER, Johann Georg, b. at Schaffhausen, Sept. 3, 1759; d. there Sept. 20, 1819; studied theology at Zürich and Göttingen, and in Weimar under Herder, and was appointed professor of Greek and Hebrew in the Collegium Humanitatis, in his native city, 1794, and afterwards professor of encyclopædia and methodology. His writings—of which the principal ones are, Philosophische Aufsätze, Breslau, 1789; Unterhaltungen mit Serena, Wintherthur, 1793-1803, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1834; Briefe über das Studium der Wissenschaften, 1798 (1817); Theophil, 1801; Reliquien alt. Zeit., 1803-06, 4 vols.; Von Glauben d. Christ., 1816, 2 vols. (1823), etc.—were mostly intended for young people, and exercised a considerable influence as a mediation between the reigning rationalism and the beginning religious awakening. He was the brother of the celebrated historian of Switzerland, Johannes von Müller (1752-1809). [See K. STOKAR: Johann Georg Müller, Professor und Oberschulherr zu Schaffhausen, Basel, 1885.] G. KIRCHHOFER.

MÜLLER, Julius, a distinguished German evangelical theologian, and, for many years, professor of systematic theology at Halle; the son of a clergyman; was b. at Brieg, in Silesia, April 10, 1801; d. at Halle, Sept. 28, 1878. After the usual course of study in the gymnasium, he entered, in 1819, the university of Breslau. In 1820 he went to Göttingen, where his brother Otfried was acting as professor of archaeology at the Georgia Augusta. His parents had set him apart for a legal career; and both here and at Breslau his dissertations gained prizes in the department of jurisprudence. One of these was printed, and favorably noticed by Savigny. On the fiftieth anniversary (June 4, 1871) of his receiving the prize at Göttingen, the faculty made him doctor of laws. He felt, however, that a legal career was not his vocation. The ideal of a higher life was presenting itself to his mind; and, in consequence of it, he determined to direct his attention to the study of theology. He heard the elder Planck in Church History, Eichhorn on the Pauline Epistles, and others. The Göttingen theology, however, did not satisfy him, nor its scientific method, but rather repelled him, driving him off, for a time, to the study of philosophy and even of medicine. The doubts which had been excited increased until they threatened to destroy his faith. In 1822 he returned to Breslau, but failed to get comfort in the lecture-room. It remained for Tholuck to quiet his doubts, and to exert a powerful and permanent influence upon his spiritual life. While he was on a visit to Breslau, Müller, at the suggestion of a friend, visited him. Nearly fifty years afterwards, in the dedication of his Dissertations in Dogmatics (Dogmatische Abhandlungen), he refers to Tholuck's influence upon his mind in these words: "When the call of the Lord made me a theologian, and I was overflowed with doubts and conflicts as I gave myself up to a closer study of theology, and especially of philosophy, then the suggestion of a friend now departed led me to you. You called my attention to the moral spirit of Christianity, and again aroused in me the confidence that saving truth is found in evangelical faith, and nowhere else." He afterwards carried on a correspondence with Tholuck, whose personality, rather than theology, influenced him.

After spending the winter at Breslau, in the earnest study of the Bible, Müller went, at the urgent advice of Tholuck, in the spring of 1823, to Berlin. Here it was not Schleiermacher, but Strauss, Neander, and Tholuck, who met the demands of his mind and heart. In February, 1825, he was called to be the successor of his friend Radeke, in the pastorate of Schönbrunn and Rosen. He had already married, and entered with much zeal upon his work. He had large plans for literary work, and contemplated writing histories of pietism and German mysticism. He first appeared before the public as an author in a work (Zur Beurteilung d. Schrift: D. kathol. Kirche Schlesiens) upon the ecclesiastical concerns of Silesia, and opposing Theiner. A second edition was called for. Soon after, he came into conflict with the ecclesiastical authorities by refusing to introduce the new Liturgy; and in May, 1830, he announced this as his final decision to the Consistorium. His official relations to the church were thus endangered; but he was happily delivered from the inconvenience of a removal from his pastorate by a call, in 1831, to Göttingen, as university preacher, with the promise of a professorship as soon as he should publish a learned work. He habilitated in 1832 with a dissertation on Luther's doctrine of predestination and the freedom of the will (Lutheri de predest. et lib. arbitrio doctrina). He gathered about him an increasing number of hearers, and in 1833 published a volume of sermons under the title D. christl. Leben, s. Entwicklung, s. Kämpfe u. s. Vollendung ("The Christian Life, its Development, Conflicts, and Consummation"). He was called to the St. Ansgar Church of Bremen, and offered the position of director of the seminary about to be founded in Marburg. The offer of a professorship induced him, however, to remain in Göttingen until the fall of 1834, when a call to the chair of systematic theology attracted him to Marburg. At the conclusion of his last sermon in Göttingen (March, 1835), Lücke, in behalf of the university, presented him with the degree of doctor of divinity.

In 1833 Müller became a contributor to the Studien u. Kritiken, by a review of Göschel's works. In this and succeeding contributions he asserted the impossibility of harmonizing the philosophy of Hegel with the Christian system, as also the inadequacy of Schleiermacher's theology in some important particulars, as the cognoscibility of God, etc. In 1836 he contributed an article reviewing Strauss's Life of Christ, which he followed up, in 1838, by another on the same subject, in rejoinder to the reply of Strauss.

More important than these contributions was his work, D. christl. Lehre von d. Sünde ["The Christian Doctrine of Sin," Eng. trans. from the fifth German edition, Edinburgh, 1877, 2 vols.]. He had already made preparatory studies upon this subject in Schönbrunn. The first part was published at Breslau, 1839, under the title Vom Wesen u. vom Grunde d. Sünde ("The Nature and Foundation of Sin"). The second part followed, in 1844, which continued the investigation into the possibility of sin. Six editions have since appeared. The second and third contained many additions, taking notice of the criticisms, especially those of Rothe in his Ethics, and of Vatke and Dorner. The last three editions have hardly any changes.

In the Dedication, he denies that intellectual thought stands in contradiction to Christian experience, and that meditation upon sin leads to the destruction of the religious fear of it. As against Hegel, he denied that a system of absolute knowledge is inconsistent with the actual state of the world pervaded by evil. Here, also, he gives due prominence to the consciousness of sin and guilt, which is made too little of in Schleiermacher's system. This personal consciousness of sin is declared to carry with it the sense of condemnation. Sin is intelligent self-determination. No recent system of theology is so closely allied to the theology of the confessions as this of Julius Müller, who asserts the reality of guilt and the necessity of an objective atonement.

Müller had several calls to other universities, but remained at Marburg till 1839, when he accepted the professorship at Halle, made vacant by Ullmann's removal to Heidelberg. [Here, during the remainder of his life, he exerted a wide influence, both by the stimulus of his lectures, and his simple, sincere Christian character. With Dorner of Berlin he was the most learned and profound lecturer in the department of systematic theology in Germany, and, with Tholuck, the chief centre of attraction to the students at Halle.] In August of the same year he lost his wife, and in 1841 he was made a widower for the second time. He took a prominent part in the measures resulting in the convention of the Kirchentag (see art.), and participated actively in its meetings till 1851. In 1850 he founded, in conjunction with Neander and Nitzsch, the Deutsche Zeitschrift für christl. Wissenschaft u. christl. Leben ("German periodical of Christian Science and Life"), to which he contributed many valuable articles, — Would there have been an Incarnation if the Fall had not occurred? 1850; Faith and Knowledge, 1853, etc. These have, for the most part, appeared in his Dogmatische Abhandlungen ("Theological Discussions"), Bremen, 1870.

From the year 1855 on, he suffered greatly from sleeplessness, headache, and other bodily infirmities, and in the following year was attacked by a stroke of apoplexy; so that, for the remainder of his life, he confined his labors almost exclusively to the lecture-room. He saw his colleagues and friends, Hupfeld and Tholuck, pass away before him, but had much comfort from his visits, during vacation, to the homes of his nine married children. On May 6, 1875, he celebrated, surrounded by them and his grandchildren, the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination. In the summer of 1878 he resigned his professorship to make way for younger talent, but died soon after, Sept. 27.

Julius Müller's Lectures on Theology would have been welcomed in print by a large circle of pupils and admirers; but a provision of his will stipulated that all his manuscripts should be destroyed. See Sketch of his life by his son-in-law, LEOPOLD SCHULZE, Bremen, 1879. DAVID HUPFELD.

MÜMPELGART, The Colloquy of, was occasioned by the incorporation of the countship of Mümpelgart with the duchy of Würtemberg by inheritance. The Reformation had been established in the country in 1536, according to the Calvinistic type; but the Duke of Würtemberg then tried to re-organize the church according to the Lutheran type. In order to solve the various complications which arose from those circumstances, a disputation was arranged between the Calvinists and the Lutherans in the castle of Mümpelgart. It lasted from March 21 to March 26, 1586. On the Calvinist side spoke Beza; on the Lutheran, Andrea. But the only result of the disputation was, that the differences between the two parties became deeper and more glaring. No official protocol was kept. See A. SCHWEIZER: Geschichte der reformirten Centraldogmen, Zurich, 1854-56, 2 vols., i. pp. 402-501. A. SCHWEIZER.

MÜNSCHER, Wilhelm, b. at Hiersfeld, in Hesse, March 15, 1766; d. at Marburg, July 28, 1814; studied theology in the university of the latter place, and was appointed professor there in 1792. His stand-point was that of a moderate rationalist, and his erudition was comprehensive and accurate. His chief influence, however, he exercised in the field of doctrinal history; and his Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte, 1797, 4 vols. (2d ed., 1802), and Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, 1811 (2d ed., 1832-38, by Cölln and Neudecker) were received with great favor. See his biography by L. WACHLER, Frankfurt, 1817. HAUCK.

MÜNSTER, the capital of Westphalia, was the scene of one of the wildest outbreaks of that fanaticism, half religious and half political, which showed itself at various places in Germany during the period of the Reformation, and which in the Anabaptists found its aptest tools. Münster was at that time a free city of the empire, and the seat of a bishop. Feb. 18, 1532, the Reformation was preached for the first time within its walls by Rothmann; but it spread so rapidly, that Feb. 15, 1533, the bishop retired from the city, and all its churches, with the exception of the cathedral, were given up to the Protestants. Rothmann had originally no connection with the Anabaptists; but they soon began to gather into the free city, both from Germany and the Netherlands; and their influence was speedily felt. Rothmann began to preach that infant baptism was an abomination to God, that Papists and Lutherans were equally ungodly people, that the civil authorities of the Pagans should not be obeyed, etc. Especially after the arrival of John of Leyden in the city, the Anabaptists rapidly gained the ascendancy. They took possession of the government, and immediately went to work realizing their fantastic ideals. All decent people fled from the city; and their place was filled up with the riotous rabble from everywhere, invited thither by lying proclamations. On the basis of the most complete communism — community not only of property, but also of wives — a despotism was established, with John of Leyden at the head, as "king of all the world;" and every attempt of keeping the folly within certain bounds of soberness and decency was punished with outrageous cruelty. Sometimes more than fifty persons were beheaded a day. First the bishop, a count of Waldeck, tried to conquer the bewildered city, and restore order within its walls; but the army at his disposal proved utterly insufficient. Not until an imperial army had besieged the city for several weeks, and famine and dissension reduced the strength of the fanatics, were the walls forced, and the rioters overwhelmed, June 25, 1535. See CORNELIUS: Die Geschichtsquellen des Bisthums Münster, Münster, 1853, vol. ii.; [L. KELLER: Geschichte der Wiedertäufer zu Münster, Münster, 1880; and the arts. ANABAPTISTS and BOCKHOLD]. O. THELEMANN.

MÜNTER, Friedrich Christian Karl Heinrich, b. at Gotha, Oct. 14, 1761; d. in Copenhagen, April 9, 1830; was educated in Copenhagen, studied theology at Göttingen, travelled in Italy, 1786, and was appointed professor of theology in the university of Copenhagen, 1788, and bishop of Zealand, 1808. He was possessed of an enormous erudition, and was a very prolific writer in Danish, German, and Latin. Among his works, many of which have still considerable value for church history, and Oriental languages and antiquities, the principal are an edition of the Coptic translation of Daniel, Rome, 1789 (Versuch über die kirchlichen Alterthümer der Gnostiker, 1790); the publication of the statute-book of the Templars, 1794, which he discovered in the Corsini Library in Rome; Die dänische Reformationsgeschichte, 1802, 2 vols.; De schola Antiochena, 1811; Religion der Karthager, 1816; Kirchengeschichte von Dänemark und Norwegen, 1823-34, 3 vols.; Effata et oracula Montanistarum, 1829, etc. L. PELT.

MÜNZER, Thomas, was b. about 1490 at Stolberg in the Harz region, and educated at Aschersleben and Halle. After studying theology at Leipzig, he was first appointed teacher at the Martini Gymnasium in Brunswick, 1517, then chaplain and confessor in the nunnery of Beutitz near Weissenfels, 1519, and finally (1520) preacher at the Church of St. Mary in Zwickau. There his proper career began; though his craving for adventures, his passion for secret societies, and his talent as a demagogue, had already previously revealed themselves. In Zwickau he immediately joined a union of fanatics, mostly weavers, who, with Nikolaus Storch at their head, had organized themselves under the leadership of twelve apostles and seventy-two disciples, and held secret conventicles, in which they pretended to receive divine revelations. The activity of the union soon developed into open conflicts with the civil authorities, but the magistrates stepped in with energy, and a great number of the members were expelled from the city. Münzer left in April, 1521.

Wandering through Bohemia, where, in spite of the prevailing fermentation, he seems to have made only a slight impression, and Mark Brandenburg, he arrived, in the beginning of 1522, at Wittenberg, where Carlstadt and the Zwickau prophets had brought matters to a most dangerous crisis. Münzer immediately joined in the general excitement; but when, in March, Luther re-appeared in the city, and began to preach, he soon came to feel that the place for the realization of his ideals was not there, and he consequently left. Having been elected pastor of Alstedt in 1523, he soon gained the entire confidence of his flock; and all the changes which he proposed in the ecclesiastical organization of his congregation were willingly accepted. But even at Alstedt he felt Luther as an obstacle, and to destroy the influence of Luther became his first object. From the presses of Eilenburg, Jena, and Alstedt, a swarm of libels were issued against Luther; but as those pamphlets also preached open revolt against the civil order existing, and as at the same time the existence of a widely-spread secret society became palpably evident, the immediate result was, that, on the denunciation of Luther, Münzer was summoned to Weimar to defend himself before the Duke of Saxony, Aug. 1, 1524. He failed utterly in his defence, and was ordered to leave the country.

After a tour through Southern Germany, where he hoped to procure allies, he settled, towards the close of 1524, at Mühlhausen, and there he found the way prepared for him by Heinrich Pfeifer and others. Crowds of peasants and burghers, and even some noblemen of the neighborhood, joined the movement. The magistrates were unable to maintain order. They were compelled to consent to their own abrogation, and the establishment of a thoroughly revolutionary government in the city. From Mühlhausen the revolt spread through the whole of Thuringia, and gradually assumed the character of a peasants' war. Not only churches and monasteries, but also castles, were attacked, pillaged, and burnt. The Count of Mansfeld was unable to quell the uproar. But soon the Dukes of Saxony and Brunswick, and the Landgrave of Hesse, came to his aid; and at Frankenhäusen (May 15, 1525) the peasant army, under the leadership of Münzer, was utterly defeated, and almost completely massacred. Münzer escaped, but was caught shortly after, and beheaded, together with Pfeifer.

The tendency which Münzer represented was half religious, half social. He had drawn some inspiration from Joachim of Floris, Suso, and Tauler; and there were genuine elements of religious mysticism in his own nature. But the violence of his temper, and the incoherence of his character, prevented him from grasping the principles of the Reformation under any other form than that of wild fanaticism and uproar. His writings, which are few, and composed in an obscure and bombastic style, are unimportant, and show a singular combination of meagreness and confusion. His life was written in Latin by C. G. AURBACH (Wittenberg, 1716), LÖSCHER (Leipzig, 1708), ANGER (Zwickau, 1791), and in German by MELANCHTHON (Hagenau, 1525), A. L. SCHLÖZER (Göttingen, 1786), STROBEL (Nuremberg, 1795), A. VON BACZKO (Leipzig, 1812), GEBSER (Sondershausen, 1831), STREIF (Weissensee, 1835), SEIDEMAN (Leipzig, 1842), H. LEO (Berlin, 1856).

MURATORI, Ludovico Antonio, b. at Vignola, Oct. 21, 1672; d. at Modena, Jan. 23, 1750; studied theology, philosophy, and canon law in the university of the latter city; and was appointed conservator in the Ambrosian library at Milan, in 1694, and keeper of the ducal archives at Modena, in 1700. His principal works are historical: Scriptores rerum Italicarum, a collection of sources to the mediæval history of Italy (500-1500), Milan, 1723-51, 28 vols. folio; Annali d'Italia, a history of Italy down to 1749, Milan, 1741-49, 12 vols. 4to; Thesaurus veterum inscriptionum, Milan, 1739-42, 4 vols. fol.; Dell' antichità estense, Modena, 1737-40, 2 vols. But he also distinguished himself as a theologian, representing a more liberal stand-point, and suffering for it. His De ingeniorum moderazione in religionis negotio, Paris, 1714, was vehemently attacked by the Jesuits; and still more so his De superstitione vitanda, Venice, 1740. With the Jesuits, however, he succeeded in effecting a reconciliation by his historical exposition of their mission in Paraguay. But his Della regolata divozioni de' Cristiani, Venice, 1747, again aroused suspicion of heresy. Somewhat timid by nature, he humbly addressed himself to the Pope, Benedict XIV., who answered him in a most gracious manner, completely exculpating him. Collected editions of his works appeared at Arezzo, 1767-80, 36 vols. 4to, and at Venice, 1790-1810, 48 vols. His life was written by his nephew, F. S. MURATORI, Venice, 1756, by ABBÉ GOUPET, Paris, 1756, and by J. W. BRAUN, Treves, 1838.

MURATORIAN CANON. See CANON, p. 390.

MURDER AMONG THE HEBREWS was, from the very beginning of their life as a nation, considered one of the greatest crimes. The First Commandment of the second table forbade it, and the law applied to it the ius talionis in its widest scope. No fine was sufficient to expiate a murder. The very country was considered as defiled by that crime, and could be cleansed only by the blood of the murderer. Neither the city of refuge (Deut. xix. 4-13) nor the altar (Exod. xxi. 11) could shield him against the avenger of blood (which article see). Could the murderer not be found out, the elders of the city nearest to the place where the murdered man was discovered, should bring a young heifer, without blemish, to a "rough valley" in the neighborhood, sacrifice it, and by prayers and ablutions make manifest their detestation of the deed (Deut. xxi. 1-9). To the full definition of murder belongs intention (Exod. xxi. 11); and in Num. xxxv. 16-22 various criteria are mentioned from which intention might be inferred. If a person killed another accidentally, he was still liable to the revenge of blood, if the victim died immediately; but he might escape the revenge by shutting himself up in a city of refuge. Even if the victim were a thief or a burglar, the slayer was acquitted, only when the murder had taken place during night (Exod. xxii. 2, 3). Killing by poison is not mentioned in the Mosaic law. Later Jewish legislation treated it as a kind of witchcraft, and the very attempt was punished by death (Josephus: Archæol., 4, 8, 34). Nor is murder of wife, or husband, or children, mentioned. Parricide is first spoken of in 1 Tim. i. 9. Fratricide was not punished more heavily than other kind of murder (Gen. xxvii. 45; 2 Sam. xiv. 6). Suicide was specially abhorred (1 Sam. xxxi. 5; 2 Sam. xvii. 23). See also JOSEPHUS; Bell. Jud., 3, 8, 5.

MURDOCK, James, D.D., b. in Westbrook, Conn., Feb. 16, 1776; d. in Columbus, Miss., Aug. 10, 1856. He was graduated from Yale College, 1797; entered the Congregational ministry; pastor in Princeton, Mass., 1802-15; professor of ancient languages in the University of Vermont, 1815-19; professor of sacred rhetoric and ecclesiastical history in Andover Theological Seminary, 1819-28; retired to New Haven, and from then till his death devoted himself exclusively to the study of church history, orientalia, and philosophy. The principal fruits of this learned leisure are a translation from the German of MÜNSCHER'S Elements of Dogmatic History, New Haven, 1830; a translation from the Latin of MOSHEM'S Institutes of Ecclesiastical History, New Haven, 1832, 3 vols., revised edition, New York, 1839 and often since (republished in London, edited by Soames, 1841, and Reid, 1848); a translation of MOSHEM'S Commentaries on the affairs of the Christians before the time of Constantine the Great, New York, 1851-52, 2 vols.; The New Testament: a literal translation from the Syriac Peshito version, New York, 1852 (this is a standard work) He also edited, with preface and notes, MILMAN'S History of Christianity, New York, 1841, and wrote two original works, The Nature of the Atonement, Andover, 1823, a discourse which attracted considerable attention, and Sketches of Modern Philosophy, especially among the Germans, Hartford, 1842.

MURNER, Thomas, b. at Strassburg, 1475; d. at Oberehnheim, Aug. 23, 1537; entered the Franciscan order in 1490; was ordained priest in 1494; studied afterwards theology, philosophy, canon law, etc., in Paris, Kraeow, and Freiburg, and attempted at various places to teach logic, and even jurisprudence by means of charts (Chartiludium logicæ and Chartiludium institute summarie). Greater reputation, however, he acquired as a poet. In 1509 appeared his Schelmzunft and Narrenbeschweerung; in 1514, his Ein andechtig geistliche Badenfurt, etc.,—very incisive satires on the faults and follies of his time. But, though he had an open eye for the corruption of the Roman-Catholic Church, he was decidedly hostile to the Reformation. Against Luther he wrote no less than thirty-two pamphlets, of which five or six have been printed. After the establishment of the Reformation in Strassburg, he lived for some time at Oberehnheim, but was driven away by the outbreak of the Peasants' War, and fled to Switzerland. Having settled at Lucerne, he became the head of the Roman party, and one of the most energetic opponents of Zwingli. But in 1529 he had to flee also from Lucerne; and he was then able to return to Oberehnheim, where he spent the rest of his life. His life was written by G. E. WALDAU, Nüremb., 1775. FRANZ LIST (Munich).

MURRAY, John, founder of the Universalist denomination in America; b. in Alton, Hampshire, Eng., Dec. 10, 1741; d. in Boston, Mass., Sept. 3, 1815. His parents were members of the Church of England, and followers of Wesley. In 1751 they settled near Cork, Ireland. In 1760 Murray returned to England, and joined Mr. Whitefield's congregation; but embracing, somewhat later, the teachings of James Rely (see art.), a Universalist preacher, he was excommunicated. In 1770 he emigrated to America, and preached, as a Universalist minister, his first sermon in Good Luck, N.J., Sept. 30, 1770. His field of labor was at first New Jersey and New York, but afterwards, almost exclusively, New England. He was largely instrumental in the formation of the Independent Christian Universalists at Oxford, Mass., September, 1785. On Oct. 23, 1793, he became pastor of the Universalist society of Boston, and faithfully served them until Oct. 19, 1809, when paralysis compelled him to give up preaching. He was a man of great courage and eloquence, and in the defence of his peculiar views endured much detestation and abuse. In regard to Christ, he taught that in him God became the Son; for "God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, are no more than different exhibitions of the self-same existent, omnipresent Being." He taught that all men would ultimately be saved through the sacrifice of Christ. See his Letters and Sketches of Sermons, Boston, 1812, 3 vols., and his interesting Autobiography, continued by his wife, Boston, 1816, centenary edition by Rev. G. L. Demarest, Boston, 1870.

MURRAY, Nicholas, D.D., b. at Ballynasloe, Ireland, Dec. 25, 1803; d. at Elizabethtown, N.J., Feb. 4, 1861. He emigrated to America, 1818; was apprenticed as a printer to Harper & Brothers. Brought up in the Roman-Catholic communion, he was in 1820 converted to Protestantism, and, after graduation at Williams College (1826), studied theology at Princeton, and became a Presbyterian pastor, first at Wilkesbarre, Penn., 1829, and from 1834 till his death, at Elizabethtown, N.J. In 1849 he was moderator of the (Old School) General Assembly. His fame rests upon his able and witty controversy with Bishop Hughes, afterwards published under the title Letters to the Right Rev. John Hughes, Roman-Catholic Bishop of New York, New York, 1847-48, 3 series (collective ed., revised and enlarged, 1855). These letters appeared in the New-York Observer, over the signature of "Kirwan." They attracted wide notice at the time, and made his name a household word. They have been translated into several languages. He addressed another series to Chief-Justice Taney, published in 1852 under the title Romanism at Home. Dr. Murray also wrote Notes, Historical and Biographical, concerning Elizabethtown, 1844; and Men and Things as I saw them in Europe, New York, 1853.

MUSÄUS, Johann, b. at Langenwiesen, in Thuringia, Feb. 7, 1613; d. at Jena, 1681; studied philosophy and humaniora at Erfurt, afterwards theology at Jena; and was appointed professor there, first in history (1642), then in theology (1646). Possessed of an excellent philosophical training, he at once vindicated the application of philosophy to theology against the disciples of the stiff Lutheran orthodoxy, and condemned its too universal use by the Reformed theologians. (See his De usu principiorum rationis, Jena, 1647, against the Dutch theologian, Nicholas Vedelias.) His conception of theology as an object, not only of the intellect, but also of a pia affectio (see his Introductio in theologiam, Jena, 1679), led him to emphasize the importance of good works and of the sanctity of the will, to such a degree, that he has since been designated as a precursor of Spener. To the stiff and fixed definitions then prevalent in orthodox Lutheran dogmatics he was strongly opposed; and he refused to subscribe to the Consensus repetitus fidei vere Lutheranae, drawn up by Calov in 1655. A long and bitter controversy ensued (Theologorum Jenensium Errores, Wittenberg, 1676, principally directed against Musäus; Der jenschen Theologen Erklärung, Jena, 1676, Musäus' answer, 718 pp. in quarto); but he lost the battle, and was compelled to renounce in a formal way all sympathy with the so-called "syncretism." See HACKENSCHMIDT, in Studien und Kritiken, 1880. HENKE.

MUSCULUS (MEUSEL), Andreas, b. at Schneeberg, in Saxony, 1514; d. at Francfort-on-the-Oder, Sept. 21, 1581; studied theology at Leipzig and at Wittenberg, where he became an enthusiastic disciple of Luther, and was in 1540 appointed professor of theology at Francfort-on-the-Oder. He was one of the gladiators of the Lutheran party; and in his controversies (with Stancarus, Staphylus, Abdias Prätorius, the magistrates of Francfort-on-the-Oder, etc.) he never yielded, though the students pelted him with stones in the street, and stormed his house. He published forty-six books, and partook in the drawing-up of the Torgau-Book and the Formula Concordiæ. His life has been written by CHR. W. SPIEKER, Francfort-on-the-Oder, 1858. H. WEINGARTEN.

MUSCULUS (MÜSSLIN or MEUSSLIN), Wolfgang, b. at Dieuze, in Lorraine, Sept. 8, 1497; d. at Bern, Aug. 30, 1563; was educated in the Benedictine monastery near Lixheim, but left it in 1527, roused by Luther's writings; studied in Strassburg under Capito and Butzer; married, and was appointed pastor at Augsburg in 1531, and professor of theology at Bern in 1549. Originally in favor of a union between the Lutheran and the Reformed Church, he afterwards gave up the idea entirely, and followed an exclusively Calvinistic direction, as seen both from his Commentaries and his Loci communes (Basel, 1560, and afterwards often reprinted). See his life by L. GROTE, Hamburg, 1855.

MUSGRAVE, George Washington, D.D., LL.D., b. in Philadelphia, Oct. 19, 1801; d. there Thursday, Aug. 24, 1882. He entered the junior class of the College of New Jersey, Princeton, but his poor health prevented his finishing the course; yet, pursuing private studies, he finally entered Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed, 1823, and was pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, July, 1830-52; was corresponding secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, 1852-53, and of the Board of Home Missions, 1853-61, 1868-70; from 1862 to 1868, pastor of the North Tenth-street Church, Philadelphia. He was president of the Presbyterian Historical Society, a director of Princeton Theological Seminary from 1836, and a trustee of the College of New Jersey from 1859 until his death. In 1868 he was moderator of the (Old School) Presbyterian General Assembly. He was particularly prominent in the re-union movement of 1867-69, and was chairman of the joint committee on reconstruction, May, 1870. He was a staunch Calvinist and Presbyterian and an eloquent speaker. He never married. See Presbyterian Re-union Memorial Volume, New York, 1870, especially pp. 541 sqq., for his work in connection with the re-union.

MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

Instrumental music, although, according to Gen. iv. 21, of profane, Cainitish origin, appears to have been used in Hebrew antiquity, especially in the service of God, and the more so, since Israel has been separated from among the Shemitic tribe to be the people of God. A larger variety of instruments the people probably brought along out of Egypt. When the people sang praises to God for his great deeds,—be it after a victory, or after a deliverance out of great distress (Exod. xv. 4, 20; Num. xxi. 17 sq.; Judg. xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6; 2 Chron. xx. 28; Neh. xii. 22; Ps. lxxviii. 25 sq.; 1 Macc. iv. 21, 54, xiii. 51), or at the anointing of a king, or a marriage (1 Kings i. 39 sq.; Jer. xxv. 10; 1 Macc. ix. 39), or when the people met on solemn occasions (2 Sam. vi. 4 sq. 15; 1 Chron. xiii. 8, xv. 16, xvi. 5 sq., xxv. 1 sq.; 2 Chron. v. 12 sq.), even at idolatrous feasts (Exod. xxxii. 6).—song and music, also dancing, together with poetry, were combined for the one great purpose. According to the Mosaic law (Num. x. 2-10; Lev. xxiii. 24, xxv. 9), trumpets only were used, not so much in divine service, but for announcing holy seasons, or as signals at sacrifices, and for assembling the people in the march and in war. Since, however, the assemblies of the theocratic people had the character of a divine service, the trumpets could only be blown by the priests (Num. x. 2 sq.). The song of the female choirs mentioned (Judg. xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6 sq.) was not of a religious character. The cultivation of sacred music, which was commenced under Samuel, especially through the establishment of the school of the prophets (1 Sam. x. 5; xix. 19, 20), reached its height under David, who, encouraged and assisted by the choir of the prophets (2 Chron. xxix. 25), was not only an expert in song and music himself, but also an inventor of musical instruments, as may be seen from Amos vi. 5. His chief of the musicians instructed the people (2 Sam. i. 18); and the wonderful effects—soothing, on the one hand (1 Sam. xvi. 14 sq.), and inspiring, on the other hand (1 Sam. x. 5, xix. 20; 2 Kings iii. 15)—of the music of David, of the choir of the prophets, as well as of the temple orchestra (2 Chron. v. 12 sq.), indicate a certain degree of perfection of sacred music, in spite of its simplicity. According to 1 Chron. xxiii. 5, the temple orchestra consisted of four thousand Levites, who acted as singers and musicians, and were presided over by Asaph, Heman, and Ethan. When the temple was built, these three choirs were united into one (2 Chron. v. 12 sq.). According to Josephus (Ant., VIII. 3, 8), Solomon provided the temple orchestra with two hundred thousand dresses, forty thousand psalteries and harps, and two hundred thousand trumpets, which can only mean that this provision was intended for all time. That there were also female singers at the time of the temple cannot with certainty be ascertained from 1 Chron. xxv. 6; but that there were such after the exile, we know from Ez. ii. 65, Neh. vii. 67. During the exile, although the national music had lost much of its ancient glory and splendor, yet it was still preserved and cultivated; for, at the foundation of the second temple, there were about two hundred and forty five singers, who had returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 44, 67; Ez. ii. 41, 65, 70), and thus the temple music could be restored. As to the musical instruments used among the Hebrews, there were three kinds.

I. INSTRUMENTS OF PERCUSSION AND AGITATION.—The most ancient pulsatile instrument mentioned is, 1. The toph, consisting of a narrow circle, or hoop, of wood or metal, covered with a tightened skin, and struck with the hand. The Arabs still call it dof; and the Spaniards, adufe. by the Septuagint it is rendered tympanon, drum. It is often mentioned in the Old Testament, as in Gen. xxxi. 27 [where the Authorized Version reads "tabret"]; Exod. xv. 20; Job xxi. 12; Ps. lxxviii. 25; Isa. xxiv. 8, and often. 2. Tsetshin metsilt, in the Septuagint, kymbala, or cymbals, which were held in either hand, and dashed sharply together. They are first mentioned in 2 Sam. vi. 5, and were used by the conductor to beat time to the whole Levitical choir (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 6; 2 Chron. v. 12). 3. Menaanim (2 Sam. vi. 5), "shaking instruments," consisting of two iron bars, with movable rings and bars of metal inserted in the frame, by the sharp impact of which upon the frame, when shaken in the hand, a piercing sound was produced. 4. Shalishim (1 Sam. xviii. 6) are either a kind of cymbals, or triangle.

II. STRINGED INSTRUMENTS, or nejinoth, to which belonged, 1. The kinnor, first mentioned Gen. iv. 21. It was used as an instrument to accompany spiritual as well as worldly song (Gen. xxxi. 27; 1 Sam. xvi. 16 sq.; 1 Chron. xxv. 6; Isa. v. 12, xxiii. 16, xxiv. 8, etc.). 2. The nebel, an instrument apparently much resembling the kinnor, or harp, in its nature and properties, though considerably different in form. According to Josephus (Ant., VII. 12, 13), it had twelve strings, which were played upon with the hand. One variety of it had only ten strings (Ps. xxxiii. 2; cxliv. 9); and from an expression in Isa. xxii. 24 (Heb., "all manner of nebel instruments"), we gather that the instrument, like the harp, was used in various sizes and shapes. 3. The sabekka ["sackbut" in the Authorized Version] (Dan. iii. 5, 7) was probably, also, a stringed instrument. With this instrument female performers visited the Roman Empire.

III. WIND INSTRUMENTS.—1. The most ancient of these was the ugab (Gen. iv. 21; Job

xxi. 12, xxx. 31; Ps. cl. 4), a kind of bagpipe. 2. The halil, flute, the meaning of which is bored through (1 Sam. x. 5; 1 Kings i. 40; Isa. v. 12, xxx. 29; Jer. xlviii. 36; Matt. ix. 23, xi. 17; 1 Cor. xiv. 7; Rev. xviii. 22; 1 Macc. iv. 51, ix. 39). It was originally formed from the reed, by the simple contrivance of cutting a larger or smaller number of holes in one of its lengths; but it was afterwards more artistically made of wood, bone, horn, and ivory. It is still used in Palestine. 3. The maskrokita (Dan. iii. 5) was an instrument of the pipe class, but what kind is impossible to determine. 4. The shophar, "horn," often interchanged with keren: hence it is difficult to draw a distinction between them. Both, originally made out of the horns of the ram, were probably in later times of metals. The instrument was used in the service of God, in making announcements, and for calling the people together in the time of holy solemnities, of war or rebellion, or of any other great occasion (Exod. xix. 13; Num. x. 10; Judg. iii. 7; 1 Sam. xiii. 3, xv. 10; 2 Chron. xv. 14; Isa. xviii. 3). 5. The chatsotserah, the straight trumpet, was also used for signalling. The two silver trumpets appointed by Moses to be made for the use of the priests of the tabernacle were of this construction, and were used for announcing to the people the advent of the different feasts, for signalling the journeying of the camps, and for sounding alarms in time of war (Num. x. 1-10). Solomon increased the number to a hundred and twenty (2 Chron. v. 12).

MUSIC, Sacred. Of the music of the ancient Jewish Church, little need be said in this article. In the days of Solomon, the office of praise in public worship was not left to regulate itself. Of the thirty-eight thousand Levites, four thousand were set apart to praise the Lord with the instruments of music which David had made (1 Chron. xxiii. 5). Two hundred and eighty-eight chosen cunning men were instructed in the songs of the Lord (1 Chron. xxv. 7). In the tabernacle and in the temple, both the instrumental and vocal performers were selected from among the Levites, and they were specially trained for the service. The music was of the crudest and most rudimentary kind: it was without harmony, with very little melody; recitative and responsive, or antiphonal in its character.

It was the Incarnation which gave birth to song. After the Last Supper, our Lord and his disciples sang together before going to the Mount of Olives (Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26). "At midnight, Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God," in the prison at Philippi (Acts xvi. 25). Then we find the apostle exhorting the church at Ephesus, and that at Colosse, to worship in "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16).

We are told of the Christians of apostolic times, that "they were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God," and that "they did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God" (Luke xxiv. 53; Acts ii. 47). Such is the New-Testament basis of the history which we are to review.

Primitive Christians were characterized in history by Pliny, as those who sang hymns to the praise of Christ. The first efforts to systematize the music of the early church were made by Ambrose, bishop of Milan, 374-397. For the most part, his work was the adaptation of Greek music to the use of the church. The introduction of the four scales, known as the "Authentic Modes" (1, Dorian; 2, Phrygian; 3, Lydian; 4, Mixolydian), is generally ascribed to Ambrose.

But, much as Ambrose did, his work was greatly surpassed by that of Gregory the Great, 590-604. Gregory discarded the Greek tetrachord, and substituted the scale of the octave. To the four "Authentic" he added the four "Plagal" modes, each a fourth below its corresponding one in the "Authentic" modes: they were called "Hypodorian," "Hypo-phrygian," "Hypo-lydian," and "Hypo-mixo-lydian." Gregory collected such ancient hymns and psalms as had been approved in the church, and arranged them in the order which was soon adopted by a great part of the Western Church. Canisius says, "This pontiff composed and arranged and constituted the Antiphonarium and chants used in the morning and evening service." He established schools at Rome for musical education, which he often visited to hear or to lead the singing. The simplicity and plainness of the Ambrosian Chants had been overlaid with frivolous embellishments, so that there was little difference between secular music and sacred.

Gregory changed all this. His aim was to simplify the music of the church, regarding, as he did, all rhythmic singing as too light and frivolous for the purposes of worship. Short melodies, or chants, for the psalms, were prepared, — melodies with only a few intervals, — consisting of the "Intonation" (two or more notes for the minister or precentor), the "Recitation," the "Mediation," and the "Cadence." There were no flats or sharps, there was no rhythm, there were no bars, or measures of time, there was no harmony, as we understand it: and yet these Gregorian Chants form the basis of the cathedral music, both in the Roman Church and in the Anglican, to this day; while many of them, adapted and harmonized, have made their way more or less widely through all branches of the church. They were the chief music of the Anglican Church, not only immediately after the Reformation, but even late in the seventeenth century: they are in Marbeck's book (1559), in Morley's (1597), in Lowe's (1661), in Clifford's (1664), and in Canon Jebb's Collection of Choral Uses of the Churches of England and Ireland.

Choirs were formed as early as the fourth century; and the Council of Laodicea found it necessary to forbid congregational singing. But Gregory reformed the abuses, and restored music to the people. It is said that a copy of his Antiphonary is in possession of the monastery of St. Gall in Switzerland; a facsimile of which was published in 1867.

After Gregory's time, there was a marked decline in the music of the church. By the seventh century the priests had monopolized the singing, and they sang only in Latin. From thence till the Reformation, the people were almost songless in public worship. In the eleventh century, Guido Aretino gave a new impulse to musical study: he introduced a system of notation, and the practice of solmization by scales of six sounds only. The names of notes still in use were suggested by an ancient hymn to John the Baptist: —

"Ut queant laxis
Re-sonare fibris
Mi-ra gestorum
Fa-muli tuorum
Sol-ve polluti
Labi-um reatum, Sancte Johannes."

"Ut," "Re," "Mi," "Fa," "Sol," "La," became thus the names of six tones. "Ut" was afterwards changed to "Do," and "Si" was added to complete the scale. Before the eleventh century, in written music the length of notes was not indicated. The oldest notation is on three or four lines, without bars or measures, and with square or angular notes variously colored. By the twelfth century the position of a note determined its pitch; and the shape, its length. A Latin manuscript of the tenth century shows some slight knowledge of chords. It may be said that the organ is the mother of harmony, and the violin the mother of melody; that Germany was the birthplace of harmony, and Italy the home of melody. In the fourteenth century we first meet the word contrapunctum, or "counterpoint." Toward the last of this century some Belgian musicians brought to Rome the first harmonized masses that had been seen there.

The sixteenth century witnessed a great revival of musical interest and a great advance in musical knowledge. In France, at the suggestion of Beza, the court poet Marot prepared and published a version of some of the psalms in French rhymes, which became so popular, that the Sorbonne, though at first favoring them, at last felt constrained to forbid their use. These psalms, Calvin adopted, and published in Geneva, with a preface of his own. Luther devoted much time and attention to the preparation of music for the people, and published a small book in which the hymns and the tunes were mostly of his own composition. The people received this volume with avidity; and the air was full of the sound of sacred song. Cardinal Cajetan said of Luther, "By his songs he has conquered us." The "Infectious frenzy of sacred song," as it was called, was not confined to Germany, but was almost co-extensive with the Reformation. Sternhold and Hopkins (1518-49), followed by Rouse (1641), by Tate and Brady (1696), and then by Watts (1671-1748), carried on the work in England.

In the Church of Rome the music had become so secular, that it came under the censure of the Council of Basle; and afterward the Council of Trent almost resolved to banish music from the church altogether. In 1563 Pius IV. appointed eight cardinals to carry out the will of the Council. Meanwhile a great musician had been raised up for the emergency,—Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina, b. in Palestrina (Præneste) near Rome, 1524; d. in Rome, 1594. The exact date of his birth is uncertain. This name marks the greatest epoch in the history of music after that of Gregory the Great. Palestrina starved through seven pontificates, but in and by his sufferings he became great. The committee of cardinals applied to Palestrina to save music to the church by such a composition as would silence opposition. In answer to this request, Palestrina composed his Missa Papæ Marcelli. When the Pope heard one of these masses, he declared that it must have been some such music that the apostle of the Apocalypse heard sung by the triumphant hosts of angels in the New Jerusalem. The crisis was passed, and music was saved to the church. Palestrina may be said to have founded a school of church music. He was skilled in all the intricacies of his art, and carried the science of counterpoint much higher than had been done before. Some of his masses and motets are still in use in the Roman-Catholic Church; and three of his motets, adapted to psalms, are still in use in the English cathedral service. He was buried with great pomp in St. Peter's. His last words were directions to his son for the publication of his manuscripts,—"for the glory of the Almighty, and his worship in the congregations of the faithful."

The oratorio, for a time, advanced side by side with the opera; but a divergence came, not long after the beginning of the seventeenth century. Carissimi and the Scarlattis had prepared the way in Italy; and Bach (1685-1750), Handel (1684-1758), Haydn (1733-1809), and Mendelssohn (1809-47), besides others less conspicuous, made the oratorio extremely popular in Germany, England, and the United States. Of the masters of the symphonic school, and of the great writers for the lyric stage, it is not necessary here to speak. A recent elaborate work in the style of the oratorio is Gounod's Redemption.

We turn to take a brief survey of the history of church music in America. When the Puritans came to this country, they brought with them Ainsworth's Version of the Psalms. In 1610 The Bay Psalm-Book was printed; and the music for the later editions was taken principally from Ravenscroft's Collection (London, 1618). About the year 1690, music was first published in this country. In 1712, or thereabout, the Rev. John Tufts published A Very Plain and Easy Introduction to the Art of singing Psalm-Tunes. In 1718 Dr. Cotton Mather published Psalterium Americanum; this was followed in 1721 by Walter's singing-book,—The Grounds and Rules of Musick explained. There was much ignorance, and not a little bigoted prejudice, among the churches against singing by note; but gradually singing-schools were established, which prepared the way for a general awakening of interest. In 1761 a music-book was published, under the title of Urania: three years later, another collection of music was published in Boston by Josiah Flagg. In 1770 William Billings published in Boston a collection which had a wide popularity. Choirs and singing-societies had become general; and rapidly the people learned to sing the simple melodies and crude harmonies which were furnished them.

The republication of the Lock Hospital Collection (Boston, September, 1809), and of the Harmonia Sacra (Andover, 1816), marked a new era in musical culture in this country. It was the first grammatical music given to our people. Early in this century, Lowell Mason, Mus. Doc. (1792-1872), and Thomas Hastings, Mus. Doc. (1784-1872), began their musical careers,—the one in Boston, and the other in New York. Singing-schools and musical societies and conventions were multiplied. More than seventy distinct musical publications were issued by these two writers; and for some years a new collection of tunes was expected each year.

About the year 1856 this rapid multiplication of tune-books ceased, and ceased quite suddenly; and the present era of the "hymn-tune book" began. Much music, meanwhile, has been prepared expressly for the use of the sabbath school; and many books of what is called "refrain-music" have been published, for use in conference-meetings and revival services. With the growth of general musical cultivation, there has been developed a disposition to deny to the church a distinct repertoire, and to mingle secular music with sacred, and even to crowd out the sacred by the secular. The choral music, which has maintained its place so successfully in Germany and England, has not been popular here, where the people prefer light and frivolous melodies, or operatic airs, or else intricate harmonies, which can be sung, for the most part, only by professional choirs. What the re-action will be, it is not for the writer to predict.

MUTIANUS, Rufus Conradus, b. at Hamburg, Oct. 15, 1471; d. at Gotha, March 30, 1526; studied at Erfurt and Bologna, and obtained in 1503 a small canonry at Gotha, where he remained for the rest of his life. He enjoyed a great reputation among the humanists; and the attitude he assumed with respect to the Reformation was very characteristic, not only for him, but for the whole party. He published only a few epigrams, but quite a number of his letters have been preserved. They are of great historical interest. See D. F. STRAUSS: Ulrich von Hutten, Leipzig, 1858. Some of them were published by W. E. Tenzel, in his Supplemen. historie Gothanae, i., Jena, 1701.

MYCONIUS (MECUM), Friedrich, b. at Lichtenfels, in Upper Franconia, Dec. 26, 1490; d. at Gotha, April 7, 1546; entered the Franciscan order in 1510; became a very enthusiastic devotee of monastic exercises, and was ordained priest in 1516; but fled from the monastery in 1524, and was in the same year appointed evangelical pastor in Gotha. An intimate friend of Luther and Melancthon, he was very active in establishing the Reformation in Thuringia; and took, also, part personally in most of the great events of the Reformation, whose history (from 1517 to 1542) he wrote. F. M. Historia Reformationis, edited by E. S. Cyprian, Leipzig, 1718. His life was written by MELCH. ADAM, Franfort, 1705; JUNCKER, Waltershausen, 1730; BOSSECK, Leipzig, 1739; GODOF. LOM-

MATZSCH, Annaeb., 1825; and LEDDERHOSE, Gotha, 1854.

MYCONIUS, Oswald, b. at Lucerne in 1488; d. at Basel, Oct. 14, 1552; was very active in reforming the Swiss schools as rector at Basel, Lucerne, and Zürich; and was in 1531 appointed professor of theology, and pastor of St. Alban's in Basel. He was an intimate friend of Zwingli, and took an active part in all the great events of the Swiss Reformation. His family name was Geisshüsler. His life was written by KIRCHHOFER, Zürich, 1813, and HAGENBACH, Elberfeld, 1859.

MYRRH is the aromatic gum, or sap, of a low thorny tree, which grows chiefly in Arabia and Ethiopia, but not in Palestine. The gum is first oily, then fluid; first yellow-white, then reddish, hardening into small globules of a peculiar balsamic smell, and bitter taste. There are several ways of collecting it: the best is to allow it to exude of itself; another way is to cut the bark of the tree. Myrrh was used for incense (Cant. iii. 6), perfume for clothing and beds (Ps. xlv. 8; Prov. vii. 17; cf. Cant. v. 1), as an oil (Esth. ii. 12), an ointment (Cant. v. 5), in the holy anointing oil (Exod. xxx. 23), and, as to-day, in medicine, and for embalming (John xix. 39). Myrrh was also put in wine to give it a spicy taste and smell; and this unintoxicating wine was a favorite with the ladies. Jesus, before his crucifixion, was offered wine mingled with myrrh (Mark xv. 23), probably the sour wine of the Roman soldiers. RÜETSCHL.

MYRTLE, The, grows wild in Asia, whence it was imported into Greece and Italy. It makes a tree ten feet high, with evergreen polished leaves, white blossoms, and agreeable odor. On account of its beauty and fragrance, it was a favorite for cultivation, even in countries where it was native. Out of its black berries, an oil and a sort of wine were made. Myrtle-branches were used in the decoration of houses and rooms on joyful occasions, were thrown in the way of victors in their triumphs, and were woven into wreaths and chaplets for heroes and guests. Myrtle-wreaths figured particularly at weddings, as the shrub was sacred to Aphrodite (Venus), and the symbol of conjugal love. The Jews used its branches to cover their booths during the feast of tabernacles (Neh. viii. 15; cf. Lev. xxiii. 40); and in the Old Testament the myrtle is the picture of the church's prosperity (Isa. lv. 13; Zech. i. 8-11). RÜETSCHL.

MYSTACOGUE (an initiator into the mysteries), MYSTACQY (introduction to the mysteries). The latter term is applied by the Greek Fathers, and in the Greek Church, to the sacraments; and the former, to the priest who prepares candidates for baptism.

MYSTICISM has been defined as belief in an immediate and continuous communication between God and the soul, which may be established by means of certain peculiar religious exercises; as belief in an inner light, an illumination of the soul, a contemplation of the divine, which may almost dispense with the written revelation, etc. This definition, however, identifies mysticism too closely with its extravagances, its more or less unsound developments,—quietism, enthusiasm, fanaticism, etc.,—and overlooks that there is a mystical element in all true religion, both objectively in the revelation, and subjectively in the faith. According to general acceptance, therefore, mysticism simply means a one-sided development of that element. Religion is an equal interaction of the consciousness of God and the consciousness of self. But the mystic disturbs the balance by throwing himself wholly upon his consciousness of God, and, so to speak, losing the consciousness of his own self in the feeling of God. As soon, however, as the mirror of the personality of man is dimmed, the image of the personality of God is also dimmed, and the strange, pantheistic speculations, so characteristic of mysticism, begin; while, practically, the strained ideas of the power of human life to grasp and represent the divine lead into asceticism, ecstasies, etc.

In history, mysticism generally appears as the re-action against the formula. Whenever the intellectual element of religion has become crystallized into stiff dogmas, and the definition begins to tyrannize over the free flow of spiritual life, the element of feeling, mystical in its very nature, rises and protests. Thus Brahmanism called forth Buddhism; the Talmud, the Cabala; the Mohammedan Koran-worship, Sufism; and, within the pale of Christendom, the theology of the Spanish Inquisition called forth the Alombrosos, Jesuitism, Quietism, Jansenism, etc. This must not be understood, however, as if the appearance of mysticism in history merely consisted of a series of abrupt outbursts. On the contrary, between the single phenomena there is a strong internal connection. At the foundation of the Christian Church, John stands as the born mystic in the circle of the apostles. Later on, Alexandria, the tomb of pre-Christian mysticism, became the cradle of Christian mysticism. From the Alexandrian theology ensued monasticism and the pseudo-Dionysian writings; that is, the practical organ and the speculative representation of Christian mysticism. Finally, during the middle ages, mysticism gained the ascendancy over scholasticism in the Western Church, and produced the Reformation. But there is a palpable connection between the Johannean logos-doctrine and the Alexandrian theology, and between the pseudo-Dionysian writings and the Victorines. Indeed, mysticism and scholasticism, though the former generally appears as the re-action against the latter, are simply the two faces of the head of Janus, equally important in the history of the Church; and when in the middle ages, scholasticism stood at its highest, mysticism also reached its fullest development.

The mediæval mysticism falls into three groups,—the Greek, the Gallo-Romanic, and the Germanic. The mysticism of the Greek Church found in the fifth century its type in the pseudo-Dionysian writings, and, in the seventh century, its most considerable representative in the monk Maximus. After that time, it seems, in the cells of the monks, to have sunk into a merely pathological quietism; and, if the mental state of the Hesychasts can be designated as a kind of religious somnambulism, the Greek Church may be said, in the synods of Constantinople of 1341, 1347, and 1350, to have established somnambulism as the highest form of divine revelation. A corresponding phenomenon is found in the Western Church in the visions of the female saints,—Elizabeth of Schönau, St. Hildegard, St. Birgitta, St. Catharine of Siena, and others; but the phenomenon has there a distinctly popular character. Nicolaus Cabasilas, in the fourteenth century, shows that the Greek mysticism, however, was capable of higher inspirations; though it is a striking fact, that, even in the Greek and Russian churches of to-day, mysticism presents a peculiar aspect of merely pathological sombreness. Another trait is also very characteristic,—the tendency the Greek mysticism evinces to fall into heresy. From the old mystical Gnosticism and Manichæism grew up a great number of heretical sects, some of which were very powerful, as, for instance, the Paulicians in the seventh century, and, later on, the Bogomiles, who were intimately connected with the wide-spread communities of the Cathari in the Western Church. The passing conflict between scholasticism and mysticism, which took place when Bernard of Clairveaux attacked Abelard, afterwards developed into a continuous contest. The pseudo-Dionysian writings, which were introduced in the Western Church in the ninth century by Scotus Erigena, formed the basis of this Gallo-Romanic mysticism. Its principal seat was the monastery of St. Victor in Paris; and its principal representatives were Hugh, Richard, and Walter of St. Victor, all belonging to the twelfth century. Its most characteristic trait may be found in the curious fact, that, though it made a decided opposition to scholasticism, it was itself scholastical, and used the same forms and methods as its adversary. No wonder, therefore, that Bonaventura in the thirteenth, and Gerson in the fourteenth, century, endeavored to reconcile the two antagonists. In the writings of Joachim of Floris this mysticism assumed an apocalyptic character. Among its aberrations may be mentioned the Gospel of the Holy Spirit, the Fratricelli, the Beguines, and the Beghards, etc. At the beginning of the thirteenth century a mystical pantheism stood in full bloom in the Rhine regions among the Brethren of the Free Spirit. It is generally put in connection with the Aristotelian pantheism of Amalric of Bena, and David of Dinanto; and Meister Eckart, a provincial of the Dominican order, and consequently one of the chief champions of orthodoxy, is often mentioned as one of the centres of the whole movement. Eckart's views are at all events very closely related to those of Scotus Erigena. Among his successors were Tauler, the great mystical preacher; Suso, a poetical genius; Ruysbroek, the doctor extaticus; and others. From the Rhine region, the movement passed on into the Netherlands, where Gerhard Groot formed the community of the Brethren of Common Life, to which Thomas à Kempis belonged. Its final result was the German Reformation.

In the history of the Reformation, the Anabaptists designate a wild outburst of an unsound, fanaticized mysticism; and, as soon as doctrinal correctness gained the ascendancy in Lutherdom over the living faith, the protests of mysticism appeared often in very curious forms, such as the montanistic chiliasm of Petersen, the ascetic theosophy of Gichtel, the pantheistic spiritualism of Dippel, etc. (See G. Arnold: Kirchen- und Ketzergeschichte, 1699, vol. ii.) During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, mysticism entered into various combinations with Pietism, Herrnhutianism, Methodism, etc., producing, in the eighteenth century, the Hebraeans in Holland, the Hutchinsonians and Jumpers in England, the Zionites in Norway, etc., and, in the nineteenth century, the Antonians in Switzerland, the Harmonists in North America, the Muckers in Würtemberg, etc. But most of these phenomena belong under the head of chiliasm, or fanaticism, rather than under that of mysticism. The Reformed Church also had its mystics in the Labadists, besides a number of wild aberrations; and it is a curious fact that the Reformed Labadism on the one side is connected with the Roman-Catholic Jansenism, and on the other with the Lutheran Spenerism. The Jansenists are the mystics of the modern Roman-Catholic Church. But also the Alombrados in Spain, and the Molinists in Italy must be mentioned, besides a number of independent phenomena, — St. Francis of Sales, Fénelon, Michael Bajus, etc.

MYTHICAL THEORY, The, and the Legendary Theory, form a group of their own among the false theories of the life of Christ. They agree in considering the gospel narrative, in all its supernatural and miraculous features, as a poetical fiction: but they differ in the closer definition of the character of the fiction; the one dissolving the statements into myths, the other into legends.

The myth starts from an idea, and invents facts to embody and represent it: the legend starts from facts, which it modifies and alters, until they fit a certain idea. The myth-making instinct belongs naturally to the childhood of a nation, and may be considered as a stepping-stone towards truth. The various mythologies — the Indian, Greek, Scandinavian, Finnish, etc. — are splendid examples of its activity. The legendary instinct appears much later in the life of a people, and arises from an exuberant imagination and religious enthusiasm, but also from an utter want of the critical faculty. It seems to be merely a weakness, a lack of power to grasp the truth, and to distinguish it from fiction. The mediæval martyrology is a typical instance of its modus operandi.

The mythical theory was applied to the gospel history by D. F. Strauss, in his Leben Jesu, 1835. He does not deny the historical existence of Jesus: he even admits him to have been a religious genius of the first magnitude. But, from pantheistic premises, he resolves all the supernatural and miraculous elements of Christ's person and history into myths, or imaginative representations of religious ideas. The ideas thus symbolized, especially the idea of the essential unity of the divine and human, are declared to be true in the abstract, as applied to humanity as a whole, but denied in the concrete, or in their application to an individual. The theory may be reduced to the following syllogism: There was a fixed idea in the Jewish mind, nourished by the Old-Testament writings, that the Messiah would perform certain miracles, — heal the sick, raise the dead, etc.; there was a strong persuasion in the minds of the disciples of Jesus, that he actually was the promised Messiah: therefore the mytho-poetic faculty instinctively invented the miracles corresponding to the Messianic conception, and ascribed them to him.

The legendary theory was applied to the gospel history by E. Renan, in his Vie de Jésus, 1863. He agrees with Strauss with respect to the fictitious character of the gospel narrative; but he has a better appreciation of the realness, and of the environments, of the life of Jesus. He correctly remarks, that the term "myths" is more applicable to India and primitive Greece than to the ancient traditions of the Hebrews and the Shemitic nations in general. He prefers the terms "legends" and "legendary narratives," "which, while they concede a large influence to the working of opinions, allow the action and the personal character of Jesus to stand out in their completeness." He regards the so-called "legend" of Jesus as the fruit of the consentaneous enthusiasm and imaginative impulse of the primitive disciples. No great event in history, he says, has passed without creating a cycle of fables; and Jesus could not have silenced those popular creations, even if he had wished to. Thus he brings the gospel history down to a level with the history of Francis of Assisi, and other marvellous saints of the Roman-Catholic Church; though, inconsistently enough, he prefers to quote the myth of Sakya-Muni, the founder of Buddhism, as a parallel, thus falling back upon the mythical theory.

The mythical theory has been fully refuted by Neander, Ullmann, Lange, Tholuck, Ebrard, etc.; the legendary theory, by E. de Pressensé, Van Oosterzee, Beyschlag, Henry B. Smith, etc. See SCHAFF: The Person of Christ, New York, 12th ed., 1883; H. B. SMITH: Faith and Philosophy, New York, 1877; GEORGE P. N.

NA'AMAN (agreeableness), a distinguished Syrian general, who, through the agency of Elisha, was miraculously cured of leprosy by dipping himself seven times in the Jordan. The story is found in 2 Kings v., and teaches many valuable lessons of the goodness of God and the pride of man. On the traditional site of Naaman's house in Damascus, there is to-day a leper-house. Our Lord refers to Naaman's cure in his sermon to the Nazarenes (Luke iv. 27).

NAASENES. See Gnosticism, p. 880.

NA'BAL (fool), a synonyme of churlishness and bestiality; the husband of the wise Abigail (who subsequently was married to David), and a wealthy citizen of Maon, a town of Judah near Hebron. He refused to provide food for David and his band; whereupon David determined his destruction, but was prevented by Abigail's prudent gifts. Nabal, on being told by her of her action as he was recovering from a drinking-bout, was seized with an illness, from which he died in ten days. The episode is related in 1 Sam xxv. 2-42.

NABATÆANS. See ARABIA, p. 123.

NADAL, Bernard Harrison, D.D., LL.D., b. in Talbot County, Md., March 27, 1812; d. at Madison, N.J., June 20, 1870. He was admitted as a preacher in the (former) Baltimore Conference, 1835, and had various charges, several in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Washington. While stationed at Carlisle, he studied in Dickinson College, and was graduated 1848. From 1854 to 1857 he was a professor in Indiana Asbury University. From 1867 till his death he was professor of church history in Drew Theological Seminary, and, after Dr. McClintock's death, was acting president. Dr. Nadal was a vigorous abolitionist. By his speeches and sermons on this subject he made a great impression. His attainments were quite extensive, and he was a welcome contributor to the religious press. He was, for a session, chaplain to Congress. See Memoir, in the posthumous volume of his sermons, New Life Dawning, and other Discourses, New York, 1873.

NA'HOR is the name of Abraham's grandfather, the father of Terah (Gen. xi. 22, 24), who led the Hebrews into Ur Casdim; and also the name of Abraham's brother (Gen. xi. 26). This younger Nahor had eight sons (Gen. xxii. 23), among whom was Bethuel, the father of Rebekah. When Abraham went forward to the west, Nahor remained in Mesopotamia, in "the city of Nahor" (Gen. xxiv. 10), and continued a Pagan. The relation, however, between the two lines,—that of Abraham and that of Nahor,—was not immediately broken off (Rebekah, Leah, and Rachel).

NA'HUM (נחום, consolation), one of the twelve Minor Prophets, who consoled Israel with the prophecy that Jehovah would punish its chief enemy, Assyria. He is called (i. 1) the "Elkoshite." Jerome speaks of Helkesei, or Elkosh, as a village in Galilee which had been pointed out to him; and perhaps this was the same as the present El-Kauzeh, near Ramah, in Naphtali. Some hold that Alkuseh in Assyria was the prophet's birthplace; but, as this rests upon a tradition dating back only to the sixteenth century, we prefer to connect Nahum with the place mentioned by Jerome. Some hold that the prophet wrote in Assyria; and appeal is made to the Assyrian coloring of the imagery, to the absence of references to any sojourn in Judah, and to the language. As to the Assyrian coloring, it is nothing more than we would naturally expect from a vivid imagination. As for the absence of references to any sojourn in Judah, which Ewald presses, Maurer and Hitzig refer to i. 4, and Umbreit to i. 13-ii. 3, as making directly the opposite impression. Ewald brings forward three words—הַצֵּב (ii. 8), כְּנָזַר (iii. 17), טָפְסָר (iii. 17)—as being of Assyrian origin; and the last two certainly are. But no one has thought of asserting that Jeremiah uttered his prophecy in Assyria because he uses the third of these words (li. 27) and other Oriental terms.

The date of Nahum is put by most of the critics in the reign of Hezekiah: some, however, regarding it as having been uttered before Sennacherib's invasion; others, during its continuance, and occasioned by it. Ewald makes the prophet a contemporary of Josiah, and regards him as having the attack of Phraortes against Assyria in mind. It has been thought that Sennacherib's defeat before the walls of Jerusalem was fresh in the prophet's mind; but this cannot be made out with any certainty from i. 9, 11, 12, ii. 13. The only safe starting-point for determining the date is the passage iii. 8 sqq. Here an historical fact is appealed to, which Schrader has confirmed from the cuneiform inscriptions. These record the destruction of No-Amom (see margin to iii. 8), or Thebes, which was accomplished by Assurbanipal in his second campaign against Egypt (probably 665 B.C.). Nahum threatens Nineveh with the same fate that had come upon Thebes, and had the destruction of the latter vividly before his mind. We may, therefore, set the date of the prophecy at 660 B.C.

The prophecy depicts the power of God in the judgment against Nineveh, and derives it from her sins. The genuineness has been undisputed, except the first part of i. 1 by Eichhorn, Bertholdt, Ewald, etc. But there is no good reason for disputing this; for, as Häverneck says, why should it be considered unfitting if the prophet, before announcing his name, should declare the purpose of the book? Nahum's style is distinguished by poetical beauty and classic purity. Lowth, in his Hebrew Poetry, pungently says, "Of all the Minor Prophets, no one seems to equal Nahum in sublimity, warmth, and boldness," etc.

NA'IN (beauty), now Nein, six miles south-east of Nazareth, on the north-western edge of Little Hermon. It is memorable as the scene of Christ's raising the widow of Nain's dead son to life (Luke vii. 11-18). It was once a town of considerable size, with walls and gates; it is now a miserable little Mohammedan village.

NAMES, Biblical Significance of. Names are designed to distinguish objects. Originally they were not words arbitrarily chosen, but expressed the distinct impressions which objects made upon, or the special relations in which they stood to, the person. Thus, as it would appear, the first giving of names (Gen. ii. 20) followed and defined the peculiarities of the animals named. The nomenclature of localities also was determined by some natural characteristic (e.g., Rama, Mizpah, Jericho, etc.) or historical occurrence (Gen. xi. 9, xxii. 14, xxvi. 20, xxviii. 19, etc.). The same may be said of the names of persons. They bring out some prominent characteristic connected with the birth, etc. (Gen. xxv. 25-30; 1 Sam. iv. 21, etc.), or designate the specific historical place of the individual (Gen. iii. 20, iv. 25). The name was also regarded as an omen; as, for instance, in the case of Benjamin (Gen. 35. 18), Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 25), etc.

In the Bible, names are specially significant as pledges of the divine guidance, and defining the relation of the bearer to God. Such names were either given at birth,—as Noah (Gen. v. 29), Ishmael (xvi. 11), Isaac (xxi. 3), Jesus (Matt. i. 21), etc.,—or subsequently, on some particular occasion, as the entrance upon new relations, as in the case of Abraham (Gen. xvii. 5), Sarah (xvii. 15), Israel (xxxii. 28), Joshua (Num. xiii. 16), Cephas (John i. 42), Barnabas (Acts iv. 36), etc. In the same way, perhaps, Saul took the name "Paul" from his first convert, Sergius Paulus (Acts xiii. 12). The prophets laid much emphasis upon a name. Nathan calls Solomon Jedidiah (2 Sam. xii. 25); and Hosea (i.) and Isaiah (vii. 3, viii. 3) press out of or into the names of their children, prophecies. When God chooses a man on account of personal qualifications he calls him by name (Exod. xxxi. 2; Isa. xlv. 3, 4). The reception of a new name from God (Isa. lxxv. 15; Rev. ii. 17, etc.) indicates a new personal relation to God, inaugurated by grace.

The names used by different nations are an important monument of the national spirit and moral tone. Likewise the names current in Israel are a significant testimony to its peculiar calling, and amongst no people of antiquity do relatively so many names occur of a religious origin. Matthew Miller's collection (Onomasticon) contains a hundred names of this kind. Compounded with the divine name, אֱלֹהִים (El), שָׁרַי (Shaddai), צַדִּיק (Tzur), and, later, with יהוה (Jahveh), they contain references to God's attributes, and his relations to the chosen people, or express hope in and thanks and petition to God. The religious significance of the name was enhanced by the connection of the naming of boys with circumcision (Luke i. 59, ii. 21). To be called by one's name was another expression for the rights of inheritance (Gen. xlviii. 16; Deut. xxv. 6, 7). Children frequently preserved the name of their father; and the term bar (son) was prefixed, as in Bartholomew, Bartimæus, etc. In the later periods of Israel's history, Aramaic (Martha, Tabitha, etc.), Greek (Aquila, Mark, etc.), and other foreign names were introduced, or Hebrew names were furnished with Greek forms; as Lazarus for Eleazar, Matthew for Amittai, etc. Many Jews also added a foreign name to their original Hebrew name; as John Mark (Acts xii. 12), Jesus Justus (Col. iv. 11), etc.

The names of God and Christ are also of deep significance. God announces his name as expressive of the relation in which he places himself to men, or the attributes by which he wishes to be known and appealed to. He thus designates what he is to men. He is the God who seeth (Gen. xvi. 13); and that which is characteristic of the patriarchal stage of revelation is expressed in the divine name Elshaddai ("the Almighty God," Gen. xvii. 1). It is he who changes the name of Abram with the allusion to the patriarch's being the progenitor of a numerous posterity,—he who subjects nature to his purposes. For the meaning of Jehovah and Elohim see the articles. The expression "name of God" indicates the entire administration of God, by which he reveals himself and his attributes to men. The believing Hebrew even saw God's glory and power displayed in the realm of nature; and the Psalmist exclaims (viii. 1), "How excellent is thy name in all the earth!" But the expression is used more particularly of God's revelation of himself to his people. Thus Israel is said to "walk in the name of the Lord" (Zech. x. 12), that is, to experience his power; and the expression, "Thy name is called upon us" (Jer. xiv. 9, margin), is only a further explanation of the previous expression, "Thou art in our midst." And, when God announces his mighty presence, it is said, "Thy name is near" (Ps. lxxxv. 1).

Likewise in the New Testament, the expression, "the name of Christ," refers to all that Jesus is to men, and to the manner of his revelation of himself to them, that they may believe, know, and call upon him: hence the pregnant expression, to "bear Christ's name," etc. (Acts ix. 15), and to preach remission of sins in his name (Luke xxiv. 47); so that the preaching derives its authority from the dignity of Christ, and its power from his ability to save, in which he reveals himself to men. Such expressions as "to believe in the name of Christ" (John i. 12), "saved by his name" (Acts iv. 12), "to have life through his name" (John xx. 31), all refer to the saving and life-giving power in Christ, which is communicated to the believer. The expression, "to be baptized into the name of Christ," signifies primarily that the candidate is received into a saving relation with God, and into the experience of that which God is to man as the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

NAMES. 1. Those used among Christians. — In the church of the first five centuries, there was great indifference respecting personal names; so that Christians were content to have themselves, and to give their children, names borne by heathen divinities, and names derived from Pagan services. Some of the Fathers (Chrysostom, Ambrose) protested that fitting names should be chosen, but they seem to have had small following. Yet we do meet with persons who took additional names: thus Eusebius added the name Pamphili, in memory of Pamphilius, a martyr whom he greatly revered; and Cyprian added the name Caecilius, that of him to whom he owed his conversion. In later times the spread of saint and relic worship led to the general adoption of the names of saints at baptism, and children were baptized with such names. "In the fourteenth century, Ladislas Jagellon, Duke of Lithuania, on becoming a convert to the faith, persuaded many of his subjects to follow his example. In consequence of their numbers, they were baptized in companies, the same name being given to all in one company. All the men in the first company were named Peter; and all the women, Catherine. In the second company the names given were Paul and Margaret; and so on."

2. Those given to Christians. — The chief names for themselves in the apostolic and sub-apostolic periods were Saints (ἅγιοι), Elect (ἐκλεκτοί), Brethren (ἀδελφοί), Faithful (πίστοι), Catholics, Pisciculi, in allusion to ἰχθῦς (see art. ICHTHUS), and above all Christians (see art. CHRISTIAN, ORIGIN OF THE NAME). Several opprobrious names were applied to Christians; such as (1) Atheists, a very common appellation, arising from their refusal to acknowledge the heathen divinities to be gods at all. "Away with the atheists!" was a cry which was heard by many another martyr than Polycarp. (2) Nazarenes. (3) Galilæi. The last two terms were derived from the locality of our Lord's home, — Nazareth in Galilee. (4) Græcus, Græculus, in current speech "impostor," such was the reputation of the Greeks. (5) Cross, Sun, Ass-worshippers. (6) Other epithets, Magicians, Suicides, the Reckless, the Desperate, etc. See MISS YONGE: History of Christian Names, London, 1863, 2 vols., and SMITH and CHEETHAM: *Dict. Chr. NANTES, The Edict of, regulating the relations between the Reformed Church in France and the State, was issued by Henry IV., April 13, 1598, and revoked by Louis XIV., Oct. 17, 1685. It was very far from establishing religious liberty in France, or placing the Protestants on equal terms with the Roman Catholics. It granted freedom of conscience, but not freedom of worship. The Protestants were allowed to celebrate divine service, only in certain places and under certain restrictions. They were obliged to keep all the feast and fast days of the Roman Church, pay tithe to her priests, and conform to her marriage-laws. But they gained admission to the universities, schools, and hospitals; and mixed courts were established for cases in which the litigants were of different denominations. After it had been signed by the king, its verification by the parliaments presented many difficulties; and infringement on its regulations took place even during the reign of Henry IV. The plea on which Louis XIV. revoked the edict was, that — in consequence of the vigorous and cruel measures taken, there were no more Protestants in France. See the special treatises by SANDER (Breslau, 1885), SCHOTT (Halle, 1885), BERSIER (Paris, 1886).

NARDIN, Jean Frédéric, b. at Montbéliard in 1687; d. at Blamont in 1728; studied theology at Tübingen; was strongly impressed by the German pietism, and was appointed pastor of Hericourt in 1714, and of Blamont in 1715. A collection of his sermons (Le prédicateur évangélique, Basel, 1735) was often reprinted, last in Paris, 1821, in 4 vols. His life was written by Duvernoy.

NARTHEX, an architectural term, of somewhat doubtful etymology, designating that portion of the ancient church — sometimes without and sometimes within the building — in which the catechumens and penitents gathered. It communicated with the nave by the "beautiful gates," where stood the Audientes; and with the outside, by the "great gates," where stood the catechumens.

NASMITH, David, Scotch philanthropist, b. at Glasgow, March 21, 1799; d. at Guildford, Nov. 17, 1839. He was the originator of city missions, having established the first one, in Glasgow, 1826. He founded the London City Mission, 1835, and city missions in many other cities of Great Britain, Canada, and the United States. From 1821 to 1828 he was secretary to the united benevolent societies of Glasgow, but spent the remainder of his life in propagating his benevolent schemes. See JOHN CAMPBELL: Memoirs of David Nasmith, London, 1844.

NATALIS (NOEL) ALEXANDER, b. at Rouen, Jan. 19, 1639; d. in Paris, Aug. 21, 1724; entered the Dominican order in 1655; taught, for several years, theology in the convent of St. Jacques, in Paris, and was appointed provincial of his order in 1706. On the instance of Colbert, he wrote his Selecta historiae ecclesiasticae capita, Paris, 1677–86, 24 vols.; to which he afterwards added six volumes of Old-Testament history. The work is a series of dissertations, rather than a continuous history. It is written in a liberal spirit, and from a Gallican point of view. The first parts, in which the Gallicanism of the author had no opportunity of showing itself, gained much favor even in Rome, but so much the greater was the disappointment caused by his representation of the middle ages; and by a decree of July 13, 1684, Innocent XI. forbade people to read the book, under penalty of excommunication. Natalis Alexander, however, did not recant. He defended his book, and Benedict XIII. finally removed it from the Index. He also wrote a Theologia dogmatica et moralis (Paris, 1693, often reprinted), some homilies, etc.

UHLHORN.

NATHAN (given), a name of frequent occurrence among the Hebrews. A son of David, born to him by Bathsheba, in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 14; 1 Chron. iii. 5), bore that name, and may have received it in honor of the celebrated prophet

Nathan, the sublime model of a court priest, who exercised a great and beneficent influence on the reign of David. He forbade him to build the temple, but promised him blessings in his seed (2 Sam. vii.); he awoke his conscience by the beautiful parable of the lamb of the poor man (2 Sam. xii.); and it was principally through his exertions that Solomon was declared heir apparent (1 Kings i.). At the court of Solomon, his two sons, Sabud and Asarjah, held high offices.

The poet Lessing chose Nathan for the name of his model Jew (Moses Mendelssohn) in the famous drama, Nathan der Weise, of which there is a good translation by Miss E. Frothingham, New York, 1867.

NATHAN'ÆL. See BARTHOLOMEW.

NATIVITY OF CHRIST. See CHRISTMAS.

NATURAL ABILITY. See INABILITY.

NATURAL LAW. The definition of a natural law always consists of three constituent elements, — matter, its inherent force, and the invariableness of the activity of the force. By induction, this invariableness — the external identity of effects when the causes are identical — is first made into an internal necessity (that is, an empirical result is made into a postulate of reason); and then all natural laws known are combined into one great totality, the law of nature, denoting the internal necessity with which the whole world of phenomena springs from the causality inherent in nature. Twice the idea of the law of nature, or natural law, touches theology, and has to be considered by the theologian, — once in the department of dogmatics, and again in the department of ethics.

Christian dogmatics must define the relation between the necessity of the law of nature and the omnipotence of the living God, both with respect to the creation and with respect to the government of the world. The question is, whether the law upon which nature, the whole world, all creation, stands, admits or excludes any further direct interference from the side of God; and the answer to that question will decide upon the possibility or impossibility of miracles. Nature may be conceived of pantheistically, as the all, in which even God has become absorbed; and it may be conceived of deistically, as an accomplished fact, which, from the moment of its completion, becomes utterly external to God. In both cases the possibility of miracles must be denied. The theological representative of the first-mentioned view is Schleiermacher. Christian ethics must define the difference between the causality of natural forces and the causality of the human will, between the necessity of nature and the freedom of man, between natural law and moral law. On account of his sharp distinction between phenomena and noumena, theoretical and practical reason, subject and object, etc., it came natural to Kant to define the difference between natural and moral law as one between fact and commandment; but, when the distinctions of Kant had been blunted by the philosophy of Schelling, it came equally natural to Schleiermacher to oppose the forced and strained idea of duty descending from Kant, and give an exposition of Christian ethics from the view, not of duty, but of the highest good, though thereby even spiritual life assumed the aspect of a natural process, and the idea of the freedom of will became much obscured.

Thus natural law is, both in dogmatics and in ethics, confronted with freedom, — in the former with the freedom of God, in the latter with the freedom of man; and the great problem of theology is, that neither the omnipotence of God be deistically circumscribed, nor the freedom of man pantheistically destroyed, by the necessity of nature. Every thing depends upon the true conception of the spirit, and "the Lord is the Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (2 Cor. iii. 17).

NATURAL RELIGION. See RELIGION.

NATURAL THEOLOGY is the scientific exposition of the existence, nature, and attributes of God, so far as revealed to us by nature. Of the legitimacy and value of this science, two directly opposite views have been propounded. On the one side, it has been said that natural theology is not a science, but a misunderstanding; first, because the idea of God, and all the ideas immediately connected with or dependent on it, are intuitions, of which no evidence or demonstration can be given; and, next, because nature, on account of its very character, can give no revelation of God. To the first objection, however, may be answered, that, though the idea of God is truly an intuition, the scientific refutation of the denials of that intuition is not only not valueless, but even necessary. And the second objection depends simply on a superficial and materialistic view of nature, which may usurp, but can never vindicate for itself, the title of being truly scientific. On the other side, it has been said that the natural revelation of God is so complete as to make a supernatural revelation quite superfluous, and that, consequently, natural theology is the only true theology existing. It is apparent, however, that, about the salvation of man, nature can tell us nothing; and consequently a natural theology which does not establish itself as an introduction to Christian theology is in its very essence a denial of Christianity.

Natural theology figures particularly in the deistic controversies of the last century. The deists claimed that there was no need of any revealed theology. See DEISM.

NAUDAUS, Philippus, b. at Metz, 1651; d. in Berlin, 1729; sought refuge in the latter city in 1687; became a member of the academy as a mathematician, and acquired a name in the history of theology by his staunch defence of the old doctrinal system of the Reformed Church, with its strict Calvinistic orthodoxy. He fought for supralapsarian predestination, imputative justification, etc.; and in his great work, La souveraine perfection de Dieu, he opposed every attempt at mitigating the old doctrines. But the times when doctrinal correctness was thought of paramount importance had gone by, and the works of Naudæus exercised only a small influence.

NAUMBURG, Convention of, 1561. Soon after the accession of Pius IV. (Jan. 6, 1560), preparations were made for the re-opening of the Council of Trent; and threatening rumors began to spread, of a new religious war for the purpose of stamping out Protestantism. The Protestants, it was said in Roman-Catholic circles, do not adhere any longer to the original Confession of Augsburg. They have split into many parties; they allow all kinds of innovations among themselves, and are consequently no longer entitled to those rights which were granted to them by the peace of Augsburg. To the Protestants it was evident that unity and concord were absolutely necessary; and, at a meeting of Duke Christof of Württemberg, the Elector Friedrich the Pious of the Palatinate, and his son-in-law, Duke Johann Friedrich of Saxony (at Hilsbach, June 29, 1560), it was determined that all the Protestant princes should be invited to a convention at Naumburg-on-the-Saale, in order to come to an agreement both with respect to a new subscription to the Confession of Augsburg, as a manifestation of their unity, and with respect to the policy to be adopted towards the Council of Trent. The convention met Jan. 20, 1561, and lasted till Feb. 8, holding twenty-one sittings. Personally present were the Elector Friedrich III. of the Palatinate, and his son, the Count-palatine Casimir, the Elector August of Saxony, the Count-palatine Wolfgang of Zweibrücken, and his cousin Hans Georg, Duke Johann Friedrich of Saxony, Duke Christof of Württemberg, and his son Eberhard, Duke Ulrich of Mecklenburg, the Dukes Ernst and Philipp of Brunswick-Grubenhagen, Margrave Charles of Baden, Count Georg Ernst of Henneberg, Landgrave Philipp of Hesse, and his son Ludwig, Duke Francis of Lauenburg, besides a great number of counts and barons who had not been specially invited. Several princes who were not personally present — the Elector Joachim II. of Brandenburg, the Margraves Hans and Georg Friedrich of Brandenburg, the Dukes of Pomerania, Mecklenburg, Lauenburg, Holstein, etc. — had sent representatives. A general subscription of the Confession of Augsburg could not be agreed upon. On the contrary, one of the conveners of the convention, Duke Johann Friedrich of Saxony, formally protested, in the fourteenth sitting (Feb. 2), against the preface which had been added to the confession, and left Naumburg the next day: others adopted other measures to show their disagreement. More harmony prevailed with respect to the second great question of the convention, — the Council of Trent. Two papal legates, — Bishop Delfino of Faro, and Bishop Commendone of Zante, — and an imperial embassy, arrived at Naumburg, and were introduced to the convention at its sixteenth sitting (Feb. 3). They were very politely received; but when it was discovered that the papal breves inviting the Protestant princes to participate in the Council of Trent began with the words, Dilecto filio, they were sent back unopened, with the remark that the Protestant princes were not, and would never be, the sons of the Pope. The convention finally answered the emperor and the Pope, that none of its number would participate in the Council of Trent; that they wanted a national German council, — a council in which they not only could be heard, but also have a vote, etc.

NAVE, an architectural term of doubtful etymology (some deriving it from ναός, a temple; others, from navis, a ship), denotes the body of the church, between the choir — from which it is generally separated by a screen, or by rails — and the porch. It is the receptacle of the congregation proper; just as the choir is the receptacle of the clergy, and the porch or narthex, that of the penitents. It generally has one or more aisles on each side, and contains the pulpit, the baptismal font, and the organ.

NAYLOR, James, a Friend preacher; b. at Ardsley, Yorkshire, Eng., about 1616; d. 1660. In 1651 he was converted under the preaching of George Fox, and himself became a preacher among the Friends. His success disordered his mind; and he allowed himself to be addressed in such extravagant terms, and to be treated in such a quasi-reverential way, that he was tried by Parliament for blasphemy, and condemned to be whipped twice at different times, to be branded, have his tongue bored with a hot iron, and be imprisoned during pleasure, with hard labor. This cruel sentence was executed, and he was two years in jail. On his release he was an altered man. His lunacy had left him, and he was again received into the confidence of the Friends. His Writings were published in a collected edition, London, 1716. His Life has been several times written, 1657, 1719, and by Joseph Gurney Bevan, 1800.

NAZARENES. See EBIONITES.

NAZ'ARETH (from a Hebrew root signifying to sprout, to germinate, referring to the rich vegetation of the place), a city of Galilee, stands in a valley among the mountains which separate the plain of Zebulon in the north from the plain of Esdraelon in the south, in the same latitude as the southern end of the Sea of Galilee. The valley is long and narrow, but opens up towards the plain of Esdraelon, above which it is elevated more than three hundred feet. A zigzag mule-track leads from the plain to the valley; and the traveller is most agreeably surprised when he reaches the upper end of the path, and discovers the quiet green valley, and the stately city with its white walls. The gardens abound in olive-trees and fig-trees, and some palm-trees are also found; and the view from the tops of the north-western mountains, reaching north to Mount Hermon, and west to the Mediterranean, is one of the finest in Palestine.

The place is never mentioned in the Old Testament, or by Josephus; but its name occurs very often in the New Testament. It was the abode of the parents of Jesus (Matt. ii. 23; Luke i. 26, ii. 4, 39, 51); he spent his youth there (Matt. xiii. 54; Mark vi. 1, Luke iv. 23); it was the scene of his first public activity (Luke iv. 16); he afterwards visited it (Matt. xiii. 54; Mark vi. 1); from it his adherents received the name of Nazarenes, which is still the common designation of the Christians in the Orient. According to Epiphanius (Hær. 1, 136), it was inhabited exclusively by Jews in the time of Constantine; but in the sixth century Antoninus found there, besides the synagogue, also a great basilica; and a century later, when Arculf visited it, it had two churches.—one built over the spring of the valley, and the other over the house of Mary. In spite of the conquest and destruction by the Moslim, Sæwulf tells us that it contained a celebrated monastery in 1103; and when Tancred was enfeoffed with Galilee, in 1109, he removed the episcopal see from Scythopolis to Nazareth. After Saladin's victory in 1187, and still more after the conquest by the Turks in 1517, the prosperity of the city sunk very low. In 1620, however, the Franciscans succeeded in making a settlement there; and after that time the city gradually arose again.

At present it has between 5,000 and 6,000 inhabitants; of whom 2,500 are Greek, 2,000 Mohammedan, 800 Latin, 100 Protestant, and 80 Maronites. The Latin inhabit the western, the Mohammedan the eastern, and the Greek the northern, quarter. In the Latin Church of the Annunciation, which occupies the central portion of the Franciscan monastery, there is a crypt under the high altar, where formerly stood the casa santa, which in 1291 was removed by angels to Tersato in Dalmatia, and thence to Loreto near Ancona. The Latin quarter also contains the Protestant church, the school of the Protestant mission, and a female orphan-asylum founded by the Female Education Society in London. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

NAZARITES. The most important kind of vows occurring among the Hebrews was that taken by the Nazarites,—a vow of abstinence, of separation unto the Lord. It was regulated by the law (Num. vi. 1-21); which prescribed that the person, man or woman, who took the Nazarite vow, should, for the term of the vow, abstain from wine and every other intoxicating liquor, from the vinegar made of any such liquor, and, indeed, from any thing coming from the vine, from the kernels to the husks. He should, furthermore, allow his hair to grow, and keep himself clean from all defilement by dead bodies, even those of his parents, or sisters or brothers. In other respects he was not excluded from intercourse with his fellowmen. If, for instance, by a case of sudden death in his own house, the Nazarite became unclean, he should, on the legally fixed day of his cleansing, the seventh, have his hair shaved off; and on the eighth he should offer two turtle-doves or young pigeons,—one as a sin-offering, and one as a burnt-offering,—after which his head should again be consecrated, and his term begin anew. When the term of the vow was completed, the Nazarite offered one he-lamb of the first year for a burnt-offering, one ewe-lamb of the first year for a sin-offering, and a ram for a peace-offering; after which his hair was cut at the door of the tabernacle, and burnt, together with the sacrifice. The vow fulfilled, the Nazarite was allowed to drink wine, etc. Generally the term of the vow was thirty days; but instances of vows for life also occur; as Samson, Samuel, John the Baptist, etc.

The religious significance of the Nazarite vow must be sought for in its analogy to the priesthood. The abstinence from wine, the avoidance of defilement by the dead, even the long hair, which was an ornament to the Nazarite, as was the mitre to the high priest,—every thing reminds of the regulations of sacerdotal life. Indeed, though the Nazarite did not serve at the temple, his vow was a temporary and voluntary adoption of that idea on which the life of the priest was placed by birth. The institution was very old among the Hebrews: it probably originated among the Shemitic nomads, and not in Egypt; comp. the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv.), the Nabataeans (Diod. 19, 94), etc. The examples of Samson and Samuel show that it flourished during the period of the Judges. After the exile, it was renewed (1 Macc. iii. 49). The vow was often taken in cases of sickness or other trials (Josephus: Bell. Jud., II. 15). Indeed, the phrase, "I will be a Nazarite, if . . ." became, according to Mishna Nasir, 5, 5, a common means of emphatic speech. That Paul, according to Acts xviii. 18, took the Nazarite vow, is a mere conjecture: the vow could be taken in a foreign country, but not fulfilled outside of Palestine; and there is nothing which indicates that Paul ever fulfilled a vow in Jerusalem. As the rites of the vow entailed considerable expense, it was considered a worthy thing for the rich man to defray the expenses of the poor man's vow (Acts xxi. 23 et sqq.). See H. VILMAR: Die symbolische Bedeutung des Nazirer-gelübdes, in Studien u. Kritiken, 1864. OEHLER.

NEAL, Daniel, historian of the Puritans; b. in London, Dec. 14, 1678; d. at Bath, April 4, 1743. He studied first at Merchant Taylors' School, London, then (1697-1700) in Rev. Thomas Rowe's academy, and then for three years at Utrecht and Leyden. Returning to London in 1704, he was chosen assistant pastor, and in 1706 full pastor, of the Independent Congregation in Aldersgate Street, and faithfully served them, until, a few months prior to his death, he was compelled by ill health to resign. He was the author of two works, which have given him lasting fame,—The History of New England, Containing an Impartial Account of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Affairs of the Country to the Year of our Lord 1700, London, 1720, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1747), but chiefly the standard History of the Puritans, or Protestant Non-conformists, from the Reformation in 1517, to the Revolution in 1688, 1732-38, 4 vols. (2d ed., 1754, 2 vols.), Bath, 1793-97, 5 vols.; edited by Dr. Joshua Toulmins, American edition edited by J. O. Choules, New York, 1814, 2 vols.

NEALE, John Mason, was the only son of Cornelius Neale, a clergyman of the evangelical school, and something of a poet. He was b. in London, Jan. 24, 1818; graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1840; was ordained deacon, 1841, and priest, 1842; was for a time incumbent of Crawley in Sussex, and from May, 1846, till his death (on Aug. 6, 1866), warden of Sackville College, East Grinstead. His degree of D.D. was bestowed, I think, by Trinity College, Hartford.

He belonged to the most advanced section of High-Churchmen; and his outspoken and consistent championship of "Catholic" views won him not only suspicion, but obloquy. He was under the inhibition of his bishop (Chichester) for fourteen years: in 1857 he was burnt in effigy. His preferment and income were of the humblest. But his zeal and industry matched his great and varied talents. "His life was divided," says the Congregationalist Josiah Miller, "between excessive literary toil and exhausting labors of piety and benevolence." He founded, in 1856, the Sisterhood of St. Margaret. Desperately unpopular for a time, the order was before his death in demand everywhere, as furnishing the best nurses in England.

As an author his productiveness has few parallels. A full list of his books is impossible within our space: those esteemed the greatest are his History of the Holy Eastern Church, and of the Patriarchate of Alexandria, 4 vols., 1847-51, and his Commentary on the Psalms, from Primitive and Mediæval Writers, 1860: the latter was left incomplete, and was continued by Dr. Littledale. We may mention, also, his Readings for the Aged, four series, 1850, and later; Hierologus, or the Church Tourists; Ecclesiological Notes on the Isle of Man; Voices from the East; History of the so-called "Jansenist" Church of Holland, 1858; Sermons for Children, 1867; The Patriarchate of Antioch (a posthumous fragment), Lond., 1873; an adaptation of Pilgrim's Progress, 1853. This last, we are told, caused some controversy; but so did every thing of his, when noted by others than the comparatively few who received his principles. He had strong convictions, and the full courage of them: in his own view he was a witness, and at need a confessor, of a system of absolute truth. On almost every page of his writings, whether prose or verse, learned or popular, his point of view and his resolute purpose are apparent. They are books of faith and of intention; he could not and would not make them otherwise: so one obvious motive runs through them all. To him "religion was the solidest of all realities," and religion and the church (as he understood and received her) were inseparably one.

Nowhere is this more marked than in his wonderful stories for children and young people; though they were written for bread, and necessarily aimed to entertain the reader. Most of these have an historical foundation; many of them recite real or supposed facts, dealing with ancient or obscure trials and martyrdoms. His sympathies seem rather Roman than Protestant, and dubious legends are accepted with unquestioning belief; but the charm of style, the minute knowledge of distant times and places, the vivid realization, the subdued feeling, at once profoundly devout and intensely human, form a combination which no other English popularizer of Christian history — if we except single works of Newman, Manning, Kingsley, and Mrs. Charles — has approached. The Firm of Aptonga, The Egyptian Wanderers, The Followers of the Lord, Lent Legends, Tales of Christian Heroism and Endurance, The Quay of the Dioscuri, and some others, are as much prized by adult as by infant readers: an expurgated edition of these (if that were possible) would form such an array of Sunday-school books as is often sought in vain. More lengthy and less powerful, but yet readable, instructive, and edifying, are Stories of the Crusades, 1816, and Duchennier, or the Revolt of La Vendée, 1818.

As a poet, Neale eleven times gained the Scatonian prize. An edition of his Scatonian Poems (1864) was dedicated, by permission, to his bishop, after their reconciliation. His Songs and Ballads for the People, for Manufacturers, etc., are secular only in name. But his greatest services have been rendered, and his widest fame won, through his hymns. Here he worked under no false or limiting conditions, in a field entirely congenial. He easily leads the roll of those churchmen, who, within living memory, have revolutionized English hymnody; and only one or two British names of the present century can be doubtfully ranked with his.

His twenty Hymns for the Sick (1843), and eighty-six Hymns for Children (in three series, 1844, and later) include some gems and much useful matter, but have been cast into the shade by his translations. Most of these appeared 1851. The Hymnal Noted is chiefly given to long metres, which seem to the uninitiated somewhat dry and formal; yet many, even of these, have gained large acceptance. Mediæval Hymns and Sequences (2d ed., enlarged, 1863) afford more variety and many valuable notes. Among the most precious of these is Neale's first selection from the famous Rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix, completed 1858. No strains have been more thrilling or more effective than these; and their cry of "heavenly homesickness" came no more genuinely from the heart of the Cluniac monk than from that of the inhibited priest at East Grinstead: feelings like these cannot be counterfeited, nor work of this sort done to order.

After the Rhythm of Bernard, his noblest work is Hymns of the Eastern Church, 1863. There he was on ground familiar to him, and to him alone; and the mine he opened yielded treasures indeed. Whatever the originals, such renderings from any language into English as some of these (if we except John Wesley's free paraphrases from the German) had not been known; nor were there many original sacred lyrics of such beauty as Art thou Weary, Safe Home, The Day is past and over. Within twenty years, more or less of these Greek hymns, like others from the same busy brain and hand, have made their way almost everywhere.

Dr. Neale was a singular compound of mediæval (he would have called it primitive) doctrine and devotion with modern culture and English manliness. He was the sworn foe of "breadth" and "liberalism;" but his large gifts and nature transcended his self-imposed (or, as he thought, God-imposed) limits, and made much of his work catholic in the sense which he repudiated. Those who most disliked his "Romanizing" tendencies have been forced to admire his vast industry, his rigid consistency, his patience under long adversity, injustice, and neglect, his superiority to all questions of self-interest, his heroic and unflinching faith. His tone toward "sects" and heresies might seem full of arrogant contempt; but, as he says of St. Theodore of the Studium, there are those "whom the world, judging from a superficial view of their characters, has branded with unbending haughtiness and the merest formality in religion, while their most secret writings show them to have been clinging to the cross in an ecstasy of love and sorrow." And many who have little sympathy with his peculiar type of theology and ecclesiasticism hold his memory in affectionate reverence as that of a great hymn-writer, a great scholar, and a great saint.

FREDERIC M. BIRD.

NEANDER, Joachim, a distinguished German hymn-writer of the Reformed Church, and a supporter of the doctrines of Labadie (see art.); was b. in Bremen, probably in 1650; d. in Bremen in 1680. Untereyk, who was at that time the representative of the movement of Labadie (or the pietism of the Reformed Church) at Bremen, was the subject of much ridicule. Neander, who was a wild youth, sympathized with this spirit, but was suddenly converted on attending one of Untereyk's services. From that time on, he was intimately identified with the pietistic movement of Germany. After studying in Heidelberg, he went to Frankfurt, where he met Spener, and was called to Düsseldorf as preacher, and master of the Latin School. He was suspended for a time, on account of his peculiar religious views, but re-instated in 1677, after signing a document disapproving of the separatistic tendency of Labadie's movement. Two years afterwards he was called as pastor to St. Martin Church, Bremen. Neander is one of the few great hymn-writers of the German Reformed Church (Tersteegen, Henrietta of Brandenburg, Lampe, etc., being the others), and one of the greatest of Germany. He wrote sixty-four hymns, which appeared under the title A und Ω, Joachim Neandri Glaub- und Liebesübung, etc. They were taken up and sung by Spener and his friends, and in 1698 several were admitted to the Darmstadt Collection. Among the best of these hymns is [the so-called German Te Deum] Lobe, den Herren, den mächtigen König der Ehren ("Praise to Jehovah, the Almighty King of Creation!"), etc. They are characterized by simplicity and sincerity of thought, and warmth and purity of expression. Neander was also the author of some classic tunes, as Wunderbarer König; Unser Herrscher, unser König, etc. See IKEN: J. Neander, s. Leben u. s. Lieder, Bremen, 1880; the works on hymnology of WINTERFELD and KOCH; [and CATHERINE WINKWORTH: The Christian Singers of Germany]. HERZOG.

NEANDER, Johann August Wilhelm, the father of modern church history, was of Hebrew descent, and, before his transition to Christianity, bore the name of David Mendel; b. Jan. 17, 1789, at Göttingen; d. July 14, 1850, in Berlin. Through his mother he was related to the philosopher Mendelssohn and to the medical counsellor Stieglitz in Hanover. Soon after his birth he was taken by his mother, who had been separated from her husband, to Hamburg, which, in subsequent years, he regarded as his home. He was educated by the help of friends, especially Stieglitz. At the gymnasium at Hamburg he was especially interested in the study of Plato, which prepared him for the acceptance of Christianity. But that which determined him most strongly in its favor was Schleiermacher's Reden über die Religion ("Discourses on Religion"). On Feb. 15, 1806, David Mendel was baptized, in the Church of St. Catharine at Hamburg, under the name of Neander (New-man). The state of his mind was pictured in an essay he wrote before his baptism, and gave to pastor Bossau. It was an attempt to describe the various stages of religious development; and it became apparent that he looked at Christianity from an ideal stand-point, rather than as the absolute truth. But that his baptism was a washing of regeneration, a renewal of the whole man, is vouched for by his resolution to study theology, and to serve the Lord with his whole heart. Up to the spring of 1806 he had been intending to study law, and left Hamburg with this in view. He went to the University of Halle, where he came especially under the influence of Schleiermacher; but he was compelled, by the commotions of war, to exchange it for Göttingen, where Planck was then teaching. He preached his first sermon at Wandsbeck in 1807, on John i. 1 sqq. On his return to the university from a visit to Hamburg, in the fall of this year, he put Schleiermacher, Schelling, and Fichte aside, and substituted in their place the New Testament and the Church Fathers. A few months afterwards, he laid a confession before his friends, binding himself to the study of church history, and praying the Lord to preserve him from errors. His theological course over, he returned, in the spring of 1809, to Hamburg, where he taught for eighteen months, preached from time to time, continuing with great zeal the study of church history. In 1811 he habilitated at Heidelberg with the dissertation, De fidei gnoseosque christ. idea et ea, qua ad se invicem atque ad philosophiam referantur, ratione secundum mentem Clem. Alex. In 1812 he was made professor extraordinary at the university, and the same year issued the first of his monographs, — Ueber d. Kaiser Julianus u. s. Zeitalter, Leipzig [Eng. trans., Julian the Apostate, New York, 1850]. In 1813 he was called to Berlin to labor at the side of Schleiermacher, De Wette, and Marheineke, where he lectured on church history and the exegesis of the New Testament with great success, and continued his literary labors. In 1813 appeared the monograph, D. heil Bernhard u. s. Zeitalter; in 1818, D. genetische Entwicklung d. vornehmsten gnostischen Systeme; in 1822, D. heil. Chrysostomus u. Denkwürdigkeiten aus d. Gesch. d. Christenthums u. d. christl. Lebens [Eng. trans. by RYLAND: Memorials of Christian Life in the Early and Middle Ages, Lond., 1852]; and finally, in 1825, Anti-Gnostikus, Geist d. Tertullianus u. Einleit. in dessen Schriften. All these monographs were a preparation for the main work of his life, — Allgem. Gesch. d. christ. Religion u. Kirche [Eng. trans. by TORREY: General History of the Christian Religion and Church, 12th ed., N. Y., 1882, 6 vols.]. The demand for a new edition of his Julian, which he had scruples about re-issuing in its previous form, decided his mind to undertake this great work. The first volume appeared in 1826; and the work was continued down to Boniface VIII., the fifth volume appearing in 1815. A new edition of the earlier volumes appeared in an improved form after 1812. Schneider prepared an additional volume, reaching to the Council of Basel (1430), from Neander's papers in 1852. A third edition of the entire work was published in 4 volumes in 1856, with a comprehensive preface by Ullmann. Neander also published D. Gesch. d. Pflanzung u. Leitung d. christl. Kirche durch d. Apostel, 2 vols., Hamburg, 1832

[Eng. trans., History of the Planting and Training of the Christian Church by the Apostles, by RYLAND, Edinburgh, 1812, 2 vols., revised by Dr. Robinson, New York, 1865], and Leben Jesu, Hamburg, 1837 [Eng. trans. by JOHN McCLINTOCK, D.D., and BLUMENTHAL: The Life of Jesus Christ, New York, 1848], to write which he was incited by the conflict with Strauss.

In order to appreciate the position of Neander as a church historian, it is necessary to take into consideration the views which had, up to this time, prevailed amongst church historians. The most important church historian of that time was Planck, and he belonged to the so-called pragmatic school. The views of this school prevailed when Neander began his great work. It must not be forgotten, however, that higher conceptions of church history had begun to be expressed by Schelling, Marheineke, and Gieseler. The pragmatic school only looked at Christianity as a system of doctrine. It failed to look upon it as an historical development. It lost sight of objective forces in its interest in individuals whose thinking and plans are the only causes of all changes. Of higher causes it knows nothing. It substituted, in the place of the fulness of a living development, its own poor shallow conception of Christianity. Instead of devotion to events, instead of a revelation of the fulness of Christ's life, church history was turned into a gallery of pictures representing human follies and errors, which the historian felt free to condemn or to ridicule.

Neander broke through the rules of the pragmatic school in his very first work, Julian, when he remarks at the beginning, "How little it is in the power of any one to create any thing! how little one can achieve in a conflict with Providence, which leads and forms, according to its own eternal decree, the spirit of all the periods of history!" He substituted for psychological arts the rich results of a study of the historical sources; and it is only necessary to observe the way in which Neander introduces the work of Julian into the progressive development of the church, to become aware that his conception of history was higher than the superficial conception which regarded him merely from the stand-point of an apostate, or surrounded him with a halo. The general principle of Neander's method is seen to even better advantage in his monograph on Bernard. Author and subject of the biography were kindred spirits; and, in the treatment of Bernard's career, Neander lays bare the innermost principle of his life, and derives his activity from it. In his Chrysostom, the most elaborate of his biographies, often diffuse and defective in style — and style was his weakest point, — Neander displays the same method.

Neander's conception of church history is set forth in his introduction to his great work in these words, "We look upon Christianity, not as a system born in the hidden depths of man's nature, but as a power which has come down from heaven, in that heaven has opened itself to a hostile world, — a power which in its essence, as well as in its origin, is exalted high above all that man can create with his own powers, and which was designed to impart to him new life, and transform him in his innermost nature." He regards Christianity as a force, a life, and not alone as a dogma, or a divine power which has come down from heaven. In his view, therefore, the history of the church is the history of the process of the interpenetration of man's life with the divine life; the history of the divine life of Christ pervading humanity. He constantly recurs to the parable of the leaven to illustrate this process. This new life was perfectly manifested in Christ, the second Adam, and becomes concrete in the lives of individuals whose peculiarities are not destroyed, but transformed and glorified. Every Christian, therefore, repeats the life of Christ in his own characteristic way. In no one is that life repeated in its comprehensive fulness. Each only presents a single aspect of it. Neander is constantly representing the one life of Christ in its conflict with sin, its adoption and rejection of worldly principles and forces in the various phases of rationalism and supranaturalism, scholasticism and mysticism, speculative and practical effort. To this general conception is due the edificatory character of Neander's History. "The understanding of history presupposes the understanding of that which is its operating principle." And the history of the church, being a representation of Christ's life as it pervades mankind, can be understood only in proportion as the life of Christ is known by experience. The history of the church is the church's consciousness of its own life. Pectus est quod facit theologum ("It is the heart which makes the theologian") was Neander's often-used motto. He therefore expressly says, that it was his purpose from the beginning to present the history of the church as a striking proof of the divine power of Christianity and as a school of experience.

One of Neander's characteristics as an historian is his talent for portraying individual traits of character and life. He honored the individual as no other historian before him, and brought out the objective features of his subject, without mixing in his own subjective thoughts and opinions. Closely connected with this talent is his ability, which we have already referred to, of understanding and sympathizing with the experiences of others, and unveiling the Christian element in their lives. Hence that mildness of judgment which Neander displayed side by side with an absolute love of truth.

The objectivity of Neander's portrayal of events and persons is the most important feature of his work. But here we are brought to his weakest point. The concrete and individual are relatively far more prominent than the universal. The body consists only of an aggregation of separate individuals, but the aggregate is not sufficiently emphasized. In one word, Neander's defect is a failure to give prominence to and appreciate the church as such. Instead of the church, we have a collection of single portraits of individuals animated with the life of Christ. The biographical element predominates. He loves to dwell upon the spiritual life of his characters, and has depicted with a master's hand the hidden life of the church; but in doing so he has neglected to portray its all-conquering power over the world. The influence of the church upon the formation of dogmatic beliefs, upon civil law, social customs, art, and architecture, he does not sufficiently bring out. In spite of the variety of individual character and experience, the history of the church in his hands does not present an harmonious and progressive development. It is an endless portrait-gallery. Neander has given us a commentary of the parable of the leaven, but fails to give a commentary of the parable of the mustard-seed.

Neander's division of church history is extremely simple. So far as the spiritual life of the church is concerned, it falls into three periods. The boundary between the first and second is the growth of a priesthood, — a fact to which he cannot call attention too often; for his history is a history of the universal priesthood. The first period is a period of pure spiritual religion; the second is characterized by a re-inswathement of Christianity in habiliments like to those of the Old Testament; the third is marked by a reaction, and an effort of Christian liberty to reassert itself.

Neander's personal influence in the classroom was little less important than, if not quite as important as, his literary activity. He labored in Berlin for thirty-eight years. In his exegetical lectures he pursued a practical method. This he also did in his commentaries [Exposition of First John, the Philippians, and James, translated by Mrs. COXANT, New York, 1859]. He also lectured on systematic theology (in which he depended too much upon Schleiermacher), and, after Schleiermacher's death, on ethics. His lectures in these two branches appeared after his death, in the three volumes, Dogmengeschichte [Eng. trans. by RYLAND, 2 vols., London, 1858], Katholizismus u. Protestantismus, and Geschichte d. Ethik.

Neander's personal influence upon his students was also very great, and became a rich blessing to many. He presents the figure of a man of simple and childlike spirit, helpless in the practical affairs of life, faithful to his calling, severe towards himself, and temperate, full of love and gentleness towards others, and wholly and unreservedly devoted to the Lord. But he could be severe, and entered a protest against the evangelische Kirchenzeitung [Evang. Ch. Journal, Hengstenberg's organ], and opposed, not only with great firmness, but often with heat, both pantheistic and spiritualistic speculations, and the more rigid wing in the church which insisted upon a strict system of doctrine. His activity was a benediction to thousands; and, amongst those who contributed to the revival of faith and theology in the first half of this century, he has, beyond dispute, one of the most prominent places, perhaps the most prominent if we look at practical results.

Throughout the whole of his life, Neander had to contend against a feeble constitution. In 1817 he began to suffer with his eyesight, and was prevented from continuing his History. Attacked with a stroke of apoplexy, he lingered only a few days before he was called to his heavenly home. During his sickness he continued to labor on his lectures; and in the wanderings of his mind he was occupied with thoughts of the continuance of his Church History, and dictated from his bed an account of the Friends of God. He asked what time it was, and, on receiving a reply, said, "I am weary, I will now go to sleep, good-night," closed his eyes, and passed from a calm sleep to the land beyond. The court-preacher Strauss delivered the funeral address at the house, from John xxi. 7, "The disciple whom Jesus loved saith unto Peter, It is the Lord;" and this single word describes his life better than any thing else could.

[Neander never married, and lived alone with a sister. Dr. Schaff, in his Germany, its Universities, etc., thus describes his personal appearance: —

"Think of a man of middle size, slender frame, a homely though good-natured and benevolent face, dark and strongly Jewish complexion, deep-seated but sparkling eyes, overshadowed with an unusually strong, bushy pair of eyebrows, black hair flowing in uncombed profusion over the forehead, an old-fashioned coat, a white cravat carelessly tied, — as often behind or on one side of the neck as in front, — a shabby hat set aslant, jack-boots reaching above the knees, — think of him either sitting at home, surrounded by books on the shelves, the table, the few chairs, and all over the floor, or walking Unter den Linden and in the Thiergarten of Berlin, leaning on the arm of his sister Hannechen or a faithful student, his eyes shut, or looking halfway up to heaven, talking theology in the midst of the noise and fashion of the city, and presenting altogether a most singular contrast to the teeming life around him, stared at, smiled at, wondered at, yet respectfully greeted by all who knew him; or finally standing on the rostrum, playing with a couple of goose-quills, which his amanuensis had always to provide, constantly crossing and recrossing his feet, bent forward, frequently sinking his head to discharge a morbid flow of spittle, and then again suddenly throwing it on high, especially when roused to polemic zeal against pantheism and dead formalism, at times fairly threatening to overturn the desk, and yet all the while pouring forth with the greatest earnestness and enthusiasm, without any other help than that of some illegible notes, an uninterrupted flow of learning and thought from the deep and pure fountain of the inner life, and thus, with all the oddity of the outside, at once commanding the veneration and confidence of every hearer, — and you have a picture of Neander, the most original phenomenon in the literary world of this nineteenth century."]

NEAP'OLIS (new city), a town eight or ten miles from Philippi, in Northern Greece, containing at present about six thousand inhabitants. It is memorable as the first place in Europe visited by Paul (Acts xvi. 11); and, since Neapolis is the port of Philippi, he probably landed there on his second missionary tour, and certainly thence embarked for his last journey to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 1, 6).

NEBAIOTH. See ARABIA, p. 123.

NE'BO is mentioned in Isa. xlvi. 1, after Bel, as a deity worshipped by the Babylonians. The Septuagint has Δαγών. — Among the Assyrians and Babylonians. In the cuneiform inscriptions the name reads Nabu or Nabius. It occurs frequently in Babylonian and also Assyrian patronymics, as, for instance, Nebuchadrezzar, Nabu-kudarri-usur ("Nebo protect the crown"), Nabopolassar, Nabu-habal-usur ("Nebo defend the son"), Nabonassar, Nabu-nâsir ("Nebo protect," etc. It is also found in the Chaldean name Samgarnebo, Samgur-Nabu — "he gracious Nebo" (Jer. xxxix. 3); and perhaps the name Abednebo (Dan. i. 7) is a corruption of Abed-Nebo. The signification of these patronymics shows that Nebo was worshipped as a benevolent deity; and their great number, that the worship was quite extensive. In the later Babylonian Empire, all the kings, with very few exceptions, were named after him; while, out of fifty names of Assyrian kings, only two show that derivation. The character of the deity is further proved by the epithets applied to him, — "he who reigns over the hosts of the heavens," "the governor of the world," "the god of science," etc. It is not improbable that the Assyrian nabu, which means "to speak," "to announce," is connected with the Hebrew nabi, "prophet," or, more correctly, "messenger." In the Assyro-Babylonian star-worship, the planet Mercury is assigned to Nebo; and the Greco-Roman nations have not failed to recognize in Nebo their Hermes-Mercury, the mediator between the divine and human spheres. He was, however, a younger god, son of Merodach. A statue of him, dating from the end of the ninth or the beginning of the eighth century B. C., has been found at Nineveh. — Among the Western Shemites and the Later Mesopotamians. The Assyrians and Babylonians were not the only worshippers of Nebo. His name is also found in some very old geographical designations in Canaan. Thus Nebo was the name of the mountain, in the land of Moab, from the top of which Moses looked down into the promised country (Deut. xxxii. 49, xxxiv. 1). Near the mountain, stood a Moabitic city of the same name. It was assigned to the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxxii. 3), but never taken possession of. There was also a city thus named in Judæa (Ez. ii. 29). The occurrence of the name Nebo in some patronymics in the inscriptions of Palmyra does not necessarily prove the ancient worship of that deity among the Aramæans, as the name might be a later post-Christian importation. From Babylonia the worship of Nebo spread to the neighboring Armenia. Moses Chorenensis tells us that King Abaranus was a worshipper of Nabok (Nebo), and introduced his worship into Edessa; and to this worship Jacob of Sarug testifies in his speech on the fall of the idols. Among the Arabs no deity of the name of Nebo has been found. See CHWOLSON: Die Ssabier und der Ssabismus, St. Petersburg, 1856, ii. pp. 161 sqq.; SCHRADER: Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament, 1872, pp. 272 sqq. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

NE'BO (prophet), a mountain, of the range Abarim, in Moab, from which Moses surveyed the promised land, and whereon he died (Deut. xxxii. 49, xxxiv. 1-5). It was rightly located by Eusebius as six Roman miles (south-) west from Heshbon, and is called "Nebbeh" by the Bedawin. From its summit, one can in clear weather see from the Dead Sea, which is eight miles away, to Mount Hermon, — in short, the view of Moses. In 1875 Professor Paine maintained the identification of Nebo with the eastern summit of this mountain of Moab, called by the Arabs "Jebel Nebba," and Pisgah with a projecting western shoulder, called "Siaghah." See PISGAN, and art. "Nebo," in RIEHM'S Handwörterbuch d. bib. Altertums.

NE'BO, a city of Moab assigned the Reubenites (Num. xxxii. 38), identified by Professor Paine with a ruin about a mile south of the summit of Mount Nebo.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Babylon., Nabu-kudurrī-ussur, "Nebo, protect the crown," though the exact sense is disputed; Heb., נְבוּכַדְרֶצַּר (Jer. xlix. 28, K'th'ib: cf. Ez. ii. 1), נְבוּכַדְרֶצַּר, and נְבוּכַדְרֶצַּר, etc.; LXX., Naboukodonosor), third of the name, the most famous of the Babylonian kings, who reigned B. C. 605-561, is mentioned in the Old Testament as follows: 2 Kings xxiv. xxv., and 2 Chron. xxxvi. passim; Ez. ii. 1, v. 12, 14; Neh. vii. 6; Jer. xxvii., xxviii., xxix., xxxii., xxxiv. pass., xxxv. 11, xxxix., xliii., xlix., l., lii. pass.; Ezek. xxvi., xxix., xxx. pass.; Dan. i.-v. pass.; cf. Nebuchadnezzar was son of Nabopolassar, who, in combination with the Medes, had effected the destruction of Nineveh B. C. 606 (?) and appears first as his father's co-regent and general. In the latter capacity he headed an army against Necho, king of Egypt, who, possibly in ignorance of the (impending or accomplished) overthrow of the Assyrian power "went up against the King of Assyria to the River Euphrates" (2 Kings xxiii. 29; but on the movements of the Egyptian king see Necho). In a decisive battle near Carchemish (Djribās), on the western bank of the Middle Euphrates, Necho was utterly defeated and put to flight in the year B. C. 605 (or 606?). Nebuchadnezzar was proceeding to follow up this victory by establishing Babylonian authority over the lands which Necho had traversed on his way to the Euphrates (cf. 2 Kings xxiv. 7); and the subjection of Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv. 1; cf. Jer. xxxvi. 9, 29) may have been accomplished at this time. But the news of the death of Nabopolassar called his son back to Babylon for the purpose of securing the throne to himself. A part of his army, left behind in the "West Land," may be represented by the "Chaldees," who figure (2 Kings xxiv. 2) among the assailants of Jehoiakim. when, at the end of three years, he revolted. (But see JEHOIAKIM.) When Nebuchadnezzar, in the eighth year of his reign, again appeared in Palestine, Jehoiachin had succeeded his father Jehoiakim; and he surrendered Jerusalem to the invader. Jehoiachin and the flower of the inhabitants were carried away to Babylon, and the temple and the king's palace were plundered (2 Kings xxiv. 10-16; cf. Dan. i. 1, 2). Nebuchadnezzar set Jehoiachin's uncle, Mattaniah, on the throne, changing his name to Zedekiah (2 Kings xxiv. 17). (See JEHOIACHIN, ZEDEKIAH.) After eight years, Zedekiah revolted: in his ninth year (Nebuchadnezzar's seventeenth), Jerusalem was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar; and the siege lasted a year and a half (2 Kings xxv. 1 ff), with an interruption caused by the approach of Pharaoh-Nophra (Jer. xxxvii. 5 ff.; cf. xlv. 30), who, however, failed to make a permanent diversion, much more to drive back the Babylonians. In the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign (B. C. 586), famine and the superior force of the besiegers brought about the fall of Jerusalem. Zedekiah, attempting to escape, was made prisoner; and at Riblah, the headquarters of Nebuchadnezzar, he was forced to see his sons killed, and then to lose his own sight. He was himself carried thence to Babylon. Nebuzaradan, the Babylonian general, completed the plunder of temple and city, of which a beginning had been made when Jehoiachin surrendered, destroyed them with fire, and carried away all the inhabitants, except some "of the poor of the land" (2 Kings xxv. 12). Over this feeble remnant a certain Gedaliah was appointed governor. His assassination, two months later, instead of securing new independence for Judah, was followed by dread of Babylonian vengeance, which led to the flight toward Egypt of those who were left in the land.

Having thus wiped out all semblance of independent power in Palestine, Nebuchadnezzar turned his attention northward, and began vigorous operations against Tyre. The siege of that city occupied thirteen years. Ezek. xxix. 18 seems to indicate that it was not wholly successful. But Nebuchadnezzar must, by force of arms or treaty, have secured himself from molestation in this quarter before venturing on his campaigns in Egypt; and we know that he gained a foothold in Cyprus. His name was doubtless known and feared in all the Phœnician colonies. In his thirty-third year (?)—it seems to have been the twenty-seventh of Ezekiel's exile, Ezek. xxix. 17 (B.C. 572)—he entered Egypt, and penetrated as far as the borders of Ethiopia, where he was at length repelled by Hophra (see Wiedemann: Ägyptische Zeitschrift, 1878, pp. 2 ff., 87 ff.; and cf. Ezek. xxix. 10, 20); and in his thirty-seventh year (B.C. 568) a second expedition occurred, this time against a king who is probably to be identified with Amasis. Amasis was apparently first a co-regent with Hophra, and then his successor. (See Wiedemann: ib.; Schrader: Ägypt. Zeitschrift, 1879, pp. 45 ff.; Pinches: Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., vii. 2, 1881, pp. 210 ff.) This second Egyptian campaign is the only one of which a record has thus far been found in the cuneiform inscriptions.

There must have been many other important expeditions of which we have no information as yet. To Nebuchadnezzar is undoubtedly due the credit of firmly establishing and greatly extending the dominion which Nabopolassar had secured. He was the most formidable and successful monarch who sat upon the throne of Babylon up to the time of its overthrow by the Persians.

We are better informed about the details of his occupations at home. Numerous inscriptions tell us of his devotion to the gods (cf. Dan. iii. 1 ff.), particularly Bel-Merodach (see MERODACH), and are largely occupied with an account of his restoration and building of temples. Among the most famous are those of Nebo (called Ezida) in Borsippa, and of Bel-Merodach (called Esaggil) in Babylon; but, besides these, traces of his work were left in Sippara, Cutha, etc. The fondness for building here evidenced appeared also in the construction of a splendid palace, of strong city walls and citadels, enclosing and protecting a vast area, probably also the so-called "Median Wall," stretching from the Euphrates to the Tigris. Terraced gardens, and a system of canals and reservoirs for irrigation, are also attributed to him. Of Nebuchadnezzar's insanity, and the events which preceded it, we have no account except from the Book of Daniel. (See DANIEL.)

FRANCIS BROWN.

NEBUZAR-A'DAN (Bab., Nabu-zir-iddina, "Nebo gave seed"), one of the generals of Nebuchadnezzar; conquered Jerusalem in the nineteenth year of the reign of that king, having taken a part of the city a month previously. After the occupation he fired the temple, whose treasures he sent to Babylon, the royal palace, and the most conspicuous houses, and carried away the inhabitants as prisoners. Five years later on he carried away seven hundred and forty-five more Hebrews. As the Chaldeans were besieging Tyre, and waged war against the Moabites and Ammonites, they were easily suspected of conspiracy, or perhaps they actually had conspired (2 Kings xxv. 8 sqq.; Jer. xxxix. 9 sqq., xl. 1 sqq.) RÜETSCHL.

NECESSITY, MORAL, is "that without which the effect cannot well be, although, absolutely speaking, it may. A man who is lame is under a moral necessity to use some help, but absolutely he may not. The phrase 'moral necessity' is used variously. Sometimes it is used for necessity of moral obligation. Sometimes, by moral necessity, is meant that sure connection of things that is a foundation for infallible certainty. In this sense it signifies much the same as that high degree of probability which is ordinarily sufficient to satisfy mankind in their conduct and behavior in the world. Sometimes, by moral necessity, is meant that necessity of connection and consequence which arises from such moral causes as the strength of inclination or motives, and the connection which there is in many cases between them and such certain volitions and actions."—FLEMING: Vocabulary of Philosophy, ed. C. P. Kranth, Philadelphia, 1860, pp. 342, 343.

NE'CHO (called in the Bible נְכֻחַ, or נְכֻחַ; on the Egyptian monuments, Neku; in the Septuagint, Νεχώς; by Herodotus, Νεχώς) was a son of Psammetichus the Great, the founder of the twenty-sixth dynasty, and reigned over Egypt from 609 to 595 B.C. He sent out an expedition of Phœnician sailors, who successfully circumnavigated Africa in three years. He also continued his father's work on the great canal, but gave it up without completing it, probably on account of his campaign against Assyria. With a great army he landed in Syria, and defeated Josiah at Megiddo, 608 B.C., but was himself completely routed by Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish, 605 B.C.; and in 597 B.C. the Egyptians were again completely driven out of Asia. See 2 Kings xxiii. 29 sqq., xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20-xxxvi. 4; Jer. xxii. 10, xv. 7; xlvi.; Josephus: Ant., 10, 5; Herodotus, 2, 158; 4, 42; Diodorus, 1, 33. RÜETSCHL.

NECKHAM (NECHAM, NECKAM, NEQUAM), Alexander, or, from his birthplace, Alexander of Sancto Albano; b. at St. Albans, 1157; d. at Cirencester, 1217. He was foster-brother to Richard Cœur de Lion, being born on the same day. He was master of Dunstable School, and in 1180 professor at the University of Paris. He became an Augustinian monk, and abbot of Cirencester. He was a man of universal learning, one of the best Latin poets of his age, and author, among many others, of two curious productions, — De naturis rerum (of no scientific value, but interesting for the information it conveys), and De laudibus divine sapientia. These two were edited by the famous antiquary, Thomas Wright, London, 1863.

NECROLOGIUM (NECROLOGY), also called obitarium, obituarium, calendarium, etc., was the name of a book kept, in imitation of the original diptychs of the church, in all religious houses, and containing the names of those dead for whom prayers should be made, — members of the house, its benefactors, members of houses with which a compact for mutual intercession had been made, etc.

NECROMANCY (from the Greek νεκρομαντεία, "divination by means of the dead") was exercised under two different forms, — the one consisting in examining the viscera of one newly dead or slain, in order to draw out omens; and the other, in raising the soul of one departed, in order to obtain direct information concerning the future. Eusebius, in his Vita Constantini (1, 36), says of Maxentius, that he opened the wombs of pregnant women, and searched the viscera of newly-born infants. Similar stories are told about Valerian, and even about Julian. The second method, the raising of the souls of the dead, was of course the much more frequently used, and is often spoken of by Justin, Clemens Romanus, Tertullian, and others. After the sixth century the word began to be used in a vague sense of all exercise of pretended supernatural powers.

NECTARIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, was the successor of Gregory Nazianzen, and the predecessor of Chrysostom. Immediately after the Council of 381 had been called, Gregory Nazianzen retired, and the see of Constantinople became vacant. Nectarius, a native of Tarsus, and at that time a very old man, lived in Constantinople as a senator, but was just about to return home. Before departing, however, he paid a visit to Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, who was present in Constantinople on account of the council; and the bishop became so impressed by the venerable old senator, that he put his name on the list of candidates for the vacant see. The emperor's choice fell upon the senator, to the great surprise of the bishops, who had never before heard his name, but soon learned that he was not an ecclesiastic, nay, even not baptized; and Nectarius was soon after installed as patriarch of the metropolis. His participation in the transactions of the council was liberal and moderate, but his most important official act was the abolishment of the presbyter penitentiarius. Since the Novatian troubles, the Greek Church had appointed a special penitential priest, who received the confession of such as fell into heavy sins after baptism. Of course, the confession was secret: but it happened, now and then, that the secrets of the confessional leaked out; and, in order to prevent such a scandal, Nectarius abolished the office, 390 or 391. A Homilia in Theodorum martyrem, first printed among the works of Chrysostom (Paris, 1554), is generally ascribed to him. GASS.

NECTARIUS, Patriarch of Jerusalem 1660-72, was a native of Crete, and had studied in Athens under Theophilus Korydales. He was the immediate successor of Dositheus, and belonged, like him, to the strictly orthodox party. He accompanied the first edition of the confession of Mogilas with a commendatory preface, 1662, and issued afterwards a very energetic declaration against Rome. Among the Roman emissaries in Palestine who labored to induce the Greeks to join the Roman Church, was a Franciscan monk, Peter, who published five theses in defence of the papal supremacy. Against those theses Nectarius published his Karà tìs àρχής τοῦ Παπῆ, which became very celebrated. It was first printed at Jassy, 1682, afterwards in London, 1702. GASS.

NEEDHAM, John, was a Baptist pastor at Hitchin, Hertfordshire, and, from 1746, in Bristol. He was living in 1787. He published in 1768 two hundred and sixty-three hymns, a number of which have been largely used; nineteen being included by Rippon, 1787, and twenty-four by Dobell, 1806. They are moderate in doctrine and in talent, and of late years have been chiefly, though not exclusively, employed by the Unitarian denomination. F. M. BIRD.

NEFF, Félix, b. at Geneva, Oct. 8, 1798; d. there April 12, 1829; entered, when he was seventeen years old, upon a military career as a soldier in the garrison of his native city, but was afterwards reached by the religious revival, which at that time took place in the city, and became himself a revival preacher among his comrades. In 1819 he renounced his position in the army; and May 19, 1823, he was ordained in Mr. Clayton's chapel, in the Poultry, London. After laboring for some time at Mens, he settled in the lonesome valleys of the Quéras and Freissinière in the Hautes-Alps. Some remnants of the Waldenses had at one time sought refuge there, but they had utterly degenerated. Not only had fights and drunkenness taken the place of the hymns of their ancestors, but they had even forgotten the commonest arts, and sunk into barbarism. The work which lay before Neff in that place was almost overwhelming. He performed it, however, though it cost him his life. When in 1827, he returned, dying, to Geneva, the settlements in the far-off valleys were converted and flourishing. See GOLLY: Memoirs of Neff, London, 1832; A. BOST: Lettres de Félix Neff, Geneva, 1842, 2 vols., and Vie de Félix Neff, Toulouse, 1860.

NEGRI, Francesco, b. at Bassano, in the Venetian territory, in 1500; d. at Chiavenna, in the Grisons, after 1559; entered the Benedictine order, but left it again on the outbreak of the Reformation; joined Zwingli, whom he accompanied to the Conference of Marburg, 1529; was present at the diet of Augsburg, 1530; and settled finally at Chiavenna as a school-teacher. He published several books of philological interest, and is the author of the curious allegorical drama, Tragedia de libero arbitrio, Geneva, 1546, translated into French in 1559, La tragédie du roi Franc-Arbitre.

NEGRO EVANGELIZATION AND EDUCATION IN AMERICA. 1. The EVANGELIZATION of the negroes began, both at the North and South, at an early date. Their warm natures — full of hope, faith, and love — presented a fruitful soil for religious truth; and in spite of the wrong and cruelty of slavery, and of its denial of education, much was done in giving them oral religious instruction. The Methodist Church was organized in America in 1766; and in 1800 it reported an aggregate colored membership of 13,450, who were enrolled in the white churches. To prosecute this work among the slaves demanded the heroism of an apostle. Slaveholders were exceedingly jealous of any influence among their negroes. The first regular Methodist mission among the colored people was established in 1829, in South Carolina. The Rev. Dr. (afterwards Bishop) Capers was its superintendent. The result of the year's labor was two missions, with 417 church-members. The second year their membership was more than doubled. Before the war these stations had increased to 26, with 32 preachers, and a colored membership of 11,546. But the work was not confined to South Carolina; every conference in the South had its colored missions. In the Mississippi Conference fully one-third of the effective ministry were employed exclusively on the colored missions; while every pastor on circuit, station, or white mission, had a colored membership to whom he gave regular pastoral attention. Galleries were made in the churches, where the negroes sat during public services for the whites: in addition, every Sunday afternoon they had special services, filling the body of the churches in many places. In 1844 the Methodist-Episcopal Church was divided; and in 1860 the colored membership of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South had reached 207,766. In 1870 the colored members of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South were by mutual agreement set apart in a separate organization, styled "The Colored Methodist-Episcopal Church," which in 1882 had a membership of 125,000. The African Methodist-Episcopal Church was organized in Philadelphia in 1816, and reports a membership of 391,044 in 1880. The Zion African Methodist-Episcopal Church was formed in New-York City in 1819, and now has 300,000 members.

The Baptists, at least two generations before the civil war, had given attention to the religious condition of the slaves. In 1801 the Charleston Baptist Association petitioned the Legislature for an amendment of the law passed the preceding year, imposing restrictions on religious meetings, so far as it respects persons of color, and renewed it the next year with a degree of success. Pastors of white Baptist churches, some of the most eminent, labored faithfully among these people; and, as a rule, the slaves of persons identified with Baptist churches sat with their masters in the same house of worship, occupying the rear seats or the galleries, heard the same sermon, were received into membership by baptism upon evidence of conversion, and were admitted to the same table of the Lord. In these churches the colored members had no voice in the government, or in cases of discipline, except those cases relating to their own race, when they voted with the whites. In the sparse settlements, on large plantations, and in the smaller towns, this mixed church-membership prevailed. Planters frequently paid liberally toward the support of ministers who gave their chief attention to the evangelization of the blacks. In the cities, as converts multiplied, and single church-edifices became too small to accommodate both whites and blacks, separate churches for the latter were organized. To some of these, white pastors ministered, but more frequently pastors from their own members. The church-property was held by white trustees; but in their spiritual matters these churches were independent, though taking counsel of their white brethren in licensing and ordaining their preachers. They elected their own officers, administered the ordinances, conducted their own discipline. That the religious effort thus put forth was successful, is shown by the fact, that, in 1850, the colored Baptists of the country, so far as reported, numbered 89,695; South Carolina having 14,991, Georgia 16,552, and Virginia 35,546. In 1880 their numbers are estimated variously at from 400,000 to 500,000.

The Presbyterians, in like manner, took an early interest in the religious instruction of the slaves. The synod of New York and Philadelphia in 1787 recommended "to all the members belonging to their communion to give those persons who are at present held in servitude such good education as may prepare them for the better enjoyment of freedom." This action was sanctioned by the General Assembly in 1793. In 1815 the Assembly urged upon the Presbyterians "to adopt such measures as will secure, at least to the rising generation of slaves within the bounds of the church, a religious education." In 1825 the Assembly notice "with pleasure the enlightened attention which had been paid to the religious instruction and evangelization of the unhappy slaves and free people of color," and "especially commend the prudence and zeal combined in this work of mercy by the presbyteries of Charleston, Union, Georgia, Concord, South Alabama, and Mississippi." It adds, "No more honored name can be conferred on a minister of Jesus Christ than that of an apostle to the American slaves." In 1839 one minister in Georgia is reported as devoting his time exclusively to the colored people; and most, if not all, settled pastors and stated supplies, preach as often as once a week to them. Similar reports are subsequently made from other portions of the field occupied by the colored people. In the houses of worship of the whites, provision was made for the blacks, where they might enjoy the privileges of the sanctuary. Services were held for them on the plantations, and it was the custom to have household servants at family prayers. On large plantations it was not uncommon for Christian masters to employ a minister to preach steadily to their slaves. The colored members of the Presbyterian Church in 1860 numbered 13,837.

The English bishops who had charge of the missions of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the American Colonies showed a warm interest in the religious instruction of the negroes. In 1721 a list of inquiries was sent to the missionaries in the Colonies, asking, "Are there any infidels, bond or free, within your parish? and what means are used for their conversion?" The answers from Virginia to this question are various, but show, that, with some exceptions, the masters favored the instruction of their slaves; and the missionaries embraced the opportunity to instruct, and, when proper, to baptize, and admit them to the Lord's Supper. Few baptisms, however, are reported.

The Friends everywhere sought the overthrow of slavery; and, though it found a place among them for a time, it was at length ruled out. But this body of Christian people always endeavored to instruct the negroes, who found them to be friends indeed, wherever located, whether in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, or the South.

The Roman Catholics, who settled Maryland, made early provision for the instruction of the colored people in the churches. Bishop English of South Carolina began operations among the negroes of his diocese in 1820. A school for free colored girls and the instruction of female slaves was begun about 1830. A colored sisterhood has existed in Baltimore since 1829, and the Jesuits have taught the Catechism at Frederick since 1840. In 1871 an enterprise was begun for the conversion of the colored population in America through the agency of an English training-school. The report of 1877 shows that it has had 42 students, and in 1878 returns 33 students and 6 lay-brothers. Three students from this school have been laboring in Charleston, S.C., and report 196 baptisms. The Catholic Directory of 1882 reports one colored church in Baltimore, one in St. Louis, two in Charleston, and two in Florida.

The emancipation of the negroes in 1863 gave a strong impulse in the North to efforts for their evangelization. The barriers were broken down, and the call was urgent. The four millions of emancipated slaves were, it is true, far in advance, religiously, of their heathen ancestors when torn from Africa. Their churches and preachers were numerous, and the piety of the people themselves was in many cases deep and genuine. But there were heavy drawbacks. At the opening of the war, only about one-eighth of their number were actually church-members. The instruction they had received from the white ministers was only oral, and that which came from preachers of their own race (and that was the main source) was from men usually illiterate, and often immoral. The slaves themselves had come forth from bondage in poverty and ignorance, and the white masters had become too impoverished by the war to render much assistance. The call to the North was the voice both of piety and of patriotism.

Since emancipation, the Methodist-Episcopal Church (North) has entered more extensively than any other denomination into the work of organizing these people into churches under its care. The colored membership of that church now (1882) numbers 193,750. The Baptist Church (North) has devoted itself mainly to educational work among the freedmen, and hence its efforts in distinctively church-work have been small. It now reports only 21 ministers and 2,219 church-members. The Presbyterians (North) have done a larger church-work, reporting 168 churches, with a membership of 12,456. The Congregationalists, represented by the American Missionary Association, having few adherents among the blacks before emancipation, aim to gather churches around the schools of the Association. They have 83 churches, with 5,641 members. The Protestant-Episcopal Church reports 26 missionaries (white and colored) and 3 lay-readers among the colored people in the South.

It is estimated that there is now (1882) a total membership in the colored churches of this country of more than 1,000,000.

II. The EDUCATION of the negro after emancipation had to be commenced almost from the foundation. In the early colonial days, education was not rigidly forbidden, and many acquired a knowledge of letters; while a few, like Banneker the mathematician, and Phillis Wheatley the poet-ess, rose to distinction. But, as the slaves became numerous and the slave-power more dominant, almost every Southern State adopted laws prohibiting the education of the negroes, under severe penalties; and, where no such laws existed, public sentiment was exacting in forbidding their education. The emancipated slaves, therefore, came into freedom, as a mass, wholly illiterate. After emancipation (1863), the first appropriation of public funds for their education was made by the National Government, in the establishment of the Bureau for Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, in 1865. The Bureau closed in 1870, and during its existence devoted to the education of the freedmen $5,262,511, which was employed largely in the erection of school buildings on lands owned by benevolent societies or by the colored people themselves, in the rental of buildings, in paying the transportation of teachers, and in the founding of Howard University, Washington, D.C.

In the final report of the Commissioner of the Bureau, Gen. O. O. Howard, July 1, 1870, the enrolment in colored schools of all classes—including those supported by the government, the benevolent societies, and individuals—is estimated at 247,333 scholars.

The former slave States, in the period of reconstruction after the war, made ample provision, in their remodelled constitutions and laws, for popular education; all the States, except Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky, guaranteeing equal school privileges to all children, irrespective of race. But the want of funds, existing prejudices, and the paralyzing effects of the civil war, prevented satisfactory results. Yet good progress was made. The enrolment of colored schools of all grades, in 1880, supported by the States and the religious societies, numbers 800,113 pupils. Towards the support of the public schools, the Southern States (except Delaware and Maryland) paid, in 1880, $2,370,629. Delaware and Kentucky appropriate the tax collected from the colored citizens. In the latter State it amounted, in 1880, to only forty-eight cents for each colored child. Maryland makes a biennial appropriation by the Legislature. For the higher education of the negroes, Maryland appropriates annually $2,000; Virginia, $10,000; South Carolina, $7,000; Georgia, $8,000; Mississippi, $10,000; Louisiana, from $5,000 to $10,000; and Missouri, $5,000.

But the earliest schools for the freedmen were established by the benevolent contributions of individuals, churches, and societies in the North; and the colored schools for higher instruction were founded almost exclusively by these societies.

The first school for the freedmen was established by the American Missionary Association. On the 17th of September, 1861, only five months after the beginning of the war, that school was opened at Hampton, Va., where many fugitive slaves had congregated, under the protection of the guns of Fortress Monroe. The spot overlooked the waters on which the first slave-ship entered the American continent. The Association steadily extended its work, until it had founded chartered institutions in every large Southern State.—Berea College, Berea, Ky.; Hampton Institute, Hampton, Va.; Atlanta University, Atlanta, Ga.; Fisk University, Nashville, Tenn.; Talladega College, Talladega, Ala.; Tou-galoo University, Tougaloo, Miss.; Straight University, New Orleans, La.; Tillotson Collegiate and Normal Institute, Austin, Tex. Land has also been purchased for the Edward Smith College in Little Rock, Ark. It has 49 other schools of different grades. Connected with some of its chartered institutions, are theological, law, and industrial departments. Those at Hampton, Talladega, and Tougaloo, have large farms. Chartered institutions, 8; normal and high schools, 11; common schools, 38; total, 57. Teachers, 241; students, 9,608. Howard University, founded by the Freedmen's Bureau, had, in 1882, 29 teachers and 349 students. Its theological department is sustained mainly by the American Missionary Association.

The Freedmen's Aid Societies were early organized. The first was formed in Boston, Feb. 7, a second in New York, Feb. 22, 1862. Others followed rapidly, — in Cincinnati, Chicago, Cleveland, and elsewhere throughout the North; and in 1865 the teachers employed by all the societies numbered 634. With a view to economy and efficiency, they were consolidated, in 1866, in the American Freedmen's Union Commission. These societies devoted themselves in large part, at first, to physical relief and the organization of labor. But ere long the education of the freedmen became their chief endeavor, and they accomplished much good in the line of secular education. But the several branches were at length abandoned, or became absorbed in the societies of the religious organizations. The Commission itself closed in 1869.

The Baptists, who conduct their work, both educational and church, among the freedmen, through their Home Missionary Society, entered early into the establishment of schools; beginning, in the spring of 1862, with schools at St. Helena and Beaufort, S.C., and afterwards adding others at Fortress Monroe, Washington, Knoxville, and New Orleans. Missionaries were appointed to preach, and to teach day schools; and assistants, both male and female, were sent out. From three to five thousand pupils were taught yearly, until about 1872, when the secular or day-school system was given up, and efforts were concentrated on permanent or higher institutions, some of which had been planted in 1865. In 1882 the society has under its care twelve schools; as follows: Wayland Seminary, Washington, D.C.; Richmond Institute, Richmond, Va.; Shaw University, Raleigh, N.C.; Benedict Institute, Columbia, S.C.; Atlanta Seminary, Atlanta, Ga.; Nashville Institute, Nashville, Tenn.; Leland University, New Orleans, La.; Natchez Seminary, Natchez, Miss.; Alabama Normal and Theological School, Selma, Ala.; Florida Institute, Live Oak, Fla.; Bishop College, Marshall, Tex.; Louisville Normal and Theological School, Louisville, Ky. Normal instruction is given in most of the schools, industrial education in several, and biblical instruction in all. In four institutions a collegiate course is pursued; five are chartered institutions. In 1882, schools, 12; teachers, 79; pupils, 2,397.

The Freewill Baptists have an excellent institution, Storer College, at Harper's Ferry, Va., with 5 teachers and 245 students.

The Friends, true to the principles of the founder of their denomination, George Fox, entered at once the opened door for relieving the physical necessities of the freedmen, and at length established schools among them; but, when the public schools furnished the education, they gradually withdrew. They now maintain Southland College, Helena, Ark., with 277 pupils; a school in Maryville, Tenn., with 13 instructors and 211 pupils; and one in Philadelphia with 291 pupils; with 22 other schools in the South, maintained for a portion of the year. The Friends (Hicksite) entered the work in 1862; furnishing supplies at first, afterwards sustaining schools numbering at one time 25. They now have one school with 150 scholars.

The Methodist-Episcopal Church had from the first co-operated with the undenominational Aid Societies in the care of the freedmen in relieving physical suffering, and in giving instruction in primary education; but it concentrated its efforts by the organization, in Cincinnati, Aug. 6, 1866, of the Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. This society now reports 6 chartered institutions; viz., Central Tennessee College Nashville, Tenn.; Clark University, Atlanta, Ga.; Claflin University, Orangeburg, S.C.; New Orleans University, New Orleans, La.; Rust University, Holly Springs, Miss.; Wiley University, Marshall, Tex.; — 4 theological schools, viz., Centenary Biblical Institute, Baltimore, Md.; Gammon Theological Seminary, Atlanta, Ga.; Baker Institute, Orangeburg, S.C.; and Thomson Biblical Institute, New Orleans, La.; — 1 medical college, viz., Meharry Medical College, Nashville, Tenn.; — and 14 institutions not chartered. Total number of institutions, 25; teachers, 95; pupils, 3,506. It gives special attention to biblical instruction, and at Clark University a department of industry is established. The African Methodist-Episcopal Church founded and sustains Wilberforce University at Xenia, O., with 13 teachers and 170 students.

The Presbyterian Committee of Missions for Freedmen was organized by the General Assembly in 1865, and began its work at once by sending preachers and teachers to the South. Its efforts thus far are confined to the two Carolinas, Virginia, and Tennessee, with a few missions and schools in Georgia, Kentucky, and Florida. It has under its care 3 chartered institutions, — Biddle University, Charlotte, N.C. (with a theological department); Wallingford Academy, Charleston, S.C.; and Scotia Seminary, Concord, N.C., — 2 normal schools, 3 graded schools, and 50 parochial schools. Total number of schools, 58; teachers, 108; scholars, 6,088. Lincoln University (Lincoln University P.O.), Oxford, Penn., has an able corps of 13 professors and 200 students. — 18 theological, 100 collegiate, and 82 preparatory.

The Protestant-Episcopal Freedmen's Commission was organized October, 1865; and in a few months it opened schools in Petersburg, Va., Wilmington and Raleigh, N.C. The first year the teachers numbered 23, and the scholars, day and night, 1,600. The Committee for Domestic Missions (under whose care this work now is) reported, in 1882, 2 normal schools with 8 teachers each, and 11 schools with 1 teacher each. The normal schools are at Raleigh, N.C., and at Petersburg, Va.

The United Presbyterians have 2 schools, — one in Abbyville, Va., with 4 teachers and 245 students; the other in Chase City, Va., with 3 teachers and 251 students.

The Catholic Directory for 1882 reports for the archdiocese of Baltimore, 1 academy for colored girls with 60 pupils, and 4 other schools with 693 pupils, total, 753; archdiocese of New Orleans, 7 schools, 330 pupils; archdiocese of St. Louis, 1 school, 120 pupils; diocese of Louisville, 6 schools, 332 pupils; diocese of Natchez, 3 schools, 80 pupils; diocese of Natchetoches, 2 schools, 10 pupils; diocese of Savannah, 2 schools, 75 pupils; diocese of St. Augustine, 6 schools, number of pupils not given. Total: schools, 30; pupils reported, 1,730.

The princely gift of $2,100,000, by the philanthropic George Peabody, to education in the South, has yielded an annual income varying from $70,000 to $100,000. Of the money given for teachers' institutes and public schools one-fourth is for the colored people. Mr. John F. Slater of Norwich, Conn., has enrolled his name with Mr. Peabody by giving $1,000,000, designating it specially for the colored people. Mrs. Valeria G. Stone of Malden, Mass., has recently given to the American Missionary Association $150,000, which it has used in erecting buildings in Atlanta, Nashville, Talladega, and New Orleans. She has also given to Hampton Institute, Berea College, and the theological department of Howard University, $55,000.

It is estimated that the appropriations of the American Missionary Association, the Freedmen's Aid Society, the Baptist Home Missionary Society, and the Presbyterian Home Missionary Society, for educational work in the South, chiefly for the negro race, together with the portion of the Peabody fund devoted to the same purpose, have amounted, since the war, to nearly $10,000,000.

The slaves emancipated by the Proclamation of 1863 numbered about 4,000,000. The census of 1870 reported the number of colored people 4,880,000. The census of 1880 reported the number 6,577,151, an increase of thirty-three per cent. The number of colored voters who could not read and write in 1870 was 850,032; in 1880, 944,424, — showing an increase of illiterate voters of 94,392. Thus, in spite of all that has been done, the education of the colored people has not kept pace with their increase in population or illiteracy.

The negro is robust in body, strong to endure labor, has shown himself in the schools to be capable of mastering the higher studies, and possesses a heart peculiarly susceptible to religious impressions. Since emancipation he has proved himself to be industrious, has acquired property, has crowded the schools open to him, and has developed remarkable ability for song and eloquence. If cultured adequately, he will add a rich store of needed elements to the Anglo-Saxon civilization of America, and will give a new impulse to the work of evangelizing Africa.

NEHEMI'AH (consolation of Jehovah), the distinguished Jewish patriot, and restorer of the walls of Jerusalem, was the son of Hachaliah. One of the Jewish exiles in Babylonia, he served as cup-bearer to King Artaxerxes Longimanus, with whom he must have stood in high favor. In the twentieth year of this sovereign (444 B.C.) he secured permission to return to Jerusalem, and restore its walls and his fathers' sepulchres. He undertook his journey, provided with letters of introduction to the governors and a body-guard (ii. 9). Arrived in Jerusalem, he was successful in rallying colaborers, and in restoring the fortifications of the city. This work aroused the opposition and hostility of Sanballat and others, who harassed the builders with threats, and made a conspiracy to completely defeat the plan. Nehemiah's discretion conceived admirable arrangements for combining the work of defence with the prosecution of the masonry by putting a sword, as well as a trowel, into every man's hand; and all the efforts of the enemies were defeated. Nehemiah was a disinterested patriot, as well as an able leader, and refused to take the salary due to a governor, on account of the poverty of the people. A hundred and fifty Jews sat down at his table every day. All our reliable information of Nehemiah's life is taken from the book bearing his name. The facts are continued down to the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes' reign, or 432 B.C. He stands before us as one of the noblest and most magnanimous characters of the Old Testament. Like Joshua, he is a type of lay piety and religious activity. He was one of those ardent Jewish patriots whom the attractions of a foreign court did not make ashamed of their nationality, or indifferent to the welfare of Jerusalem. He combined the practical skill of the architect with the vigilance and fortitude of the general.

BOOK OF. — The Book of Nehemiah is valuable for the description it gives of the restoration of Jerusalem, which is our best guide in mapping out the topography of the city, the development of the enmity between the Jews and the Samaritans, and the revival of the reading of the law and the observance of the feasts. It contains an account of Nehemiah's return to Jerusalem, and reconstruction of its walls (chaps. i-vii.), the institution of the public reading of the law and a religious feast by Ezra, and the prayer of the Levites (viii., ix.), the covenant and genealogy of the Levites, and the separation of Israel from the mixed multitude (x.-xiii. 3), and Nehemiah's reforms concerning the temple, and marriages with foreign women (xiii. 4-31). It is the latest of the books of the Old Testament. The authenticity of its contents has not been a matter of dispute. There are no events of a miraculous nature to awaken suspicion. The questions of interest concern the relation of the work to Ezra and the authorship.

In the Hebrew canon, Nehemiah and Ezra were counted as one book. The LXX. and the Vulgate divided them into two books. The events which they narrate belong to the same period of restoration; but, as has already been stated in the article EZRA, they are to be regarded as distinct compositions. The opening clause of Nehemiah, "The words of Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah," clearly indicates this. The author uses the first person in chaps. i.-vii. 6, xii. 31-43, and xiii. 4-31; and it is pretty generally agreed, that Nehemiah is the author of these sections. The case is different with the intervening chapters. De Wette, Bishop Hervey, Dr. Crosby, Canon Rawlinson, and others hold that all, or a portion, of this matter, is by another hand. Keil, on the other hand, ascribes the entire composition to Nehemiah. Stress is laid upon the change from the first to the third person in the narrative; but there is danger of being deceived by this argument, as the instances cited in the art. EZRA prove. The style of chaps. viii.-x. is, as Rawlinson and others have shown, different from the first seven chapters; and the lists of chaps. x.-xii. have evidently been interpolated (xii. 10-22, etc.).

LIT.—The Fathers did not give much attention to Nehemiah; and Venerable Bede was the first to give a commentary upon it in his allegorical interpretation, Allegorica Expositio in Librum Nehemie. Among the older commentators are STRIGELIUS (Scholia in Nehem., 1575), Bishop PILKINGTON (Exposition upon Nehemiah, 1585), CROMMIUS (Lovan., 1632), TRAPP (London, 1656). The more recent commentaries are by BERTHEAU, 1862; KEIL: 1870; Canon RAWLINSON, in Speaker's Commentary, London and New York, 1873; HOWARD CROSBY, in Lange, New York, 1876. See art. "Nehemiah," by Bishop HERVEY, in Smith's Bible Dictionary, the vivid portraiture by EWALD, in his History of Israel, and the art. "Ezra und Nehemia," in HERZOG; SAYCE: Introduction to Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, London, 1885.

NEHUSHTAN (brazen thing) is the name which King Hezekiah of Judah gave to the brazen serpent set up in the wilderness by Moses (Num. xxi. 8). It had been preserved by the Israelites up to that time; but Hezekiah ordered it to be burnt, because the people regarded it as an idol, and offered incense to it (2 Kings xviii. 1). The name Nehushtan he gave it in derision.

NELSON, David, Presbyterian clergyman, b. near Jonesborough, Tenn., Sept. 21, 1793; d. at Oakland, Ill., Oct. 17, 1841. He was graduated in 1810 at Washington College, Virginia. He practised medicine, imbibed infidel opinions, but was converted, and licensed to preach, April, 1825. After five years' service in Tennessee and Kentucky, he established Marion College in Missouri, and for six years was its first president; but his abolitionist views at last forced his departure, and in 1836 he opened at Oakland a training-school, particularly for missionaries. Besides other literary work, he wrote that widely circulated work, Cause and Cure of Infidelity, New York, 1836, often reprinted and edited. The American Tract Society publishes translations of it in French, German, and Spanish.

NELSON, Robert, b. at London, June 22, 1656; d. at Kensington, Jan. 16, 1715. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge; in 1680 was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and passed a life of study and beneficence. He was a Non-juror, and did not return to the Church of England until 1709. He wrote several books, which were widely circulated in his day; and one, Companion for the Fasts and Festivals of the Church of England (London, 1704), still retains its popularity. He is, moreover, known as the biographer of Bishop Bull, 1713.

NEMESIUS, a Christian philosopher, author of a book (περὶ φύσεως ἀνθρώπου) on human nature, and, according to the titlepage of the book, bishop of Emisa, or Emesa, in Phœnicia. Nothing more is known of his life, even not the exact period in which he lived; for, though his book was much used, he was not quoted until late. By some he has been identified with Nemesius, the Pagan prefect of Cappadocia, to whom Gregory Nazianzen addressed several letters and a poem; but there is no positive proof of that supposition. It is probable, however, that he lived towards the close of the fourth century, as he mentions no writer of a later date, but often quotes Apollinaris and Eunomius. His book must early have been ascribed to Gregory of Nyssa. It was much used by Philoponus, John of Damascus, Elias Cretensis, etc. Having been several times translated into Latin, it was for the first time edited in Greek by Nic. Ellebodius, Antwerp, 1565; afterward often, as, for instance, in MIGNÉ: Patr. Græca, vol. 40, [translated into English by George Wither, London, 1636]. W. MÖLLER.

NENNIUS is the name of several Celtic saints, of whom one (d. in 809), the pupil of Elbodus, archbishop of North Wales, is often mentioned as the author of the Historia Britonum. Out of the thirty manuscripts, however, which have come down to us, only two, dating from the twelfth century, mention Nennius as the author; while seventeen other manuscripts mention Gildas, and one of the best, a certain anchoret, Mareus. But, the oldest manuscripts, dating from the tenth century, mention no author at all; nor does William of Malmesbury (about 1125), who often quotes the book under the title Gesta Britonum. The book belongs to the time when the Britons, driven away by the Saxons, consoled themselves for the loss of their freedom and power by boastful fictions. It seems to have been written between 822 and 831; but in its present shape it has gone through the hands of no less than five different editors, who have enlarged it, and filled it with confusion. See SCHÖLL: De Eccl. Brit. Historie Fontibus, pp. 29-37. C. SCHÖLL.

NEOLOGY, from νέος ("new") and λογος ("word," "idea"), is used in philology to denote the introduction of new and more or less superfluous words, and in theology to denote the introduction of new and more or less unsound doctrines.

NEONOMIANISM, from νέος ("new") and νόμος ("law"), is a term which in the controversies of the English dissenters, in the beginning of the eighteenth century, was applied to the views of Dr. Daniel Williams and his adherents, because they defined and construed Christianity as a "new law."

NEOPHYTES (νεόφυτοι, "the newly-planted") denoted, in the primitive church, such as had recently been baptized: see 1 Tim. iii. 6, where it is rendered "novice." The term was retained by the Fathers, though with various modifications. According to Apost. Canon., 50, a neophyte could hold no office in the church, except under peculiar circumstances. Neophytes of the Roman-Catholic Church — that is non-Christians, or Christians of other denominations, entering the Church of Rome — receive many privileges from the Pope. Compare FERRARI: Bibliotheca Canonica.

NEO-PLATONISM was the last form of philosophy which the Greek civilization developed, and stood in a curious relation to Christianity, alternately attracting and repulsing it. When Christianity entered into history, the whole Greek-Roman civilization was falling into decay, its moral and religious foundation was decomposed and crumbling away, and the uncertainty and insufficiency of its scientific construction became apparent by the glaring contradictions of the various philosophical systems. Its inherent power was still too strong, however, to yield without making one last grand exertion for self-restoration. The history of philosophy was ransacked; and those systems which presented a combination of philosophy and religion (Pythagoras, Plato, etc.), supplemented with such Oriental ideas as had proved adaptable to the Greek mind, were re-adjusted in accordance with the demands of the situation. During the first and the second century of the Christian era, the New-Pythagoreans flourished; Apollonius of Tyana emphasizing the doctrines of Plato, Numenius of Apamea more inclined towards Oriental ideas, etc. But they were only eclectics. Their influence was merely momentary. They simply prepared the way for Neo-Platonism, which, though firmly planted on the basis of the preceding Greek philosophy, may be considered a new manifestation of the genuine creative power of the Greek spirit, distinct, both from the philosophy of Philo, with its peculiar Jewish admixtures, and from Gnosticism, with its preponderating Oriental elements. Its deepest impulse was a longing away from the finite existence in the world towards the infinity of God. Its principal object was to discover the means by which the human soul may escape from its imprisonment in matter, and return to the spirit-source from which it originally sprang. Thus it is characterized in each of its three phases, — the Alexandrian-Roman school, 200–270 (Ammonius Saccas and Plotinus), the Syrian school, 270–400 (Porphyry and Jamblichus), and the Athenian school, 400–529 (Proclus and his disciples).

Ammonius Saccas, a native of Alexandria (d. about 250), a Christian by education, but afterwards converted to Paganism, was the founder of Neo-Platonism. He wrote nothing; but among his disciples were Origen the Neo-Platonist, Origen the Christian Father, Longinus the critic, and Plotinus (b. at Lycopolis in Egypt, 205; d. in Campania, 270), who first gave a systematic form to the Neo-Platonic doctrines. Plotinus settled in Rome in 244, gathered a large circle of pupils, and began in 251 to put his ideas into writing. His essays, fifty-four in number, were collected by Porphyry, and arranged, according to their contents, in six Enneads. They were first printed in a Latin translation by Marsilius Ficinus, Florence, 1492, and then in Latin and Greek at Basel, 1580, in Greek, with critical apparatus by Moser, and Creuzer, Oxford, 1835, 3 vols., by Dübner, Paris, 1855, by Kirchhoff, Leipzig, 1856, and by H. F. Müller, Berlin, 1878–80. [Parts of his works were translated into English by Th. Taylor, London, 1787, 3d ed., 1817. There is a complete French translation by Bouillet, Paris, 1857–60; also a German, Berlin, 1878–80.] Among modern works on Plotinus' philosophy are, C. H. Kirchner: Die Philosophie Plotinus, Halle, 1854; A. Richter: Neuplatonische Studien, Halle, 1861–67. The system of Plotinus comprises three divisions, — the supersensuous world, the world of the senses, and the elevation of the soul from the latter to the former. The centre and foundation, not only of the supersensuous world, but of all that exists, is God. But God is incommensurable with reason, above reason, and can be approached by the human understanding only under three forms, — as the infinite, without limit or form, without magnitude or life, without thought or being, definable only through negations; as the one and the good, the source of all that loves, the goal of all that lives; and as the sum total of all power or force, the absolute causality: which three conceptions afterwards were introduced into the Christian dogmatics, as the three ways of knowing God, by the Christian Neo-Platonists, Dionysius Areopagita, Maximus Confessor, and Scotus Erigena. From the superabundance of this absolute causality issues forth the Idea, or world of ideas (νοῦς), which, though radiating from God, "like the beams from the sun," is different from him, "like the flower from the root," and as unable to exercise any influence on him as is "the river with respect to its source." From the Idea again issues forth the Soul (ψυχή), one by itself, as the All-Soul or the World-Soul, and yet comprising an innumerable multitude of individual souls. Though the Soul belongs to the supersensuous world, she has an instinctive longing towards her own creation, — the world of the senses, the world of appearances, the world of matter. This last stage in the development of the universe is as necessary, according to its inherent plan, as any of the preceding; but matter is, nevertheless, the very opposite of good, — evil by itself, and the source of all evil. The goal of all moral effort of man must consequently be to rid himself from his connection with matter, and return through the Idea to God. The means by which that goal can be reached is virtue; not the simple, plain virtue by which social life is regulated and adorned, but a thorough purification of the Soul, — by which the sensuous affections are not only limited and governed, but absolutely extinguished, — and a concentration of all the powers of life upon the Idea, that is, upon the study of the sciences and the contemplation of the divine, until at last the Soul is completely absorbed in God through a holy enthusiasm, or ecstasy.

The most prominent of Plotinus' disciples, and the head of the Syrian school of Neo-Platonism, was Porphyry (b. in 233 at Tyre, or, according to another account, at Batanea in Syria; d. in Rome, 303 or 304). He studied first under Longinus, but repaired in 263 to Rome, and entered the school of Plotinus. After a residence of several years in Sicily, he returned in 271 to Rome, where he edited the works of Plotinus, and wrote most of his own books. Christian writers — Socrates (Hist. Eccl., III. 23) and Augustine (De Civit. Dei, X. 20)

— tell us that he was educated a Christian, but was converted to Paganism, and, from a feeling of revenge, became a bitter enemy of Christianity; and, indeed, one of his most famous works was his Karà Xριστιανῶν ("Against the Christians"). It has perished, and so have the refutations of it by Methodius, Eusebius of Cæsarea, Apollinaris, and Philostorgius; but it is often spoken of (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., VI. 19: Demonstr. Evang., III. 6; Augustine: De Civ. Dei, XIX. 23). His exposition of Plato's Timæus, and most of his original works on philosophy, are also lost. Still extant are his Introduction to the Categories of Aristotle, his epitome of the system of Plotinus, etc. (see Fabricius: Bibl. Græca, V. 725). In the system of Porphyry, the tendency of restoring and regenerating Paganism by means of philosophy is much more apparent than in the system of Plotinus. Porphyry was a man of a practical turn of mind, clear, cutting, and popular; a scholar and a critic, rather than a speculative genius. He added nothing new to Neo-Platonism; but he popularized the system, and made it fit for practical application. Of course, he could not avoid stumbling now and then against the vulgar conception of the Greek religion. He abominated the sacrifice of animals; he advocated abstinence from flesh; he spoke of the true worship of God as consisting in devout contemplation and the piety of the heart: but he, nevertheless, considered the Hellenic polytheism as a true and legitimate stage in the elevation of the human soul from matter to spirit, and capable not only of restoration, but also of reform. His disciple Jamblichus (a native of Cælesyria, a contemporary of Constantine; d. about 330), and the disciples of Jamblichus (Ædesius, Chrysanthius, Maximus, Eunapius, etc.), approached the problem still more closely, and gave to Neo-Platonism the aspect of a fantastic theology of polytheism, the character of a mysticism and theurgy, in which both the speculative spirit and the pure piety of the earlier Neo-Platonists were lost.

After the death of the Emperor Julian, who was a Neo-Platonist, and the complete failure of the practical re-action against Christianity, the Neo-Platonic philosophers were for some time compelled to retreat into obscurity, in order to escape the penalties of the imperial edicts and the violence of Christian mobs. Hierocles was ill treated in the streets of Constantinople; Hypatia was killed in a church in Alexandria: nevertheless, in the large cities the philosophical schools were still kept open, and they were often frequented by Christians for the sake of the scientific education they offered. Themistius taught with success in Constantinople, and was appreciated even by Christian theologians (Gregory Nazianzen). The school in Alexandria was very prosperous in the beginning of the fifth century; but it was especially the school in Athens which became celebrated by adopting a stricter method, and cultivating a more accurate and more comprehensive scholarship. Proclus stood at its head, a Lycian by descent (b. in Constantinople, 410; d. in Athens, 485). He was revered by his pupils, not only as a profound philosopher, a great scholar, and a prolific writer, but also as a model of moral perfection, a favorite of the gods. He collected all the results of the Neo-Platonic speculation into one body, remodelled the whole mass of doctrines, and gave to the system its consummate scientific form, dissolving the contradictions, filling up the gaps, etc. But, in spite of his talent and conscientiousness, under his hands Neo-Platonism became a kind of scholastic art, a stiff tradition, built up with dialectical subtlety on the basis of the works of Plato, the oracles, and the Orphic poems; and under his successors (Marinus, Isidorus, Hegias, and Damascius) the school sank down to empty formalism. By order of Justinian, it was closed in 529. Damascius, Simplicius, and five other Neo-Platonists, emigrated to Persia, where they found an appreciative patron in King Chosroes. Four years previously (in 525), the last representative of the old philosophy in the Occident, the Christian Neo-Platonist, Boethius, had found his death by violence.

The discrepancies between the Neo-Platonic philosophy and the Christian religion are palpable. What the one seeks, the other has found: what the one asks for, the other gives. But they proceeded, nevertheless, from the same historical premises, — the deep despair which had seized the peoples when they saw their political liberty, their national education, their religious institutions, tumble down into chaos; and they aimed at the same moral goal, — to give to human life a new and safe foundation by reconciling those awful contradictions which were burning in every man's heart, — God and the world, spirit and nature, mind and matter, etc. No wonder, then, that, as Augustine says in his Epistle to Dioscorus (Ep. 118), Neo-Platonism became to many the bridge which led them to Christianity. But, besides that, Neo-Platonism exercised a discernible influence on the historical development of Christianity. Origen, Methodius, Synesius, the three Cappadocians in the East, Marius Victorinus, Boethius, and Augustine in the West, had frequented Neo-Platonic schools (see Lösche: Augustinus plotinizans, Jena, 1881). The Fathers often used the expositions of Neo-Platonic writers, especially of Plotinus (see A. Jahn: Basilius plotinizans, Bern, 1838). Theodoret, in his De curandis Gr. aff., even employs Plotinus' propositions concerning Providence, though at the same time protesting that Plotinus has derived his ideas from Christian sources. But the greatest influence Neo-Platonism exercised on Christianity through the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius. According to general acceptance, that author was a Christian, who, educated in the school of Proclus, undertook to combine Christian and Neo-Platonic ideas into a system of mystical gnosis, which then was accepted by many as the genuine and original Christian doctrine, handed down from the apostles themselves as a secret but divine science. Through Maximus Confessor, John of Damascus, and Scotus Erigena, those writings exercised a decisive influence on the scholasticism, and more especially on the mysticism, of Western theology during the middle ages.

NEOT, St., an Anglo-Saxon monk, famous for holiness and learning; flourished in the middle of the ninth century, and lived, first in Glastonbury Abbey, afterwards, for the sake of greater seclusion, in a hermitage which he built at the present St. Neot's, in Cornwall. He was a kinsman of King Alfred, and is said to have exercised considerable influence on him. Later biographies tell us that he gave the first idea to the foundation of the University of Oxford, and, indeed, that he was the first professor of that institution. He is commemorated on July 31. NEOSTADIENSIMUM ADMONITIO CHRISTIANA DE LIBRO CONCORDIÆ . . . NEOSTAD. IN PALATINATU 1581 is the title of a book issued against the Formula Concordiæ by the Reformed theologians of Neustadt-on-the-Haardt. In that place the theologians who had been expelled from Heidelberg by the Elector Ludwig, who was a Lutheran, were settled by Johann Casimir of the Palatinate, who was a Calvinist; and, as long as Heidelberg continued Lutheran (1576-83), Neustadt remained a nursery for the Reformed Confession. The Admonitio was written by Ursinus, and is found, in a somewhat enlarged form, in his Opera, Heidelberg, 1612, t. ii. The chapter on the authority of Luther is especially interesting. A. NEPOMUK, John of. See JOHN NEPOMUK.

NEPOS, an Egyptian bishop; d. about the middle of the third century; an ardent champion of chiliasm; defended the literal, realistic exegesis of Scripture against Origen and his disciples, and wrote a work against the allegorists (ἑλεγχος ἀλληγοριστῶν). The work has perished; but its views found many adherents, especially at Arsinoë; and, in order to prevent a great split in the Egyptian Church, Bishop Dionysius of Alexandria had not only to write against the book, but also to hold conferences with those who had accepted its ideas. See EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., VII. 24 et seq. SCHUPART'S De chiliasmo Nepotis (Giessen, 1724) caused a controversy between him and the chiliast Petersen. NER'GAL is mentioned, in 2 Kings xvii. 30, as a deity worshipped by the men of Cuth, who from Babylonia were transplanted into Samaria. The name also occurs in the patronymic Nergalsharezzer, Nirgal-sar-usur, "Nergal protects the king" (Jer. xxxix. 3, 13); but its etymology is completely uncertain. In the Babylonian star-worship, the planet Mars is assigned to Nergal; and he is probably represented by the colossal lions at the entrance of the Assyrian palace. — a fit symbol for the deity in which the Græco-Romans recognized their Ares-Mars. By the Mendæans the planet Mars was called Neryg, which evidently is a corruption of Nergal. According to the Talmud and the rabbins, Nergal was worshipped under the form of the domestic cock. This statement may be due to a merely arbitrary combination between the rabbinical name of a cock, tar-negal, and the name of the god. But it is not improbable that the cock — entirely unknown to the ancient Hebrews, and never mentioned in the Old Testament, first introduced from India to the Persians, and then from the Persians to the Hebrews — may have formed one of the symbolical representations of Nergal, as it everywhere, in India, Persia, Greece, etc., was consecrated to the god of war. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

NER'GAL-SHARE'ZER (Nergal-sar-usur, "Nergal protects the king") is the name of a Babylonian nobleman (Jer. xxxix. 3) entitled Rab-mag, probably as the chief of magicians, and generally identified with Neriglissar, the son-in-law and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. The palace built by him has been discovered among the ruins of Babylon.

NERI, Philip (Filippo de), founder of the Congregation of the Oratory; one of the saints of the Roman-Catholic Church, perhaps the most witty of their number, and free from all pharisaical leaven; was b. at Florence, July 22, 1515; d. at Rome, May 25, 1595. He was characterized from childhood by a cheerful and gentle disposition. Left comparatively poor by the loss of their goods by fire, his parents sent him to his uncle, a rich merchant in St. Germano. Resisting his uncle's generous offers, he went in 1533, out of religious devotion, to Rome, where he studied philosophy and theology under the guidance of the Augustinians. He gave himself up in his spare hours to works of charity, and had no sooner concluded his studies than he sold his library, and gave the proceeds to the poor. On one occasion, in his thirtieth year, while he was engaged in prayer for the Holy Spirit, he was so overcome that he threw himself on the ground; but when he rose up, he found his chest had expanded to the extent of a fist's width. Later, at the dissection of the body, it was discovered that the heart was perfectly sound, and two of the ribs had been broken.

Neri was ordained priest in the Lateran Church, May 23, 1551. He took part in the foundation of the Society of the Holy Trinity for the care of the poor and strangers; but it is especially with the Congregation of the Oratory that his name is associated. This society grew out of evening gatherings which Neri held in a hall. — the Oratory, — for prayer, readings from the Bible, the Fathers, and the martyr-legends, song, etc. The musical treasures of the church were put under tribute, and the pieces chosen were called "oratorios." Down to this day such compositions are performed at the Church of the Oratory in Rome, the St. Maria in Vallicella, from All Saints' Day (Nov. 1) to Palm Sunday.

A familiar and cheerful atmosphere pervaded these gatherings. Neri was persuaded that a cheerful temper was far more in accordance with Christianity than melancholy. The most of his alleged miracles he performed with the simple words, "Be cheerful, and doubt not." This spirit he carried into his daily life; and he was full of humor in his social relations, and even engaged in games. This conduct could not escape the notice of those who sought to bring about a reformation by pharisaical seriousness. He was accused by the cardinal-vicar of Rome of having piped for his companions to dance, etc., and was suspended from the confessor's chair and the pulpit. But the cardinal-vicar died; and Neri was honored by the repeated offer of a cardinal's hat, which he refused. Many miracles are ascribed to him. He was often, for hours at a time, in a state of ecstacy; and his body was seen, on such occasions, to sway in the air several feet from the ground. It does not seem to have been his custom to pray to Mary. Miracles are said to have followed his decease; and in 1622 he was canonized, at the solicitation of Louis XIII. of France.

In 1575 a papal decree was secured recognizing the Congregation of the Oratory. The principle of perfect equality prevails among its members, and even the superior takes his turn in serving at the table. The members are not monks, and do not renounce their private fortunes, or take vows. It was Neri's wish to limit their functions to prayer, the administration of the sacrament, and preaching. The Italian societies are, for the most part, independent of each other, and there is no centralization of authority and jurisdiction. The Church of St. Maria in Vallicella, Rome, belonging to the Congregation, was built in 1576. Three years later, Tarucci founded societies in Naples and Milan, which were followed by others in Palermo and other cities. Neri's successor as superior of the Roman society was the church historian Baronius. In 1611 a society was opened in Paris by Bérulle (afterwards cardinal), and others were founded in France. The French societies were, by reason of an inserted article of their constitution, made subject to the bishop. Bossuet passed a glowing eulogy upon the Congregation, which aroused the jealousy of the Jesuits. Jansen persuaded members of the order to settle in Flanders in order to promote the strict Augustinian doctrines of sin and grace. The order has had among its members Malebranche, Thomassin, Mascaron, and Massillon, and in 1760 had fifty-eight houses in France. The Church of the Oratory, near the Louvre in Paris, now belongs to the Reformed Church. The order decayed after the Revolution, but has since been revived [1853] under the impulse of the devout Pététot of St. Roch, and has the name of the "Oratory of Jesus and the Immaculate Mary." Gratry belonged to it. [In 1817 Cardinal Newman founded a Congregation of the Oratory at Birmingham, the members of which were for the most part made up of former members of the Anglican Church. In 1849 a second Congregation was established at London, with Frederick W. Faber as the superior.]

NERO (Roman emperor 54-68) has made his name conspicuous in the history of the Christian Church by his persecution of the Christian congregation in Rome, — the first great persecution instituted against the Christians. In the night between July 18 and 19, 64, a fire broke out on the southern declivity of the Palatine Hill. It raged for six days and six nights, spreading far and wide, and suddenly started anew in the northern parts of the city, lasting for three more days, and destroying ten out of the fourteen wards of the city. The excitement in Rome was indescribable; and a rumor was abroad that the conflagration was the work of the emperor himself, — a suspicion not altogether improbable on account of his delirious craving for magnificence, and his desire to embellish or even rebuild Rome. In order to avert the popular fury, which could not be appeased by lavish contributions, public processions, etc., Nero formally accused the Christians of having caused the calamity. Why he first chose the Christians is a question not easy to answer. Some have surmised that the accusation was due to the influence of the Empress Poppæa. She was on very friendly terms with the Jews; and she was excessively jealous of Acte, the mistress of Nero, and said to have been a Christian. It is more probable, however, that the emperor simply made use of the prejudice of the Romans against all Orientals and their special aversion to the Jews. Though, at that time, people in general hardly made any distinction between Christians and Jews, simply considering the former a sect of the latter, there were certain Christian ideas — the belief in the speedy return of Christ, in his judging all mankind, in the destruction of the world by fire, etc. — which were well known to all who had heard any thing about the Christians, and which made it specially easy to fasten the accusation on them. The effect was fearful. In the gardens of Nero, the present St. Peter's Square, the Christians were crucified, sewn into hides of wild beasts, and thrown before the dogs, enveloped with some inflammable stuff, raised on poles, and used as torches, etc. Beyond the city of Rome the persecution did not spread, but the impression it made on the whole Christian community was visible for a long time. Hence the widely spread rumor among the early Christians that Nero would return as Antichrist. Many modern writers find his name in the mystic number of the Apocalypse (xiii. 18).

NERSES is the name of three great dignitaries of the Armenian Church, of whom Nerses I., the Great, has already been spoken of in the article ARMENIAN CHURCH, p. 111. — Nerses Clayensis, as catholicos, Nerses IV., b. about 1100; d. Aug. 5 or 13, 1173; belonged to the same family as Nerses the Great and Gregory Illuminator, and was catholicos from 1166 to 1173. He labored with great zeal for the establishment of a union between the Armenian and the Greek Church. At a personal meeting with Alexius, the son-in-law of the Emperor Manuel Comnenus, and commander of the garrison of Mopsuestia, he was surprised at the insignificance of the differences which separated the two churches, and sent a confession of the creed of the Armenian Church to the emperor. Thus the negotiations were opened. Later on, the emperor sent the Greek philosopher Theophrastus, and Johannes Uthman, abbot of a monastery in Philippopolis, to Armenia; and a great disputation took place between the Greek and the Armenian theologians, the effect of which was actually to draw the two churches still nearer to each other. The protocol of this disputation was first printed in Latin and Greek by J. Leunclavius, Basel, 1577, and in Bibl. Vet. Patr., iv., then in Latin and Armenian by Clemens Galanus, in his Conciliatio Eccl. Armenæ cum Romana, i. 212-222, and by Angelo Mai, in his Scriptorum Vet. Nova Collectio, Rome, 1822, tom. iv. The emperor then sent a declaration to Nerses, setting forth nine different points which it would be necessary that the Armenian Church should accept, and they were really accepted by a local synod convened by Nerses. But, before a general synod was called, the catholicoi died. Nerses also distinguished himself in literature, both as a poet and as a theologian. He wrote The Word of Faith, an extract from the Gospels, in thirteen hundred and fifty-nine verses; Jesus the Son, in four thousand verses, and other religious poems, printed in Venice, 1830; and an elegy on the conquest and destruction of Edessa, printed in Paris and Madras, 1826, at Tiflis, 1829. His prose-works consist of homilies, commentaries, Prayers, printed in twenty-four languages, in Venice, 1822 and 1827, and letters, of great theological interest, printed in Constantinople, 1825, in Venice, 1858, and in a Latin translation by Cappelletti, Venice, 1833. — Nerses Lambronensis, b. in 1153; d. July 14, 1198; was a son of Prince Oshin of Lambron in Cilicia, by a niece of Nerses Clayensis. He was educated in Constantinople, understood Greek, Latin, and Coptic, and was in 1176 appointed archbishop of Tarsus and Lambron. He had a great talent as a preacher: but he loved solitude and a secluded life; and one year after his appointment, when only twenty-four years old, he resigned his office, and withdrew into the desert, where he wrote his exposition of the liturgy of the mass, printed at Venice in 1847, and his orations on the clerical office. In the negotiations, however, still going on between the Greek and the Armenian Church, he took a prominent part. The Greek declaration of nine points was not accepted unconditionally by the Armenian synod, at whose opening Nerses delivered his most celebrated speech, printed, together with an Italian translation, at Venice, 1812, translated into German by Neumann, Leipzig, 1834, and still read as a specimen of marvellous eloquence. Several of the Greek demands were objected to; and, on the other side, the Armenians also made their demands. The Greeks, however, showed themselves very obliging, and a full agreement was actually arrived at; but, before the message could reach Constantinople, the emperor died (Sept. 27, 1180), and the stormy time which then set in made all the labor done of no avail. The suspicion and jealousy of the Greeks were again aroused by the good relation between the Armenians and the crusaders, and the embassy of Nerses to Constantinople in 1197 had no effect. Besides the works already mentioned, Nerses wrote commentaries, homilies, lives of anchorets (translated into several languages), a eulogy on Nerses Clayensis, printed in Petersburg, 1782, Madras, 1810, Constantinople, 1826, etc. PETERMANN.

NESSE, Christopher, dissenting divine; b. at North Cowes, Yorkshire, Dec. 26, 1621; d. at London, Dec. 26, 1705. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; took holy orders; was settled at Cottingham; ejected for nonconformity, 1662; and for thirty years was pastor to a dissenting congregation in London. He wrote many works; of which the most important are, A compleat history and mystery of the Old and New Testament logically discussed and theologically improved, London, 1690-96, 4 vols. (Matthew Henry is said to have utilized it in his Commentary); Antidote against Arminianism, 1700, 5th ed. revised 1836; and Life of Pope Innocent XI. (written for John Duntton, who sold the whole impression in a fortnight).

NESTOR, the father of Russian historiography; b. in 1056; d. about 1120; entered the Petscherian monastery of Kiev in his seventeenth year, and spent the rest of his life there as a monk. His principal work is his Chronicle, written in Old-Russian, and opening a continuous series of similar works running through five centuries, one author taking up the thread where the other drops it. The monkish character of the work is very striking, but impresses the reader with respect. The author narrates in simple and devout manner; and, when his credulity does not lead him astray into the fabulous, he is reliable. The earliest edition is from 1767; the latest, by Miklosich, from 1860. He also wrote a Patericum Peczericum, containing lives of the abbots of the cave-monastery of Kiev. See STRAHL: Beiträge zur russischen Kirchengeschichte, Halle, 1827; [STANLEY: Eastern Church, London, 1861]. GASS.

NESTORIANS, History of the (after 489). The Nestorians rapidly developed into a powerful ecclesiastical party, and, excluded from the empire, carried on an extensive missionary activity in Persia, India, and China. They spread at first in Persia. A letter of Ibas of Edessa to Bishop Mares of Persia, and the translations of the works of Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, into the language of the Persian Church (the Syrian), contributed to extend the doctrines of Nestorius in the Persian Empire. The teachers who had been expelled from Edessa also entered Persia, and settled down at Nisibis, and were strengthened by the addition to their number of Nerses the Leper. Christianity had been carried to Persia at an early period, and the bishop of Seleucia became the acknowledged head of the church. Persian bishops were present at the Council of Niceæ. Babæus assumed the title of "patriarch," and, according to Assemani, was the first schismatic Nestorian bishop of Seleucia (498-503). His predecessor, Acacius, was also suspected of being a Nestorian; and Xenaias of Mabbug (i.e. Philoxenus, the translator of the Syriac New Testament) gave to him and his followers the designation "Nestorians." This is the first occurrence of this name. The party so designated called themselves "Chaldeans," or "Chaldean Christians," and affirm that Nestorius was not their patriarch, and that he followed them, not they him. The Turks of to-day call them Nasârah; i.e., Christians. Babæus, however, was the first to boldly avow himself a Nestorian. He inaugurated his patriarchate with a synod, which granted the privilege to the patriarch, bishops, and priests, to marry one wife (as opposed to polygamy), and established the primacy of the see of Seleucia.

The successors of Babæus filled all the sees with Nestorians, and were intent upon propagating their form of Christianity. The principal seat of Nestorian learning was Nisibis. The sect produced learned theologians, and also distinguished physicians and philosophers, who translated Greek classics, — especially Aristotle, Hippocrates, and Galenus, — and were the only representatives of letters in the Orient at that time.

In Arabia the Nestorians were also successful in propagating their doctrines. They spread in Syria and Palestine under the caliphs; and a bishop of the Nestorians in Egypt is mentioned under Mar Aba II. (742-752). The bishops of Arabia were subject to the metropolitan of Persia. India, in which, according to a very old tradition, the apostle Thomas introduced Christianity, also belonged to his jurisdiction. Nestorianism likewise spread to China, where a Nestorian monument of the year 781 was found by the Jesuit missionaries in 1625 at Si-gan-fu. The inscription, which is in Chinese and Syriac, gives a long list of Nestorian clergymen. Its genuineness, once widely disputed, is now very generally acknowledged. The patriarch Salibazacha (711-726) appointed the first Nestorian metropolitan of China. At the same time metropolitans were appointed for Herat and Samareund.

Early in the sixth century there was a split amongst the Nestorians in Persia, two patriarchs (Nerses and Eliseus) being elected by two parties; but it was healed at the end of twelve years. Both parties united upon Paul, who was followed in a few months by Mar Aba I., a converted Magian (536-562). This prelate translated the Nestorian Liturgy from the Greek into the Syriac, which is still in use, and displayed remarkable energy in the government of the church. He made tours of visitation, and in 544 held a synod, which decreed that neither the patriarch nor the bishops might marry, — a decree which is still authoritative. It also established the authority of the Nicene Creed, and of Theodore of Mopsuestia as an expositor of the Bible. The synod of 577, convened by patriarch Ezekiel (577-580), pronounced against the Messalians. The Emperor Chosroes I. is said to have become a Christian before his death; and his successors, Hormizd IV. and Chosroes II., greatly favored the Nestorians; the latter forcing all other Christians to accept their doctrines.

Under the Mohammedans, the Nestorians were not only almost wholly free from persecutions, but could boast of several edicts licensing their religion, the genuineness of some of which, however, has been justly a matter of dispute. The tradition runs, that Mohammed had the acquaintance of a Nestorian monk, Sergius, and got from him his knowledge of Christianity. The patriarch Jesujahb is also reported to have gone to Mohammed, and secured from him an edict of toleration, which was edited by Gabriel Sionita, Paris, 1630. The same is said to have received a like favor from Omar. The Nestorians often filled high political positions under the Mohammedans, and acted as secretaries to the caliphs or physicians (both of which classes stood very high in the esteem of the Mohammedan rulers), and took a prominent part, on account of their position, in the election of the patriarchs. At one time Bagdad was the patriarchal residence; and here the patriarchs were elected, though they were ordained at Seleucia.

Under the Mongols, likewise, the Nestorians were favored. When Hulagu Khan captured Bagdad, in 1268, he spared them. His successors were likewise favorable to the sect; which may be, at least in part, explained by the resemblances of the Buddhistic ritual to its own. A son of Zingis Khan is reported by Marco Polo to have passed over to Christianity. The famous and mythical Presbyter John was a Nestorian; and it was among the Nestorians that John of Monte Corvino (1292) labored.

The favorable position of the Nestorians under the Arabs and Mongols was attended with a rapid extension of Christianity in Eastern Asia. After the siege of Bagdad, in 1258, twenty-five metropolitans acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Nestorian patriarch. The first persecutions were inaugurated by Timur. Thenceforth their congregations began to shrink up, or wither away. The Roman-Catholic Church also contributed to this result by undertaking active missionary operations among them. Pope Innocent IV. despatched some bishops in 1247 with a communication to the vicar of the Nestorian Orient, who replied by sending a confession signed by the archbishop of Nisibis, two other archbishops, and three bishops, acknowledging Mary as the "mother of Christ" (χριστοτόκος). Nicolaus IV., in 1288, likewise communicated with the Nestorians, as also did Benedict XI., and received from the patriarch Jahballaha, in 1304, an answer acknowledging the Roman Church as "the mother and teacher of all the others," and the Pope "as the head shepherd of all Christendom." Assemani concludes too abruptly, that the Nestorians at this time united with the Roman Church: at any rate, the Nestorians under Jahballaha's successors continued to be independent. In 1445, however, under Pope Eugenius IV., the entire Nestorian body on the Island of Cyprus was won for the Roman Church by the efforts of Archbishop Andrew. In the sixteenth century a strong Catholic party was formed. At the death of the patriarch Simeon, in 1551, a party in the church, refusing to acknowledge his nephew, Bar Mama, who had been elected his successor, chose a patriarch of their own, Johannes Sulaka, who was sent to Rome for consecration. For a hundred years this succession was kept up. The patriarch who was contemporary with Paul V. accepted the confessions the Pope sent him in 1617; but his successors renounced the union. But in 1681 Innocent XI. again nominated a patriarch, who assumed the name "Joseph;" and ever since, this has been the name of the patriarch of those Nestorians or Chaldeans who acknowledge the jurisdiction of Rome. The other wing of the Nestorians also retained its organization and its patriarch, who, since the close of the seventeenth century, has borne the name "Simeon," and the title "Patriarch of the Chaldeans." He has his residence in an inaccessible valley of the Kurd Mountains. The small residue of the once powerful Nestorian Church is confined to these hills and the plain about Oroomiah, and in 1833 numbered, according to Smith and Dwight, seventy thousand souls. The American Board sent missionaries to them in 1834, who, by their prudent and in every way much-blessed labors, have done not a little to prevent the few surviving Nestorians from being swallowed up by the Roman-Catholic Church. It was through these missionaries that the news was first brought, that the Nestorians still preserved a dialect of the old Aramaic language. They have set up their presses in Oroomiah [1840], and made this dialect the language of the Scripture translation. Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1818), Baxter's Saints' Rest (1851), and many other books, have been published in this same tongue, especially under the distinguished guidance of Rev. Mr. Perkins. In 1853 the learned missionary, David T. Stoddard, gave the first systematic account of this dialect in his Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language (Journal of the Am. Or. Soc., vol. v.). The first German treatment was that of Noldeke (Grammatik d. neu-syrischen Sprache, Leipzig, 1868). All the liturgical books of the Nestorians are in the old Syriac. In 1843 and 1846 six thousand Nestorians were put to death in the war with Kurds.

[The American mission among the Nestorians was inaugurated by the appointment of Rev. Justin and Mrs. Perkins, who sailed from Boston, Sept. 21, 1833. The next important name in the history of the mission is that of Dr. Asahel Grant, a physician at Utica at the time of his deciding to become a missionary. The New Testament was printed in the modern Syriac in 1846, and the whole Bible in 1852. The American Board retained control of the mission till 1870, when it passed over to the hands of the Presbyterian Church of the United States. The present headquarters are at Oroomiah, where a most flourishing work is carried on, there being five self-supporting churches; and an important institution of learning has been established.]

As regards the Nestorians, or Thomas Christians, of India, they received a metropolitan under the patriarchate of Timotheus (778-820). They spread rapidly. In 1120-30 their spiritual head, John, is said to have gone to Constantinople for the pallium, and later to Rome. The church after this date waned in influence. The Portuguese found them, and the Jesuits sought to bring them under the papal jurisdiction. The archbishop of Goa, Alexius Menez, forced them to accept the decrees of a synod held in 1599; so that only a small remnant remained true to the faith of their fathers. But in 1653 the former were able to throw off the Roman yoke, which papal missionaries have since been endeavoring to restore.

NESTORIUS AND THE NESTORIAN CONTROVERSY (to 489). Nestorius (a prominent name in the history of the christological controversies of the early church), b. in the Syrian city Germanicia, and probably educated in Antioch under Theodore of Mopsuestia, won for himself, as monk and presbyter, by his ascetic life, zeal in the cause of orthodoxy, and sermons, a wide reputation in Antioch. He was consecrated bishop of Constantinople, April 10, 428, and, according to Socrates (VII. 29), was a bitter enemy of the heretics. In several sermons he took the part of the presbyter Anastasius, and combated the use of the title, "Mother of God" (θεοτόκος), of Mary. Not God the Logos, but only the human nature, he assumed to himself, had a mother. It was not God who suffered and died. These utterances produced an intense excitement in Constantinople. Clergymen like Proclus preached against him, and laymen interrupted him in the pulpit. As soon as the matter became noised abroad, Cyril of Alexandria, a zealous representative of the Alexandrian school, and, by position, a rival of the patriarch of Constantinople, rose against Nestorius, and wrote to his followers among the clergy of Constantinople, and to the sister and wife of the emperor, to win them for his side. The emperor espoused the cause of Nestorius. Nestorius answered Cyril with not a little haughtiness. His reception of some Pelagians who had been expelled from the West, with the purpose of examining their case, afforded him an opportunity of writing to Cœlestine, bishop of Rome, and defying his christological views. Cœlestine, however, received them with disfavor; and a Roman synod in 430 declared against Nestorius, threatened him with excommunication in case he did not make a speedy retraction, and intrusted the duty of taking further measures against Nestorius to Cyril. John of Antioch sought to induce his friend Nestorius to admit the expression, "mother of God," but was referred by him to the œcumenical council about to be held. Cyril now held a synod in Alexandria, which demanded from Nestorius his signature to twelve articles. Nestorius replied only by publishing twelve articles of his own. Other representatives of the Antiochian theology—John of Antioch, Andrew of Samosata, and especially Theodoret—raised their voices against Cyril's articles.

The theological difference between Nestorius and Cyril was this: Nestorius regarded the pet epithet of the Alexandrian teachers, "Mother of God" (θεοτόκος), as a heathenish admixture of the divine and earthly. "Has God a mother? The creature has not borne Him who is uncreate." The divinity of the Logos is to be distinguished from the temple of his flesh; and two natures are to be predicated of him in order that suffering, and all that is mortal (birth, crucifixion, and death), be not ascribed to the divine nature, and that the humanity which was made subject to death be not regarded as essentially divine. Both natures in the God-man remained what they were before their union. Notwithstanding this, there is only one person in the God-man. He was God in man. Therefore it is proper to say that Mary bare the humanity of Christ, but not that she bare the Son of God. She was the "mother of Christ" (χριστοτόκος), or the "receptive organ of God" (θεοδόχος). In these assertions Nestorius does not lay the same stress upon the human development of Christ as the Antiochian school did. It was his aim, however, to distinguish sharply between the two natures. Cyril, on the other hand, was justified in failing to derive from the treatment of Nestorius the distinct assertion of a single divine-human personality. Nestorius did not by any means intend to predicate two persons. But Cyril starts with the emphatic affirmation, that his opponent taught a co-existence of two persons (προσώπων ἑνώσις), whereby Immanuel was split into two Christs, two Sons. The Logos, on the other hand, actually became man, and did not merely assume a human nature to himself (wherefore Cyril was accused of Apollinarianism). The human nature was made a participant (κοινωνεῖν) in the divine. The Logos did not assume a human personality; nor were there two natures after the incarnation, but only the single nature of the incarnate Logos. The predicates of the human and divine natures became the common property of both. Cyril said, "Nestorius resolves Christ into two Sons, to a man filled with God." Nestorius said, "Cyril makes the Logos undergo a transmutation into flesh, ascribes to him a capacity to suffer," etc. Each drew deductions from the statements of the other which were not intended.

The Council of Ephesus was convened in 431, by order of the emperor, Theodosius II., to settle the dispute. Nestorius arrived in season, under the protection of the imperial legate, Irenæus; and another imperial legate, Candidian, was also present to watch over the proceedings. Cyril arrived with fifty bishops; but the Syrians, with John of Antioch at their head, tarried. After waiting sixteen days, Cyril, in spite of the news that the Syrians were close by, and in spite of the protestations of Candidian, opened the council, June 22. Nestorius was treated as an accused party; and two hundred bishops voted to depose him from his episcopal office, and exclude him from all priestly communion. The Syrians, on their arrival, stormed against Cyril, and in a separate synod, under Candidian's presidency, deposed him; but the Roman delegation, on its arrival, confirmed Cyril's course. Both factions hurried to present their cause to the emperor, who summoned delegates to Constantinople, but allowed them to come no farther than Chalcedon. Nestorius, weary of the controversy, was ready to retire. The emperor ordered him to return to his convent in Antioch. The opposing party gained in influence, were permitted to follow the emperor to Constantinople, and Cyril and Memnon to return to their dioceses.

The emperor, however, had not abandoned the cause of Nestorius. He desired a compromise, which met with disfavor from John of Antioch, the aged Acacius of Beroea, and Theodoret. Cyril made some advances by modifying his theological definitions. He knew also how to get an influence at court. The friends of Nestorius, including John of Antioch, forsook him. The Antiochians presented a confession to the emperor, to which Cyril gave his assent. It acknowledged two natures in the one Christ, and admitted the use of the epithet, "mother of God." Cyril's acceptance of this confession was a theological inconsistency. Neither party was fully satisfied. Cyril had to listen to the objections of fanatics belonging to his party. On the other hand, an extreme Antiochian party of bishops from Central Asia, Syria, and Thessaly, was constituted, who favored Nestorius, and strongly opposed John, the patriarch of Antioch. The effort, however, to give efficacy to the compromise, confirmed John of Antioch and the emperor as advocates of Cyril. In 435 the emperor banished Nestorius to Petra in Arabia, and ordered his writings to be burned. Nestorius probably lived in the oasis of Upper Egypt, and was driven about by various Egyptian prefects until he died. The place and time are unknown. Cyril sought to follow up his victory. Bishop Rabulas of Edessa, a pupil of Theodore of Mopsuestia, espousing the side of Cyril, condemned the writings of his teacher, and drove away from Edessa the teachers who had taken him for their master, among whom was Ibas. Some of the teachers who had been expelled from Edessa went to Persia, where Bishop Barsumas of Nisibis advocated the doctrines of Theodore of Mopsuestia. Ibas became the successor of Rabulas at his death, and remained in close relations with these teachers. The school of Edessa, regarded by the Emperor Zeno as the last stronghold, in the Greek Empire, of Nestorianism, was destroyed in 489. Few traces of this school of opinion are found in the later history of the Greek Empire.

NETTER, Thomas (generally called Thomas Waldensis), b. at Walden, in the county of Essex, about 1380; d. at Rouen, on a journey to Paris, Nov. 3, 1130; studied at Oxford; entered the order of the Carmelites; became their provincial in 1414, and confessor to Henry V. in 1420; was present at the Council of Pisa in 1409, and at the Council of Constance 1414-18; and visited Lithuania in 1419 in order to effect a reconciliation between the king of Poland and the Teutonic knights. He was a prolific writer. His principal work is Doctrinale antiquitatum fidei ecclesie catholice, in six books, on God and Christ, the church, monasticism, the mendicant orders, the sacraments, and the ritual and liturgy. In spite of its title, the book is simply an elaborate criticism of the doctrines of Wiclif; and the criticism is moderate, honest, successful in finding out the weak points of the adversary, and energetic in the attack. Thus the book came to play a conspicuous rôle in the century of the Reformation. It was thrice printed, once in Paris (1521-32, 3 vols.), once in Salamanca (1556), and once in Venice (1571). France, Spain, and Italy, the great strongholds of Romanism, drew from that work their principal weapons in their contest with the Lutheran heresy. It has, however, also great merit as a source of information concerning Wiclif himself. Among his other works is Fasciculi Zizaniorum Johannis Wyclif cum tritico, edited by Walter W. Shirley, in Rerum Brit. mediæ ævi Scriptores, 1858. See LECHLER: Johann von Wiclif und die Vorgeschichte der Reformation, Leipzig, 1873. G. LECHLER.

NETTLETON, Asahel, a distinguished American revivalist preacher; b. at North Killingworth, Conn., April 21, 1783; d. at East Windsor, Conn., May 16, 1814. He was brought up on a farm, of which he was called upon to take the full charge in 1801. He prepared himself for college, and graduated at Yale in 1809. After studying theology under the Rev. Mr. Pinneo of Milford, he was licensed to preach by the West Association of New-Haven County in 1811. From 1812 to 1822 he was active as an evangelist in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York. In the latter year he was prostrated by a severe attack of typhus-fever, from which he never fully recovered. In 1820 he labored in New Haven by request of the pastors, and for the second time. In 1827 he went to Virginia for his health, spending two years there. He held meetings in New-York City in 1830-31, and in 1831 he visited Great Britain. In 1833 he was appointed professor of pastoral theology in the recently established theological institute of East Windsor (now Hartford Seminary), but declined the appointment. Mr. Nettleton was never married. He was a powerful preacher, and large accessions to the church resulted from his preaching. It was strongly doctrinal and Calvinistic. He avoided the "anxious bench and all of its kindred measures" (Tyler). He was regarded as the representative of the conservative tendency, in opposition to Mr. Finney, whose evangelistic labors aroused much criticism. Among the most prominent of these critics was Nettleton himself, who had two interviews with Mr. Finney, — at Albany in December, 1826, and January, 1827, — in which he called upon him to abandon certain practices, such as the calling upon women to pray in public, praying for individuals by name, etc. A discussion was afterwards carried on through an open correspondence.

In this controversy Mr. Nettleton was supported by Drs. Lyman Beecher, Justin Edwards, Hawes, and others. His only published work was the Village Hymns (1824), according to Professor Bird "one of the most influential and important of American collections." See BENNET TYLER: Memoir of Rev. A. Nettleton, D.D., Hartford, 1844.

NEUBRIGENSIS, William (also called Petit, or Parvus), b. at Bridlington in Yorkshire, 1136; d. as canon in the abbey of Newbury, 1208; wrote, besides a Commentary on the Song of Songs, a Historia Rerum Anglicarum, from William I. to 1197, which occupies the first place among contemporary chronicles. The author has a fine power of observation, knows how to choose his materials, and exercises at times an acute criticism. The book was first published at Antwerp, 1567. The best edition is that by H. C. Hamilton for the English Historical Society, 1856. C. SCHÖLL.

NEUFCHATEL, The Independent Evangelical Church of. In the canton of Neufchatel, containing a population of about 110,000 inhabitants, chiefly Protestants, there was organized, A.D. 1873, a free evangelical church, entirely independent of the State, and comprising in 1882 twenty-two parishes, with a membership of about 12,000 souls, among whom 3,361 are voters. The circumstances were as follows:—

The origin of the Independent Church of Neufchatel may be said to date back to the time of the Reformation. At that time the sovereigns of the country remained attached to popery; and the governor, their representative, opposed with all his might the powerful preaching of Farel, and the reformatory impulse aroused in the people by that preaching. One day, however, the citizens gave his emissaries the following decisive answer: "Tell the governor, that, so far as God and our souls are concerned, he has nothing to command over us." Throughout the whole country the Reformation was adopted by a majority of votes, with the exception of two places, which have continued Roman Catholic up to this very day. And thus the Reformed Church was established in Neufchatel without, and even in spite of, the State; while in the other Swiss cantons the administration of the Church and that of the State were generally united in the hands of the political power, because it was the Grand Councils which placed themselves at the head of the movement, and imposed the Reformation on the country, even against opposition.

The pastors of the new church, with Farel, the Knox of Switzerland, at their head, used to meet regularly in the city of Neufchatel, and discuss the affairs of their churches. From these spontaneous re-unions originated the body called the "Company of Pastors," which continued at the head of the church of Neufchatel down to 1848, governing the Church completely, independently of the State, and maintaining with great fidelity the preaching of the pure gospel. For the material sustenance of the church a fund was provided, formed partly from old-church property, partly from private contributions. But in 1848 the revolution which dissolved the relation in which the State of Neufchatel had stood to Prussia since 1707, also overthrew the ecclesiastical sovereignty of the Company of Pastors. From the negotiations between that body and the new authorities resulted a re-organization of the church, according to which its administration was confided to a synod, composed of ecclesiastics and laymen chosen by the forty churches of the country. The synod also appointed the professors of theology, without any interference from the side of the State. The former church-property was absorbed by the State treasury, which then was charged with the payment of the ecclesiastical officers.

Under this constitution the church lived in peace until about 1865. At that time a number of freethinkers who had acquired great influence in the circles of the government, and who felt irritated at the orthodoxy reigning in the church, resolved to burst the stubborn dogmatic unity. To that end they invited some anti-evangelical preachers from France and Holland, who publicly attacked the traditional faith. But, as the campaign did not lead to the result desired, other means were resorted to. A revision of the ecclesiastical law was decided upon in the Grand Council; and shortly after a new law was carried through that assembly by a majority of seven votes. According to Art. 4 of the new law, every citizen of the state is a member of the church by the mere fact of his birth, and has the right to vote. According to Arts. 6 and 12 every minister is eligible to an office in the church, if he only has a license to preach; and he cannot be bound in advance by any measure whatever, regulation, creed, etc. Art. 17 leaves the synod no authority outside of the administration; and an article added during the debate transfers the appointment of professors in theology from the synod to the council.

Under such circumstances, what should the pastors and the evangelical members of the church do? The question was discussed in a public assembly. Some thought that it was their duty to submit to the new law, though it was ruinous to the church, and live on under the deplorable constitution, waiting for better times. Others thought that the new establishment had nothing whatever in common with the church founded by Christ himself, and insisted upon the necessity of an organization independent of the State. As the case was one of individual conscience, no vote was taken; but on the very same day the adherents of the latter opinion assembled, and charged the members of the old synod who were present with taking the necessary measures for the organization of the new church. The professors of the theological faculty were invited to open their lectures at the ordinary term, and under the direction of the synod. Out of the forty parishes of the country, twenty-one groups of faithful were formed, which, with their pastors, declared in favor of forming the new church. The most numerous groups contained between five and six hundred voters; others, however, only about thirty. A synod was elected, consisting of all the pastors, and three laymen for each pastor. A new constitution was also drawn up, and submitted to the churches, which adopted it with a unanimous vote.

A synodical committee governs the church in the intervals between the sessions of the synod. The pastors are paid, not directly by their parishes, but from a central fund formed by voluntary gifts. The annual budget, comprising the maintenance of the theological faculty of four professors, amounts to about a hundred and ten thousand francs, each pastor being paid from twenty-five hundred to twenty-eight hundred francs a year. Thus in ten years somewhat more than a million francs has been voluntarily furnished by three thousand voting members. As the use of the church-buildings is by law guaranteed to all religious denominations, the independent congregations can use the buildings; and about one-half of them do so. But the others, having met with various impediments in the exercise of their right, have built their own places of worship, and spent for that purpose a sum which amounts to another million. These sacrifices, however, are not considered a burden by those who have undertaken to maintain a Christian church in their country; and, indeed, by those sacrifices they have preserved the preaching of the pure gospel, not only for themselves and their children, but also in the State church; for the government has felt compelled to give up the introduction of rationalism in the State establishment, feeling convinced that a number of pious persons who still cling to that institution would, in such a case, immediately enlist in the ranks of the independent church.

Thus, by giving to Cæsar what belongs to Cæsar, the faithful of the church of Neufchâtel have attempted to give to God what belongs to God, and to follow the same course as their ancestors in the sixteenth century, when they gave the representative of the political power the above-mentioned noble answer. See the Bulletins de Synodes, especially that of 1874, and G. GODET: La Question Ecclésiastique d. Neuchâtel, in the Revue Chrétienne, September, 1873-January, 1874. F. GODET.

NEVINS, William, D.D., a distinguished Presbyterian clergyman, the youngest of twelve children, b. in Norwich, Conn., Oct. 13, 1797; d. in Baltimore, Sept. 14, 1835. He embraced the gospel while his parents were as yet not members of the church. In his fourteenth year he entered a counting-room in New-York City. He afterwards entered Yale College, and, graduating in 1816, went to Princeton Seminary. In August, 1820, he accepted the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, Baltimore. He was greatly beloved as a pastor, and excelled as a preacher. He wrote articles in the New-York Observer, on Roman Catholicism, which were published in a volume, Thoughts on Popery, New York, 1836. A posthumous volume of Sermons appeared, New York, 1837. NEW-BRUNSWICK THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. The theological seminary of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America finds the beginning of its uninterrupted history in the election by the synod, in October, 1784, of Rev. Dr. John H. Livingston of New-York City (one of the pastors of the Collegiate Church) as professor of theology, and Rev. Dr. Hermanus Meyer of Pompton, N.J., as instructor in the "inspired languages." For more than a hundred and fifty years the Dutch churches in America had been subject to the classis of Amsterdam, and had no authority to educate and ordain ministers, but were supplied from Holland, or by Americans who were educated in the Dutch universities, and ordained by the classis of Amsterdam. In consenting, in 1771, to the independence of the American Church, the classis made it one of the conditions that measures should at once be taken for the appointment of teachers of theology; but no steps could be taken until after the Revolutionary War.

On the 19th of May, 1785, Dr. Livingston delivered his inaugural oration, in Latin, in the Old Dutch Church, in Garden Street, New-York City, and immediately began to receive students at his own house. Part of the time he taught at Flatbush, L.I., while his church generously relieved him from some of his pastoral duties, that he might give himself more fully to professorial work. Lectors in theology, residing in parts of the church remote from the city, were appointed by the synod, with whom young men studied with a view to a final examination by Professor Livingston for professorial certificates. At one time two additional professors of theology were appointed, who received students under their care in their own houses. In accordance with a covenant between the General Synod and the trustees of Queens (now Rutgers) College, Dr. Livingston became president of that institution, and removed to New Brunswick in 1810, and there opened his school. He had up to this time given professorial certificates to about ninety students. In 1812 the General Synod adopted a plan for the full organization and government of the school, and provided for the appointment of a board of superintendents. In 1815 a second professor was appointed, in 1825 a third, and in 1865 a fourth.

The General Synod has original cognizance of all matters relating to the theological school,—the appointment of professors and their course of instruction, the appointment of superintendents, and all regulations. A professor is elected by that body on a day subsequent to that on which nominations have been made, and by a vote of three-fourths of the members present; which vote must be obtained by the regular process of balloting, and without the setting-aside by resolution of any one who has been nominated. A professor must be a minister, and is directly amenable to the synod for his doctrine, mode of teaching, and moral conduct. He is required before his inauguration to sign a formula declaring his belief in the standards of doctrine,—which are the Heidelberg Catechism, the Belgic Confession, and the Canons of the Synod of Dort,—and promising to teach and defend the same. He also engages, that, if his views of doctrine should change, he will not teach his new views until he shall have frankly made them known to the synod, and also that he will be ready, if any suspicions are entertained of his doctrine, to make such explanations as may be required. By the present constitution of the church he is not allowed to hold a pastoral charge, nor sit as a member of classis, or of any ecclesiastical judicatory. Three months' notice of intention to resign must be given to the president of the synod, and on retiring from office he is to be dismissed to such ecclesiastical judicatory as he may elect.

To entitle any one to an examination for licensure by a classis, he must have a professorial certificate to the effect that he has completed the prescribed course and term of theological studies, and has passed an examination according to the regulations of the school, as established by the General Synod. In special cases, dispensations from these requirements are granted by the General Synod. The course of instruction is extended over three years. It has always been a principle of this church to require of those preparing for the ministry a course of study under her own professors of theology.

The buildings of the seminary are situated in the suburbs of New Brunswick, and on grounds given by James Neilson, D. Bishop, and C. P. Dayton. They comprise, (1) "Peter Hertzog Hall," erected with moneys given by Mrs. Anna Hertzog of Philadelphia, amounting to $30,700 (it contains studies, dormitories, dining-room, reading-room, etc); (2) "James Suydam Hall," the gift of the late James Suydam of New-York City, containing lecture-rooms, chapel, gymnasium, and room for the Society of Inquiry, and museum; (3) "Gardner A. Sage Library," a spacious, fire-proof building, the gift of the late Gardner A. Sage of New York; and (4) four dwelling-houses; a fifth being now in process of building. The institution is greatly indebted to Messrs. Suydam and Sage. Their united contributions reach nearly half a million of dollars. The former endowed, by a gift of $60,000, the professorship that bears his name: the latter has bequeathed $50,000 for the establishment of a fifth professorship. The Gardner A. Sage Library is a well-selected and valuable one, containing about 35,000 volumes. See Centennial of the Theological Seminary [of New Brunswick], N.Y., 1885. D. D. DEMAREST.

NEWCOMB, Harvey, b. at Thetford, Vt., Sept. 2, 1803; d. at Brooklyn, N.Y., Aug. 30, 1863. From 1818 to 1826 he taught school in Western New York; from 1826 to 1831 he was editor upon several journals; from the latter year, until 1840, wrote Sunday-school books; from 1840, till his death, Congregational minister in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania. He is said to have written a hundred and seventy-eight books; but most of them were children's books, and very few of them are now in print. By one book, however, he laid the religious public under heavy contribution,—A Cyclopaedia of Missions, New York, 1854, 2d rev. ed., fifth thousand, 1860. It remains the only comprehensive work of its kind, but sadly needs enlargement and revision to bring it down to date.

NEWCOME, William, D.D., Archbishop of Armagh; b. in Bedfordshire, Aug. 10, 1729; d. at Dublin, Jan. 11, 1800. He was graduated M.A. at Pembroke College, Oxford, 1753; took holy orders, and was appointed bishop of Dro-more, Ireland, 1766; transferred to Ossory 1775, to Waterford 1779, and to the archbishopric of Armagh. He was the author or editor of several important and valuable works.—An Harmony of the Gospels [in Greek], Dublin, 1778, based upon Le Clerc, new eds., with Eng. trans. of text, London, 1802 and 1827; An historical view of the English Biblical translations; the expediency of revising, by authority, our present translation, and the means of executing such a revision, [with] a list of the various editions of the Bible and parts thereof, in English, from the year 1526 to 1776. Dublin, 1792. He himself published revised translations, with notes, of the twelve Minor Prophets (Dublin, 1785), Ezekiel (1788), and of the New Testament, printed 1796, but not published until 1809, 2 vols. (taken as the basis of the Unitarian Version, London, 1808).

NEWELL, Harriet, one of the most attractive female characters who have given their lives to missionary labors among the heathen; a daughter of Moses Atwood; b. at Haverhill, Mass., Oct. 10, 1793; d. on the Isle of France, Nov. 30, 1812. She early displayed a pious disposition, and interest in missions; was married in 1812 to the Rev. Samuel Newell, and with him sailed for Calcutta on Feb. 19, 1812. Not being allowed to remain at Calcutta, they sailed for Mauritius, and from there to the Isle of France. A daughter born on the journey died, and was buried at sea. Rapid consumption soon set in, and carried the mother off likewise. "She is interred in a retired spot in the burying-ground in Port Louis, under the shadow of an evergreen." Mrs. Newell's early death, at the age of nineteen, aroused wide sympathy, and did more, by the interest it stimulated, for missions, than, perhaps, a long life would have accomplished. Her Memoirs were published by SAMUEL NEWELL; and a Life was written by Dr. LEONARD WOODS, to which her Letters were appended and the Memorial Sermon of Dr. Woods. The latter work had a very large circulation.

NEWELL, Samuel, one of the first band of American missionaries to foreign lands; b. on a farm at Durham, Me., July 24, 1784; d. in Bombay, India, March 30, 1821. Left an orphan at the age of ten, he went four years later to Boston, and secured a place in a family; but an interest in books led him to prepare for college, the means being furnished by his employer and some other friends. He graduated at Harvard in 1807, and went to Andover Seminary in 1809. Mr. Newell was one of the four students who presented the petition which contributed so much to the formation of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. In 1812 he married Harriet Atwood of Haverhill (see HARRIET NEWELL); on Feb. 6 was ordained at Salem with Judson, Nott, Rice, and Gordon Hall, and on the 19th sailed with Judson for Calcutta. Not being permitted to embark, he went to the Isle of France; and in January, 1814, he joined Hall and Nott at Bombay. He married, a second time, Miss Thurston, in 1818. He died of the cholera. Mr. Newell published, with the help of Hall, The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions (Andover, 1818), which aroused much interest; and a biography of Harriet Newell.

NEW-ENGLAND THEOLOGY. NAMES AND GENESIS. — This system has been adopted by a larger number of divines out of New England than in it, but it derives its name from the fact that the men who initiated the system were New-Englanders. One impulse moving them to the initiation of it was given by the fact that they were not secluded students, but were pastors and preachers; and, as they were high Calvinists in many of their views, they aimed to present these views in a practical way, — a way fitted to awaken the conscience, and to persuade the will, of their hearers. Another impulse was given by the fact that they deemed the system to be necessary for reconciling apparently discordant passages of the Bible. They were led into their views of scientific theology by their views of the inspired Word.

In the beginning they announced a few principles, which were called "New-Light Divinity," or "New Divinity." When a few more principles were added to their system, it was called "Hopkintonian," or "Hopkinsian." As Edwards, Hopkins, West, resided in Berkshire County, Mass., their system was called "Berkshire Divinity." When some of its tenets were advocated by Andrew Fuller, Robert Hall, and other British divines, it was called "American Theology." It has also been distinguished as "Edwardean." This epithet was not first suggested, but its use has been furthered, by the Remarks of Dr. Jonathan Edwards on the Improvements made in Theology by his Father, President Edwards. (See Works of Jonathan Edwards, D.D., vol. i., pp. 481-492.) These remarks detail the improvements made, not only by the president himself, but also by his "disciples" and "followers." These "disciples" and "followers" have regarded themselves as advancing along the line marked out by the president, and have regarded their system as the outgrowth of germs lying embedded in his writings. They have differed among themselves in relation to the premises laid down by the president, and also in relation to the conclusions derivable from those premises. Some of these divines, for one reason, and some for another, would reject some of the principles which are said in this article to characterize the New England theology. At the present day, however, a majority of the divines who defend the system, and a majority of those who oppose it, would probably recognize the following tenets as belonging to it.

THE NATURE OF HOLINESS AND SIN. — Holiness, or true virtue, is the choice of the greater and higher, rather than of the smaller and lower, good of sentient being. It is voluntary and impartial benevolence. Sin is the choice of the smaller and lower, rather than of the greater and higher, good of sentient being. It is the elective preference for self or the world above God. Holiness and sin, then, are not passive states, but they are acts of the will. They are free acts, and imply that the agent's power to render obedience, and avoid disobedience, to the moral law, is commensurate with his obligation to render the one, and to avoid the other. They constitute moral agency; and this consists in the agent's choosing the right when he had the natural ability to choose the right instead of the right; or else, in his choosing the wrong when he had the natural ability to choose the right instead of the wrong. By natural ability is meant power in its literal sense. This idea of power is a simple one, and is expressed without qualification when a moral agent is defined to be an agent who does or can choose either holiness or sin.

It is evident, that, according to the preceding definition of holiness, the moral attributes of God are all comprehended in general benevolence. Distributive justice is one of his fundamental attributes, but this is one form of an elective preference for the general well-being. The original advocates of New-England theology gave an unusual prominence to the doctrines of divine sovereignty, predestination, and eternal punishment. In giving this proportion to this part of Calvinism they were penetrated with the conviction that all the acts of God, even those which appear to be the sternest, are forms of infinite benevolence, are reducible to a choice of the greatest and highest good of universal being, — not of the created universe alone, but of the uncreated also.

THE WILL AND THE NATURAL SENSIBILITIES. — When the New-England theologians insist that all moral character lies in the will, in choice, they do not define the will in the manner adopted by the recent philosophers of Europe. They do not admit that the will is the faculty of merely intending, purposing, resolving, determining, putting forth an exertion ab extra. These acts presuppose a choice distinct from them. They follow the choice in the order of nature, if not of time. The will is the faculty of choosing, — of choosing to perform executive acts, and also of choosing objects other than its own future acts. The process of choosing is unique, different from an exertive process, also from a constitutional emotion.

The earlier New-England divines made the distinction, but did not make it sharp enough nor clear enough, between the will and the sensibility. They did not anticipate the nomenclature of modern times. Often, if not commonly, they speak of moral character as inhering in the "heart," the "affections," the "temper." They speak of "desires" as belonging to the will: still they distinguish between these exercises and the "natural feelings." They repeat and reiterate, especially in their sermons and practical writings, that no moral quality belongs to the "natural feelings," "animal affections." Their idea of "natural" or "animal feeling or affection" was the same with our idea of constitutional sensibility. Dr. Jonathan Edwards distinguishes between the "sensitive faculties" and the "heart and affections." Where the heart and affections are regarded as constitutional sensibilities, they are distinguished by the epithet "natural," "animal," "involuntary." The want of a precise nomenclature, however, occasions much ambiguity in the style of the elder Edwards and his immediate disciples.

THE UNION OF MAN'S FREE ACTIVITY WITH HIS CONSTANT DEPENDENCE. — Not without the common influence, but without the supernatural influence of God, a man has, in the proper sense of the word, the power to repent of his sin; but it is infallibly certain that he never will use this power in repenting. His natural ability does not lessen his dependence on the special interposition of the Holy Spirit for any, even the smallest, degree of holiness. Without that interposition, he has not the moral power to choose the right; that is, he certainly never will choose the right. In the proper sense of the word, natural power is the only kind of power; but, in the technical or figurative sense, the infallible certainty that an agent will act in one way is his moral power to act in that way, and the infallible certainty that he will not act in one way is his moral impotence to act in that way. The New-England divines guarded their system against Pelagianism by emphasizing the distinction between an agent's literal ability to do right and any degree of probability that he will do right. They gave a marked prominence to the truth, that, while an unrenewed man does not choose the wrong inevitably, yet he does so infallibly; that is, while left to himself, he will certainly choose the wrong, although he has the literal power to choose the right. For every holy choice which he puts forth, he is constantly dependent on the sovereign, the special, or supernatural interposition of divine grace. These theologians were also careful to emphasize the distinction between the natural power of a regenerate man to apostatize from the faith, and any degree of probability that he will apostatize. He has the ability to fall away finally and forever from his "new obedience;" but it is infallibly certain that he will not fall away. He will be kept from falling by the same supernatural power which kept him from continued sin. Thus, in the renewal of sinners and in the perseverance of saints, there is a combination of the divine and the human activity, the divine preceding the human logically, if not chronologically.

TOTAL DEPRAVITY AND ORIGINAL SIN. — All the moral acts of the unrenewed man are entirely devoid of holiness, and are sinful on the whole. The fact of his entire sinfulness is occasioned by the disordered or corrupt state of his nature. "I believe — that by nature every man is personally depraved, destitute of holiness, unlike and opposed to God; and that, previously to the renewing agency of the Divine Spirit, all his moral actions are adverse to the character and glory of God." (Andover Creed.) As his sinfulness is occasioned by nature, so his corrupt nature is a consequence of Adam's apostasy. The sin of Adam is not "transferred," is not literally "imputed" to us: we are not punished for it, although, on account of it, we suffer evils which represent God's abhorrence of sin, and signify his determination to inflict the legal penalty upon those who persevere in committing it. We, however, do not suffer a legal penalty for any sin which does not consist in our own free choice. Still, the first sin of Adam has brought us into such a state that we do commit sin as soon as we put forth a moral choice. Some of the New-England divines affirm that infants commit sin as soon as they are born, and this is native depravity: others affirm that infants commit sin, not as soon as they are born, but as soon as they can, and this is natural depravity. The term "original sin" is not a favorite one with the New-England theologians. It is entirely disapproved by one class of them, and is variously defined by other classes. Some of them make an attempt to accommodate their definition to that of the older Calvinists, and say that original sin is such a disorder or corruption of our nature as results in our actual sin, and results from the first sin of Adam. This first sin of Adam is thus the origin of our evil nature. This evil nature exists at the origin of our personal existence: it is itself the origin of our entire sinfulness.

REGENERATION. — According to all advocates of New-England theology, regeneration is a change occasioned or produced by the special or supernatural interposition of the Holy Spirit. According to one class of these divines, it is the change of the sinner's volition from sin to holiness. According to a second class, it is the change of his nature, and precedes the change of his volition,—the latter being distinguished by the term "conversion." According to a third class, it is the change of both his nature and his volition,—the two being inseparable in the logical, if not the chronological order.

On this general topic, more, perhaps, than on any other, has been illustrated the practical character of New-England theology. Many, but not all, of its more eminent advocates, have maintained that unrenewed men should be exhorted to no act which does not involve true holiness. The unrenewed, as really as the renewed, have natural power to choose the right; their conscience requires them to choose the right; before choosing the right, every choice exercised by them is sinful; they should be exhorted, not to perform any sinful act, but at once to make for themselves "a new heart." This theory of preaching awakened one of the earliest, as well as most prolonged and warmest, controversies in regard to the "New Divinity."

THE SOVEREIGNTY AND THE DECREES OF GOD.—Men have objected to the New-England system, that it is ethical and anthropological, rather than theological. The reverse is true. Its primary and signal aim has been to exalt God as a sovereign, and to glorify the eternal plan on which he governs the universe. He is a sovereign; that is, he does what he chooses to do, because his choice is infinite benevolence, securing the greatest and highest well being of the universe. "I moreover believe that God, according to the counsel of his own will, and for his own glory, hath fore-ordained whatsoever comes to pass, and that all beings, actions, and events, both in the natural and moral world, are under his providential direction; that God's decrees perfectly consist with human liberty; God's universal agency, with the agency of man; and man's dependence, with his accountability" (Andover Creed). Two lines of truth, both parallel with each other, run through the doctrine of decrees, as well as other doctrines, such as regeneration or conversion, saints' perseverance, etc. On the one hand is the agency of God, and our dependence upon it; on the other hand is the free agency of man, and the divine recognition of it. His decrees are his intentions to perform certain acts. Primarily they have regard to what he does himself; secondarily, to what his creatures do. The moral acts of men result certainly, but not inevitably, from the providential acts of God; and these result from the decrees, which, in his infinite benevolence, he formed in eternity, and executes in time. In executing his decrees he leaves all moral agents just as free as they would be if there were no decrees referring secondarily to them.

OPTIMISM.—The created universe is, on the whole, the best which could have been created. It is the best, viewed comprehensively, viewed in all its relations to the Creator and the creature. Although the Creator had the natural power to prevent all sin in his creatures, yet he could not prevent it wisely, could not prevent it in the best system, could not prevent it consistently with the greatest and highest good of the universal being. This statement is sanctioned explicitly by one class of the New-England divines; by another class it is admitted to be a logical sequence from the premises of Edwards; by a third class it is deemed either false or doubtful.

THE ATONEMENT.—The sufferings, and especially the death, of Christ, were sacrificial; were not the punishment of the law, but were equivalent in meaning to it; were representative of it, and substituted for it. The demands of the law were not satisfied by it; but the honor of the law was promoted by it as much as this honor would have been promoted by inflicting the legal penalty on the elect. The distributive justice of God was not satisfied by it, but his general justice was satisfied perfectly. The active obedience, viewed as the holiness, of Christ, was not a work of supererogation performed by our Substitute, and then "transferred" or "imputed" to us. The atonement rendered it consistent and desirable for God to save all who exercise evangelical faith; yet it did not render it obligatory on him, in distributive justice, to save them. It was designed, for the welfare of all men, to make the eternal salvation of all men possible, to remove all the obstacles which the honor of the law and of distributive justice presented against the salvation of the non-elect as well as the elect. The atonement does not constitute the reason why some men are regenerated, and others not; but this reason is found only in the sovereign, electing will of God. The atonement is useful on men's account, and in order to furnish new motives to holiness; but it is necessary on God's account, and in order to enable him, as a consistent Ruler, to pardon any, even the smallest, sin, and therefore to bestow on sinners any, even the smallest, favor.

VARYING TENDENCIES, OR SHADES, OF NEW-ENGLAND THEOLOGY. 1. The Hopkinsian System.—This is largely incorporated into the present New-England system. It is distinguished, however, by giving a greater prominence than the New-England divines now give to the doctrines of divine sovereignty and decrees, to election and reprobation; also in giving a smaller prominence to the doctrines of natural ability, the nature of the will as distinct from the sensibilities; also in insisting upon the duty of every impenitent sinner to be willing to suffer the punishment which he deserves, and which will be inflicted upon him, if he dies, as he now lives, in his sins. See Dr. Stephen West's Sketches of the Life of the Late Samuel Hopkins.

2. The System of Dr. Emmons.—This is distinguished by its peculiar use of terms. The terminology of Emmons has led to various misconceptions of his meaning. He did not believe that any moral quality belongs to the soul apart from its exercises; neither did he believe that any moral quality belongs to the exercises of the soul apart from the soul itself. His belief was, that all moral quality belongs to the soul acting, to the man himself choosing. He preferred not to speak of the nature of the soul as separable from its exercises, and he never meant to speak of the exercises of the soul as separate from its nature. In conversation he said: "I cannot form any conception of the soul's substratum as existing passively, and as having a moral character. The cessation of the soul's activity is the cessation of its existence." He used the term "efficient" cause as synonymous with "independent" cause, but never maintained that God is the efficient cause of human actions in any sense which implies that men are forced or compelled to act as they do. He believed that justification on the ground of Christ's atonement consists in God's treating believers as forgiven, and not as positively righteous. He believed that at every single moment the renewed man is either perfectly holy or perfectly sinful, but that he does not remain perfectly holy for any considerable time in this life.

3. The "Taste" Scheme.—As Emmons believed that all moral character inheres in "exercises," some of his opponents adopted the theory that all moral character inheres in the "taste." The most noted advocate of this scheme was Rev. Asa Burton, D.D., a pupil of Dr. Levi Hart, who was a favorite pupil and son-in-law of Dr. Bellamy. Dr. Burton instructed not less than sixty theological students, and published, besides various pamphlets, an octavo volume, entitled Essays on Some of the First Principles of Metaphysics, Ethics, and Theology, 1824. When he taught that all moral character lies in the moral "taste," he meant the sensibility as distinct from the will. When he taught that all moral character lies in the moral "appetites," he meant the processes of the sensibility as distinct from the acts of the will. He believed in the natural inability of the unregenerate to cease from sin, and repudiated the distinction between natural and moral power. He believed that the divine will is the foundation of virtue. He agreed with some, but radically differed from other, New-England theologians, in maintaining that "holiness is not an absolute good;" that "happiness is the only absolute good;" and he asks, "Of what value is the universe, however holy, if there be no happiness?"—The "Taste Scheme" of Dr. Burton was ably defended by Judge Nathaniel Niles, a distinguished pupil of Dr. Bellamy. (See Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit, vol. i., pp. 716-718.)

4. The System of Dr. Taylor.

"Dr. Nathaniel W. Taylor was professor of theology in Yale College from 1822 to 1858 (see TAYLOR, N. W.). Among the points of doctrine on which he insisted are the following. (1) The elective preference, in which character, good or evil, consists, though beginning in an act of choice, is a permanent voluntary state, 'a ruling purpose.' (2) Natural ability involves a continued 'power of contrary choice.' There is previous 'certainty, with power to the contrary,' in regard to moral choices. (3) 'Nature,' in the phrase, 'we are sinful by nature,' includes both the subjective native condition and the outward circumstances of human life,' which, as joint factors, give the certainty, but not necessity, of sin from the beginning of moral agency. (4) Regeneration is the change of the predominant elective preference from love 'to the world' to love to God. It is effected by influences of the Holy Spirit, which give the certainty, but not the necessity, of the effect. (5) The involuntary desire of happiness, or 'self-love,' is the subjective antecedent of all choices, whether good or evil. The excellence of virtue is its tendency to produce the greatest happiness of the universe. (6) Election is founded in benevolence, which, guided by wisdom, so dispenses grace as to insure the best results. (7) Sin is not 'the necessary means of the greatest good,' since it is avoidable by the creature, and is not so good as holiness in its stead, but may not be preventible by the act of God in the best system."—Professor George P. Fisher, D.D.

5. System of Professor Charles G. Finney.—The main distinction between this system and the New-England theology has been stated thus:—

"As virtue and sin belong only to voluntary action and are contradictory in their nature, they cannot co-exist in the soul. The beginning of the Christian life is entire obedience. Every lapse into sin involves, for the time, the entire interruption of obedience. The promises of God and the provisions of the gospel are such, that, when fully and continuously embraced, they enable the believer to live a life of uninterrupted obedience,—an attainment which may be properly encouraged and expected in the present life."—President James H. Fairchild. (See Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. xxxiv. pp. 708-741.)

NEW-JERUSALEM CHURCH, a religious body which holds to the doctrines disclosed in the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg. The first meeting for the organization of this body was held in London in 1783, eleven years after the death of Swedenborg, and consisted of five persons. The next year the doctrines were introduced into America in a course of lectures delivered in Philadelphia by William Glenn. From these small beginnings the church has slowly but steadily increased to the present time (1883), when there are societies belonging to it in most parts of the civilized world. Its members are the most numerous in England and in America. The British Conference of the New Church is composed of sixty-five societies. There are societies in France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, Norway, and Sweden, which are centres for the propagation of the doctrines. There are also societies in Australia and South Africa. In America there are societies in the principal cities and in many of the smaller towns, where the doctrines are taught, worship is held, and the sacraments of Baptism and the Holy Supper are administered. There is no uniform system of church organization, though the tendency is towards the Episcopal. Every society is left in freedom to manage its own affairs. In England the General Conference is composed of societies. In America there is a General Convention, meeting annually, composed of eleven associations and six societies. The associations are generally divided by State lines, and comprise about a hundred societies. There are also some societies which are not comprised in any general body. The number of members is not accurately known. There are many, in all churches and out of them, who are more or less acquainted with the doctrines, and believe them to be the laws of spiritual life.

This body is not regarded by those who compose it as a sect of the Christian Church, differing from it only by some special points of doctrine, as the various sects differ from one another: they believe the doctrines to be a New Dispensation of divine truth, and to constitute a distinct step in spiritual knowledge, which will lead to a new and higher spiritual life. They regard them as a spiritual science which solves the problems of theology, reconciles its contradiction, elevates the mind into a higher sphere of knowledge, and meets all man's spiritual wants. They may be briefly stated as follows:—

1. The doctrines of the New Church teach that God is one in essence and person. He is one Divine Being, as man is one human being. This unity extends to His nature, as well as to His person. There are no conflicting elements in it. God is love. This implies much more than that He fervently loves. Love is the essence and substance of His nature. Wisdom is the form which His love assumes in going forth into creative act, and they are inseparably united in Him. He can act from no other motive than love, and in no other way than an infinitely wise one.

2. In this one Divine Person is embodied the Trinity. The Father, or Jehovah, is God, as He is in Himself, who is above all human consciousness; the Son is the human organization with which Jehovah clothed Himself for the purpose of saving men, and by means of which He came into the world; the Holy Spirit is the divine power modified by the Divine Humanity, and by means of it flowing forth into act, as man's spirit operates by his body. The Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, is embodied in the one person of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the finite trinity of soul, body, and power, is embodied in every human being.

3. This one Divine Person is the only being who is life. Life cannot be created: only forms can be created capable of receiving it. All created beings are such forms, and their life is received by constant influx from the Lord. Man's mind, as well as body, is therefore only an organic form capable of receiving life; and all his moral and intellectual power is a constant gift from the Lord. This fact determines all man's relations to the Lord, limits and qualifies all that the Lord can do for him. It implies an inherent, essential, and constant conjunction between man and the Lord, which determines the measure and quality of his life.

4. The human mind or spirit is a spiritual body in the human form, organized by the divine life for its reception and manifestation in human consciousness. This spiritual body is organized with perfect relation to the nature and flow of the divine forces which create and sustain it, as the material body is organized, and adapted to all the material forces which constantly act upon it. So long as the will and understanding, which are the inmost organic forms of the human mind, remain in the order of their creation, all man's affections, thoughts, and actions are in complete union with the divine life. All his faculties act in perfect harmony, and he is filled with light and happiness according to his capacity of receiving the divine life. This was man's state before the fall, and will be again when he becomes regenerate.

5. Life is so given to man that it seems to be his own. This is of the divine love, that man may act in freedom. This enables him to love and think and act in every respect as though he were an independent being. He is as free to act within the limits of his power as the Lord Himself. But still it is necessary to the integrity of his nature, that he should live in acknowledgment of his dependence upon the Lord, constantly turn to Him, and reciprocate His love. Hence arose the possibility of his fall. As life seemed to be his own, he was gradually allured by the appearance to claim it as his own. He was seduced by the senses represented by the serpent, first as to his affections represented by the woman; and then as to the understanding represented by the man; and he became in his own estimation, as God, knowing good and evil. Being a form receptive of life, his declension, which continued through many generations, consisted in the gradual closure of the higher planes of his nature against influx from the Lord, until he lived only in the merely natural plane of his faculties. This was spiritual death caused by the exclusion of life. Man lost his knowledge of God and of his spiritual nature and destiny. His whole organism became perverted, and his union with the source of his life so broken and deranged, that the Lord could only reach him by an outward way. His nature became wholly evil. The Lord never ceased to do all in His power for man during his fall. He appeared to him in the form of an angel. He gave him the Law, which contains the essential principles of spiritual life, and arranged a representative worship, which was the highest of which he was capable; and by those natural, outward means He still retained some hold upon him. But, by the accumulation of hereditary evil, man was fast closing every faculty of his nature against the Lord, and approaching the brink of destruction. Then, in the fulness of time, Jehovah took upon Himself man's nature in the way of His own order, and stood face to face with him on the plane of the senses, in a form which he could appreciate. In that way He gained recognition, and got a foothold in human history. But Jehovah was not changed into a babe. He did not divest Himself of any power. He simply clothed His divine with a human organism, and made that a medium of bringing His divine power to bear upon man. In this way He could remove obstructions to the influx of life, and, as man received it, He could conform him to Himself. The necessity for this coming lay in man's dying condition, and not in any legal difficulties.

6. The human organism which Jehovah took upon Himself was a disorderly and perverted one. It could be tempted. It was subject to all the laws of the human mind. It could learn, and increase in wisdom. It had a consciousness distinct from the divine which it clothed, and this gave rise to all those expressions which seem to indicate that Jesus Christ was a distinct person from Jehovah. But, by the constant action upon it of the divine within, the imperfect organism received by incarnation was gradually put off, and replaced by a corresponding divine nature, by a process which is called by the Lord "glorification." The Lord's real death was the laying-down of this evil life, and not the crucifixion of the material body. By this process of glorification, He ascended to the Father; that is, made his human nature one with His divine nature. In this glorified human nature He now dwells, and by means of it He exerts a more direct control over man. He can re-open the higher degrees of his mind, and keep him within the sphere of His divine influence. In this way He saved man from spiritual death, and renewed the broken covenant between the source of life and its recipients. The work of Redemption was consequently performed by one Being, in one person, according to the immutable laws of the divine order.

7. The spirit is the man himself clothed with a material body. The spirit is in the human form, organized of spiritual substances, and possesses all the organs, in general and particular, of the material body. It gives form and life to the body, which is merely an instrument the spirit uses to dwell in a material world, and gain material ideas, which are to serve as a basis and means for the development of man's spiritual faculties. The material body bears the same relation to the spiritual body that the husk does to the corn, and performs the same relative use. It serves only a temporary purpose. If man had never sinned, and disease had never attacked the material body, the real man would have cast it off when it had fulfilled its purpose. The death of the body is an orderly step in man's life, though, since sin entered the world, it is taken in a disorderly way. The death of the body is caused by the resurrection of man from it. As all its life was derived from the spirit, when that departs, it has no more power than the elements which compose it. By the death of the body, man is born into the spiritual world. His spiritual senses are opened, and he becomes conscious of spiritual objects, according to the same law that the material senses are opened by birth into this world.

8. The spiritual world is a substantial world in the true meaning of the word. It is composed of every class, degree, and form of substances and objects which are found in the three kingdoms of nature, and many besides, which cannot be formed out of the gross elements of matter. The spiritual world is the realm of causes; and the material universe, like the material body, is cast into the mould of spiritual forms. Spiritual substances, though they have form and hold relations to one another, are not material, and have nothing but form and external appearance in common with material objects. They are not created in the same way, or subject to the laws of fixed time and space. The spiritual world has three grand divisions, heaven, the world of spirits, and hell. The world of spirits is intermediate between heaven and hell. This is the world which all enter immediately after the death of the body, and where they are prepared for heaven or hell, according to their characters. It is a place of instruction, but not of probation, where every one who will receive it is taught the truth, and led into a heavenly life. It is also a state in which the spiritual faculties, freed from the incumbrance of the material body, are brought under more potent spiritual forces, which develop the ruling love with great rapidity. Every one is left in perfect freedom to go where he pleases, and to form such associates as he chooses, though every aid is given to lead all to heaven by means of the truth. Here parents and children, husbands and wives and friends meet, and for a while live a life similar to that which they lived on the earth. But the scene gradually changes. Those who are not of homogeneous natures separate; and each one goes his own way, and joins himself with those to whom he is akin by nature. All pretence and disguises are thrown off. Every thing which is not in accordance with the ruling love is discarded; and the speech, the actions, and even the form itself, become the perfect embodiment and expression of the character. When the external becomes homogeneous with the internal, the man or woman rises to heaven, or sinks to hell, drawn by the irresistible affinities of his nature, and becomes incorporated into a society of similar character, where he remains forever. In this way, by orderly processes, in which every one is led in freedom, his judgment is effected. Every one goes where he chooses, where he can be the least miserable, or the most happy. All children and youth, and all of every age and every religion, who have not become the organized and fixed forms of evil, are instructed, and led to heaven.

9. Hell is not a state of constant punishment and suffering. Its inhabitants live in societies, where they can render to one another such services as their necessities demand. They have all the enjoyments they are capable of receiving. But as their ruling motives of life are love of self, and hatred to others, they cannot act from any affection without doing injury to others; and this always brings punishment, according to the same law which we see in universal operation in this life. When a man violates a law of his physical nature, he suffers from it. The penalty is inseparably connected with the broken law. By the action of these immutable principles the wicked are kept under constant restraint. They are not tormented by conscience, for they have none. The worm that never dies, and the fire that is never quenched, are their insane desires to subject all others to their power and their revengeful passions, which can only be repressed by suffering. In time their lusts become less active, though they are never destroyed. They submit to enforced order, become stupid, and lose all semblance of humanity.

10. On the contrary, all those in whom the love of the Lord and the neighbor has become the ruling motive of life are led by spiritual attractions to the society in heaven to which they specifically belong, and there they are welcomed by all: they find their home and the most ample field for the exercise of every faculty and the gratification of every pure desire. They find their place and their special function, and their happiness in the exercise of it. Heaven is not a state of idleness, but of glowing activities. Its rest is not repose after labor, but the free play of all the faculties. As every one is animated by love of others, each one is helped by all: as all the organic forms of their nature are in harmony with the divine forces which give them their life, they are constantly perfected. The perceptions grow keener, the understanding larger, the affections deeper and more varied and exquisite, and

11. The spiritual world being the substantial home of every human being, the Sacred Scriptures were given to man to reveal to him its laws and the principles of the divine government. They are also given according to the relation between natural and spiritual things. All material objects, natural actions, and events, are the effects of spiritual causes; and the spiritual causes are the laws of the divine order, and the embodiment of the divine character and purposes. Every natural object is consequently an exponent of some spiritual law or fact. When man had sunk into a condition which rendered it necessary that divine truth should be communicated to him by an outward way, the Lord employed those objects, relations, and human actions, which were the exponents of the truths He desired to communicate, because they were the effects of those truths, and performed the same uses on the material plane that the truths and affections serve on the spiritual plane. Every natural object and act recorded in the Word corresponds to and represents some spiritual principle or fact. While the Word in the letter is written according to the laws of human language, and treats of natural events, every sentence and word has a spiritual meaning which the natural idea represents; and this spiritual meaning is connected in the most logical manner throughout, from the beginning to the end, according to the harmonies of the Lord's nature, and the order and methods of His work. The Bible is consequently a Divine Book, written in a style impossible to a finite mind. The Lord Himself is its author; and Moses and David, the prophets and apostles, were only instruments in His hands in writing it, as the pen is an instrument in the human hand. Their minds were used, and consequently every one wrote in his own style, but stated the divine truths in correspondent natural forms. From the divine style in which the Word is written, it is adapted to all the wants of every human being in all worlds.

12. The most important service which Swedenborg has rendered to the world consists in the disclosures he has made concerning the spiritual sense of the Word and the divine method of its composition. By the opening of his spiritual senses he was admitted into the spiritual world, introduced into the societies of spirits and angels, was instructed in the laws of spiritual life; and, from his own experience of what he saw and heard, he has made known to men the nature and the reality of human life beyond the grave. His natural senses were not closed while he was in this state: he was consciously in both worlds at the same time, and could see their relations to each other. He could see the correspondence between natural and spiritual things, and was able to reveal the spiritual meaning of the Word. This opening of the genuine meaning of the Word is the means by which the Lord effects His Second Coming. He comes in the power and glory of the spiritual truths revealed to men in the writings of Swedenborg, and derived from the Word. In these truths He is effecting a more powerful influx of life into the minds of men, moving them to greater activity, and conjoining them more

The works of Swedenborg devoted to the exposition of the spiritual sense of the Word are Arcana Cœlestia, in 12 vols. octavo, The Apocalypse Explained, in 6 vols., and The Apocalypse Revealed, in 2 vols. In these works the spiritual meaning of every word in Genesis, Exodus, and the Revelation, is given, and the interpretation demonstrated by similar passages in other parts of the Word. The most important doctrinal works by Swedenborg are Angelic Wisdom concerning Divine Love and Wisdom, Angelic Wisdom concerning the Divine Providence, Heaven and Hell, Conjugal Love, and The True Christian Religion, containing the Universal Theology of the New Church. The collateral works are numerous, and constantly increasing. Among the most important are NOBLE'S Appeal and Plenary Inspiration, BARRETT'S Lectures on the New Dispensation, BAYLEY'S The Divine Word opened, BRUCE'S Commentaries on the Gospels of Matthew and John, CLISSOLD'S Practical Nature of Swedenborg's Theological Writings, Illustrations of the End of the Church, CLOWES'S Four Gospels, GILES'S Nature of Spirit, GOULD'S Swedenborg and Modern Biblical Criticism, GRINDON'S Life, its Nature, Varieties, and Phenomena, HAYDEN'S Light on the Last Things, Dangers of Modern Spiritualism, HINDMARSH'S Rise and Progress of the New Church, HOLCOMBE'S Our Children in the Other Life, The Lost Truths of Christianity, The End of the World, HENRY JAMES'S Secret of Swedenborg, PARSON'S Essays, Three Series, Deus Homo, The Infinite and the Finite, RENDELL'S Antediluvian History, The Last Judgment and Second Coming of the Lord, SILVER'S The Symbolic Character of the Sacred Scriptures, The Holy Word in its own Defence, TAFEL'S Documents concerning Swedenborg, WILKINSON'S Human Body in its Relation to Man, On Human Science and Divine Revelation. The most important biographies of Swedenborg are, Emanuel Swedenborg, his Life and Writings, by WILLIAM WHITE, Swedenborg, a Biography, by JAMES JOHN GARTH WILKINSON, HOBART'S Life of Swedenborg, and WORCESTER'S Life of Swedenborg. Swedenborg's theological works have been wholly or in part translated into English, French, German, Swedish, and Italian. There are three weekly, five monthly journals, and one quarterly published, in advocacy and exposition of the principles of the New Church; six in America, two in England, one in German, and one in Italian.

NEWTON, Sir Isaac, b. at Woolthorpe, Lincolnshire, Eng., Dec. 25, 1642; d. in London, March 20, 1727. He was a posthumous child, and of very feeble health; but he early evinced great passion and great talents for the study of mathematics and mechanics. In 1660 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1665 he took his degree as B.A. In 1667 he became a fellow, and in 1669 he succeeded Dr. Barrow as Lucasian professor of mathematics. In 1695 he was appointed warden of the mint, and in 1699, master; which position he filled with great ability, though his health again became very poor in the last years of his life. The magnificent discoveries, mathematical and physical, by which he entirely changed the reigning conception of the world, he seems to have made at quite an early period of his life. But he was slow in publishing. His Philosophiæ naturalis Principia mathematica was not given to the world until 1687, and his Analysis per Equationes numero terminorum Infinitas not until 1711. The Cartesian vortex was at that time the commonly accepted scientific theory of the world; and, though not without difficulties, it had been explained into harmony with the views of the theologians. But this theory was completely wiped out of existence by Newton's theory of gravitation; and thus a collision with the theologians became unavoidable, the more so as Newton's whole method was an open protest against the method of scholasticism. Observation and experience were the only scientific basis he acknowledged. Metaphysics he abhorred; hypothesis he despised. No wonder, that, under such circumstances, he found one of his most zealous and most effective disciples in Voltaire. In England, however, the collision was not so very fierce. Newton's ideas were incorporated with the official system of teaching at Cambridge in 1699, at Oxford in 1704. Personally he was not orthodox: he verged towards Arianism. But he was a pious man, and his great interest in the Bible and in Bible-studies he has shown by his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms amended (1728), Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St. John (1733), and A Historical Account of Two Notable Corruptions of Scripture, 1754. See BREWSTER: Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton, London, 1855, 2 vols.

NEWTON, John, b. in London, July 24, 1725; d. there Dec. 31, 1807. In early life, as a sailor (according to the account he gives in his autobiography), he ran a profligate course coupled with sad impiety, which led him to call himself, in his last days, the "old African blasphemer." In Africa he had to do with the slave-trade. But a wonderful change came over him between 1750 and 1754, accompanied by extraordinary circumstances, especially a dream he had, of a ring given to him, which he dropped into the sea, and which was restored by one who promised to keep it for him, — a beautiful parable, very interesting to thoroughly evangelical Christians. He decided on taking orders in the Church of England, and, after some difficulty, was ordained in 1764. He took a curacy at Olney in Buckinghamshire, a small town with which his name has since been identified; for there he became the intimate friend and adviser of the poet Cowper. The influence which he produced on him has led to controversy, and it has been thought that the companionship of the curate made his illustrious parishioner increasingly melancholy. But though his treatment might, in some things, be injudicious, there can be no doubt that Newton was an exceedingly cheerful man, and that his religion served to cheer his friend, rather than otherwise. After an exemplary course at Olney, Newton became rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, and lived to a great age, exercising a great influence in London and throughout the country, as well by his social habits as by his popular preaching.

He was the main pillar of the Evangelical party in the Church of England, and gathered round him at his simple re-unions in Hoxton, where he resided, Dissenting ministers as well as the Established clergy. He wrote a good deal; and, not to mention other publications included in the edition of his works (1816), his charming letters, entitled Omicron and Cardiphonia, deserve to be, as they are, favorites with the British public and with American Christians. His contributions to the Olney Hymns (348 in number, of which 67 were Cowper's) rank high in English psalmody, and are, some of them, exceedingly touching. The epitaph on his monument, prepared by himself, is very characteristic: "John Newton, clerk, once an infidel and libertine, a servant of slaves in Africa, was, by the rich mercy of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, preserved, restored, pardoned, and appointed to preach the faith he had long labored to destroy." JOHN STOUGHTON.

NEWTON, Robert, D.D., Wesleyan pulpit orator; b. at Roxby, Yorkshire, Sept. 8, 1780; d. April 30, 1854. He was received into the British Conference in 1799, and from that time on won reputation, and ultimately great fame, for his oratory. He was four times president of the British Conference, and in 1839 was sent as delegate to the Methodist-Episcopal Church of the United States. Everywhere he went, he was attended by crowds. The British and Foreign Bible Society and Foreign Missions were favorite themes. His Sermons was posthumously published, London, 1856; and his Life was written by Jackson, London, 1855.

NEWTON, Thomas, D.D., b. at Lichfield, Jan. 1, 1704; d. in London, Feb. 14, 1782. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge; and, after filling several charges in London, was in 1761 appointed bishop of Bristol, and in 1768 dean of St. Paul's. He edited the first critical edition of Milton's Poetical Works, London, 1749-52, 3 vols.; and (very popular) Dissertations on the Prophecies, which have been remarkably fulfilled, 1754-58, 3 vols., 10th ed., 1804, 2 vols. His Complete Works appeared 1783, 3 vols., with Memoir.

NEWTON THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTION is located on the summit of a beautiful hill in Newton Centre, Mass., about seven miles west of Boston. A more convenient, healthful, and attractive site for a theological seminary, it would be difficult to find in New England. The institution was founded in 1825, and is the oldest seminary established by American Baptists for the purpose of providing graduates from college with a suitable course of theological instruction, occupying three years.—a course beginning with the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, continuing with biblical theology and ecclesiastical history, and concluding with homiletics, pastoral duties, and church polity, but giving special prominence to biblical study. The privileges of the institution have also been offered, from the first, to candidates for the ministry whose education, however gained, was sufficient to enable them to take all the studies of the regular course in class-connection with graduates. Moreover, a few men, approved by the churches, have been received to a purely English course of two years, embracing such parts of the regular course as can be taken by one who does not read either Hebrew or Greek.

The work of the institution began in 1825, with a single professor, Rev. Irah Chase, D.D. In 1826 Rev. Henry J. Ripley, D.D., was associated with Dr. Chase; in 1834 Rev. James D. Knowles was added to the faculty; and in 1836 Rev. Barnas Sears, D.D. Professor Knowles died in 1838, after a short period of brilliant service; and in 1839 Rev. H. B. Hackett, D.D., was made professor of biblical literature and interpretation. All these were eminent scholars and teachers; and the institution, though financially weak, prospered under their care. From 1839 to 1846 the number of professors was four; from 1846 to 1868 it continued the same, with an assistant instructor in Hebrew; but since 1868 there have been five regular professors—one of them president—and a teacher of elocution.

The board of instruction is now (1882) constituted as follows: Rev. Alvah Hovey, D.D., LL.D., president, and professor of theology; Rev. Heman Lincoln, D.D., professor of church history; Rev. O. S. Stearns, D.D., professor of biblical interpretation, Old Testament; Rev. J. M. English, A.M., professor of homiletics, pastoral duties, and church polity; Rev. J. F. Moreton, A.M., professor, pro tempore, of biblical interpretation, New Testament; and Mr. L. A. Butterfield, Alva Woods Lecturer on Elocution. A Newton lectureship has recently been established by a friend of the institution, and it is expected that a sixth professor will soon be added to the faculty.

The institution has a well-selected library of about seventeen thousand volumes, and a commodious reading-room. The library, under the care of John B. Houser, is open to students six hours every day, except Sundays. It has the income of twelve thousand dollars for the purchase of books and reviews. To meet other expenses the institution has an endowment of more than three hundred thousand dollars, besides twenty-five scholarships of a thousand dollars each (and a bequest of ten more soon to be received) for the benefit of indigent students. It has four public buildings; viz., Colby Hall (containing chapel, reading-room, library, and president's room on the first floor, and three lecture-rooms, with a museum, on the second), Farwell Hall and Sturtevant Hall (which are heated by steam, and have rooms, comfortably furnished, for at least sixty-eight students), and a gymnasium.

About nine hundred students have been connected with the institution, though some of them have not taken the full course. Sixty-two have gone from it to be missionaries in foreign fields. Nearly as many have been made presidents or professors in colleges or theological seminaries, but most of its graduates have become pastors in America.

The institution is controlled by a board of forty-eight trustees, a part of them ministers, and a part laymen. It has had many liberal benefactors, of whom the late Gardner Colby of Newton Centre deserves honorable mention. ALVAH HOVEY.

NEW-YEAR'S CELEBRATION. The Calendæ Januariæ, that is Jan. 1, was celebrated in Rome, and, indeed, throughout the Roman Empire, as a feast of joy, just like the Saturnalia. The first day of the year should be a good omen for the whole year. In the forum, in the shops, and in the houses, business was begun early in the morning in the usual way, but only pro forma. The first stroke of work done, the year was considered as duly inaugurated, and people gave themselves up to merry-making. The houses were hung with wreaths and draperies; everybody gave his "Happy New-Year" to everybody else; and friends presented each other with sweetmeats and old coins, as omens of a year full of enjoyment and profit. In the public squares female dancers showed their art; and the crowd made merry with games, singing, jokes, and masqueradings of all kinds. Towards this Pagan custom, and all the follies and excesses to which it gave rise, Christianity assumed a decidedly hostile attitude; and the Fathers and teachers of the church took occasion of the debaucheries of the feast to deliver severe penitence-sermons on that day. (See Ambrose, serm. 7; Augustine, serm. 2, 198; Petrus Chrysologus, serm. 155; Maximus Turinensis, hom., 8; Chrysostom, and others.) The Council of Tours (567) forbade in its fourteenth canon all merry-making on New-Year's Day, and made the day a fast-day; and in the tenth century Bishop Atto of Vercelli renewed the decree. In the fourth century, however, Dec. 25 was fixed as the birthday of Christ; and Jan. 1, falling on the eighth day after Christmas, thus became, in accordance with Luke ii. 21, the day of the circumcision of Christ. When and by whom that event first was made the occasion for a Christian festival is not known; but the above-mentioned Council of Tours (567) ordered that on Jan. 1 a missa circumcissionis should be celebrated. In the beginning of the eighth century Beda Venerabilis wrote a homily on Luke ii. 21, for Jan. 1. In the Roman Sacramentarium, in the Missale Gothicum, and in many old Calendaria, the day is duly noted down as the Festum circumcissionis Domini. The rules of Chrodegang (74), the capitularies of the Frankish kings (l. c. 158), the synod of Mayence (813, can. 36) speak of the festival under the name of Octava Domini. Of course the circumstance that the festival of the circumcision also was New-Year's Day was at first completely ignored. But gradually it made itself felt even in the proceedings of the church; and it became customary for the priest to give the congregation his "Happy New-Year" from the pulpit, or even to deliver a New-Year's oration. In the Sermonum Opus Exquisitissimum, by Gottschalk of Osnabrück, 1517, may be found a very curious specimen of this kind of sermons, which, however, again went out of fashion with the Reformation. In the Greek Church Jan. 1 is chiefly celebrated in honor of Basil the Great. See ALT: Der christliche Cultus, Berlin, 1843, ii., 46, 205, 315.

NEW-YEAR, Feast of. See FESTIVALS, YEAR.

NEW-YORK CITY, the most populous city and chief commercial centre of the Western Hemisphere, had a population, in 1880, of 1,206,299. It was originally confined to Manhattan Island, a body of land thirteen miles and a half long, and two miles and a quarter wide at its widest point. The Dutch began the settlement of the island immediately after the discovery of Hudson, in 1609; and the town, which was built around a fort, was called New Amsterdam. In 1664 it passed into the hands of the British, who changed the name to New York, in honor of the brother of Charles II., the Duke of York. The town remained in the hands of the British (with the exception of a short interval when it was recaptured by the Dutch, 1673) till after the surrender of Yorktown in 1783.

The first and legal church was the Reformed Church of Holland, and services were conducted both in the Dutch and the French from the beginning. The first church was organized in 1628, with fifty members (Dutch and Walloons), by Rev. Jonas Michaëlius, who had just arrived from Holland. The first edifice was built of wood, in Pearl Street, between Whitehall and Broad. The Dutch Reformed Church still holds a position of high honor and influence. The British legalized the Episcopal Church, but tolerated the Dutch Reformed denomination, as also the Lutherans, who built a church in 1669, and had for their first pastor Rev. Jacob Fabritius. They were, however, intolerant to other denominations, Lord Cornbury, especially, signaling his gubernatorial term in this regard; as, for example, when in 1707 he threw into prison the Presbyterian clergyman, Makenie, for preaching without a license in New York. The first Episcopal services were held in the church at the fort. Trinity Church was opened Feb. 6, 1697, by the Rev. William Vesey. In 1703 the King's Farm was granted by Queen Anne to the corporation of Trinity Church, which was the foundation of its great wealth, and still makes it the wealthiest religious corporation in the land. The present edifice of Trinity Church was erected in 1816. The first Baptist Church was organized in 1724, but disbanded eight years later. The so-called First Church was organized in 1745, with Jeremiah Dodge as pastor. The first Presbyterian Church was organized in 1716. The first church edifice was erected in Wall Street in 1719. The first society of the Methodist-Episcopal Church was organized with five members, in October, 1766, by Philip Embury, a local preacher; and the first church edifice, on John Street, was dedicated Oct. 30, 1768. The religious statistics of New York for 1886 were as follows:—

Baptist churches and chapels	48
Catholic Apostolic church (Irvingite)	1
Congregational churches and chapels	9
Disciples church and chapel	2
Friends churches and chapels	4
Hebrew Christian church and mission	2
Jewish synagogues	30
Lutheran churches and chapels	24
Methodist (African) churches and chapels	8

Miscellaneous (churches and chapels)	42

505

One hundred and twenty-seven of these organizations are Protestant missions, sustained either by individual churches, individuals, or the New-York City Mission and Tract Society (five chapels). Protestant services are held in the English, German, French, Swedish, Hungarian, Bohemian, Italian, and Chinese languages. The Protestant population of the city is estimated at about 600,000, the Jews at 70,000, and the Roman Catholics at 400,000; the average sabbath attendance upon Protestant places of worship, at 150,000. The total church accommodations are sufficient for 375,000 persons. The Roman-Catholic churches are not sufficient to accommodate the worshippers. The number of communicants in the Protestant churches has been estimated at upwards of 80,000. There are 356 Protestant sabbath schools, with an attendance of 88,237 scholars; and 418 sabbath schools of all denominations, with an attendance of 115,826 scholars. The following table gives an exhibit of the relative strength of the churches in different years:—

DENOMINATIONS.	1830.	1850.	1870.	1881.
Protestant Evangelical Churches,	99	211	380	392
Roman Catholic Churches	4	19	41	58
Unitarians, Universalists, etc., and Synagogues	6	17	49	39

The following table presents the ratio of the churches to the population:—

YEARS.	Churches.	Population.
1786	9	23,614
1800	22	60,489
1820	62	123,706
1840	170	312,852
1860	347	813,669
1870	470	942,262
1880	489	1,206,299

There are three theological institutions in the city,—Union Seminary (Presbyterian), with seven professors, at 1200 Park Avenue; the General Theological Seminary (Episcopal), with seven professors, at 405 West 20th Street; and St. John's College (Roman Catholic) at Fordham.

There are five Young Men's Christian Associations, which include separate organizations for the Germans, colored people, and Chinese. The main organization, at the corner of 4th Avenue and 23d Street, sustains four branches. There is also an efficient Young Women's Christian Association at 7 East 15th Street.

There are seven free reading-rooms for seamen, fifteen for workingmen. Seven daily noon prayer-meetings are sustained in different portions of the city, of which the best known is the Business Men's Noon-day Prayer-Meeting, held on Fulton Street, from 12 to 1.

The charitable organizations of the city are very numerous, and it is estimated that at least $1,000,000 are distributed by these bodies annually. Space permits us only to give the following figures: Hospitals, Homes, and Asylums (including 4 foundling-asylums), 92, all but 9 of which are sustained by religious denominations; Fruit-Mis- sions, 3; Benevolent Societies (including societies for the suppression of vice, the prevention of cruelty to children, cruelty to animals, relief organizations, etc.), 41; Industrial Schools, 38; Institutions for Children (including 4 newsboys' lodging-houses, etc.), 48; Dispensaries, 30. These figures give an idea of the charitable work and the number of charitable institutions of New-York City, but do not exhaust the number. The most of the churches maintain sewing-schools, distribute alms through special committees, etc.

The American Bible Society has its headquarters in New-York City, occupying the immense building called the "Bible House." The Children's Aid Society, which gathers in destitute children, and provides homes for them in the West, etc., has, in the last twenty-eight years, provided for 59,481 children, and expended $2,958,919.

Official statements place the number of drinking-places at 9,215, the money expended in which may with safety be set down at $60,000,000 a year. There were 67,135 arrests for 1881, and 45,309 persons were held. 32,391 of these persons, or three-fourths, were of intemperate habits. Besides the work done through the churches and hospitals and temperance meetings, there is a Home for Inebriates at 48 East 78th Street.

LIT.—The history of New-York City may be found in the Histories of MARY L. BOOTH (rev. ed., New York, 1880) and Mrs. LAMB (New York, 1881). For the statistics, see Report of the United-States Bureau; Christian Work in New York (published annually by the New-York City Mission and Tract Society, under the editorial care of Lewis E. Jackson, treasurer, No. 50 Bible House), etc.; BRACE: Dangerous Classes in New York, and Twenty Years of Work among them, New York, 1872.

D. S. SCHAFF.
NEW-YORK SABBATH COMMITTEE, The, was organized in 1857, to promote the observance of the Lord's Day, and especially to secure the enforcement of the laws which protect the quiet and order of Sunday and the right of all classes to the weekly rest. It grew out of a prevalent feeling of the need of some measures to check the growing public desecration of Sunday, and the alarming proportionate increase of drunkenness, disorder, and violent crimes, on that day. At a conference of prominent and influential citizens, after much deliberation, a permanent committee of twenty was formed, to whom the conduct of the reform was committed, with power to fill vacancies in their own number. The committee was composed of leading laymen, representing the different denominations and the various business and social interests of the community. Mr. Norman White, who had taken the chief part in initiating the movement, was made chairman, to whose eminent zeal, wisdom, and perseverance the success of the committee has been largely due; and an efficient secretary and executive officer was found in the person of Rev. R. S. Cook, who had previously been a secretary of the American Tract Society. The committee, from the beginning, secured the hearty moral and financial support of the Christian community. It adopted, and has always adhered to, these principles in its work: viz., clearly to discriminate between the sabbath as a religious and as a civil institution, and carefully to respect the proper limitations of civil intervention in guarding the weekly rest; to keep the one issue distinct from all other measures of reform; to avoid all impracticable measures; to recognize the controlling power of public sentiment, and to take no step until the way should be prepared for it; to advance one step at a time; to work through the constituted authorities, giving as little prominence as possible to its own agency; and to conduct its work on such broad and just grounds as to secure the co-operation of the widest possible constituency.

The committee undertook successively the suppressing of the noisy crying of newspapers on Sunday, the Sunday selling of liquor, Sunday theatrical entertainments, noisy processions and parades on Sunday, unnecessary work upon the public streets, and the encroachments incident to such a city (public and private) upon the rest and quiet of the day. To accomplish these measures new legislation has been found necessary, and has been secured from time to time; notably, the Sunday Theatre Law of 1860, the Excise Law of 1866, important amendments to the Excise Law in 1873, the Processions Law of 1872, and the modification and re-enactment of the Sunday statute in the Penal Code of 1882. The committee has also successfully opposed numerous attempts to pass laws hostile to the sabbath. Beside its work in this city, the influence of the committee has been widely exerted throughout the State and in other parts of the country. It acted effectively in behalf of the sabbath during the late war, and secured the issue of President Lincoln's sabbath order to the army and navy in 1862. It aided the closing of the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia on Sundays, and has secured governmental recognition of Sunday in various instances, especially in the International Electrical Exposition at Paris in 1881. It has assisted in the formation of similar associations. In addition to the personal efforts of the officers and members of the committee, it has secured the preaching of sermons on the sabbath, by eminent clergymen, many of which have been published; it has contributed very largely to the discussion of the subject in the secular and religious journals; and especially has issued a series of carefully prepared original documents, fifty in number, discussing the various aspects of the Sunday question. Of these documents, and of occasional fly-leaves, circulars, etc., several millions of pages have been printed and distributed in English and other languages. Some of the documents have been reprinted in Europe. Six of the original members of the committee, including the chairman, Mr. Norman White, still remain (1883) in connection with the committee, after the lapse of twenty-five years, though no longer able to participate actively in its work. Mr. Cook, on his death (in 1864), was succeeded in office by the Rev. Dr. Philip Schaff, whose services were especially valuable in securing the sympathy and co-operation of German ministers and citizens in the work of the committee at home and abroad. Dr. Schaff resigned his position in 1869, and was followed by the Rev. W. W. Atterbury, who has since continued to hold this office.

NEW ZEALAND. The Colony of New Zealand consists of three islands, known as North, South, and Stewart's Islands, together with the small adjacent islands. The North, called by the Maoris Te Ika a Mani, is 500 miles in length and 250 miles at its greatest breadth. The South or Middle Island, called by the Maoris Te Wahi Pounamu, is the same length, but not nearly so broad. Stewart's Island, the Maori name of which is Rakiura, is 30 miles long and 25 miles broad. The area of the group is 105,000 square miles, being approximately the size of Great Britain and Ireland. It is situated in the South Pacific Ocean, 1,200 miles south-east of the Australian Continent, between 34° and 48° south latitude, and between 160° and 178° east longitude.

The earliest inhabitants of the country seem to have been the Maoris, a people believed to be of Malay origin. The first European discoverer was Abel Tasman, the Dutch navigator, who visited it in 1642, after his discovery of Tasmania; but it is not known to have been again visited till 1769, when Capt. Cook landed on it. A few years later, whaling-ships began to call occasionally; and in 1814 the Church Missionary Society established a mission at the Bay of Islands, among the Ngapuhi tribe, whose chiefs in 1840 were the first to sign the treaty acknowledging British supremacy. Other missions speedily followed. The colonization of the country may be said to have begun in 1840, when Wellington was settled by the New-Zealand Land Company, who had obtained authority for the purpose from the British Government. Auckland was established the same year, and the year following New Plymouth and Nelson were founded. The most important settlements politically and ecclesiastically were those of Otago and Canterbury. The former took place in 1848, under the auspices of the Free Church of Scotland; and the latter, under the auspices of the Church of England, in 1850.

The country is of volcanic origin, and very mountainous. Some of the heights are covered with perpetual snow, notably Mount Egmont in the North Island, and Mount Cook, which is the highest peak in the southern Alps, and rises to the height of 13,200 feet. The climate, while varying greatly in the different latitudes, is, on the whole, free from extremes. The climate of the North Island has been compared to that of Italy, and the South Island has been compared in this respect to Jersey. New Zealand is rich in minerals. The cereals, fruits, and flowers of temperate climes, grow in abundance, and of good quality. Neither marsupials nor snakes, both of which are common on the mainland of Australia, are found in New Zealand.

The provincial system of government was established in 1852, and continued till 1875, when it was abolished, and the country divided into counties. The constitution is substantially the same as in the other British colonies, and consists of a governor, a legislative council, and a house of representatives. In the latter there are usually several Maori members. The system of education is regulated by the Act of 1877. It is secular and free. The University of New Zealand grants degrees.

The population, according to the census of March, 1878, was 414,412, including 4,433 Chinese, but exclusive of the Maoris. Perhaps it may now be put at approximately half a million, including all races. In 1878 the Maoris numbered 43,000. Although a powerful race physically and mentally, they are evidently passing away gradually but surely. The number was estimated at 2,000,000 in 1835. Their children are taught in native schools under the government; and the Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and other denominations, have diligently carried on mission-work among them. In 1878 the population of the principal cities of New Zealand was as follows:—

Auckland	39,401
Dunedin	34,674
Christ Church	29,029
Wellington	21,005

Wellington is the capital, and seat of government.

There is no state church in New Zealand. The Church of England has six bishops,—at Auckland, Napier, Wellington, Nelson, Christ Church, and Dunedin. In this denomination there were, by the census of 1871, 172 churches and an attendance of 19,916. The Presbyterians had at that time 125 churches and an attendance of 13,541. By the circumstances of their settlement thirty years ago (1850), the provinces of Otago and Canterbury have had a distinctive ecclesiastical character, the Presbyterians being predominant in the former, and the Episcopalians in the latter; but this is becoming gradually less marked. The other sects, at the time of the above census, were as follows: Wesleyans, 105 chapels, in attendance, 12,723; Roman Catholics, 86 chapels, in attendance, 10,967. Baptists, Free Methodists, and Congregationalists were nearly equal, with an attendance each of about 3,000.

By the census of 1878 the population was divided, according to nominal church connection, as follows:—

Episcopalians	173,734
Presbyterians	95,103
Methodists	37,879
Baptists	9,159
Congregationalists	5,555
Lutherans	5,643
Roman Catholics	58,881

Then follow various smaller sects, of which the Unitarians number 432; while 10,664 do not state their religion.

NIBHAZ is mentioned in 2 Kings xvii. 31 as a deity worshipped by the Avites, who had been transplanted by the Assyrians, and settled in Ephraim. Whence they came is not known, but it must have been from some place in Syria or Mesopotamia. The derivation of the word "Nibhaz" is very uncertain. Whether that deity was identical with the Nebaz of the Mendeans, the demon of the uttermost darkness, has not been decided. The rabbins derive the name from a Hebrew root, "to bark;" but though there was an Egyptian deity with a dog's head, Anubis, and though by the Persians the dog was represented as following Mithras, nothing is known of sacred dogs or dog's worship on Assyro-Babylonian soil.

NICÆA, Councils of. I. The first council of Nicæa opens the series of œcumenical councils, and defined the church doctrine of the divinity of Christ, that he is co-essential with the Father. Very properly has a world-wide importance been attached to it, both on account of the profound metaphysical question it discussed and the influence of its decision upon the doctrinal system of many after-centuries. The council is also very important on account of its other decrees, and the epoch it marks in the relations of the State to the doctrines and polity of the Church. In contrast to many later councils, the first council of Nicæa has no intricate and tedious secret history. Our sources are the creed, canons, a synodal brief, a number of imperial letters, and various accounts by members of the council or later writers. The principal description is given by Eusebius of Cæsarea, in his Life of Constantine (Vita Constant., iii. 6 sqq.), which, however, seeks unduly to make prominent the services and magnanimity of the emperor. He also gives an account in his letter to the Church of Cæsarea (Ep. ad Cæsar., in Theodoret, I. 11). Athanasius is our next most valuable authority (De decretis synodi Nic. and Ep. ad Afros.); but, while he speaks from personal observation, he is a partial judge. A third eyewitness of whom something is preserved is Eustathius of Antioch (see Theodoret, c. 7). The later historians, Socrates (i. 8 sqq.) and Sozomen (i. 17 sqq.), draw from Eusebius, and give credible though not detailed accounts; while Theodoret (i. 6 sqq.; compare Rufinus: Hist. Eccl., i. 1 sqq.) is quite full in his notices of the acts of the council, but admits some doubtful details. The creed is given both by him and Socrates. The Arian position is represented by Philostorgius (i. 7; ii. 14), and the work of Gelasius of Cyzicum (ab. 476), which is of inconsiderable value. Marutha's history of the council, written near the close of the fourth century, is lost. Later documents are without value; but of interest are the two works, Analecta Nicæana (Fragments relating to the Council of Nice; the Syriac Text from an Ancient Manuscript, by H. Cowper, London, 1857), and Le concile de Nicée d'après les textes coptes et les diverses collections canoniques, by E. Revillout, Paris, 1881. For the circumstances forming the occasion of the council, see ARIANISM.

After Constantine had in vain endeavored to quietly settle the doctrinal dispute at Alexandria, he summoned by letter, in the year 325, the bishops of his empire to Nicæa in Bithynia [then the second city of that province, but now represented by a Turkish village, Isnik, with a population of fifteen hundred], offering them money to defray the expenses of the journey, and free conveyance. Syria, Arabia, Phœnicia, Persia, Libya, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Egypt and North Africa, Greece, Pannonia, and Spain (with one bishop, Hosius), were represented by three hundred and eighteen bishops (Athanasius, Theodoret), or two hundred and fifty according to Eusebius, or three hundred according to Socrates. To this number were added many presbyters and acolyths. The delegation from the East was in an overwhelming majority. The bishop of Rome, Sylvester I., was prevented from attending by the feebleness of age, and was represented by two presbyters, Vitus and Vicentius. The more prominent members were Macarius of Jerusalem, Eustathius of Antioch, Alexander of Alexandria, and his deacon Athanasius, Spyridion of Cyprus, Arius, Eusebius of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nicæa, Secundus of Ptolemais,—the last four belonging to the Arian wing. The worker of miracles, Jacob of Nisibis, was also present; and many confessors who bore in their bodies the marks of persecution. The month of the year in which the council met is not definitely known, although June or July are usually agreed upon. Sozomen relates that many of the bishops wished to avail themselves of the occasion to settle private disputes, and presented many complaints to the emperor. Constantine, however, conducted himself with much prudence, directed the complainants to the higher and all-wise Judge, and burned the documents. Private discussions were held with Arius, and these revealed the eloquence and intellect of Athanasius. On the day appointed for opening the convention, the bishops received the emperor standing. He appeared with a commanding yet humble mien, was welcomed by Eustathius, and, after delivering a brief address in Latin (which was interpreted in Greek), gave the assembly into the hands of the presidents (πρόεδροι). Their names are not known. The suggestion of Schroeckh and Ernesti, who mention Eustathius and Alexander, is much more worthy of confidence than that of Hefele, who, following Gelasius, advocates the claims of Hosius of Cordova.

The great subject of debate in the council was the relation of the Son to the Father. Here we have the accounts of Athanasius, who speaks of two sharply opposed parties, and Eusebius, who speaks of three varieties of opinion. Combining them, we find that there were three wings in the council and three stages in the progress of the debate. In the first stage, the council proposed to define the relation of the Son to the Father by the simple biblical predicates, such as εἰκὼν ("image of God") and ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ εἶναι ("to be or come from God"); but when the Arian party assented, defining these predicates to suit themselves, the majority of the council receded. In the second stage, Eusebius of Cæsarea and his friends, who, without being Arians, avoided the term of the strict trinitarian wing, ὁμοούσιος ("of the same substance"), fearful of running into Sabellianism. Their proposition met with temporary favor, but was finally rejected, and the much-debated word inserted in the definition. The name of Hosius of Cordova was the first signature appended to the confession. Arius and five others — Eusebius of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nicæa, Maris, Theonas of Marmarica, and Secundus of Ptolemais — refused to sign, and were anathematized. Eusebius, Theognis, and Maris changed their minds. The first two, however, refusing to sign the articles of condemnation, were banished to Gaul. Arius, Theonas, and Secundus were exiled to Illyria. Constantine sanctioned the decisions of the council, and made the diffusion of Arian writings a capital offence. The council itself prepared an encyclical, communicating its decision to the churches, and enjoining obedience.

In addition to this principal doctrinal question, the council made deliverances upon the Meletian and Passover controversies; the latter being settled by fixing the Roman practice (See MELETIAN and PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES.) It also passed twenty canons. To this number were added, in the course of time, many others, till it reached eighty or eighty-four in the Arabic collections of Turrianus and Ehellensis, which were brought to light in the sixteenth century. These canons deal with clerical self-mutilation, the relations of the clergy to women, the process of excommunication, the Novatians, heretical baptism, etc. The third canon forbids clergymen to have strange women in their houses, but does not forbid their marriage. The council wanted to pass a law requiring the three higher orders of the clergy to put away their wives after ordination; but the venerable confessor Paphnutius earnestly protested, declaring that no rule was needed which went beyond the old custom that the clergyman should not enter into a marriage-engagement after his ordination. The council was brought to a close by a magnificent entertainment by the emperor, who distributed handsome gifts among the bishops, the city, and the adjoining country.

It is proper to notice, that the Bishop of Rome did not exert any considerable influence upon the council, in spite of the statement of the Trullan Synod of 680, that Sylvester joined with Constantine in calling it, and Hefele, who even dares to hold that the proceedings of the council were sent to Sylvester for his confirmation. See HILTIUS: Hist. Conc. Nicæni, Lips., 1712; RICHERIUS: Hist. Concil. General.; WALCH: Concilien-geschichte; MANSI; HEFELE; [S. BOYLE: A Hist. View of the Council of Nice, with a Translation of Documents, New York, 1856; and the Church Histories of Gieseler, Neander, Schaff, etc.]

II. The second council of Nicæa, usually reckoned as the seventh œcumenical council, decreed the use of images in the church, and anathematized all who taught otherwise. The regent Irene favored the use of images, and with her the oppressed party came into power. Paul, the patriarch of Constantinople, withdrew; and Tarasius was put in his place. A synod met at Constantinople Aug. 1, 786. It had the consent of Hadrian I., Bishop of Rome, and two monks who were chosen to represent the patriarchs of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria, with whom it was not possible to have communication, on account of the Saracenic invasion. The synod was at once interrupted by the opponents of the use of images, many of whom were in the army, and belonged to the guard of the palace. It was again convened at Nicæa, Sept. 24, 787, and adjourned Oct. 13, after seven sittings. The members numbered three hundred and fifty. There was no freedom of discussion. The result was determined upon before the council opened. Biblical and patristic testimonies, legends of the saints, — such as the miracles of Simon Stylites and the sacredness of the painter's art, — were urged in advocacy of the use of images. The synod of 754, convened by Constantine Copronymus (Irene's predecessor), was declared heretical. Decrees were passed, admitting images and pictures of Christ, Mary, and the saints, and pictures of the cross, into the churches, and demanding for them, not the worship, it is true, which is offered to God (λατρεία), but a due reverence and prostration of the body (ἄσπασμός καὶ τιμητικὴ προσκίνησις). These decrees were unanimously adopted, and at an eighth sitting in Constantinople (Oct. 23) they received Irene's signature. Hadrian, whose delegates likewise gave their assent, lived to receive Charlemagne's sharp criticism of them in the Libri Carolini, and the condemnation, by the Synod of Frankfurt (794), of the worship of images (not the use of them in the churches).

The twenty-two canons of the council concern the election of bishops, the convention of general provincial synods, the use of relics in the churches, etc. The first council of Nicæa contributed to establish the unity of Christendom. The second belongs to a period when that unity was already threatened. It had only the semblance of an œcumenical character. Among the Greeks it is reckoned as the seventh and last œcumenical council. For literature, see above. GASS.

NICÆNO-CONSTANTINOPOLITAN CREED, The, used in all the Greek and Roman churches, and recognized by most of the denominations of Protestantism, is, according to the generally received opinion, a recension, made at the Council of Constantinople in 381, of the creed formulated by the Council of Nicæa in 325. In the present article we shall discuss, (1) the authentic text of the Constantinopolitan (or Nicæno-Constantinopolitan) Creed, (2) the Nicene Creed, (3) the origin of the Constantinopolitan and its relation to the Nicene, (4) the history of the Constantinopolitan. Some of these questions cannot be answered exhaustively as yet; but the investigations of Caspari, Lumby, Swainson, and Hort, have established the main points.

1. TEXT OF THE CONSTANTINOPOLITAN.—The three principal texts of the Constantinopolitan are, (1) The Greek text as it is found in the Acts of the 2d, 4th, and 6th œcumenical councils, in the works of the later Greek Fathers, and in the liturgies; (2) The Latin texts (translation) of Dionysius Exiguus, in the Acts of the Synod of Toledo (589), and of the Synod of Forum Julii (796), and that of Paul III.; (3) The Greek text used in the West, as it is found in several manuscripts of the ninth and tenth centuries. In addition, we have Syriac (of the year 562, in the British Museum), Coptic, two Anglo-Saxon (eleventh and thirteenth centuries, at Cambridge and Oxford), and other translations. The Latin text differs from the Greek in three main particulars: (1) The addition of Filiusque ("and the Son"); (2) The omission of the preposition in ("in") before the clause "one Holy . . . church;" (3) The substitution of the singular Credo ("I believe"), etc., for the plural. The text of Dionysius Exiguus differs in other particulars. The addition of the clause Filiusque ("and the Son") was first introduced by the Council of Toledo in 589; and the doctrine of the double procession of the Holy Ghost was worked out by Augustine, emphasized in Spain in opposition to the Arianism of the West Goths, but was not yet adopted in Rome at the beginning of the ninth century, when Leo III., in answer to a request of Charlemagne (809), refused to incorporate it. The omission of the preposition in before ecclesiam (church) was not accidental, and is found in the oldest Latin texts (Dionysius Exiguus, Synod of Toledo, Mozarabic Liturgy, etc.). This variation likewise goes back to the theology of Augustine, who made a distinction between credere aliquid (believing something), alicui (somebody), and in aliquid (in somebody).

The Greek texts of the West in part contain the divergences of the Latin text; but the Greek text written in Latin letters, in the Sacramentarium Gelasianum, agrees with the Greek texts of the East.

II. NICENE CREED.—The Nicene Creed, with which the Constantinopolitan is often identified, or of which it is regarded as a recension, was formulated at the Council of Nicæa as the first authoritative conclusion of the Trinitarian controversy. The events leading to the triumph of the Alexandrian party at the Council, and the formulation of the creed, are obscure. But Eusebius is certainly right when he affirms that the Nicene Creed was formed on the basis of the baptismal formula of Casarea, which he himself presented. This is confirmed by an investigation of the creed, and the merit of having properly apprehended this point belongs to Hort. The main points with reference to the composition of the Nicene Creed are, that it rests upon the baptismal formula of Casarea; differs from it by, (1) omissions and small changes, (2) the introduction of Christological clauses of the Alexandrian Church, and (3) by a revision based upon a comparison with the baptismal formulas of the churches of Jerusalem and Antioch; and that it was promulgated, not as a baptismal formula, but as a rule of faith in Christology. The expressions it omits, compared with the baptismal formula of Casarea, are, τὸν τοῦ θεοῦ λόγον ("the Word of God," τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ being substituted), πρωτότοκον πάσης κτίσεως ("the first-born of every creature"); πρὸ πάντων τῶν αἰώνων ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς γεννηθέντα ("begotten of the Father before all worlds," γεννηθέντα ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς being substituted). These omissions are of the greatest significance, as they prove that the triumphant Alexandrian party would allow no compromise, and was bent on avoiding all misunderstanding. The omitted clauses were biblical, but such as were in the mouths of partial or acknowledged opponents. The creed introduces the Alexandrian clauses τοῦτ' ἐστὶν ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ πατρὸς; γεννηθέντα οὐ ποιηθέντα; ὁμοούσιον τῷ πατρί, and the six anathemas at the close. The other variations of the Nicene Creed from the Casarean formula are not of a theological character, and, as they agree with the phraseology of the baptismal formulas of the Jerusalem and Antiochian churches, are to be put down as due to the influence of the patriarchs of Jerusalem and Antioch. They are πάντων for ἀπάντων, the sequence of the words ὅτι οὐτὶ πάντα ἐγένετο, the addition τά τε ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ καὶ τὰ ἐν τῇ γῆ, the addition ὅτι ἡμῶς τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, the addition κατεβήθητα, ἐνανθρωπήσαντα for ἐν ἀνθρώποις πολιτευσάμενον, εἰς τοὺς οὐρανοὺς for πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, ἐρχόμενον for ἦζοντο πάντες and the prefix of ἅγιον το πνεῦμα.

The proof that the Nicene Creed was not meant to be a baptismal formula is found in the abbreviation of the third article—where all mention of the church, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting, is wanting—and the addition of the anathemas. If we consider the positiveness with which the Nicene Creed excludes all Arianism, and its promulgation as the law of the church, we get some conception of the strength and energy of the Alexandrian party at the council. In the twenty or thirty years immediately succeeding its promulgation a number of creeds were issued by its opponents. The battle was about the Nicene symbol; and in the battle its advocates became attached to the very words, so that they not only refused to give up a single letter, but to add clauses explanatory of the orthodox view. (See Athanasius; Hilary, Ad Constant. Aug., II. 5; Jerome, Ep. ad Damas.; Amphilochius, in Migne xxxix. p. 93.) It was re-affirmed at the Council of Sardica in 343; and it is possible to adduce dozens of passages from the acts of councils and the works of the Fathers, between 350 and 450, showing the intense reverence in which the creed was held as an exposition of apostolical teaching, given under the most glorious emperor Constantine, etc.

It remained to employ the Nicene Creed at the rite of baptism. Up to 361, there is no evidence of its having been so used; but after the victory of orthodoxy, with Julian's accession to power, this was accomplished. There were three possible ways by which the Nicene Creed could be utilized for this purpose,—by introducing its emphatic expressions into the old provincial baptismal formulas, by enlarging it, or by using it without change. All of these ways were followed before the Council of Chalcedon, as will be shown in the next section. Among these attempts belongs the creed which is called the Constantinopolitan, or Nicæno-Constantinopolitan.

III. ORIGIN OF THE CONSTANTINOPOLITAN, AND ITS RELATION TO THE NICENE CREED.—According to the traditional view which has prevailed from the sixth century, the Constantinopolitan Creed was formulated at the Council of Constantinople in 381 (called by Theodosius I.) by enlarging the third article of the Nicene Creed, in opposition to the Pneumatomacliians: hence it received the name Nicæno-Constantinopolitan. The first thing to shake the confidence of scholars in this tradition was the fact, that the creed given in the Ancoratus of Epiphanius, dated 373-374, is identical with the Constantinopolitan, except in the two clauses τοῦ ἁγίου ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ πατρὸς and ταῦτε ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς καὶ τὰ ἐν τῇ γῆ. (See Hort, p. 83, etc.) Different explanations have been given of this fact; and Hefele, following Tillemont and Ceillier (Hist. des aut. sacr., v. p. 646), has advocated the view that the Council of Constantinople did not originate the revision of the Nicene Creed, but adopted one already in use; that is, the one which Epiphanius gives. Caspari has advocated this view with his well-known learning, and advances the extraordinary regard in which Epiphanius was held as the reason for the Constantinopolitan Council adopting his creed. But there is no documentary notice that Epiphanius played an important part at the council, much less that a creed proposed by him was received. We believe the traditional view of the origin of the Constantinopolitan Creed at the Council of Constantinople untenable, for reasons independent of all considerations concerning the symbol of Epiphanius. (1) The Council of Constantinople had not an œcumenical character, the Orient alone being represented. (2) The canons of the council are not found in the oldest Greek collections, as the Ballerini have properly inferred from the oldest Latin translation (the Prisca, about 450-500), in which the canons follow those of the fourth œcumenical council. The conclusion is very properly drawn, that the decrees of 381 were not generally received in the Orient till after 451 [the date of the fourth œcumenical council]. (3) The Constantinopolitan Creed is not among the documents which are preserved as the Acts of the so-called "second œcumenical Council of Constantinople" (381), but was pushed into the Acts at a later date, and stands there without any historical introduction whatever. (1) Socrates (v. 8) only states that the council, after the departure of the Macedonian bishops, confirmed the Nicene faith; and Sozomen and Theodoret know nothing different. More important is the fact, that, in his Letter to Cledonius, Gregory Nazianzen, who was present at the council, only mentions the Nicene Creed, and does not speak of any enlargement of the same, or of any new creed. This argumentum e silentio is fatal to the traditional view, from the fact that Gregory, in the same letter, speaks of the incompleteness of the Nicene Creed in its statement of the doctrine of the Holy Ghost. (5) The Latin Fathers condemned some of the proceedings of the council, but do not speak either of the adoption of a new creed, or the enlargement of an old one, before the middle of the fifth century. The same is true of the East. The Council of Constantinople in 382 only refers to the Nicene Creed; and the third œcumenical council at Ephesus (431) listened to the reading of it at its first session, but is silent about a Constantinopolitan revision. Likewise the Robber Council of Ephesus (449) speaks of the Nicene Creed as the only and immutable foundation of orthodox doctrine. Following the investigations of Caspari and Hort, we may say in one word, There is no certain vestige from 381 to 451 in the spoudal Acts or Church Fathers, orthodox or heterodox, in the East or the West, of the existence of the Constantinopolitan Creed; and it is impossible to adduce proof from any source, that, in this period, it was regarded as having originated in the Constantinopolitan Council, or as being the official baptismal formula. On the contrary, the Nicene Creed during this period was pushing out of doors in most churches, especially the Eastern, the old baptismal formulas, and growing, if possible, in general esteem, and every alteration was rejected with indignation. The assumption that the so-called "Constantinopolitan" was meant when the Nicene Creed was spoken of is purely arbitrary; for, in the passages where the Nicene is literally cited, the text of the so-called "Constantinopolitan" is never given. (6) There is but one reliable testimony for the so-called "Constantinopolitan Creed" before the beginning of the sixth century,—the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon (451), which designated it as the "Creed of the Council of Constantinople of 381," and adopted it as the title of the Nicene Creed.

The internal reasons against the traditional view are still stronger. It can be shown that the Constantinopolitan is not an enlarged copy of the Nicene Creed, and that it would have been impossible for the Council of Constantinople to make such a recension as the so-called "Constantinopolitan Creed" offers. The Constantinopolitan not only differs from the Nicene Creed by the additions in the third article, but differs also in other respects, which point back to another original. This is plain from the four omissions of words, the omission of the anathemas, the addition of ten clauses, and the five differences in the location of words. In other words, a comparison of the two creeds shows (to follow Hort), that, of the hundred and seventy-eight words in the Constantinopolitan, only thirty-three, or one-fifth, are to be found beyond a peradventure in the Nicene Creed. The conclusion is inevitable, that the so-called "Constantinopolitan" is an independent creed, with sundry insertions from the Nicene, or that it is based upon some other older formula of baptism. The two creeds have in general only that in common which was common to all the formulas of baptism in the early church. Such omissions as the two clauses, τουτ' ἐστὶν ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ πατρὸς and θεὸν ἐκ θεοῦ, are inconceivable on the supposition that the creed was made in 381, on the basis of the Nicene, and by more than a hundred bishops in full sympathy with the Nicene doctrine, and at a time when Arianism was still a power. The same result is arrived at by a consideration of the two additions, πρὸ πάντων τῶν αἰώνων and κατὰ τὰς γραφάς. As for the first clause, it is well known how the Nicene Fathers shunned ascribing any point of time to the generation of the Son, for fear of its being misconstrued, and expressly passed it by as they looked over the baptismal formula of Cæsarea. As for the second clause, the words were regarded, after a long conflict, as so suspicious, that no follower of the Nicene theology would have had reasons for adding them. Both these clauses are irreconcilable with the theory of the Nicene basis of the so-called "Constantinopolitan Creed."

From what has already been said, it follows that the so-called "Constantinopolitan Creed" is not an enlarged form of the Nicene. It is a revision of some old formula of baptism which was not made at Constantinople in 381, for it is stated that that council confirmed the Nicene Creed. This becomes evident by a study of the third article on the Holy Ghost, which was for the large part original, so it is said. It is beyond dispute, that the Council of Constantinople in 381 opposed the Pneumatomachians, whose definite exclusion from the orthodox church dates from that time. What, however, are the predicates attributed to the Holy Ghost in the so-called "Constantinopolitan Creed"? His equality with the Father and Son (homoousia) is not expressly confessed; but it was considered sufficient to acknowledge him as the "Lord, the Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father," etc. Such epithets do not suffice to express the energetic advocacy of the divinity of the Spirit about 380, and point back to a date earlier than 381, and probably later than 362.

What, then, are the origin and history of the so-called "Constantinopolitan Creed"? Thus much we can regard as established: it was prepared before the Council of Constantinople in 381, and it is found substantially in the Ancoratus of Epiphanius, written eight years before the council. Epiphanius did not originate the creed, as Caspari has well shown. He himself speaks of it as a venerable confession, and says, αὕτη μὲν ἡ πίστις παρεδόθη ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγίων ἐπισκόπων, καὶ ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ τῆ ἁγία πόλει ἀπὸ πάντων ὁμῶν τῶν ἁγίων ἐπισκόπων ἕπτε τριακοσίων δέκα τον ἄρθρῶν. Although these words are not very clear, it is evident that Epiphanius communicates the creed to the Church of Pamphylia as the Apostolic and Nicene. Where did he get it? Gerhard Vossius long ago detected the similarity between it and the creed of the church at Jerusalem. Hort has followed up the idea, and has proved that the so-called "Constantino-politan Creed" is nothing more than a revision of the baptismal formula of the Jerusalem Church, in which the most important Nicene catch-words, and the statements concerning the Holy Ghost, have been inserted. The entire first article, and the second down to the words τῶν αἰώνων, are identical with that baptismal formula of Jerusalem; and the skeleton of the second is found in it. The third article ran in the form of Jerusalem, καὶ εἰς ἓν ἅγιον πνεῦμα τὸν παράκλητον, τὸ λαλήσαν ἐν ταῖς προφήταις ("And in one Holy Spirit, the paraclete, who spoke by the prophets"). Although very considerable changes have been made in this article and in those about the church, etc., yet the foundation is the same. The new predicates of the Holy Spirit are best explained by a reference to the letters of Athanasius to Serapion, written 356-362. (See Hort, p. 85 sq.)

The Constantinopolitan symbol is, therefore, a revision of the baptismal formula of Jerusalem perfected between 362 and 373. In the latter year it was in use in Jerusalem, probably in Cyprus, and prospectively in Pamphylia. There can be little doubt that Cyril of Jerusalem (351-386) was the reviser. By a careful analysis of his theology, and a comparison of it with the new clauses in the Constantinopolitan Creed, Hort raises this hypothesis to a reasonable certainty. The revision of the baptismal formula of Jerusalem was not a solitary instance of its kind. The Antiochian was, as Hort has shown, also revised after the Nicene Creed as a model, and probably by Meletius. The Nestorian Creed published by Caspari (i., p. 116 sq.) is a second revision of the Antiochian baptismal formula made in 366; and the baptismal formula of the church at Philadelphia, presented to the Council of Ephesus, is a revision of an early one after the model of the Nicene Creed. The Pseudo-Athanasian Ἐρμηνεία (Caspari, i.; Hahn, § 66), the longer Ancoratus (Caspari; Hahn, § 68), the Cappadocian formula of baptism (Caspari, ii.; Hahn, § 70), and the Pseudo-Basilian Ἐρμηνεία (Caspari, ii.; Hahn, § 140), are all closely related, derived from one source, are furnished with phraseology from the Nicene Creed and have nothing to do with the Constantinopolitan Creed, as Hort has proved against Caspari. All these seven creeds belong to the third quarter of the fourth century, as is evident from the absence of all reference to the later christological controversies, and from the fact that the growing popularity of the Nicene Creed from the beginning of the fifth century left no room for the preparation of baptismal formulas. The years between 360 and 400 form, therefore, the second period in the formation of baptismal formulas. Here the so-called "Constantinopolitan Creed," based upon the old baptismal formula of the church at Jerusalem, belongs.

IV. HISTORY OF THE CONSTANTINOPOLITAN CREED. — This is a singularly difficult problem. 1. The creed could not be held in general regard until the council of 381, to which it was ascribed, had come to be regarded as having an œcumenical character. This was not the case in the Orient till after the Council of Chalcedon (451), and in the West not till a century later. Until the middle of the fifth century, only two councils were regarded as œcumenical; the term being applied in a loose sense, by the Council of Constantinople of 382, to the one held there in 381, as Hefele admits. But, when the patriarchate of Constantinople secured in 451 the supremacy, it considered it to its interest to declare the council of 381, like the Nicene Council, an œcumenical council, because, (1) it was held in the imperial city, (2) called by the second Constantine, Theodosius I., and (3) had accorded the precedence of honor, after the bishop of Rome, to the bishop of Constantinople. In the West, however, the œcumenical character of this council was not admitted till the Roman bishop passed into servile dependence to the Byzantine emperor. Vigilius (538-555) was the first to call it an œcumenical synod. (See on these points Vincenzi, Caspari, and Hort, p. 101 sq.)

2. The date of the recognition of the creed in the West can be pretty accurately established as identical with the recognition of the œcumenical character of the council of 381; that is, about 530. Perhaps Dionysius Exiguus was the first to introduce it from the East, but there is no record of its being held in esteem in the West before the middle of the sixth century. From that time, however, it was rapidly introduced as a formula of baptism in Rome and Spain, where, at the Council of Toledo (589), it received the fatal addition, Filioque, and has been put on a level with the Apostles' Creed; yea, was even designated by this name. (For proofs see Caspari, i. p. 242, etc.) The Reformers usually call it simply the Nicene Creed. The Arminians, Socinians, and Unitarians have expressly rejected it. The Roman Church confirmed it at the Council of Trent. Its later history in the churches of the Reformation begins with the Calixtine controversies.

3. The facts just brought out indicate that the creed must have been regarded, already in 500, in a part of the East at least, as a revision of the Nicene Creed, made at Constantinople 381. But its position after the canons, instead of before, in the collection of Dionysius Exiguus, proves that it was inserted into the Acts of the council not later than the latter half of the fifth century; but it is probable, though not beyond doubt, that it was first read at the Council of Chalcedon (451) as a product of the Council of Constantinople. It was a Constantinopolitan deacon, who, according to the report, read it on that occasion. Hort has traced indications of a relation between the baptismal formula of Jerusalem, the symbol of Cyril, and the council of 381. Cyril attended this council; but his orthodoxy was not above suspicion, and it is not unlikely that he laid down a confession in order to place this orthodoxy above the reach of reproach. This would naturally be the baptismal formula of his provincial church. It was accepted, and put amongst the Acts of the synod, as the formula of Cæsarea had before been put amongst those of the Council of Nicaea, or that of Philadelphia amongst those of the Council of Ephesus (431). Now, when the Church of Constantinople began to look around for a fuller statement of doctrine than the Nicene Creed offered, it found this baptismal formula of Jerusalem, announced it as the Constantinopolitan Creed, and so used it. Whether these hypotheses be regarded as well founded or not, it remains certain that the so-called "Constantinopolitan Creed" is the revised symbol of Jerusalem, made about 363; that the council of 381 gave official confirmation only to the Nicene Creed; and that the thought of passing off the so-called "Constantinopolitan" as the work of the council of 381 was not put into execution till about 450. By 500 it had secured a place at the side of the Nicene Creed, and soon after was employed as a formula of baptism, and began to supplant the Nicene.

Finally, we may mention the radical hypothesis of the Roman theologian Vincenzi (De process. Sp. Sancti, Rome, 1878), who seeks to prove that the Constantinopolitan Creed is a Greek fabrication of the seventh century, for the purpose of dating back the erroneous doctrine of the single procession of the Holy Spirit to the fourth century. It is not necessary to refute this theory; for its author not only starts out with the purpose of proving the antiquity of the doctrine of the double procession of the Holy Spirit, but has overlooked many of the most important testimonies, and does violence to others.

The Constantinopolitan Creed is, therefore, an apocryphal work, like the Apostles' Creed and the Athanasian. It is at once older and younger than the council of 381. The historical student will compare its contents with the theology of Cyril and Athanasius. After the middle of the fifth century, the Fathers regarded it as an enlarged form of the Nicene, and used it against Apollinaris, Nestorius, and Eutyches. See CASPARI: *Quellen zur Gesch. d. NICEPHORUS, b. 758; d. 828; a celebrated Byzantine writer and patriarch of Constantinople; descended from a distinguished family, strictly orthodox, and ardently devoted to the worship of images. His father, Theodorus, lost his office, and was exiled, for that very reason; but the son saw the complete reversion of affairs, when, under Irene, after the synod of Nicaea (787), the image-worshippers came into power. He did not feel at home, however, in court circles, and retired to a monastery on the Thracian Bosphorus; but in 806 he was recalled to the metropolis, and, though only a monk, elevated to the patriarchal see. Once more, however, he experienced a complete change in the course of affairs, when Leo Armenius ascended the throne in 813, and the iconoclasts came into power: he was deposed, and retired to the monastery of St. Theodorus. His writings are partly historical, — Breviarium Historicum, from 602 to 770, first printed in 1616, and then incorporated in the edition of the Byzantine historians, Venice, 1729; Chronologia compendiaria tripartita, translated into Latin by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, printed in Paris 1648, — partly philosophical, in defence and explanation of image worship: Antirrhetici libri adversus Iconomachos, in Bibl. Patr. Lugd., xiv.; Disputatio de imaginibus, edited by Combefis, Paris, 1664: Confessio Fidei, in BARONIUS, Ann. ad a. 811, etc. GASS.

NICEPHORUS, Callisti, flourished about 1330, was a monk in the monastery attached to the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, and wrote a church history (ending 610), which contains some valuable information. He closes the series of mediæval Greek church-historians, and is one of the best of them. His work, which exists only in one manuscript, in the Imperial Library in Vienna, was first printed in a Latin translation by Johaun Lange, Basel, 1553 (often reprinted); and his Greek text was edited by Fronto Ducaeus, Paris, 1630, 2 vols. GASS.

NICERON, Jean Pierre, b. in Paris, March 11, 1685; d. there July 8, 1738; entered the Society of the Jesuits in 1702, and published Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire des Hommes illustres dans la république des Lettres, Paris, 1729-45, 43 vols.

NICETAS ACOMINATOS (also called Choniatas, after his native place, Chone, the old Colossæ), studied theology and jurisprudence in Constantinople; entered the civil service of the Byzantine Empire, and was governor of the province of Philippopolis when the Latins conquered Constantinople, in 1203. He fled to Nicea, and died there a few years afterwards. His Byzantine History treats the period from 1118 to 1205, and is an able and reliable work in spite of its turgid style. His Θησαυρὸς ὀρθοδοξίας, in twenty-seven books, is, like the Πανοπλία of Euthymius, a learned refutation of all heresies, but more original, and less monkish. Only the five first books, however, have been published in a Latin translation by Petrus Morellus (Paris, 1561), and in Bibl. Patr. Lugd., XXV. See ULLMANN: Die Dogmatik der griechischen Kirche im 12. Jahrhundert, 1833. GASS.

NICETAS, David (generally surnamed Paphlago, because he was born in Paphlagonia, and afterwards became bishop there), flourished about 880, and wrote a life of the patriarch Ignatius, which is much praised by Roman-Catholic writers, because it is exceedingly partial against Photius. It was first edited, Greek and Latin, by Matth. Raderus, Ingolstadt, 1601, afterwards often. Many other works, not published, are ascribed to him.

NICETAS PECTORATUS, monk and presbyter in the monastery of the Studium, near Constantinople; flourished in the middle of the eleventh century; a contemporary of Michael Cæsararius, and wrote a violent work against the Church of Rome, of which a Latin translation, Liber adv. Latinos, is found in Canisius: Lect. Antiq., iii. But when the papal legates, shortly after, arrived at Constantinople, it came to a disputation between him and Cardinal Humberto, in which he was so completely defeated, that he recanted, and consented to the burning of his books, — a circumstance, however, which the Greek sources do not mention. See GRÜNER: Byzantinische Geschichte, Graz, 1877, iii., 529 sq.

NICHE, an architectural term denoting a recess in a wall, generally used as a receptacle for some ornament, — a picture or statuary. Niches are sometimes square, and sometimes semicircular at the back, sometimes perfectly plain, or adorned only with a few mouldings at the front, but sometimes provided with pedestals, canopies, and exceedingly elaborate mouldings.

NICHOLAS is the name of five popes and an antipope. — Nicholas I. (858-867) stands in the history of the Church as a powerful representative of that tendency which developed in the Roman curia after the death of Charlemagne, — to throw off the yoke of the imperial authority. The ideas of the unity of Church and State, and of the unity of the Christian world, were vividly present to his mind; and he labored with energy and success for their realization. The arbitrary measures of Archbishop Johannes of Ravenna had produced much ill feeling in his diocese, and complaints were made against him in Rome. As from of old the Archbishop of Ravenna was the rival of the Bishop of Rome, Nicholas seized with eagerness the opportunity of humiliating that rival; and Johannes was finally compelled to submit to the papal demands, — that no bishop should be appointed in the province of Emilia without the assent of Rome, and that every bishop should have a right to appeal to Rome. Of still greater importance was his contest with Archbishop Hincmar of Rheims. It was Hincmar's dream to elevate his see to the primacy of the entire Frankish Church; and the opposition he met with from below — as, for instance, from Rothad, bishop of Soissons — he attempted to break by means of local synods. In 861 Rothad was deposed by the synod of Soissons, but in 865 he repaired to Rome. Nicholas declared in his favor, cancelled the decisions of the synod of Soissons, and re-invested him with his episcopal rights. In the same year he was formally re-installed in his office by the papal legate Arsenius. Hincmar was threatened into compliance; and the startling propositions, drawn from the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, — that no synod could be convened except by the Pope, that every bishop had a right to appeal from his metropolitan to the Pope, etc., — obtained, if not formal acceptance, at least practical efficiency, in the Frankish Church. Equally successful was his interference in the affairs of the Greek Church. He sided with Ignatius, whose deposition he refused to recognize; and in 863 a synod of Rome deposed and anathematized Photius. At that very moment Christianity was successfully introduced among the Bulgarians by Greek missionaries. But Prince Bogoris, suspecting that too close an ecclesiastical connection with Constantinople might endanger the political independence of the country, opened negotiations with Rome. Nicholas immediately sent Bishop Dominicus of Trivento and Bishop Grimwald of Bomarzo to Bogoris; and in spite of the exertions of Photius and the synod of Constantinople (867), which even went so far as to depose Nicholas, the Bulgarian Church became Latin, and not Greek. The Moravian Church, though likewise established by Greek missionaries (Cyrillus and Methodius), also acknowledged the authority of Rome. But the master-stroke of Nicholas's policy was his interference in the matrimonial affairs of Lothair II. A synod of Metz (862) allowed the king to send away his legitimate wife, Thietberga, and marry his mistress, Waldrada. But Nicholas, who knew that Thietberga was innocent, and the transactions of Metz fraudulent, cancelled the decrees, deposed the archbishops of Cologne and Treves, who had managed the synod, and finally compelled Lothair, supported by the moral indignation of the whole world, and the threats of Charles the Bald and Louis the German, to submit unconditionally to his decision. See ANDR. Nicholas II. (Dec. 28, 1058—July 27, 1061). Immediately after the death of Stephen X., the nobility of Rome, with the Count of Tusculum at their head, enthroned, by force, Benedict X. in the night between April 4 and 5, 1058. Hildebrand, however, supported by Godfred II., Duke of Lorraine, and Margrave of Tuscia, obtained the assent of the regent, the Empress Agnes, and gathered the cardinals, who had fled from Rome, to a regular election at Siena. Gerhard, a native of Burgundy, a member of the ecclesiastical reform party, who, as bishop of Florence, had introduced the vita canonica in his diocese, was elected, and assumed the name of Nicholas II. A few months later on, Benedict was compelled to submit, and renounce his office. At the celebrated Easter Council in Rome (1059), the decree was issued which laid the papal election exclusively into the hands of the cardinals. From the emperor's side, only a kind of confirmation was necessary. At the same council, Berengarius of Tours retracted his doctrines on the Lord's Supper; and it is probable that also the decrees against simony and the marriage of the priest were published at that occasion. See JAFFÉ: Regesta Pontificum Roman., Berlin, 1851; PFLUGK-HARTUNG: Acta Pont. Roman., Tübingen, 1880; WATTERICH: Vita Pont. Rom., Leipzig, 1862. — Nicholas III. (Nov. 25, 1277—Aug. 22, 1280) was an able diplomat, and compelled Rudolph of Hapsburg to cede the pentapolis and the exarchate of Ravenna to the papal see, and Charles of Anjou to renounce the regency in Tuscany and the dignity as a Roman senator. By a constitution of July 18, 1278, it was decreed that only a citizen of Rome, but neither a king nor an emperor, could hold the senatorial power. In the controversy between the stricter and laxer parties in the Franciscan order, he decided in favor of the former, in spite of his own passion for magnificent display. See Annales Placentini Gibellini, Annales Parmenses, and Continuatio Martini Poloni, in PERTZ: Mon. Germ. Hist., xviii. and xxii.; Vita Nicolai III., in MURATORI: Reper. Ital. Ser., iii.; WERTSCH: Die Beziehungen Rudolfs von Habsburg zur röm. Kurie, Boehm., 1880. — Nicholas IV. (Feb. 22, 1288—April 4, 1292) was the first Franciscan who ascended the papal throne; but he was a weak man, who timidly sought his way through the contest of the two rival families of Orsini and Colonna. See Vita Nicolai IV., in MURATORI: Reper. Ital. Serip., iii. — Nicholas V., antipope to John XXII. (1328–30). In 1310 he separated from his wife, and entered the order of the Minorites. In Rome, where he lived in the monastery of Ara Cœli, he acquired some reputation as a preacher; and May 12, 1328, Louis the Bavarian had him elected antipope by a popular assembly in the St. Peter's Square in Rome. But as Louis the Bavarian could not maintain himself, and finally was compelled to leave Italy, Nicholas found himself in a miserable plight. At last he surrendered unconditionally to John XXII., and was kept in prison for the rest of his life. See RAYNALDUS: Annales ecclies. ad annos 1328–30, and other sources, in BÜHMER: Fontes Reper. Germ., vols. i. and iv. — Nicholas V. (March 6, 1447—March 21, 1455) distinguished himself in politics, in science, and in art. With Friedrich III. he concluded the concordat of Aschaffenburg, or Vienna, Feb. 17, 1448, by which Germany lost nearly all the advantages which it might have derived from the Council of Basel. The annats, the reservations, the mensæ papales, were consented to by the king. He was equally successful in healing the papal schism, and winding up the affairs of the Council of Basel. April 7, 1449, Felix V. resigned the office; and in 1450 Nicholas V. could celebrate the semi-centennial in Rome with great magnificence and proper dignity. He was a scholar himself, a worthy member of the Humanist camp, and encouraged scholarship. He laid the foundation to the Vatican Library, and offered a prize of ten thousand gold-pieces for a translation of Homer into Latin verses. He restored the walls of Rome and many of her churches, and entertained an idea of rebuilding the Vatican and the Church of St. Peter. By the Romans, however, he was not appreciated. His last days were saddened by the conspiracy of Porcario, and still more by the fall of Constantinople. He formed the League of Lodi between the Italian States for the defence of Italy, but his attempt to rouse Europe to a new crusade was a failure. NICHOLAS OF BASEL. See JOHN OF CHUR, and FRIENDS OF GOD.

NICHOLAS, Bishop of Methone, the present Modon, in Messenia, flourished during the reign of Manuel Comnenus, 1143–80, and left a number of works on the presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper, on the use of unleavened bread, on the procession of the Holy Spirit, on the primacy of the pope, on the Pagan Platonism of Proclus, etc., which belong to the most characteristic productions of Greek theology during the twelfth century. Printed are the work against Proclus (Ἀνάπτυξις), edited by J. Th. Voemel, Francfort, 1825, and two essays against trinitarian heresies (Λόγοι δύο), edited by the archimandrite Demetracopulos, Leipzig, 1865. See ULLMANN: Die Dogmatik der griechischen Kirche im 12. Jahrhundert, 1833. GASS.

NICHOLAS, Bishop of Myra in Lycia, a sacred name in the tradition of the Latin as well as the Greek Church, but hardly any thing more. The reports of his life are confused, and full of legendary elements. According to Metaphrastes, he was imprisoned during the persecution of Diocletian, and not released until the time of Constantine; but he was present at the Council of Nicea (325). His name, however, is not mentioned by any contemporary historian. By Metaphrastes and the Menologium Græcum a great number of miracles are ascribed to him, — allaying storms, liberating captive soldiers, etc. Balsam flowed from his grave when he was buried, and again, when, in the twelfth century, his remains were exhumed, and transferred to Bari in Apulia. Many churches were dedicated to him. See his Vita e Metaphraste et aliis collecta, in SURIUS (Dec. 6), and FABRICIUS: Bibl. Græca, x., and TILLEMONT: Memoires, vi. GASS.

NICHOLAS, Henry. See FAMILISTS.

NICHOLAS OF STRASSBURG was lector in the Dominican monastery in Cologne in the beginning of the fourteenth century, and was in 1326 made a kind of inspector of all Dominican monasteries in Germany. Thirteen sermons by him have been published by Franz Pfeiffer in the first volume of his Deutsche Mystiker; and he is generally reckoned among the older German mystics, though his sermons show no talent for, nor any inclination towards, mystical speculation. A larger work, De adventu Christi, dedicated to John XXII., has not been published. Not to be confounded with him is another Nicholas of Strassburg, or rather Nicholas Kemp de Argentina, monk in a Carthusian monastery in Chemnitz, where he died, a centenary, in 1497. A treatise by him, Dialogus de recto studiorum fine ac ordine, has been published by Pez in his Bibliotheca ascetica, vol. iv., Regensburg, 1721. c. SCHMIDT.

NICODEMUS, a Pharisee, and teacher of the law, the nocturnal disciple of the Church Fathers (νυκτηριὸς μαθητὴς), who became the open disciple (ημεριῶς), was one of the few, who, like Paul, made the transition from the Pharisaic righteousness of works to faith in Christ. We meet him three times in John's Gospel, and these three passages describe as many phases in the development of his faith. He came to Christ, in the early part of his ministry, by night (John iii. 1-21), aroused by the miracles, and seeking instruction. The conversation which ensued, upon the necessity of the new birth, is one of the richest pearls of the Gospel, full of inexhaustible spiritual import. The second meeting with Christ occurred two years and a half later, when Christ's conflict with the hostile forces was rapidly nearing its crisis (John vii. 45 sqq.), and with more boldness demanded that Jesus should be accorded the privileges of the law. A half-year later he appears again, a firm and open disciple, helping Joseph of Arimathea to bury the body of our Lord (John xix. 38-42). The crucifixion had burst the remaining bonds of his heart, and led him to sacrifice all temporal interests. According to the tradition, Nicodemus was baptized by John and Peter, and excluded from the Sanhedrin. The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus (see the text in Fabricius and Philo, and a translation in Cowper's The Apocryphal Gospels), which is reported to have been written by Nicodemus in Hebrew, at least attests the high esteem in which he was held from the beginning. NICOLAI, Philip, Lutheran theologian, preacher, and hymn-writer: b. Aug. 10, 1556, in Mengerlinghausen; d. Oct. 26, 1608, in Hamburg. His father, who was a clergyman, dedicated him early "to God and his church." After studying theology at the universities of Erfurt and Wittenberg, he became in 1583 pastor at Herdecke, Westphalia; from which he was obliged to flee at the invasion of the Spanish troops. Finding on his return that the mass had been introduced again in his church, he became pastor of a secret congregation of Lutherans in Cologne, and afterwards at Nieder-Wildingen. He was made doctor of divinity by the university of Marburg; in 1596 was called to Unna in Westphalia, where the Lutheran clergy expected him to take the lead in the discussions with the Calvinists; and in 1601 he accepted a call to Hamburg. Here he exerted an extensive influence, preaching, like "another Chrysostom," on Sundays and Thursdays to a crowded church, and commending himself as a faithful pastor and pious man.

Nicolai was a zealous Lutheran, and advocate of the doctrine of ubiquity. He entered with all his soul into the theological controversies of the day against the Calvinists, and sent forth many contributions through the press. Amongst these were the Fundamentorum Calvinianæ Sectæ Detectio (Tübingen, 1586), the De Controversia ubiquitaria (1590), De duobus Antichristis (1590), and Kurzer Bericht von d. Calvinisten Gott u. ihrer Religion (1598). The last work was one of the coarsest of all the anti-Calvinistic writings of its author, and in general one of the most notorious of the polemical writings of the sixteenth century, verging close to the blasphemous tone of polemics. It is pleasant to turn away to another work, the Fruledenspiegel d. ewigen Lebens (Frankfurt, 1599, 1617, 1633, etc., 1854), which was fragrant with the odor of heavenly flowers, and suggested by a terrible pestilence which raged in Unna, where he was pastor. He also published a Commentatorium de regno Christi lib. II. (Frankfurt, 1597), a remarkable work, full of chiliastic speculations, and in which he predicted the world's dissolution in 1670. His most important theological work was the Sacrosanctum omnipresentiæ J. Chr. mysterium libris II. solide et perspicue explicatum (1602), in which he seeks to prove the doctrine of Christ's omnipresence, both from his divine and human nature. Attention has recently been called to his Christology again by Thomasius, Dorner, and others.

That which has given Nicolai a permanent claim to honor and fame in the Protestant Church is his four hymns, especially the bridal song of the Church to her heavenly Bridegroom on Ps. xlv. Wie schön leuchtet uns der Morgenstern ("How lovely shines the morning star," by Dr. H. Harbaugh), and a spirited song of the midnight voice and the wise virgins (Matt. xxv.), Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme ("Wake, awake, for night is flying," Miss Catherine Winkworth). These two hymns, which were written in Unna at the time of the pestilence (1599), are among the jewels of German hymnody, and mark an epoch in hymn-composition by their fervor of personal faith and love and their poetic and musical rhythm, characteristics which are foreign to the hymns of the Reformation period. These wonderful songs exercised a powerful influence upon that generation, and were soon adopted far and near. The melody of Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme, was composed by Nicolai himself, who perhaps got his idea of the tune from the horn of the night watchman.

Nicolai's works were edited by DEDEKEN, in 2 Latin and 4 German vols., Hamburg, 1611-17. For his life, see CURTZE: P. Nicolai's Leben u. Lieder, Halle, 1859; KOCH: Kirchenlied, ii. 324 sqq.

WAGENMANN.

NICOLAÏTANS, a party which had some following in some of the churches of Asia addressed in the Apocalypse. They are twice mentioned by name, in the Epistles to Ephesus and Pergamos (Rev. ii. 6, 15). In the second epistle they are compared to those who "hold the teaching of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication." The vices of the Nicolaitans are, therefore, not to be explained figuratively (Herder), nor are they to be regarded merely as libertines (Vitringa), but as committing the sins attributed to the Israelites, and as holding principles justifying such practices. This conclusion puts it beyond dispute that the Nicolaitans are likewise meant in the description in the Epistle to the Church of Thyatira (ii. 20 sqq.), where fornication, and eating things sacrificed to idols, are referred to. Here the woman Jezebel does not mean a special individual in the Church of Thyatira. She is the representative of a certain school whose doctrines and practices seem to have met with less resistance at Thyatira than at Ephesus and Pergamos. It may also be regarded as certain that the "evil men" and the "false apostles" referred to in the Epistle to Ephesus (ii. 2) were Nicolaitans, and not Judaizing teachers (Züllig). One might be more apt to think of Jewish Christians such as gave Paul trouble in his congregations (Ewald, Gebhardt); but there are none of the peculiar marks of the Judaizing tendency.

The Nicolaitans are to be compared with the Antinomian libertines of the Church of Corinth. Antinomianism had spread in this congregation, in contrast to the narrow legalism of Jewish Christianity, as we learn from Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians. They seem to have questioned the resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 13 sqq.), desecrated the table of the Lord (xi. 18), grossly abused Paul's principle, that "all things are lawful" (vi. 12, x. 23), by eating flesh offered to idols, etc. The similarity of Nicolaitanism and the Antinomianism of Corinth renders it certain that the two stand in an intimate historical relation. The difference lies here, that the Nicolaitans were an organized party. Such a party might well have developed in these Asiatic churches, as it did in Corinth, by the time the Apocalypse was written (68 or 69 A.D.).

The Nicolaitans were, then, Gentile Christian Antinomians, who abused Paul's doctrine of freedom. But it is not the apostle Paul and his helpers that the rebukes are directed against (Baur, Schwegler, Volkmar, Holtzmann, Renan). Those who hold this view refer to Rev. ii. 9, which speaks of those who say they are Jews, and are not, but are a synagogue of Satan; but these parties are not the Nicolaitans, nor a heretical party within the church, but enemies and persecutors of the Christians. They were Jews who were hostile to the gospel, and unworthy of their name. Nor can the words of Rev. ii. 2 be applied to Paul, for he was already dead, and would no longer be an object of hatred; nor did his co-laborers desire to be called "apostles." Moreover, the vicious practices attributed to the Nicolaitans are the very ones that Paul himself likewise deprecated (1 Cor. v. 1 sqq., vi. 12 sqq., etc.). Wholly without foundation is the further opinion, recently advanced by Völter, that the false apos-ties (Rev. ii. 2), Balaamites (ii. 14), and Jezebel were Montanists, and the Nicolaitans (ii. 6, 15) Gnostics (Ophites) of the year 160-170 (explanations which are then used to prove that the epistles to the seven churches were inserted in the Book of Revelation in the second part of the second century).

The Nicolaitans are not mentioned by the Church Fathers until Irenæus, who speaks of them as the followers of Nicolas, one of the seven deacons mentioned in Acts vi. 5 (1. 26, 3). This is to be explained by the fact, that, at an earlier time, not so much stress was laid upon a complete list of the heresies, and by no means proves that the sect had grown up after Justin Martyr and Hegesippus wrote. The order in which Irenæus treats them (1. 26, 3; comp. III. 11, 1) indicates that they flourished before Cerinthus, while they anticipated his doctrines. He, however, does not know of any Nicolaitans of his own day; for he does not bring them into connection with any of the heresies he mentions after Basilides (1. 28, 2). What Tertullian says about them (Præscrip., 33; Adv. Marc., i. 29; De Pudic., 19) is evidently taken from the Apocalypse. The statements of Hippolytus (Philos., 7, 36) are based upon those of Irenæus. He adds, that the fall of Nicolas (the supposed founder of the sect) was occasioned by his jealousy of his beautiful wife. This is the only tradition found in the writings of the Fathers which is independent of the statements of the Apocalypse, and may well be considered unhistorical.

The statement of the Fathers, as well as the evident presumption of the Apocalypse, that the name was well known, indicate that Nicolas was the founder of the sect, and that the name (from νικῶ, "to rule," and λαός, "people") was not a symbolical imitation of the Hebrew Balaamite (בַּלְעָם, "to take possession," and עַם, "people"), as Vitringa, Herder, Hengstenberg, Düsterdieck, and others have held.

NICOLE, Pierre, b. at Chartres, Oct. 13, 1625; d. in Paris, Nov. 16, 1695; received a very careful education, first at home, by his father, who was a parliamentary advocate; afterwards, in the College d'Harcourt, where he studied philosophy. Finally he determined to devote himself exclusively to theology, and it was his great aim to become a doctor and professor at the Sorbonne. Meanwhile, his connections with the Port-Royal, through his aunt, Mother Marie de Saint-Ange Sniureau, and the furious controversy concerning the five propositions of Jansenius, drew him away from the university. In Port-Royal he never rose above the rank of a clerc tonsuré; but he soon became one of the most celebrated teachers of that institution, and one of the most prominent representatives of Jansenism. He translated Pascal's Provinciales into Latin, and accompanied the text with very sharp notes and commentaries (1658). In connection with Arnaud he wrote Logique de Port-Royal, 1659. Among his original works are the so-called Petite perpétuité (1661) and Grande perpétuité (1669-76, 3 vols., in defence of Jansenism), the Imaginaires (1664) and Visio-vaires (1665-66, a kind of imitation of Pascal's Provinciales), Essais de Morale (1671, 14 vols.), several polemical treatises against Calvinism, etc. His Life, by Goujet, is found in the last volume of his Essais de Morale. See also the histories of Port-Royal by BESOIGNE, DOM CLÉMENTET, and SAINTE-BEUVE. C. PFENDER.

NICOPOLIS was the name of several cities in Asia, Africa, and Europe. That Nicopolis in which Paul determined to winter (Tit. iii. 12) must have been either that of Thrace or that of Epirus. The subscription to the Epistle, which, however, is a later addition, decides for the former, having "Nicopolis of Macedonia;" but most commentators have, with Jerome, decided for the latter, as best agreeing with the travelling-plan of the apostle. The Nicopolis of Epirus was built by Augustus, in commemoration of his victory at Actium, B.C. 31.

NIEBUHR, Carsten, b. in Hanover, March 17, 1733; d. at Meldorf in Holstein, April 26, 1815; studied mathematics at Göttingen; entered the Danish service, and accompanied a Danish expedition to Arabia in 1761. The other members of the expedition died; but Niebuhr carried out its plan with great energy and success; and after his return to Copenhagen, in 1767, he published his Beschreibung von Arabien (1772) and Reisen in Arabien (1774-78), which are still of value. He is the father of the great historian of Rome, BARTHOLOMÆUS NIEBUHR (1776-1831).

NIEDNER, Christian Wilhelm, one of the most distinguished modern church historians, son of a minister; was b. in Oberwinkel, Saxony, Aug. 9, 1797; d. in Berlin, Aug. 13, 1865. He studied theology in Leipzig; became privatdocent there with Theile and Hase, professor extraordinary in 1829, and doctor of theology and ordinary professor in 1838. The same year appeared his work on Hermes, Philosophia Hermesi Bonnensis novarum. in theologia errorum explicatio et existimatio. He combined an interest for philosophy and theology, and his lectures on church history were pervaded with the philosophical spirit. After Ilgen's death (1814) he undertook the presidency of the historical and theological society, founded in 1811, and the editorial care of the Zeitschrift für die hist. Theologie. After much hesitation he published a manual of church history, Geschichte der christlichen Kirche (1 vol., Leipzig, 1816, 2d ed., Berlin, 1866). Baur very properly praised the comprehensiveness of this work, the careful investigations of the author, and the clear selection of his material, but deplors the scholastic and ponderous style. Niedner at once took a place at the side of Neander, Gieseler, and Hase, and is distinguished by his philosophical treatment of the details, but falls behind them in the vivid portrayal of character, clear summarization, and skill of arrangement. Niedner held a middle position in theology, and had as little sympathy with Strauss and Baur as with strict confessional orthodoxy. His last published work during his Leipzig residence was De subsistentia τῶ θεῶ λόγῳ apud Philonem tributa (Leipzig, 1849). After the revolution of 1848 he resigned his professorship, retired to Wittenberg, where he remained till 1859, when he followed a call to Berlin as professor and Consistorialrath. He was one of those who protested against Schenkel's Charakterbild Jesu. At his death the editorial supervision of the Zeitschrift für d. hist. Theologie passed into the hands of Kahnis, who retained it till 1875, when the periodical was superseded by Brieger's Zeitschrift. [There was privately printed his Eindeutung in die Geschichte der Philosophie u. Theologie christlicher Zeit, als Wissenschaft u. Lehre.]

Niedner was a man of almost childlike piety, humble and modest, and thankful for the least attention. He possessed a remarkable industry, at times allowed himself sleep only every other night, seldom took a walk, and "had no time" to get married. In spite of all his immense book knowledge, however, he knew little about the real world, and took no interest in art. He was a great historical investigator, but no writer of history. P. M. TZSCHIRNER.

NIEMEYER, August Hermann, b. at Halle, Sept. 1, 1751; d. there June 7, 1828. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor there in 1779, and director of all the Francke institutions in 1799. He was a very prolific writer on practical theology and education: Christliche Religionslehre (1790), Grundsätze der Erziehung (1796), etc. His standpoint was that of a mild rationalism. His son, H. A. Niemeyer, edited the symbolical books of the Reformed churches: Collectio Confessionum in ecclesiis reformatis publicatarum, Lipsiæ, 1840. The Westminster standards were first overlooked, but afterwards published in an appendix (the Latin version, but not the English original).

NIHILISM (from nihil, "nothing") denotes in theology the view that the human nature of Christ had no independence, no individuality, no true subsistence; that, indeed, the human nature of Christ was nihil. By a mistake the view was ascribed to Petrus Lombardus. It was condemned in 1179 by Alexander III.

NIKON, b. in a village near Nizhnei-Novgorod, 1605; d. Aug. 17, 1681; was educated in a monastery, and ordained priest; married (which is not against the order of the Russian Church), but separated from his wife after ten years, and lived for some time as a hermit in an island of the White Sea. Appointed archimandrite of the monastery of Novazaskoi by the Czar Alexei Michaelovitch, he was, in 1647, made metropolitan of Novgorod, and in 1652 patriarch of Moscow. He was a man of great practical ability, and occupies a prominent place in the history of the Russian Church. Among his principal reforms are the introduction of the Greek Church music, and the revision of the Russian Liturgy, Prayer-Book, and Confession of Faith. Originally adopted from the Greek Church, and simply translated into Old Russian, the very translation was not perfect; and in the course of time a great number of deviations had crept in by the carelessness of copyists, by arbitrary changes, etc. In 1654 Nikon induced the Russian clergy to undertake a revision. The learned apparatus was gathered, a committee appointed, etc. The work, however, did not meet with universal favor, but gave rise to the sect of the Raskolniks, or Old Believers. In 1658 Nikon fell into disgrace, and retired to the monastery of Woskresensk. In 1666 he was summoned before a synod in Moscow, and formally condemned and deposed. Shortly before his death, a new czar, Fedor Alexigevitch, cancelled the verdict of the synod, and recalled Nikon; but he died on his way to the capital. See J. BACKMEISTER: Beiträge zur Lebensgeschichte des P. N., Riga, 1788. NILE, The, is not mentioned in the New Testament, but often in the Old Testament, though not under its native name. It is called Nihor, or Shihor, "the black stream" (Josh. xiii. 3; Isa. xxiii. 3; Jer. ii. 18; 1 Chron. xiii. 5); or Year, which in plural form means, not only the river itself, but also its affluents, arms, canals, etc. (Ps. lxxviii. 44; Ezek. xxix. 3, xxx. 12); or "the flood of Egypt" (Amos viii. 8, ix. 5); or simply "the river" (Gen. xli. 1; Exod. i. 22, ii. 3). Though intimately connected with the earlier history of the Hebrews (Exod. ii. 3, vii. 20; Num. xi. 5; Ps. cv. 29; Jer. xlvi. 7; Zech. xiv. 17), the Nile does not seem to have made so deep an impression on them as the Euphrates.

The Nile proper is formed by the junction of Bahr-el-Azrek, or the Blue Nile, and Bahr-el-Abiad or the White Nile, at Khartoom, in Lat. 15° 35' N., at an elevation of 1,188 feet above the level of the sea. The White Nile, which is the true Nile, comes from Victoria Nyanza, a large lake situated under the equator, at an elevation of 3,740 feet. The Blue Nile has its sources in the alpine regions of Abyssinia, at an elevation of 9,000 feet. After receiving its last tributary, the Atbara or the Black Nile, at El Damer, in Lat. 17° 45' N., the Nile descends the Nubian terraces in a very rapid course, forming its last cataract at Assouan, in Lat. 24° 10' N., on the boundary between Nubia and Egypt. With an average fall of two inches to a mile, and a mean velocity of three miles an hour, it then flows through Egypt to the Mediterranean, separating, in Lat. 9° 1' N. into two arms, Rosetta and Damietta, and forming a delta a hundred and fifty miles broad at the sea.

The most prominent feature in the natural history of this famous river is its annual inundation, by which the arid and barren valley through which it flows is transformed into one of the most productive countries on the globe. June 25 the water begins to rise, and it continues rising until Sept. 21. At Thebes the flood reaches forty feet, at Cairo twenty-seven feet, and at Rosetta four feet; and comparatively small changes in these figures cause great calamities. When the water retreats, it has not only furnished the soil with the necessary moisture, but it leaves a black mud, which acts as a powerful fertilizer.

NILES. — I. Nathaniel, Congregational clergyman; was b. at South Kingston, R.I., April 3, 1711; d. at West Fairlee, Vt., Oct. 31, 1828. Graduating at Princeton in 1766, he studied theology under Dr. Bellamy, and, after preaching for a while, his health failed, and he settled at Norwich, but not as pastor. Here he invented the method of making wire from a bar of iron by water-power; represented his district in the Legislature of Connecticut, and, on removing to Vermont, became speaker of the House of Representatives in 1781; and was for many years judge of the Supreme Court of the state. He was an able metaphysician, and for many years held a preaching service in his own house. He published Discourses on Secret Prayer, 1773, Discourses on Sin and Forgiveness, 1773, Sermons — the Perfection of God, the Fountain of Good, 1777, etc. — II. Samuel, a Congregational minister; b. on Block Island, May 1, 1674; d. May 1, 1762. He graduated at Harvard, preached at Kingston, R.I., 1702-10, and was installed pastor at Braintree in 1711. He published A Brief and Sorrowful Account of the Present Churches in New England, 1745; Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin, 1757, etc. — III. Samuel, son of the former; b. at Braintree, Mass., Dec. 14, 1743; d. at Abington, Jan. 16, 1814. Graduating at Princeton in 1769, he studied theology with Rev. Ezekiel Dodge of Abington, and Dr. Bellamy of Bethlehem, Conn., and in February, 1771, was called to the Congregational Church in Abington. He was esteemed an able thinker. He published several sermons, On the Death of Washington (1800) and other topics.

NILUS is a name of frequent occurrence in the history of the Greek Church, and forms in its literature a centre around which, at various epochs, a great number of writings has agglomerated. Leo Allatius was the first to investigate the subject, in his Diatriba de Nilis et Psellis; and he distinguishes no less than twenty-one different authors of the name. Later investigations have been made by Fabricius and Harles.

The Elder Nilus, the pupil and friend of Chrysostom, belonged, according to the Menologium Græcum, to a distinguished family, and held the highest positions in the civil service, but resigned his offices, renounced his wealth, and went in 420 to Mount Sinai, together with his oldest son, to live there as a hermit; while his wife entered an Egyptian monastery. He died probably about 440. He was a prolific writer; and his works, especially his letters, have great interest for the study of monasticism and asceticism. A complete edition does not exist; but there are collections by P. F. ZINUS, Venice, 1557; P. POSSINUS, Paris, 1639; J. M. SUARESIUS, Rome, 1673; and LEO ALLATIUS, Rome, 1668-78, 2 vols. fol.

The Younger Nilus, or Nilus Rossanensis, a Greek by descent, but born at Rossano in Calabria, lived in the tenth century, and represents a very severe form of asceticism. He was a friend of Archbishop Philagotus of Piacenza, the rival of Gregory V., and the victim of Otho III. A life of Nilus, written by M. CARYOPHILUS (Rome, 1624), is found in Act. Sanct., xxvi.

Nilus the Archimandrite (surnamed Doxopatrius) lived for some time in Sicily, and wrote, at the instance of King Roger, his Syntagma de quinque patriarchalibus thronis, 1143, edited by Stephen le Moyne, in Jar. Sacr., i. As it is written from a Greek point of view, it is, of course, offensive to Roman-Catholic critics. GASS.

NIMBUS, The, or Glory (sometimes a ring, and sometimes a disk, sometimes of gold and sometimes of some bright color), was placed behind the head of a person, in order to indicate symbolically that luminous irradiancy which was supposed to emanate and surround a divine being. Thus it was used among the Hindus and in Egypt, among the Greeks and in Rome, where it finally came to denote simple power. By the Christians it was adopted in the fifth century as a symbol of sanctity. It was first applied to Christ alone, then to the angels, and finally to Mary and the saints. In representations of God, the nimbus is sometimes made triangular, with a reference to the Trinity. The nimbus of persons still living when painted, was square. In the eighth century the appliance was universally used in Christian art.

NIM'ROD (נִמְרוֹד, Νεβρώδ in the Septuagint, Νεβρώδης in Josephus) was, according to Gen. x. 8-12 and 1 Chron. i. 10, a son of Cush, a grandson of Ham, and a great-grandson of Noah, a mighty hunter before the Lord, and a great ruler upon the earth, the founder of an empire. The beginning of his kingdom was Babel, together with three other cities in the land of Shinar, — Erech and Accad and Calneh. Out of that land he went forth to Asshur, where he built Nineveh and three other cities, — Rehoboth and Calah and Resen, — which finally were united to Nineveh, the whole forming one huge city. The first nine verses of the eleventh chapter of Genesis tell us how the Tower of Babel was erected, and how it was destroyed; the result of which, such as it presented itself in the time of Moses, is laid before us in the table of nations, contained in the tenth chapter. When an old Oriental tradition, which we know from fragments of Berossus, places the building of the Tower of Babel and the confusion of tongues in the tenth generation from Noah, that account agrees perfectly with the chronology of Moses; and when Khesias identifies Nimrod with Nimus, and Abydenos and Artapanos identify him with Baal, it seems quite probable that the glory which surrounded Nimrod made his name Nin, a surname or title of the spouse of Semiramis, and even confounded him with the great Baal. (Comp. NIEBUHR: Geschichte Assurs und Babels seit Phul, 1857.) Nor is the chronological discrepancy so very great when the Koran speaks of Abraham as having been pursued by Nimrod. The building of the Tower of Babel cannot have been begun before 2150 B.C., as a considerable time must have elapsed before the descendants of Ham and his wife became so numerous that they could found an empire, and erect so huge a structure. Nor can it have been begun much later; for the foundation of an empire stretching from Babel to Nineveh, and comprising eight large cities, must have required a period of about fifty years. But in 2100 B.C. the tower was destroyed; in 1995 Noah died; in 1993 Abraham was born.

As the grandson of Ham, Nimrod inherited the hatred of the family; and in him the mighty hunter, the fierceness of the tribe found its proper expression. He then became the chief of the

Hamites. After leaving the abodes of Noah, the rebels advanced to the south; and they finally settled in the region where the eastern mountains and the western desert-plateau narrow the plain of Mesopotamia, and press the two great rivers, the Euphrates and the Tigris, nearer to each other. There the city of Babel arose on the western bank of the Euphrates, safely located between the stream and the desert; and the empire began to flourish. Shem shall be a lord unto his brethren and all their descendants, had Noah said. But we will make a Shem to ourselves, said the Hamites; and Nimrod became their chosen leader. His name corresponded to his destiny. Linguistically, the easiest derivation of the name is from Marad ("to separate," "we will separate"); but historically, the most acceptable derivation is from Nin Rod ("Ninus the hunter"). But to form the centre of the rebellion, a man was not sufficient: it ought also to present itself under the form of some huge monument. Consequently the building of the tower was begun, that true prototype of the Pyramids of Egypt, such as it is still recognizable in the colossal ruins of Birs Nimrod, discovered by Niebuhr. In order to secure the accomplishment of that gigantic undertaking, it was necessary to make an expedition to the north. There stood the Shemites, the legitimate masters; but Nimrod built Nineveh and three other cities. To the west and south the natural boundaries gave safety; and to the east lived Cush, the father of Nimrod, and Chawilah, his brother. Meanwhile, block was laid upon block, and the tower began to rise high. Into heaven should its top reach; and it should stand as a token that the Hamites had made a Shem to themselves, and as a pledge that they would cling together forever. The old tradition tells us how Nimrod himself challenged the divine judgment, shooting with arrows towards the sky when it thundered, as if he wanted to wage war against the thunderer. The judgment came. The tower was destroyed by lightning, the tongues were confounded, and the Hamites were scattered in all directions. Only a small remnant of the tribe remained in the country, which amalgamated with the advancing Shemites, the Cashdim, and formed the Chaldean population. NINEVEH AND ASSYRIA.¹ 1. Opposite the present Mosul, on the eastern bank of the Tigris, rise two artificial hills. The northern one, partially occupied by a Turkish village, is called Koyundjik. The southern hill is popularly called Nebi Yunus, with reference to the mosque erected on it to the prophet (Nebi) Jonah, but is known by the custodians of the mosque as Nineveh. The distance between the two hills can be walked in a quarter of an hour. The two hills are united on the western side by a wall, which, extending beyond them, terminates at both ends at the channel of the Tigris, which in this locality bends out towards the west. The western wall is two miles and a half long; the northern wall is one mile and a third, the eastern wall three miles and a quarter, and the southern wall half a mile long. The eastern wall is intersected by the River Choser [Khosr], which, flowing through the ruins, passes under Kouyundjik, and empties into the Tigris. South of the Choser, at the point where the road to Bagdad intersects the eastern wall, there are two hills, which without doubt mark the site of the east gate, and will offer a rich reward to some future investigator. Four other walls, and three water-ditches outside of the eastern wall, made that part of the city especially strong. The walls are said to be still fifty feet high in some places. Xenophon found this locality in about the same condition as Botta and Layard. Rich, for many years the English resident of Bagdad, convinced himself, by a personal inspection in 1820, that it concealed the ruins of Nineveh. Layard and Rassam began excavations; George Smith, under the direction of Rassam, resumed them (1873-76); and Rassam himself has continued them since Smith's sudden death (1876). The excavations have been heretofore almost exclusively confined to Kouyundjik and Nebi Yunus, where the royal palaces were built.

In the south-western part of Kouyundjik, Layard, who spent the years 1815-17 and 1849-51 on the spot, discovered the palace of Sennacherib,—the largest yet discovered, with seventy-one rooms and halls. Rassam, in the northern part of the hill, discovered in 1854 the palace of Asurbanipal (the Greek Sardanapalus), whose highly finished bas-reliefs, and rich library of several thousand clay tablets, now form the most precious part of the Assyriological collection in the British Museum. In 1872 George Smith had the good fortune to discover, in the British Museum, upon the clay tablets found piled up in the so-called Lion-hunt room, the Babylonian account of the creation and the flood. Valuable tablets are continually being unearthed; and, in spite of the fact that the British Museum employs many diggers, a hundred years will yet be required, in the judgment of Rassam, to transport all the monuments to England.

The excavations on Nebi Yunus were checked, on account of its being the site of the mosque and a graveyard. Rassam, however, came to an understanding with the custodians of the mosque, and conducted investigations on a limited scale. He has traced three royal palaces,—of Ramannirari III., Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon.

The cuneiform inscriptions furnish us with the following results concerning Nineveh's name and history. The name of the city was Ninua, or Ninua, and was derived from the sacred non-Shemitic language of Babylonia, which the Assyrians delighted to use, down to the latest times, to designate temples and palaces. The second syllable, na or nu (lengthened forms naa or nua), signifies resting or dwelling place. The meaning of the first, n, is not so clear. Usually the word signifies "fatness," "abundance." At any rate, thus much is plain, that Ninua, or Ninua, has no etymological affinity with the Assyrian nūnu ("fish"). As regards the founding of Nineveh, the cuneiform inscriptions say nothing; but it could not have happened long after that of the city of Assur. The third oldest Assyrian king of whom we know any thing, Samsi-Raman I. (about 1760 B.C.), erected a temple in Nineveh, or rather "restored" it. A temple of Nebo and Merodach was also built at Nineveh at an ancient period, and perhaps by Ramannirari. According to Smith, Salmanassar I. (about 1300 B.C.) built a palace here, and made it the seat of government. Asurnazirpal and his son, Salmanassar II., rebuilt temple and palace; and, at the close of the latter's reign, Nineveh rose at the head of twenty-six other cities, including Assur, against him, following the lead of his son, Asur-dannim-pal. Salmanassar's other son, Samsi-Raman III., put down the rebellion, ascended the throne, and adorned the temple of Istar. His son, Ramannirari III., built a new temple for Nebo and Merodach. All these buildings were erected on the site now occupied by the hill Kouyundjik. Ramannirari III. built the first palace at Nebi Yunus. Tiglath-Pileser II. built a palace at the bend of the River Choser. Sargon built a new royal city,¹ but rebuilt the temple of Nebo and Merodach, as bricks bear record. Nineveh's most glorious period is associated with the name of his son, Sennacherib. In a cylinder inscription he calls Nineveh the "lofty city, the darling city of Istar, where all the precious things (?) of the gods and goddesses are kept, the continuing spot, the eternal foundation, the place adorned with art, where every kind of work of art, all that is precious and beautiful, is gathered, where, time out of mind, the kings, the ancestors of my fathers, exercised rule over Assyria, and received the annual tribute of princes from the four quarters of the globe." He continues to speak of these public works, which he began in 702 B.C., and on which he employed an immense body of prisoners of war. Tearing down the old palace, he rebuilt it on a much larger scale, with gold and silver, alabaster and ivory, palm, cedar, and cypress wood, and encompassed it with a park, with trees and fountains, and a lake. He dug canals to supply the park with water. In 691, in spite of his campaigns, he instituted water-works on a grand scale to supply the city with water. Eighteen canals were dug leading into the Choser; so that its stream was very appreciably augmented. Sennacherib also encircled the city with high walls,— "which were not before that time."—built a second palace where Nebi Yunus now is, and another large building for his chariots, etc. Esarhaddon finished, not later than 673, a new palace, and rebuilt Sennacherib's stables. Asurbanipal, the last Assyrian king but one, enlarged and adorned the Bit ridūti, or royal harem at Kouyundjik, the palace in which Esarhaddon was born, but avoided building the terrace too high, "out of reverence for the temples of the gods." This sketch of the buildings of Nineveh may be closed with the mention of the great eastern city gate, through which many triumphal processions passed, and the suburb Rêbit Ninā ("city Rehoboth," Gen. x. 11) which was outside the walls.

The houses of the people were probably huts of clay covered with gypsum, such as are found now in Mosul. Clay formed the chief article in the composition of the palaces. Nineveh was also not far removed from quarries of marble and alabaster, and in this respect enjoyed a great advantage over Babylon. The architecture of Nineveh was copied after the Babylonian. The height of her palaces has been much discussed. Rassam has recently expressed himself in favor of the view that they were two stories high, and thinks the walls of the lower story were four or five feet thick, and were made of bricks plated with tablets. The inner rooms, like the library of Asurbanipal, either were destitute of windows altogether, or had them in the roof.

II. CALAH [spelt by Delitzsch, Kelach].— This was another principal city of Assyria. It is now represented by an imposing wall, with traces of fifty-eight towers on the north side alone, and an artificial hill in the southern corner, four hundred by six hundred yards. A village in the vicinity bears the name Nimrod. The distance from Konyundjik is twenty miles. In the north-western corner of the hill are the ruins of the great temple tower, laid bare by the excavations of Layard. A ditch separates it from the north-west palace of Asurnazirpal, one of the most perfect of the Assyrian structures, and adorned with well-preserved sculptures, which now adorn the British Museum. The immense winged bulls and lions at the entrance, and other sculptures, were left by Layard, and may still be seen. Another palace—the central palace—is near by, and in it was found the celebrated black obelisk of Salmanassar II. Not far off is the south-west palace of Esarhaddon, which has been much injured by fire. There is also the south-east palace of the last Assyrian king, Asur-etil-ilani-ukini. It is much smaller than the others. Rassam found underneath it the ruins of an older building. In 1875 the same Assyriologist discovered the temple of Asurnazirpal close by the north-west palace, but in complete ruin. Calah (Gen. x. 11, 12) was built, according to the cuneiform inscriptions, by Salmanassar I. (1300 B.C.). His successors abandoned it until Asurnazirpal (about 880 B.C.) introduced its golden period by the construction of a temple and palaces.

III. The plain on which Nineveh and Calah are situated is sown with small hills full of ruins. The larger villages in this locality are now called Keremlis, Birtelleh, and Bellawât. The last place, which is fifteen miles east of Mosul, and nine miles north-east of Nimrod, has sprung into importance since Rassam's excavations in 1878. An Arab found there in 1875 some bronze tablets containing Assyrian pictures and inscriptions. They contain an illustrated history of the first nine years of the reign of Salmanassar II. (860-823), which are of inestimable value for the insight they afford into the civil life, military organization, etc., of the time. They also inform us that the site of Balawât was occupied by the Assyrian city Imgur-Bîl, and was founded by Asurnazirpal.

The city of Resen, mentioned in Gen. x. 12 as being between Nineveh and Calah, is, in my opinion, to be identified with the hill Selamijeh. The name has not yet been discovered on the inscriptions.

IV. ASSUR.— Assyria Proper extended from the beginning farther south; and its oldest capital, Assur, was a good deal farther down the stream, about sixty English miles from Mosul, and on the right bank of the Tigris. Its site is now marked by the large hill Kileh-Shergat (Rassam, Kala-Shergat). The ruins are in the utmost confusion, and it would require unlimited means and great labor to investigate them thoroughly. English and French parties have instituted several different excavations, but Rassam (1853) is the only one who has met with success. He discovered the palace of Tiglath-Pileser (about 1120 B.C.), and three octagon clay prisms, whose inscriptions are the oldest accounts of any length, dating from early Assyrian times. The oldest temple in Assur was built by the first Assyrian king, Belkapkapu (about 1870 B.C.), as bricks from its foundation state. Samsi-Raman I. built, in 1818 B.C., the Ann and Raman temple, which Tiglath-Pileser rebuilt six hundred and forty-one years later. Ramannirari I. and Salmanassar I. likewise built palaces there. Tiglath-Pileser's son, Asurbelkala, resided in Assur; and Asurnazirpal restored dilapidated structures of earlier kings. His son, Sabnanassar II., abandoned the city, preferring Calah. Assur revolted, but was brought into subjection again by Samsi-Raman III. The city is mentioned only seldom after this; but we know that it outlived the Assyrian kingdom, from a cylinder of Cyrus, which mentions it in the list of the cities he conquered. The Old Testament does not mention Assur, and its identification with Ellasar (Gen. xiv. 1) is usually discarded. Whenever the term Asshur is used, it designates the country.

The following points are furnished, by the cuneiform inscriptions, in respect to the city and country of Assur. The oldest Assyrian settlement founded by Babylonian colonists, probably only a few centuries before 2000 B.C., was designated with a name of the sacred language of Babylonia, Ausar, which probably means "a watered, or well-watered meadow,"—a name which the banks of the Tigris at Kileh-Shergat fully merited. The god of this settlement would naturally be their principal divinity; and it early passed into the good god Asûr, a good Shemitic word, from 'atar ("to go out, go forward, succeed"). An additional s was inserted to compensate for the length of the vowel. The name of the god Asûr occurs twice in the Old Testament.— in the compounds, Esarhaddon and Asnapper (Ez. iv. 10 = Asurbanipal).

V. The impression which Genesis (x. 8-12) leaves, that the Assyrians were a colony from the Babylonians, is fully confirmed by the excavations. We will here give the main reasons for the assumption that the Assyrians were Shemites and Babylonians. The classification of Asshur as Shem's second son is corroborated by the statues and relief pictures, which represent the Assyrians with facial contour quite similar to that of the Jews and Arabs of to-day (Kiepert). A second proof is the Assyrian language, which is pure Shemitic, though not Aramaic. The active commerce, from the ninth century B.C., of the Assyrians with nomadic tribes speaking Aramaic, accounts for Balshakch (2 Kings xviii. 26) understanding Hezekiah's commissioners; and it is expressly stated in the cuneiform inscriptions, that Assyrians high in office understood the Aramaic as well as their own tongue. The Assyrian characters are likewise the same as the Babylonian: not merely cuneiform, but derived from the oldest Babylonian cuneiform style, and, for the most part, wholly identical with it. The Assyrian architecture was likewise derived from the Babylonian. And, finally, one of the most important proofs is the religion. The Assyrian pantheon, Assur alone excepted, is identical with the Babylonian. The gods Bel, Dagon, Samas, with which the oldest royal Assyrian names are compounded (Belkapkapu, Isme-Dagan, Samsi-Raman), were well known in Babylon. Raman-nirari (about 1300 B.C.) calls his helpers Anu, Assur, Samas, Raman, and Istar. Tiglath-Pileser I. invokes Assur, Bel, Sin, Samas, Raman, Adar, and Istar, "the great gods which rule heaven and earth." Salmanassar II. glorifies, in his obelisk inscription, Assur, and then (following the Babylonian list). Anu, Bel, Aë, Sin, Raman, Samas, Marduk, Adar, Nergal, Nusku, Beltis, and Istar. The religious customs and conceptions of the Assyrians were also substantially those of the Babylonians.

NINIAN, or NINYAS, the Apostle of the Southern Picts; went, according to the Act. Sanct. Sept., vol. v. p. 318, to Rome in 370, and was ordained by Pope Siricius in 394. The words of Bede, however (Hist. Eccl., iii. 4), allow a somewhat later date for the activity of Ninian; and historical circumstances seem to fix it at the middle of the fifth century.

NIS'ROCH (Hebrew, נִסְרוֹךְ; the Sept., Ἰσάραχ, Ἰσάρακ, etc.: Josephus: Ant., X. I. 5, Ἰράσκη) is mentioned in 2 Kings xix. 37 and Isa. xxxvii. 38 as a divinity worshipped at Nineveh at the time of Sennacherib. In his temple, and while praying to him, Sennacherib was killed by his own son. The derivation of the name is very uncertain. It does not occur in the cuneiform inscriptions. As a curiosity, it may be mentioned, that the rabbins know that the idol of Nisroch was made of a board of the ark of Noah. The circumstance that the name does not occur on the monuments, while the Septuagint renders it Asarak, seems to indicate that Nisroch is a simple corruption of, or another form for, Assur. See IKEN: Dissertatio de Nisroch idolo Assyr., Bremen, 1747. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

NITSCHMANN, David, one of the first missionaries, and the first bishop, of the Moravian Church; b. at Zauchtenthal, Moravia, on the 27th of December, 1696; d. at Bethlehem, Penn., Oct. 8, 1772. In consequence of severe persecutions, he fled from his native country to Herrnhut (1724), and became a leader in the evangelistic work of the Moravians. Accompanied by Leonard Dober, he set out afoot for Copenhagen on the 21st of August, 1732; which day constitutes the anniversary of the beginning of the Moravian missions. Although they met with opposition and ridicule at every step, they persevered, reached Copenhagen, and sailed to St. Thomas, where they arrived on the 13th of December, and began to preach the gospel to the negro slaves. Nitschmann returned to Europe in the following year, and on the 13th of March, 1735, was consecrated to the episcopacy by Bishop Daniel Ernst Jablonsky at Berlin. Soon after, the new bishop led a body of Moravians to Georgia. John and Charles Wesley were on board the vessel which bore these immigrants across the Atlantic. The former was deeply impressed with their piety and the fearlessness they manifested amidst a terrible storm. He was present also at the first Moravian ordination on American soil, administered by Nitschmann; and the great simplicity, as well as solemnity, of the act, made him forget the seventeen hundred years between, and imagine himself in one of those assemblies over which Paul the tent-maker or Peter the fisherman presided (Wesley's Journal, i. p. 20). In the course of his subsequent life, Bishop Nitschmann undertook many journeys on land, and fifty voyages on sea, in the interests of the church of his fathers and for the spread of the kingdom of God. He labored in different parts of Germany, in Livonia, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, in Great Britain, in Georgia, North Carolina, New York, and Pennsylvania. "His walk," says Zinzendorf, "was single, his character upright, his authority over against the world great, his zeal as a witness of Jesus untiring, and his success in organizing churches remarkable." Cf. SCHWEINITZ: Fathers of the American Moravian Church, Bethl., 1881. E. DE SCHWEINITZ.

NITSCHMANN, John, a bishop of the Moravian Church; b. in Schönau, Moravia, 1703; d. May 6, 1772. He was made bishop in 1741, and labored in America (1749-51), England (1752-57), Germany, and Holland. He was simple in his habits, effective as a preacher, and wise as an administrator.

NITZSCH, Karl Immanuel, one of the most distinguished representatives, in the nineteenth century, of the school of theology occupying an intermediate position between the old supernaturalism and rationalism (Vermittlungstheologie), and, next after Schleiermacher, the first (in time, at least) of the systematic writers on practical theology; was b. at Bornä, Saxony, Sept. 21, 1787; d. in Berlin, Aug. 21, 1868. His theological training was secured at Wittenberg, where his father, Karl Ludwig Nitzsch (see below), was professor; and he became docent in 1810 with the dissertation, De testamentis duodecim patriarcharum, lib. vet. test. pseudepigraph., and in 1811 was ordained as assistant pastor of the Schlosskirche. He remained uninterruptedly at his post during the siege and bombardment of the town by the French in 1813. In 1817 he was appointed professor in the recently founded seminary at Wittenberg, and in 1822 accepted a call to the university of Bonn. He had received the degree of D.D. from Berlin in 1817; the occasion being his fine scholarship, and some dissertations in the Theologische Studien, which he edited (1816). In 1829 he published his System der christlichen Lehre (6th ed., 1851), of which an English translation was made by Robert Montgomery and Hennen, Edinburgh, 1849. This work defined his position towards rationalism, supernaturalism, and Schleiermacher. He said himself that he had "learned more from his father, Daub, and Schleiermacher than from any other teacher, but had been obliged to draw back from them all more or less." While he differed from Schleiermacher in the doctrine of God's relation to the world, the divine attributes, etc., he also substituted for Schleiermacher's "Christian consciousness" the Word of God itself. Notwithstanding these differences, however, he was willing to be placed at the side of Twisten as the principal representative of Schleiermacher's theology; and he was never tired of magnifying that theologian's services in making a sharp distinction between metaphysics and theology. In this period, Nitzsch wrote his able reply to Möhler's work on symbolics (Eine protestant. Beantwortung der Symbolik Möhlers), and made valuable and frequent contributions to the Theolog. Studien u. Kritiken, under the editorial care of Ullmann and Umbreit. The most of these dissertations appeared, after the author's death, under the title Gesammelte Abhandlungen von Dr. K. L. Nitzsch. Gotha, 1870, 2 vols.

During the Bonn period (1822-47), Nitzsch also acted as university preacher, and took a very active participation in ecclesiastical affairs, such as the revision of the Liturgy, and the measures looking to the union of the Lutheran and Reformed communions. Of such union he was heartily in favor, and in its interest wrote, among other things, Urkundenbuch d. evang. Union (Bonn, 1853) and Würdigung d. von Dr. Kahnis gegen d. evang. Union u. deren theol. Vertreter gerichteten Angriffe (Berlin, 1854).

Nitzsch was called in 1847 to the university of Berlin, where he continued to labor as professor till his death. He was also honored with a seat in the highest ecclesiastical council (Oberconsistorium, changed in 1852 to the Oberkirchenrath), and was elected a representative to Parliament in 1849. In 1854 he was appointed provost of St. Nicolai Church, — a valuable sinecure. On June 16, 1860, he was permitted to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his theological activity, and on June 24, 1868, his golden wedding. The most important literary work of the Berlin period, yea, of his entire life, was his Practical Theology (Praktische Theologie), begun in 1847, and finished in 1867 (second ed. 1859). The first book treats of the theory of church life; the second, of the practice at the present time. Besides these various works, volumes of sermons also appeared from his pen, a complete revised edition in 1867.

Nitzsch was a theologian "from the crown of his head to the sole of his feet." He was not brought up in pietistic circles, and so did not develop the theory of Christianity out of his experience, but vice versa. Niebuhr once said to him, "I would willingly give all my learning if I had your faith." To which Nitzsch replied, "To me, from a moral point of view, Thomas stands as high as Peter." See BEYSCHLAG: K. L. Nitzsch eine Lichtgestalt d. neueren deutsch-evang. Kirchengeschichte, Berlin, 1872. FRIEDRICH NITZSCH.

NITZSCH, Karl Ludwig, professor of theology at Wittenberg; b. in Wittenberg, Aug. 6, 1751; d. there Dec. 5, 1831. He studied at the university of Wittenberg, and, after filling several pastorates, was appointed, in 1790, professor of theology there, and pastor of the city church. He was an ardent follower of Kant, and vigorously opposed the supernaturalists by regarding the essence of Christianity as consisting in its being a moral and rational religion, and faith in Christ as a subordinate matter. His principal treatises were collected in two volumes, — De discrimine revelationis imperatorie et didacticæ prolesionis academica, Viteb., 1830.

NO (Ezek. xxx. 14). or, more completely, No-Amon (Nah. iii. 8), is the biblical name of that old famous city of the "hundred gates" (Homer: Iliad., 9, 383), in Upper Egypt, which the Greeks called Thebes. The biblical name is formed after the Egyptian nu-âmen ("the place of Amon"), the place in which Amon was worshipped, and is aptly rendered in the Septuagint by μερις Ἀμμών, or Διόσπολις, as the Greeks liked to compare their Zeus with the Egyptian Amon. The Greek name is formed after the Egyptian taape ("head"), or te-api ("the great"). Thebes was one of the oldest cities in Egypt: its foundation is never spoken of. In the dawn of history it was the centre of a sacerdotal kingdom. With the eleventh dynasty, the first Theban, it comes to the foreground; and the twelfth dynasty, the second Theban, ruled not only in Thebes and Upper Egypt, but also in Memphis and Lower Egypt: its members were called "kings of both Egypts." During the thirteenth dynasty the invasion of the Hyksos brought on a period of decay; but in the seventeenth century B.C., Amosis of Thebes, the founder of the eighteenth dynasty, liberated the country from the barbarian invaders. Thebes then became the splendid centre of a magnificent kingdom. Situated on both sides of the Nile, at a point where the valley forms a plain of about ten miles breadth, it covered an area of a hundred and forty stadias in circumference, and contained a number of the most stupendous architectural constructions, — the temple of Amon, the royal tombs, the catacombs, etc. With the twenty-first dynasty, however, the royal families from Lower Egypt succeeded those from Thebes; and when, about one thousand years B.C., the residence of the Pharaohs was moved to the Delta, the splendor of the city was gone. It still continued a holy city, a city of glorious monuments and magnificent institutions; and its actual decay did not begin until the days of the Persian conquest. At the time of Strabo it began to fall into ruins, and at present all that is left of it is some huge mounds of debris. NOACHIAN PRECEPTS. See NOAH.

NO'AH AND THE FLOOD. Noah, the son of Lamech (Gen. v. 28 sq.), was the tenth and last in the list of the Sethic line. His father gave him the name "Noah," because, as he said, "he shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed." Noah's life fell in a time of general degradation and vice. God determined to destroy that generation, and limited its continuance to a period of a hundred and twenty years from the time he informed Noah of his purpose. This is the meaning to be put upon Gen. vi. 3. The Flood took place when Noah was six hundred years old (Gen. vii. 11); so that, at the time of receiving this revelation, he was four hundred and eighty years old. According to the Hebrew text, this event took place 1,656 years after the creation: according to the LXX., 2,142; according to the Samaritans, 1,307. Noah was a "just man" (Gen. vi. 9), consecrated to God with his whole heart and life. God commanded him to build an ark, or chest, in which his family, and specimens of all kinds of beasts, might be preserved from the destruction of the Flood. It is not stated in the Old Testament, that he imparted his knowledge of the coming cataclysm to his contemporaries; but the fact seems to be implied in 1 Pet. iii. 20 (comp. Heb. xi. 7). The wonderful structure on which he worked was itself a sermon. If he communicated at all with his generation about the coming evil, he must have preached repentance; but his message found no reception.

The ark, which was divided into three stories, was 300 cubits long, 50 cubits broad, and 30 cubits high [or, allowing 21 inches for a cubit, as Professor Perowne does in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, 525 feet long, 87 feet wide, and 52 feet high. The dimensions of "The Great Eastern" were 691 feet long (on deck), 83 broad, and 58 deep]. Tiele, in his Commentary on Genesis, has calculated that the cubic contents were 3,600,000 feet, and shown, that, if nine-tenths of the space was set apart for the fodder (Gen. vi. 21), 6,666 pairs of animals could be stowed away, with 51 cubic feet for each pair. In 1609 the Memnite P. Jansen of Honr, in Holland, built a vessel after the model of the ark, and discovered that it would hold a third more freight than ships built in the usual way with the same number of cubic feet. The ark was not built for sailing, but for carrying freight. [Sir Walter Raleigh said, "It is very likely that the ark had fundum planum (a flat bottom), and was not rised in form of a ship, with a sharpness forward to cut the waves for the better speed." The same author made an elaborate calculation of the stowage, and found that the ark afforded room "for eighty-nine distinct species of beasts, or, lest any should be omitted, for a hundred several kinds." All the beasts, he thought, "might be kept in one story or room of the ark, in their several cabins, their meat in a second, the birds and their provision in a third, with space to spare for Noah and his family and all their necessaries."]

Noah entered into the ark, with his wife, his three sons and their wives, on the tenth day of the second month of the six hundredth year of his life. On the seventeenth day of the month the "fountains of the great deep were broken up" (Gen. vii. 11). The Flood had begun. The rain continued to fall for forty days, and the rise of the waters continued a hundred and fifty days (Gen. vii. 17-24). Noah stepped out upon the dry ground again on the twenty-seventh day of the second month of the following year (Gen. viii. 14). Whether the year was composed of lunar months or solar months, we have no data for deciding.

The region in which the Flood occurred we can determine from our approximate knowledge of the territory inhabited by man at that time, and the place on which the ark rested. This was Mount Ararat, the well-known mountain in the Araxes Valley, Armenia, and not Dschebel Dscudi, in the Kurd Mountains, as Berosus and Abydenus (according to Josephus, Antiq., I. 3, and Eusebius), the Targums, the Peshito, the Mohammedans, and the most of the Oriental Christians, hold. This is evident from the combination of the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz, in Jer. li. 27. The height of the great Ararat above the sea is, according to Parrot, 16,254 feet. It occupies a central location.

The extent of the Flood seems at first sight to be defined as universal by Gen. vii. 19, which states that "all the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered." But it would be as wrong to conclude that the meaning of this passage is that the Flood covered the whole earth as that Eccles. i. 14 means that Solomon had actually "seen all the works that are done under the sun." According to Gen. vii. 20, the waters were fifteen cubits above the highest mountains. The design, as Delitzsch says, was not to destroy all animals in every part of the world, but to destroy the whole human race, with the exception of Noah's family. [It must be confessed that it is difficult to reconcile the language of the account of the Deluge with the supposition that it was only partial. At the same time it must be allowed, that ethnological universality satisfies all the moral considerations which made the Flood necessary. Perowne and others have argued against the present Mount Ararat as the resting-place of the ark, on the ground that its summit is covered with perpetual snow and ice, which would have made the descent perilous if not impossible. The geological evidence for and against the geographical universality of the Flood has been much dwelt on. At one time the existence of shells on the tops of mountains was regarded as proof of the Flood, and Voltaire found much difficulty in setting this argument aside. Even within the last fifty years by so good an authority as Buckland, the skeletons of bears and other animals in the caves of Great Britain were looked upon in the same light. On the other hand, plausible geological evidence has been urged against the hypothesis of a universal deluge from the loose scoria on the flanks of Mount Etna, which show no marks of water action, the probability that certain classes of marine animals now living could not have continued to exist at so great a depth of water as the flood would have necessitated, etc. There are other difficulties in the way of a universal flood; such as the difficulty of including all the kinds of animals now existing in the freight of the ark, the re-peopling of the entire earth with animals, etc.]

On the first day of the tenth month the tops of the mountains became visible. Noah sent out a raven, which did not return; a dove, which found no rest for her feet; a second dove, which flew back with an olive-leaf in her mouth; and a third dove, which did not return. On the twenty-seventh day of the second month, a year and ten days after the beginning of the rain, Noah received the commandment to leave the ark. The account of the Flood in Genesis consists of an Elohistic and a Jehovistic record, but they agree perfectly with each other.

An important confirmation of the biblical record is furnished in the traditions of other nations. The most interesting of these accounts was found by George Smith, among the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions of the British Museum, which is much more full than the account of Berosus, and betrays a striking coincidence with the record of Genesis. Fragments of three copies of this original account, dating from 660 B.C., are also preserved. They belonged to the library of King Asurbanipal. The ancient Chaldean inscription of Smith is assigned by this scholar to the seventeenth century B.C. Sisit (Hasisadra), an old Chaldean king, takes the place of the Xisuthros of Berossus and the Noah of Genesis. He describes the godlessness of the world, the divine command to build an ark, its construction, the flood, the resting of the ark upon a mountain, the despatch of the birds, including the raven, etc. In these points the Chaldean account agrees with the record of Genesis. But there are certain differences which are very suggestive. Like the other accounts, the Chaldean ascribes the scene to a locality connected with its own special habitation, and brings it into close relation with its national origin. The biblical account is in these respects more general, but, on the other hand, alone gives the indications of time, month, day, and year when it began, when it ended, etc.; and these marks of time stand in no relation whatever to the feasts of the Jews. In these omissions and additions we have a strong pledge of the accuracy of the historian.

[Nägelsbach, in the first edition of Herzog, thus summarizes the traditions of the Flood, and refers to the literature. (1) The West Asian Traditions. — The Chaldean (see above), Syrian (Lucian., De Dea Syria, xiii.), Phœnician (Sanchuniathon, ed. Orelli, p. 32 sq.), Phrygian, in the legends of Annakus (Zenob., Prov., 6, 10; Stephan. Byzant., De Urbibus), and on the celebrated coins of Apamea. These coins have the picture of the emperor (Severus, Macrinus, or Philip) on one side, and on the other the picture of an ark or chest rocking upon the water, with the inscription ΝΩ ("No"). A man and a woman are standing in the ark, and looking out of a window in the roof: on the outside, another man and woman are standing, in the attitude of having left the ark. Two birds are also depicted, — one flying towards the ark with a branch in its claw; the other resting on the ark. (2) The East Asian Traditions. — The Persian is little known. It is doubtful whether the Chinese have any tradition of a universal flood. Some, however, recognize it in the flood of Jao. The Indian tradition is the most elaborate. The oldest form is given in the Catapatha-Brahmana. Man is saved in an ark from a flood which covers the whole earth. The Divine Being, to whom he owes his escape, appears to him in the form of a fish. Later forms are found in the Mahābhārata. See Nève: La tradition indienne du déluge dans sa forme la plus ancienne, Paris, 1851. (3) Traditions of the Classic Nations. — The Greeks knew of several great floods. Two are especially noteworthy, that of Ogyges (Varro, De rust., iii. 1; Servius, Virg. Eclog., vi. 14; Jul. Africanus, in Euseb. Præp. Ev., x. 10, etc.), and that of Deucalion and Pyrrha (Pindar, Ol., ix.; Ovid, Metam., i. 260–415, etc.). Plato, in the Timæus, speaks of the Egyptians as likewise knowing about the Flood. (4) Traditions of Other Nations. — The Celts had the tradition that all except Dviran and Dvirach were destroyed in a flood (Grimm: Deutsche Mythol., p. 516, etc.). The Laps (De Serres: Cosmog., p. 191), the Greenlanders (Cranz: Hist. von Grönland, i. 252), the Mexicans. — among whom Coxcox, Tezpi, or Teo-Cipactli stand for Noah, — and many tribes of Central and South America, have a similar tradition. See especially A. von Humboldt: Reise in d. Äquinoktialgegenden d. neuen Continents, iii. pp. 406 sqq.]

The Flood had a profound religious meaning. Its reality is assured by the relation which it is made to sustain to the great facts of salvation in the New Testament. It was a judgment upon the generation of Noah, but also a type of the final judgment (Matt. xxiv. 37 sqq.; Luke xvii. 26; 2 Pet. iii. 5–7). The hope with which Laméch greeted Noah's birth was only partially fulfilled in him. The final abolition of the divine curse, and removal of human trouble, did not then occur. Noah is the first just man in the Bible who saves others from destruction; and in this respect he is a type of Him who saves the soul from destruction, and redeems it from time to eternity.

Noah, having left the ark, erected an altar, and offered a burnt-offering, thus sending up to heaven, the dwelling-place of God, thanks and prayer. He received the rainbow in answer, and understood it to be a sign that the earth would not be cursed again, or all human life be destroyed. Henceforth man has authority over the life of the animals, and their flesh contributes to his nourishment. The race also has authority over the life of him who sheds his neighbor's blood (Gen. ix. 5). This authority was the beginning of human law, but also of war. On the basis of Gen. ix. 1 sqq., the Jewish rabbis built up the seven so-called "Noachian Laws:" (1) about judgments, (2) blessing God, (3) fleeing idolatry, (4) fornication, (5) effusing blood, (6) rape, (7) eating the parts of living animals.

Noah planted the vine; and on one occasion, while under the influence of wine, he was irreverently treated by his son Ham. The curse of servitude was pronounced upon Ham's son Canaan, and his posterity. Shem and Japheth, the other two sons, who had shown proper respect for their father, were blessed, promising to dwell with Shem (for so Gen. ix. 27 is to be explained). This promise looks to the final goal of human history, — the return of God to the earth he had forsaken at the Flood. Noah lived 350 years after the Flood, and died 950 years old. Thereafter the length of human life gradually diminished. Shem was 600 years old at his death; Arphaxad, his son, who was born after the Flood, only 438. Peleg, in the fifth generation, only attained to the age of 239; and after him there is no example of any who reached a higher age than 200.

NOAILLES, Louis Antoine de, b. May 27, 1651; d. May 4, 1729; was educated for the church, and made bishop of Cahors 1679, bishop of Chalons 1680, archbishop of Paris 1695, and cardinal 1700. In 1693 he accepted the Réflexions morales of Quesnel, but in 1696 condemned the Exposition de la foi, by Barcos. The bull Unigenitus he at first openly opposed; and for some time he stood as one of the leaders of the Jansenist party. But in 1720 he assented to a compromise, and in 1728 he accepted the bull. NOB (height), a city of the priests in Benjamin (1 Sam. xxii. 19), north of, and so near to, Jerusalem, that the Holy City was visible from it (Isa. x. 32). In Saul's time the tabernacle was there, and there Ahimelech gave David the shewbread and the sword of Goliath. Saul was so enraged by this conduct, that he destroyed all the inhabitants of the city, with the exception of Abiathar, who escaped (1 Sam. xxi., xxii.). There were, possibly, other Nobs; but the one meant in the narrative cannot be identified with any existing place; yet its site seems indicated by some cisterns and old graves upon the ridge to the north of the Upper Kidron valley. Cf. Mühlau, in Richm's Hanfwörterbuch.

NOBLE, Samuel, Swedenborgian, b. in London, March 4, 1779; d. there Aug. 27, 1853. In 1810 he was one of the founders of the London society for publishing the works of Swedenborg. In 1820 he left his profession of engraving for the Swedenborgian ministry in London. He issued two noticeable original books, originally lectures, — Plenary Inspiration of the Scriptures asserted (1828), and An Appeal in behalf of the Doctrines of the New Church, 2d ed., 1838, — and a translation of Swedenborg's Heaven and Hell.

NOD is mentioned in Gen. iv. 16 as the land to which Cain fled after the murder of his brother. It has proved wholly in vain to locate that land. The name, from the root נד, means simply "the land of exile;" but it is worth noticing that it is placed to the east of Eden. Israel, and the nations generally of Western Asia, knew, that in Eastern Asia there lived people who had a certain civilization, but upon whom they felt free to look down with contempt. [See LENORMANT: Beginnings of History, New York, 1883.]

NOËL (from natalis, "birthday," sc. Christ's), a word frequently found in old Christmas carols.

NOEL, Hon. and Rev. Baptist Wriothsley, a brother of the first Earl of Gainsborough; b. at Leithnont, Scotland, July 10, 1799; d. at Stanmore, Middlesex, Jan. 20, 1873. Graduating at Trinity College, Cambridge, he became a queen's chaplain, and incumbent of St. John's, Bedford Row, London. Leaving the Church of England, he officiated as a Baptist minister in the same locality, and was eminent as a preacher and philanthropist. He published sermons: Notes of a Tour in Switzerland, Essay on Christian Baptism (1849), Letters on the Church of Rome (1851), and sundry others, besides A Selection of Psalms and Hymns (1832, enlarged, 1853), and Hymns about Jesus (1869). Many of these are his own. F. M. BIRD.

NOEL, Hon. and Rev. Gerard Thomas, an elder brother of the above; was b. Dec. 2, 1782; and d. at Romsey, Feb. 24, 1851. He studied at Edinburgh and Cambridge, and was settled at Radwell, Herts; Rainham, Kent; and Richmond, Surrey. In 1834 he was canon of Winchester, and in 1810 vicar of Romsey. He published sundry sermons, a hymn-book, and Arventel, sketches and poems. Two of his hymns are very graceful, and have been widely used. F. M. BIRD.

NOËTIUS. SEE MONARCHIANISM.

NOLASCUS, Petrus, b. about 1189, in Languedoc; d. 1256, in Barcelona; founded in 1228 the order of the Beata Maria Virgo de Mercede pro Redemptione Captivorum, whose members consisted of priests and knights, and whose special object was to redeem Christian captives in Mohammedan countries, — in extreme cases, when there was danger of a conversion to Islam, even with the sacrifice of liberty and life. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX. in 1230, and obtained in 1232 a magnificent home in the monastery of St. Eulalia, in Barcelona. The order flourished especially in Spain, but also in France and Italy. By Benedict XIII. it was transformed into a common mendicant order (1725), and a century later it was swept away by the revolution. See *Act. Sanct. NOMINALISM. SEE SCHOLASTICISM.

NOMINATIO REGIA. In the Frankish Empire the kings acquired, even in the Merovingian period, a decisive influence on the episcopal elections. In the Carolingian period, and with the German emperors, this influence grew into a formal right of appointment; so that the right of election, originally belonging to the clergy and the people, became completely lost. By the Concordat of Worms, however, which ended the controversy of investiture in 1122, a great change was effected in Germany; the right of election being vested in the chapters, while the real power of appointment rested with the Pope. By later concordats the kings have again obtained the right to nominate bishops in Austria, Bavaria, France, Prussia, etc.; but this nominatio regia does not in reality amount to more than a presentation, as the bishop thus nominated cannot enter into the rights and the duties of his office until he has been confirmed by the Pope. WASSERSCHLEBEN.

NOMOCANON. In the Greek language, κάνονες meant the legislation by the church; νόμοι, the legislation by the secular government, — the emperor. As the imperial legislation concerning the church grew very large and very important, it became necessary, or at least convenient, to combine all νόμοι of ecclesiastical import with the κάνονες, thereby producing a complete collection of ecclesiastical legislation, — a nomocanon. The first collection of the kind was made in the sixth century; a second was begun in the seventh, completed in the ninth by Photius, and revised in the twelfth; a third, the so-called Syntagma, was made in the fourteenth century by Matthaüs Blastares.

WASSERSCHLEEBEN.

NONCONFORMISTS, The, are, in the narrower sense, those clergymen of England who were ejected from their livings, and suffered other hardships, after the restoration of the Stuarts, in 1660. The designation is also applied to all members of sects in England and Wales as opposed to the members of the Church of England, because they do not conform to the ritual and practices of the national ecclesiastical body. In this sense the term is synonymous with dissenters. After the restoration, Charles II., in spite of promises to the contrary, and his Parliament, proceeded to insist upon conformity to the doctrines and practices of the Church of England. Four acts completed the legislation against all who refused to conform. In 1662 the Act of Uniformity was passed, requiring all clergymen to give their assent to the Book of Common Prayer. In 1664 the Conventicle Act was passed, declaring it to be unlawful to be present at any religious meeting, not conducted according to the usages of the Church of England, where more than five persons in addition to the family were convened. In 1665 the most oppressive of these edicts, the Five-Mile Act, was passed, which enjoined upon nonconformists an oath against taking up arms against the king, or attempting any "alteration of government, either in Church or State," and forbade all who refused to come within five miles of any corporation represented in Parliament, or place where they had preached, on penalty of a fine of forty pounds and six months' imprisonment. The Test Act of 1673 incapacitated every person from holding any public office who had not publicly taken the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the usages of the Church of England. These acts occasioned great hardship. The bulk of the great livings throughout the country were in the hands of the Puritan clergy. Two thousand ministers were deprived of their benefices, and among them were some of the most pious, learned, and eminent divines of the day; such as John Howe, Baxter, Flavel, and Philip Henry. The court bishops fully sympathized with this legislation; but such men as Reynolds (bishop of Norwich) and Stillington condemned it. The severity of these odious laws was relaxed by James II., who was anxious to secure toleration for the Roman Catholics, William, and subsequent sovereigns. In 1687 the Declaration of Indulgence was passed, suspending the penal laws, and tests of qualification for office. Ministers were released from jails, and restored to their flocks. Under Walpole, in the first half of the eighteenth century, the other laws against the nonconformists remained inoperative, though he dared not or cared not to repeal them. The parliamentary legislation of recent times has relieved not only the Protestant nonconformists, but also the Roman Catholics (1829), and Jews (1858), from their disabilities.

See NEAL: History of the Puritans, or Protestant Nonconformists, New York (Harpers' edition), 1858, 2 vols.; A. S. DYER: Sketches of English Nonconformity, London, 1881.

NONJURORS, those members of the Church of England who refused the oath of allegiance to William and Mary in 1689, on the ground that they were bound by their oaths to James II.

Their number included four hundred clergymen and nine bishops, — Sancroft of Canterbury, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, Thomas of Worcester, Lloyd of Norwich, Frampton of Gloucester, and Cartwright of Chester. Five were deprived of their sees in 1691; Thomas, Cartwright, and Lake having died in the mean time. A separate organization was formed; and nonjuring congregations continued to exist until the death of the last bishop, Boothe, in 1805. The separation introduced many changes from the usages of the Established Church. A book of Devotions for Primitive Catholics was compiled upon the basis of the Book of Common Prayer, but differing quite widely from it. See LATNBURY: History of the Nonjurors, 1845.

NONNOS, a word of Coptic derivation, and meaning "good," or "holy," and used in the early middle ages both in its masculine and feminine form, nonnus and nonna, is the name of a Greek poet who flourished at Panopolis in Upper Egypt in the fifth century. Among his works are a Διονυσιακά, a fantastic representation of the life of Dionysius, and a Μεταβολή τοῦ κατὰ Ἰωάννην εὐαγγελίου, a paraphrase, in epic verse, of the Gospel of John. The latter, which has some interest for the critical examination of the text of the Gospel, was first printed at Venice (1501), by Aldus, and trans. into Latin by Chr. Hegendorphinus in 1528. The latest and best edition is that by Aug. Scheindler, Leipzig, 1881. See A. KOECHLY: Opuscula philologica, Leip., 1881, vol. i. CARL BERTHEAU.

NON-RESIDENCE, that is, the discharge of the duties of an office by a deputy or substitute, while the real occupant, though absent, continues enjoying the revenues, has, in the Roman-Catholic Church, been the subject of a long series of prohibitive laws, from the Council of Sardica to the Council of Trent, which finally settled the matter. In the oldest time the cause of non-residence seems generally to have been the pursuit of ambitious schemes: the bishop went to the metropolis to obtain influence at court, or he travelled in foreign dioceses to hunt out heresies, etc. Afterwards the cause was plurality of offices. The older legislation sought to suppress the evil by limiting the term during which a bishop was allowed to be absent from his see. The Council of Trent adopted a more effective measure, — forfeiture of revenues. In the Church of England, non-residence caused by plurality of offices was at times very frequent. The 1 and 2 Vict., cap. 106, treats the question in a similar way as the Council of Trent.

NOPH (Isa. xix. 13; Jer. ii. 16), or Moph (Hos. ix. 6, Heb.), is the biblical name of some great Egyptian city; and according to the Septuagint, which, of course, in all Egyptian affairs, is a good authority, that city was Memphis, the celebrated metropolis of Lower Egypt. The common name of the city read in Egyptian Mennefer, which in popular pronunciation became Men-nof; and from this latter the Greek Μεμφίς, the Coptic Memfe, the Arab Memf, and the Hebrew Moph, were formed. The holy name of the city was Pu-Ptah, or Ha-Ptah, "the home of Ptah;" Ptah being the principal god of the place. Herodotus ascribes its foundation to Menes, the founder of the first historical dynasty in Egypt; Diodorus, to the eighth king of the same dynasty. It stood on the left bank of the Nile, a few miles south of the point where the river splits, and forms the delta. The city covered an area of about a hundred and fifty stadias: it was narrow but long, stretching for several miles along the river, from whose inundation it was protected by huge dams. Containing a number of the most magnificent architectural monuments, such as the temples of Ptah and Isis, it continued a great and splendid city for many centuries, even during the period when Thebes was the residence. But, when Alexandria was founded, it lost its importance. Though Strabo mentions it as the second greatest city in Egypt, he noticed the first traces of decay; and when Cairo was founded, on the right bank of the river, and the temples and palaces of Memphis were used as convenient quarries, the city disappeared so completely, that its very site became uncertain, until fixed by the French expedition of 1799. But, though the city of the living has been so utterly destroyed, the city of the dead, the Pyramids, the great Sphinx, the Serapeon, the Apis tombs, and the numberless graves, with their inscriptions and reliefs, still remain. NORDHEIMER, Isaac, Ph.D., eminent Jewish scholar, b. at Memelsdorf, near Erlangen, Germany, 1809; d. in New-York City, Nov. 3, 1842. He took his degree at the University of Munich, 1834. Coming to New York, 1835, he was that year appointed professor of Oriental languages at the University of New-York City; and from 1838 to 1841 was instructor in Hebrew in the Union Theological Seminary in that city, notwithstanding his persistent maintenance of his Hebrew faith. He was one of the best Hebrew scholars America ever had, as is evidenced by his works: Hebrew Grammar, New York, 1838-41, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1842; Chrestomathy, 1838; and pt. 2 of a Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance, 1842 (in connection with Dr. S. H. Turner).

NORRIS, John, a Platonic divine and poet; b. 1657; d. at Bemerton, in Wiltshire, 1711. He was a fellow of All Souls' College in Oxford. In 1692 he was rector of Newton St. Loe in Somersetshire, and, later, of Bemerton, where George Herbert had been one of his predecessors. He partly edited John Dunton's Athenian Mercury, and wrote, among other volumes, Reason and Religion, Christian Blessedness, Practical Discourses, and A Philosophical Discourse concerning the Immortality of the Soul. Of his Miscellanies, consisting of Poems, Essays, etc., the Preface is dated 1678, and nine editions appeared from 1687 to 1730. According to Mr. Cattermole, "few have equalled Norris in the union of learning and acuteness, metaphysical and logical, with sublime piety." F. M. BIRD.

NORTH, Brownlow, a distinguished evangelist of the Free Church of Scotland; the son of a clergyman of the Church of England, and grandson of Brownlow North, brother of Lord North, and Bishop of Winchester; was b. Jan. 6, 1810, at Chelsea; d. Nov. 9, 1875, at Tullichewan, near Edinburgh. He spent six years at Eton, where he was known as a good fellow, and was prominent at sports. Leaving in 1825, he travelled on the Continent, getting himself into difficulties by his propensity for gambling. He was married to an Irish lady in 1828. He at one time thought of taking holy orders, and pursued studies with this in view. He had no settled occupation, and the most of his time was spent on the estates of relatives in Scotland. He was careless of religious duties, and known as a seeker of pleasure, until November, 1851, when, as he was visiting at Dallas Moors, Scotland, his whole spiritual nature underwent a radical change. While engaged at a game of cards, he suddenly became concerned about his spiritual welfare, and, feeling a sensation as of illness, said to his son, "I am a dead man. Take me up-stairs." The next day he announced publicly that he was a changed man. It is an interesting fact, that although he had been an inveterate smoker from his twelfth year, and had gotten into the habit of frequently going to sleep with a cigar in his mouth, he wholly relinquished the use of tobacco. For months Mr. North read nothing else but the Bible; and it is said, that, during the stirring events of the Crimean war, he knew nothing about them. He passed through months of temptation, but finally gained peace; and, eleven months after his conversion, began to distribute tracts among the destitute classes in Elgin, Scotland. In July, 1856, at the request of others, he began to make addresses in the churches of Dallas and Forres. He was immediately recognized as an earnest and forcible speaker, and from that time until the week before his death was an indefatigable preacher. In 1859 he was recognized by the Free Church of Scotland as an evangelist. The first ten years of his ministry he spent chiefly in Scotland. He took a prominent part in the great revivals in Ireland in 1850, and Scotland 1860, and preached in all the great cities of England and Scotland, and with conspicuous results. In 1871 he changed his residence from Elgin to London. Mr. North was a man under middle height, portly, deep-chested, broad-shouldered, of penetrating eye, and gentlemanly, dignified manners. It is said by those who knew him best, that the expression of his face changed after his conversion. His remains are preserved in the Dean Cemetery, Edinburgh. See the interesting biography by K. Moody-Stuart, London, 1878.

NORTON, Andrews, D.D., Unitarian; b. at Hingham, Mass., Dec. 31, 1786; d. at Newport, R.I., Sept. 18, 1853. He was graduated from Harvard College 1804; studied theology, but was never settled; was tutor in Bowdoin College 1809-11; tutor of mathematics at Harvard 1811-13, librarian 1813-21, lecturer on biblical criticism and interpretation (succeeding Channing) 1813-19; and, on the organization of the Harvard Divinity School, was first Dexter professor of sacred literature 1819-30; after which time he still lived at Cambridge, engaged in literary labors, but in feeble health. He is recognized as one of the ablest of Unitarian scholars, radical in his critical opinions, yet a believer in the supernatural, and an opponent of Theodore Parker. His book upon the Gospels (The Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels, Boston, 1837-44, 3 vols., 2d ed., Cambridge, 1846, abridged ed., 1867, 1 vol.) is a standard work in America and England. He demonstrates to the satisfaction of most scholars that the Gospels were written at the received dates and by their accepted authors, and therefore are trustworthy documents. Besides this work, he wrote A Statement of Reasons for not believing the Doctrine of Trinitarians concerning the Nature of God and the Person of Christ, Cambridge, 1833, new ed., with Memoir by Dr. W. Newell, Boston, 1856, 11th ed., 1876; On the Latest Form of Infidelity, 1839; Tracts concerning Christianity, Cambridge, 1852. Two posthumous publications deserve mention, — Internal Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels, Boston, 1853; and A Translation of the Gospels, with Notes, ed. by his son, 1855, 2 vols. (not thought successful). But these titles display only a portion of his literary activity. He was a contributor to the North-American Review, Christian Examiner, and other periodicals. He was a poet of no mean order of merit; and "his few hymns, which appeared at intervals from 1809 to 1833, have been," says Professor Bird, "highly esteemed and largely used." Specimens of his poetic gifts will be found in GRISWOLD'S Poets and Poetry of America. He edited the Miscellaneous Writings of Charles Eliot, 1814, and of Levi Frisbie, with Memoir, 1823. See Memoir, in Statement of Reasons, etc., mentioned above, and art. in ALLIBONE'S Dict. Eng. Lit., vol. ii. s. v.

NORTON, John, b. at Stortford, Hertfordshire, Eng., May 6, 1606; d. in Boston, Mass., April 5, 1663. He was educated at Cambridge; took holy orders; embraced Puritanism, and emigrated to Plymouth, New England, October, 1635, and preached at Plymouth, Ipswich, and Boston. He wrote against the Quakers, The Heart of New England rent at the Blasphemies of the present generation (Cambridge, 1659), by which they were greatly exasperated.

NORWAY comprises an area of 122,279 square miles, with 1,802,172 inhabitants, of whom 1,794,931 are Lutherans, according to the last census of 1876. Christianity was introduced in the country in the tenth and eleventh centuries by Olaf Trygvason (995-1000) and St. Olaf (1014-31), both of whom had received baptism in Ireland. But, as the principal means of propaganda was the sword, the people remained Pagan at heart long after they had officially become Christian. In 1152 the country obtained its own metropolitan, — the Archbishop of Nidaros (the present Trondheim), who had four suffragan bishops under him, — Oslo, Bergen, Stavanger, and Hammer. In the twelfth century the tithe was introduced; in the thirteenth, the practice of celibacy: but the Roman-Catholic Church never became very powerful in the country. As Norway was united to Denmark from 1387 to 1814, and, during the last three centuries, governed as a Danish province, the two countries had for that period church and church history in common. The Reformation was introduced in Norway in 1536. The Norwegian Church became a State establishment, an exact copy of the Danish. A prominent feature of it was its intolerance. No other denomination than the Lutheran was tolerated. When Norway separated from Denmark, in 1814, and was formed into an independent kingdom in union with Sweden, its new constitution did not materially affect the organization of the Church. It continued to be necessary to belong to the Lutheran Church in order to hold any kind of government office; and conversion from Lutheranism to another denomination was punished with exile. Later changes, however, point in a more liberal direction. By a law of July 16, 1845, other Christian denominations obtained freedom of worship: by a law of July 21, 1851, the Jews were admitted, etc. The chief spiritual movements within the pale of the Norwegian Church were due to H. N. Hauge and N. F. S. Grundtvig, which articles see.

NORWICH (city of England, ninety-eight miles north-east from London) became the seat of a bishopric transferred from Thetford, 1094. Its cathedral was commenced in that year by Bishop Herbert Losinga, and completed by Bishop Perry in 1361. Its tower was restored in 1858. It is chiefly of Norman architecture. The present bishop of Norwich is Hon. and Rt. Rev. J. T. Pelham, D.D., who was consecrated 1857; and his stipend is £4,500.

NÖSSELT, Johann August, a learned theologian; b. at Halle, May 2, 1734; d. at Halle, March 11, 1807. After studying at the university of his native town, where he came more especially under Baumgarten's influence, he travelled for two years, and, returning to Halle, was made professor in 1760. In 1779 he was elected to preside over the theological seminary. His principal department was the New Testament. He published a defence of the truth and divinity of the Christian religion (Vertheidig. d. Wahrheit u. Göttlich. d. christl. Religion, Halle, 1766, 5th ed., 1783), but in later years withdrew from the orthodox stand-point, and denied the necessity of satisfaction. His reputation as a scholar was enhanced by the purity of his character. His modesty interfered with his becoming a prolific author. See NIEMEYER: Leben Nösselts, Halle, 1809. HEINRICH DÖRING.

NOTKER, the name of several distinguished monks of the convent of St. Gall. — I. Notker Balbulus was b. about 840, in the vicinity of Thur, and not in Elgg, as the untrustworthy Life of Notker (Vita s. Notkeri), by Ekkehart V. in the thirteenth century, states; d. April 6, 912, at St. Gall. He is the author of the Martyrologium which goes under his name, and which he based upon a similar work of Ado of St. Gall. His fame rests upon his Sequences, religious poems of high merit, and written in a peculiar measure. Forty-one of these are found in the St. Gall Codex, No. 484, of the tenth century. Between 881 and 887 he dedicated the Sequences to Bishop Liutward of Vercelli, chancellor of Charles III., in a letter giving interesting details of their composition. A miniature portrait of Notker, dating from the tenth century, is preserved by the Zurich Antiquarian Society. He was canonized in 1513. See MEYER VON KNOXAU: Commentary to Ekkehart IV.: Cusus s. Galli. The Sequences are given by PEZ: Thesaur. anecdot., i. 18-42. — II. Notker Medicus, or Piperis Granum (so called on account of his severe discipline), hospitarius in St. Gall 965; d. Nov. 12, 975. His medical attainments were so great, that he was called to the court of Otto I. He was also known as a poet and painter, and was distinguished as "the most benign doctor" (benignissimus doctor).—III. Notker, Provost of St. Gall, Bishop of Luttich in 912, a statesman as well as a scholar; d. April 10, 1008.—IV. Notker Labeo, the most famous teacher and scholar of the St. Gall convent; d. of the plague, June 29, 1022. He wrote the Libri expositionum, a series of expositions and translations of biblical, theological, and classical writings. Among these were the De consolatione and De trinitate of Boethius, Virgil's Bucolics, Aristotle's Categories, Job, the Psalms, etc. His translations won for him the title Teutonicus; and, according to Wackernagel, his German style is pure and flowing. NOTRE DAME (our lady), the French designation of the Virgin Mary; and therefore a frequent name for Roman-Catholic churches in France. One of the finest specimens of Gothic architecture in the world is the cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris.

NOTT, Eliphalet, a distinguished American clergyman and educator, president of Union College; was b. of poor parents in Ashford, Conn., June 25, 1773; d. at Schenectady, Jan. 29, 1856. His parents, who were farmers, died while he was still a boy. While he lived with his brother, the Rev. Samuel Nott of Franklin, Conn., he studied the languages and mathematics, and taught school. At the age of seventeen he entered Brown University, and at twenty-two was licensed to preach. He spent the first two years of his ministry at Cherry Valley, combining the vocations of pastor, and principal in the academy, and in 1798 became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Albany. In 1804 he was elected to the presidency of Union College, an office which he filled with eminent dignity and ability. When he entered upon his duties, the institution had only fourteen students, and was in great pecuniary straits. Under his management it became one of the strongest literary institutions in the country, and thirty-seven hundred students graduated during his presidency. Dr. Nott was moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in 1811, and, after the division, was connected with the Old-School branch of that body. He has also claims to notice by the improvements he introduced into the methods of heating; and his stoves at one time had an extensive reputation. The ample fortune which he realized from his patents he used in liberal endowments to Union College. Dr. Nott is reported to have been one of the most eloquent orators of his day. His sermon on the death of Alexander Hamilton at the hands of Aaron Burr, at Hoboken, N.J., July 11, 1804, is one of the most famous specimens of American pulpit eloquence. It was preached on July 29, 1804, in the North Dutch Church, Albany, from 2 Sam. i. 19: "How are the mighty fallen!" After drawing a vivid picture of the manner of Hamilton's death, he proceeded to pronounce duelling a crime, and the fatal stroke or shot of the duellist "murder,—deliberate, aggravated murder," and to draw an elegant and sympathetic sketch of the gifted statesman, who "had yielded to the force of an imperious custom," but had himself said, just before the combat, "My religious and moral principles are strongly opposed to duelling." This sermon has been republished in Fish's Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, 1857. Dr. Nott published Counsels to Young Men (New York, 1810, and often) and Lectures on Temperance (Albany, 1847, new edition by McCoy, 1857), the Resurrection of Christ, with notes by Professor Tayler Lewis (new edition, New York, 1872). He was a prominent advocate of the temperance cause; and of his Lectures on Temperance Dr. Peabody said, "These lectures constitute the most able, thorough, and efficient argument that has yet been constructed for the disuse of all intoxicating liquors" (North-American Review, lxxxv.). See Memoirs of Eliphalet Nott, D.D., LL.D., by VAN SANTVOORD, revised by Professor TAYLER LEWIS, New York, 1876.

NOURRY, Nicolas le, b. at Dieppe, 1647; d. in the Abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, March 24, 1724; entered the Congregation of St. Maur in 1665, and labored, for several years together, with Duchesne, Bellaise, etc. His chief independent work is his Apparatus ad Bibliothecam Maximam, an historical and critical treatment of the authors incorporated in the Bibl. Patrum Max., published at Lyons. Only two volumes appeared, comprising the authors of the first four centuries, Paris, 1694, and, in an enlarged form, Paris, 1703.

NOVALIS, the pseudonyme of Friederich von Hardenberg; b. at Wiedestedt, in the county of Mansfeld, near Eisleben, May 2, 1772; d. at Weissenfels, March 19, 1801. He studied jurisprudence and natural science at Jena, and held for some time a position in the Thuringian salines, but afterwards retired from practical life, partly on account of ill health, and devoted himself exclusively to literature. He was an intimate friend of Tieck and Schlegel; and his unfinished romances,—Heinrich von Ofterdingen and Die Lehrlinge zu Sais,—and his Hymnen an die Nacht, represent him as one of the extreme leaders of the Romantic school, seeing a miracle in the most common natural occurrences, while the most awful supernatural events looked quite ordinary to his eyes. His best works, however, are his Geistliche Lieder, in which the peculiar sweetness and tenderness of his nature, the early teachings of the Moravian Brethren, to whom he belonged, his intimate intercourse with Zinzen-dori and Lavater, and the æsthetical principles and tendencies of the Romantic school, are blended into perfect harmony. They were translated into English (Spiritual Songs) by George Macdonald, London, 1876. His complete works were edited by Tieck and Schlegel, Berlin, 1802, with an addition, 1874. See CARLYLE'S Essay on Novalis, in his Miscellaneous Writings, ii.

NOVATIAN. The whole Latin tradition, with the exception of those theologians of the fourth century who stood under Greek influence (Damasus, Prudentius, the Decr. Gelas., etc.), calls the great schismatic Novatianus: while by Greek authors his name is generally written Νοβάριος. Only Dionysius of Alexandria calls him Νοβαριανός. The party he formed is generally designated as Novatiani: only once Cyprian writes Novatianenses (Ep., 73, 2). When Epiphanius (Ancorat., 13) calls the Novatians of Rome Montenses, he probably confounds them with the Donatists.

According to Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl., viii. 15),

Novatian was a native of Phrygia. Probably, however, this notice rose from the circumstance that he afterwards found many adherents in Phrygia; or perhaps it was purposely manufactured in order to insinuate a connection between him and the Montanists. With respect to his life before the schism, we depend entirely upon the spiteful and mendacious letter of Cornelius (Ep. ad Fabian Antioch.). Cyprian, Pseudo-Cyprian, and Socrates give very little, and Eulogius is wholly unreliable. The plain facts seem to be these: during a severe illness, which even made the aid of an exorcist necessary, Novatian received the clinical baptism without any consecutive episcopal confirmation. Such a form of baptism, however, was not generally recognized as valid; and, when he was ordained a presbyter by a bishop of Rome (either Fabian or his predecessor), his ordination, we are told, met with great opposition, both among the clergy and the laity, on that account. Otherwise he enjoyed great reputation in the congregation for learning and eloquence, as may be gathered from the letters of Cyprian (55, 24; 51, 2; 60, 3; 49, 2); and his official activity, as well as his private life, must have been without blemish, since Cornelius found only one dark spot to point to. At the time, he tells us, when the persecution was at its highest, Novatian kept himself shut up in his house; and, when the deacons admonished him to come to the aid of those who were in danger, he became angry, and threatened to resign his office, alleging at the same time, as an excuse for his behavior, that he belonged to "another philosophy." The story is proved false by the simple fact, that after the martyrdom of Fabian (Jan. 20, 250), Novatian took charge of the official correspondence of the congregation. And, as for the equivocal expression, "another philosophy," it later on became a favorite trick among his adversaries to represent his conceptions of sin and penance as the outcome of the Stoical philosophy, simply in order to cover up their own deviation from the principle hitherto held by the church. In reality he had as little to do with the Stoical philosophy as they themselves. The origin and further development of his views are not doubtful.

Down to 220, idolatry, adultery, fornication, and murder, were punished in the Catholic Church by formal excommunication. This practice was first broken by the peculiar power which was ascribed to the confessors, — in accordance with an archaic idea which lived on to the end of the third century, — and then by an edict of Pope Calixtus I., which spoke of re-admittance into the church as a possibility. The edict caused the schism of Hippolytus; but, as the schism was healed towards the middle of the third century, it seems probable that the successors of Calixtus returned to the old, more rigorous practice. At all events, it must be observed that the new and milder views were applied only to sins of the flesh. As none who in the peaceful period between 220 and 250 relapsed into Paganism was likely to ask for re-admittance into the Christian Church, idolatry was left entirely out of consideration. But, with the outbreak of the Decian persecution, a great change took place. The number of the lapsed became so great, that the very existence of the congregations was endangered.

It was, however, by no means a simple practical consideration which compelled the church to change its practice. The dogmatical development led it in the very same direction. If, namely, the church, with its hierarchical constitution, were an indispensable means of grace extra quam nulla salus, how could it be hoped that God would ever re-admit into grace a sinner to whom the church had refused absolution and reconciliation? Indeed, when individual man could enter into relation with God only through the priest, his salvation became absolutely dependent on his connection with the clergy and the church. Now, it is very true that these ideas did not reach their full development until the end of the Decian persecution (see Cyprian: De unitate ecclesie and De lapsis); but it is also true that the whole doctrinal and constitutional development of the church had for a long time tended towards that point. The very practice (generally adopted throughout the church in 250) of absolving the penitent lapsed immediately before death was a move, perhaps unconscious, in the direction indicated; and there is absolutely nothing which indicates that originally Novatian was either theoretically or practically opposed to the movement.

After the death of Fabian, in the beginning of the Decian persecution, no new bishop was elected in Rome. As he could probably not be elected without his name being given to the police (Cyprian: Ep., 55, 9), he would be sure to be immediately put to death; and thus it happened that the see remained vacant for fifteen months. During the interval, the congregation was represented and governed by the college of presbyters and deacons, which, when complete, consisted of fifty-three persons (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., VI. 43, 11). Among those members of the college who are known to us, Novatian stands in the first rank; while the name of the later bishop, the presbyter Cornelius, is never heard of. Of special interest for the history of this interval are the three letters which the Roman clergy issued, and which have come down to us in the correspondence of Cyprian (8, 30, 36). The second of those letters is certainly written by Novatian, and it may be plausibly assumed that he also wrote the two others. In the first, the Roman clergy state, that, though they have separated from the lapsed, they have by no means abandoned them. On the contrary, if any penitent falls sick, and wishes to enter again into communion with the church, they re-admit him. Cyprian recognized the maxim as authoritative. In Ep. 15-17 he never speaks of the dying; but in Ep. 18 he acknowledges, and quotes the letter from Rome in his support, that the dying must be re-admitted. Thus it was Rome which first turned the Bishop of Carthage in the direction of mildness and forbearance. In the second letter, the Roman clergy state, that, in agreement with other bishops present in Rome, they have adopted a middle course with respect to the lapsed, and that no new disciplinary measures will be adopted until after the election of a bishop; which implies, that, from principle, Novatian, the writer of the letter, was not opposed to the introduction of new measures. The three letters show, as does the correspondence between Cyprian and the Roman confessors Moses, Maximus, etc., that at that time there reigned perfect agreement, both in Rome itself and between Rome and Cyprian. Indeed, down to the spring of 251, not the slightest foreboding can be found of the coming schism in Rome.

But in March, 251, Cornelius was elected bishop of Rome. He was elected by a majority, and, as it would seem, in accordance with all accepted rules. Nevertheless, there was in Rome a minority, comprising several presbyters and some of the most revered confessors, which was unwilling to accept the issue of the election, but put forward Novatian as anti-bishop, and had him ordained by three Italian bishops. Thus the schism began. It is evident, however, that though Cornelius represented the laxer, and Novatian the sterner, portion of the congregation, there was, in the beginning of the contest, no theoretical point of controversy, but simply a conflict between two persons. On the one side, a theoretical difference between Cornelius and Novatian is, in the correspondence between Cyprian and Cornelius (Ep., 41-53), even not hinted at until Ep. 54; and from the beginning to the end Cyprian confines himself to lamenting the fact of the schism, without entering upon a condemnation of the theory of the schismatics. On the other side, it has been shown above, that Novatian was not from principle opposed to the re-admittance of the lapsed; and this is furthermore proved by the letter of Dionysius of Alexandria to Novatian (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., VI. 45) and by Pseudo-Cyprian (Ad Novatianum, 14). The contest began as a merely personal conflict, and Cornelius proved the more fortunate. In the spring of 251, even before he could leave his place of refuge, and return to his congregation, Cyprian was, by the schism of Felicissimus, compelled to abate his rigor, and consent to the re-admittance of the lapsed. This step naturally placed him on the side of Cornelius, though Novatian and the confessors Maximus and Moses had hitherto been his supporters in Rome. He recognized Cornelius, though not in so precise and unqualified terms as the latter wished: Their friendship, however, soon became firmly cemented by the arrival of Novatus in Rome. Novatus was a zealous adherent of Felicissimus, and one of the most dangerous adversaries of Cyprian. For what reason he in Rome joined Novatian, though on the point in question he held the very opposite views, cannot now be made out; but the circumstance contributed much to bring Cornelius and Cyprian nearer to each other. In the summer of 251 the confessors left Novatian, and returned to the Catholic Church; not, as Cornelius says, deceived by the cunning, lies, and perjuries of the schismatical and heretical beast Novatian, but, as they say themselves, in order to restore peace and unity to the church. The loss was, nevertheless, of great effect on the position of the schismatic community in Rome. In other countries, quite a number of bishops rejected the laxer practice. Some joined Novatian, though without breaking with the church: others simply declared in favor of him. In Fabius of Antioch he found a very warm friend; but he died just before the great Oriental synod convened at Antioch, and the milder views were adopted by that assembly. Nevertheless, the schism gradually assumed very dangerous proportions in the East, the views of Novatian finding many adherents in Egypt, Armenia, Pontus, Bithynia, Cilicia, Cappadocia, Syria, Arabia, and Mesopotamia.

In the beginning of the controversy the question was not about the casus mortis, or the sacrificati, or the relation of the bishop to the presbyters and confessors, or the efficacy of penitence, etc. It is simply a stubbornly repeated calumny, that Novatian or his party ever declared penitence to be of no use; but, as the Roman-Catholic Church afterwards adopted the view that the excommunicated could not be saved, the calumny appears to have had its reason. Though all those questions were raised and answered during the progress of the schism, the true principle at stake in the controversy was that of the power of the keys. The great ruling party received its theory from Cyprian, though that theory was fully developed only in the West, and not until the time of Augustine. In a general way the party argued, that Scripture enjoined mercy and love; that the church could not abandon the lapsed to the world, to heresy, and to schism; that the granting of aid in casu mortis necessarily led further, as many dying recovered; that it was unjust to demand penitence without promising absolution, etc. But none of those arguments were decisive to Cyprian. His argument was, that, since salvation could be obtained only through the church, every one who was definitely severed from her must necessarily perish. Consequently, to refuse the communion of the church to any one who had not definitely separated himself from her would be an anticipation of the judgment of God; while the re-admittance of a lapsus could in no wise prevent God from still refusing him salvation. On the other side, when Novatian considered it the right and the duty of the church to exclude forever all heavy sinners, and denied her power to give absolution to the idolater, it is apparent that his idea of the church, of the absolution of the church, of the right of the priest, in short, his idea of the power of the keys, is another than that held by his adversaries. The church is to him, not the conditio sine qua non for salvation, an institution educating mankind for salvation, but the congregation of saints, whose very existence is endangered if there is one single heavy sinner among its members. To him the constitution of the church, the distinction between laity and clergy, the connection with the clergy, that is, the bishop, are questions of secondary importance: the one question of prime importance, the one great question, is to be a saint in the communion of saints. The verdict on the respective worth and value of these two opposite movements depends upon the point of view from which it is given,—the demands of religion, or the demands of the time. It is unquestionable that the Novatians retained many most valuable remnants of old traditions; and their idea of the church as a communion of saints corresponds exactly to the idea prevalent in the first days of Christendom. But, on the other hand, to punish libellatici harder than adulterers and defrauders must seem to everybody an open injustice; and, in order to carry their point, the Novatians were very soon compelled to break with the whole disciplinary development during the last two or three generations. Indeed, the idea of the church as a community of saints could not fail ending either in miserable delusion, or in bursting asunder the whole existing Christendom.

According to Socrates (Hist. Eccl., IV. 28) and some later Cathari (see Eulogius in Photius: Biblioth., 208, 280), Novatian suffered martyrdom. But the report is doubtful; and the acts, dating from the sixth century, are spurious. During the next two generations after the Decian persecution, the Church of the Cathari became consolidated. Many Montanist congregations joined it, especially in Phrygia. In constitution and doctrine the difference between the Catholic Church and the Church of the Cathari was very small. Besides the question of discipline, — which the Novatian bishop Asclepiades formulated thus, "For deadly sins the Catholics excommunicate clergymen, but we also laymen," — the question of the second marriage also acquired some importance, especially in regions formerly occupied by Montanists. Novatian himself never forbade it, and in the West it was generally allowed. With respect to the extension of the schismatic church, notice, for Spain, Pacian; for Gaul, the polemical work of Bishop Reticus of the fourth century; for Upper Italy, Ambrose (De pœnitentiâ); for Rome, where, in the fifth century, the Novatians had a bishop and many churches, Socrates (Hist. Eccl., V. 14, VII. 9, 11); for Mauritania, Alexandria (where they also had a bishop and several churches), Syria, Paphlagonia, Phrygia, Bithynia, Scythia, etc., Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. In Constantinople they had three churches; and Socrates gives the list of their bishops, with the principal events of their lives. At the Council of Nicea the Novatian bishop Arius was present. He accepted the decisions of the council concerning the faith and the Easter controversy, and was treated with much regard by the council. But the emperor did not succeed in alluring him and his party back into the bosom of the church. Ten years later, however, when Constantine had somewhat changed his theological views, he placed the Novatians in rank with the Marcionites and Valentinians, forbade them to worship in public, closed their churches, and ordered their books to be burnt. During the Arian controversy the relation between the Novatians and the Catholic Church was generally good, as the former showed no inclination towards that heresy. But the danger was hardly over, before the Catholic Church began persecutions. In Rome, Innocent I. closed their churches, and Celestine I. forbade them to worship in public. In the East, however, the party lived on until the sixth or seventh century.

LIT. — Novatian was the first theologian of the Church of Rome who developed a comprehensive literary activity in the Latin language; but of his works, only his De Sabbato, De Circumcisione, and De Trinitate have come down to us. Of great importance for the history of the schism are the Letters of CYPRIAN, EUSEBIUS (Hist. Eccl., VI. 43-VII. 8.), SOCRATES (who was at one time suspected of having been a Novatian), the polemical work of EULOGIUS, of which large extracts are found in PHOTIUS (Cod. 182, 208, 280). Of modern representations, the best is still WALCH: Ketzerhistorie, ii. 185-288. ADOLF HARNACK.

NOVATIANUS, NOVATUS. See NOVATIAN.

NOVICE. See NOVITIATE.

NOVITIATE denotes the term of initiation and probation in a religious house before taking the vows. According to Con. Trid., Sess. xxv. c. 15, de regul. et mon., it shall last a full year or more: vows taken earlier are not valid. As long as the vows have not been taken, the novice has a right to go back into the world, and the monastery has no other claim on the property of the novice than what is necessary for the re-imbursment of its expenses. During the novitiate the novice cannot dispose of his or her property in favor of the monastery; and, if he or she dies, the monastery is not the heir.

NOWELL, Alexander, Dean of St. Paul's, and one of the most eminent ecclesiastics and preachers of the Elizabethan period; was b. at Read Hall, Whalley, County of Lancaster, 1507 or 1508; d. in London, Feb. 13, 1602. He was educated at Middleton, near Manchester, and at Brasenose College, which he entered at thirteen. He was the "chamber-fellow" of Foxe the martyrologist, and was made bachelor of arts in 1536. In 1543 he was appointed master of Westminster School, London, he being the second incumbent of that position; was licensed to preach in 1550; preached in some of the "notablest places and auditories of the realm;" and in 1551 received a stall at Westminster. He adopted the principles of the Reformation, and, at the accession of Mary, fled to the Continent, where he tarried at Strassburg and Frankfurt, in intimate intercourse with the exiles, who subsequently became eminent under Elizabeth. Returning to England at Elizabeth's accession, he was made archdeacon of Middlesex, and canon of Canterbury in 1560; was appointed one of the commissioners to visit several of the dioceses, and dean of St. Paul's. It was during his incumbency, on June 4, 1561, that the spire of the cathedral was burned. Nowell was henceforth regarded as one of the first scholars in the realm, and took a prominent part in all ecclesiastical matters. In 1563 he was chosen prolocutor of the convocation of Canterbury, and presided over those sessions which revised and settled the Articles of Religion. In 1565 he had a controversy with Dorman, who attacked Jewell's Apology. His services were in great demand on all public occasions and at the funerals of eminent men. He was chosen to make the first public announcement from the pulpit of the destruction of the Armada before the lord-mayor, aldermen, etc. Izaak Walton says Nowell was "noted for his meek spirit, deep learning, prudence, and piety," and mentions with sympathetic approval his devotion to angling, in which he is said to have spent one-tenth of his time. Nowell is the author of one or more catechisms, which were "allowed and approved" by Parliament. In 1563 The Catechism was presented to the upper, and a Catechismus puerorum to the lower, house of convocation. Whether these were identical, or two different catechisms (and in this case both written by Nowell), it is difficult to determine. Churton holds the latter view. In 1571 a catechism by Nowell was printed in Latin. It was prescribed by Archbishop Parker to be taught; and it heads a list of books for the extirpation of heresy, which the University of Oxford prescribed in 1579. It is also probable that Nowell was the author of The Church Catechism. See

A Catechism written in Latin by Alexander Nowell, together with the same Catechism translated into English by Thomas Norton (with an appendix containing a sermon of Nowell, preached at the opening of Parliament, 1563), edited for the Parker Society by G. E. CORRIE, Cambridge, 1853. For Nowell's biography, see FULLER'S Worthies of England; CURKTON: Life of A. Nowell, Oxford, 1809.

NOWELL, Laurence, brother of the former, and Dean of Lichfield; entered Brasenose College, 1536; d. October, 1576. He was a learned Anglo-Saxon scholar, and left a dictionary of Anglo-Saxon in manuscript.

NOYES, George Rapall, D.D., Unitarian, b. in Newburyport, Mass., March 6, 1798; d. in Cambridge, Mass., June 3, 1868. He was graduated at Harvard College 1818; studied theology there, and was licensed 1822; pastor at Brookfield and Petersham, Mass.; from 1840 till his death, Hancock professor of Hebrew and other Oriental languages, and Dexter lecturer on biblical literature in Harvard University. He was a fine scholar, especially in sacred philology, and published original translations, with notes, of Job (Cambridge, 1827, 2d ed., Boston, 1838), Psalms (Boston, 1831, 2d ed., 1846), the Prophets (1833-37, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1843), Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles (1846), the New Testament, from Tischendorf's text (7th and 8th editions), 1868. The latter was complete in manuscript at the time of his death; but its publication was partly posthumous, as the proofs were read by its author only as far as Philippians. Dr. Ezra Abbot carried it through the press, and edited the remainder of the translation, appending a few notes. The text is divided into paragraphs, but not into verses, which are merely indicated by numerals upon the margin. The translation is characterized by critical exactness, good taste, and a reverent spirit.

NUMBERS. See PENTATEUCH.

NUN, NUNNERY. The word "nun" is most probably derived from the Coptic nonnos ("holy"), which in early mediæval Latin was applied both to monks (nonnus) and to nuns (nonna). Other appellations were mona, monacha, monialis, etc. Even in the first century of its history, the Christian Church had its female ascetics, as well as its male ones. They were called virgines Deo sacratæ ("virgins consecrated to God"), and lived with their families, though in retirement, and devoting themselves to practical piety in the service of the poor and the sick. They were consecrated by the bishop, who received their vow, and presented them with their peculiar garments, — the sombre-colored mantle, the veil, and the gold-embroidered head-dress (mitrell). The transition from asceticism to monasticism took place at the same time and in the same manner among the female ascetics as among the male ones, and associations of female ascetics, or nuns, occur in the times of Jerome and Ambrose. They stood under the supervision of the bishops, from whom they also received their rules. Their daily worship they performed in a domestic oratory, and only on Sundays they visited the neighboring church. In the sixth century, however, they obtained their own cloister-churches, in which service was performed by a special priest; and absolute or almost absolute seclusion from the world gradually became one of the most prominent features of female monasticism. At the head of the nunnery stood an abbess, a prioress, or a mother-superior. See MONASTERY.

NUREMBERG, The Religious Peace of. At the close of the diet of Augsburg (Nov. 19, 1530), it was apparent that the emperor, Charles V., had decided to regulate the religious affairs of Germany according to his own will, even though it might be necessary to use armed force. Consequently, early in 1531, the Protestant princes met at Schmalkald, and concluded there an alliance for armed defence. In a short time, however, the situation was completely changed. The Protestant princes sought and found support in France; and the Turks, under Soliman, threatened to invade Hungary and Austria. Without the aid of the Protestant princes, the emperor could not hope to make any successful defence against the Turks; and in the spring (1532), he opened negotiations with them. Those negotiations led to the so-called "religious peace of Nuremberg" (July 23, 1532), by which the status quo was confirmed and guaranteed until a general council could be convened. For the Protestant cause, this peace was a decisive victory.

O.

OAK. There are six Hebrew words (אֵיל, אֵלֶּה, אֵילִן, אֵילָן, אֵלֶּה, אֵילָן, אֵילִן, אֵילָן, אֵילִן, אֵילָן, אֵילִן, אֵילָן, "to be strong") thus interpreted from a root which means strong. There are three species of oak in Palestine, — Quercus pseudo-coccifera, Q. agrifolia, and Q. infectoria. The first is the prickly evergreen oak, of which a fine specimen is "Abraham's Oak," near Mamre, which is twenty-three feet in girth; but the tree ordinarily is not higher than twelve feet: its leaf is like the holly's in shape, but smaller. The second is the Valonia oak, with a massive trunk, and great height. Of this kind were the famous "oaks of Bashan" (Isa. ii. 12, 13; Zech. xi. 2). Its acorns are very large, and are eaten by the poor; and their cups, which are used by tanners, are exported. This oak is found only in Northern Palestine, and east of the Jordan. The third kind is found, but rarely, in Samaria and Galilee.

Oaks play a part in the religious practices of Oriental and Occidental nations. Idols were made of oak (Isa. xlv. 14), and oaks marked places of sacrifice (Hos. iv. 13; Isa. i. 29), and also of burial (Gen. xxxv. 8; 1 Sam. xxxi. 13). To-day the evergreen oak is usually found near the Welies, or prophets' tombs. In the lands of the Goths and the Cossacks the oak was venerated, and Winfred excited intense horror by cutting down an enormous oak sacred to Thor. So in early Britain the Druids venerated the oak above all other trees. Oak-groves were their temples, and indeed the very name Druid probably means "oak." The oak was the symbol of the Supreme Being, — Hesus. The mistletoe, which grew upon the oak, represented man in his dependent state; and it was cut with imposing ceremony in December of each year.

OATES, Titus, the inventor of the famous Popish Plot; b. at London about 1619; d. in London, July 23, 1705. The son of a Baptist clergyman, he studied at Merchant Taylors' school and Cambridge, and entered the Baptist ministry; afterwards took orders in the Church of England; was a chaplain in the navy; and entered the Roman-Catholic Church, tarrying for some time in the Jesuit houses of Valladolid and St. Omer. He was expelled from these institutions for misconduct; but, while he was an inmate, he had heard of a meeting of Jesuits held in London; and "on his expulsion," as Mr. Green says, "this single fact widened in his fertile brain into a plot for the subversion of Protestantism and the death of the king." About this time (1678) there was a great deal of suppressed anxiety among the Protestants of England in view of the machinations and activity of the Roman Catholics, and the well-known sympathy with them of Charles II., and especially the Duke of York, heir to the throne. Oates took advantage of this state of the public mind, and claimed to have evidence of a huge Popish Plot for the extirpation of Protestantism. He brought the matter to the notice of the king, who probably smiled at it, and made public affidavit to the alleged facts before Sir Edmondsbury Godfrey, declaring he had been intrusted with letters touching the Jesuit plans. The excitement over the revelations was intense. Lord Shaftesbury, who had just been released from prison, for political reasons fell in with the popular feeling, and exclaimed "Let the treasurer cry as loud as he pleases against Popery, I will cry a note louder." The popular agitation was increased to frenzy by the murder of Godfrey, which was construed into an attempt to stifle the plot. The two houses of Parliament instituted an investigation of the matter. Five peers, including Arundel and Bellasys, were sent to the Tower. Patrols guarded the streets; chains were drawn across them, the houses supplied with arms, etc. Parliament at the end of the year (1678) passed a bill excluding Roman Catholics from both houses, which was left unrepealed for a century and a half. The excitement was beginning to subside, when one Bedloe, stimulated by the reward which had been offered, appeared on the scene, and again aroused the national frenzy to its former intensity by more circumstantial and aggravating revelations than those of Oates. He swore to a plot for the landing of an army and the massacre of the Protestants. Oates had been treated like a hero, and assigned rooms at Whitehall, with a pension of twelve hundred pounds. But a revulsion of public feeling took place after the execution of Stafford in 1680; and the Duke of York, whom he had severely accused, secured a verdict for defamation of character. Oates was condemned to pay a fine of a hundred thousand pounds, and sent to prison. On the accession of the duke to the throne, he was further punished by being put in the pillory, and whipped from Oldgate to Newgate, and from thence to Tyburn. It is said his back received seventeen hundred lashes. Taken back again to prison, he recovered; and, at the accession of William and Mary, the conviction of Oates was declared to have been illegal, and he was not only pardoned, but granted an annual pension of four hundred pounds.

There is no doubt that there was an intense activity on the part of the Roman Catholics to re-assert their supremacy in England in the latter years of the reign of Charles II. Not only the Duke of York, but Charles himself, sympathized with the movement. But that there was any well-defined conspiracy to land an army in England, and massacre the Protestants, is usually denied by historians, and Titus Oates declared a shameless impostor. See the histories of England, especially GREEN: History of the English People, iii. 421 sqq.

OATH. 1. In the Old Testament. — Assertions by oath of the truth of a statement, and confirmations by oath of some promise given, or duty assumed, accompanied with appeals to God, and also with curses of one's self in case of falsehood or fraud, occur frequently and at all times in the history of Israel, both in private and public life (Gen. xxiv. 37, l. 5; Josh. ix. 15; Judg.

xxi. 5). In the courts, however, oaths were not so very often used. The law prescribed them only in the following cases: when a piece of property which had been deposited with somebody for safe keeping was lost, the depository could by an oath clear himself of all guilt with respect to the loss; in the same manner any one suspected of having found and held some piece of property which had become lost could free himself from the suspicion; a wife accused of adultery by her husband could vindicate her honor by an oath; and, finally, the whole people, or all present, could be taken in oath for the purpose of discovering the secret perpetrator of some crime (Exod. xxii. 11; Lev. v. 1; Num. v. 19). Such an oath could, of course, be taken only in the name of the true God, the God of Israel: if taken in the name of any other God, it at once became open idolatry, as it ipso facto was an acknowledgment of that God (Jer. v. 7, xii. 16; Amos viii. 14). In everyday life the Hebrews generally swore by the life of Jehovah, whose principal attributes or special deeds were often mentioned on the occasion (1 Sam. xx. 42; 1 Kings ii. 23; Jer. iv. 2). Sometimes, however, they also swore by the life of the person addressed (1 Sam. i. 26), or by the life of the king (1 Sam. xvii. 55), or by something which was terrible, awe-inspiring, or dear to the speaker; and though such formulas or phrases were never recognized as legally valid oaths, but were simply considered as emphatic forms of speech, they became more and more frequently used by degrees, as the people became more and more careful in avoiding to pronounce the name of God. On solemn occasions the priest who administered the oath read the formula aloud, and he who was to take the oath simply answered, "Amen" (Num. v. 19-22). Generally the swearer lifted his right hand to heaven, to the throne of Him who was the witness of the truth and the avenger of the falsehood (Gen. xiv. 22; Deut. xxxii. 40); and thence the phrase, "to lift the hand," gradually became synonymous with "swearing" (Exod. vi. 8). Whether the Hebrew word שָׁבַע ("to swear") has reference to any other symbolical customs connected with the oath cannot now be made out. Its root is שֶׁבַע ("seven"), and it may refer to the peculiar sacredness of that number; notice the offering of seven animals in the patriarchal period (Gen. xxi. 28), the seven witnesses and pledges of the Arabs (Herodot., 3, 8), the worship of the seven planets (Pausan., 3, 20, 9), etc. A special emphasis the oath received in the patriarchal days by placing "the hand under the thigh" (Gen. xxiv. 2, xlvii. 29). While in later times the Essenes refrained altogether from swearing (Josephus: Bell. Jul. 2, 8, 6), the Pharisees seem to have treated the oath with frivolous superciliousness. In later times women were not allowed to take an oath (Philo: Op., ii. p. 274); but originally the law knew no such restriction (Num. v. 18, xxx. 4). See Stäudlin: Geschichte der Vorstellungen vom Eide, 1824.

RÜETSCHL.

II. In the New Testament. — Among the subjects which Christian ethics has to treat is also the oath. It is sometimes treated in the chapter on truthfulness, as if the principal question were, whether by the oath truth was made still more obligatory to the Christian. But its proper place is in the chapter on our direct relation to God; and the principal question is, whether such a use of the name of God as is required by the oath is permitted.

James declares altogether against the use of oaths (v. 12), and a similar prohibition is given in the words of Jesus (Matt. v. 33-37). The passage has been differently interpreted; but, without destroying its true logical articulation, it can be construed only in one way. Over against the commandment of the old dispensation, not to swear falsely, Jesus places the commandment of the new dispensation, not to swear at all; and when, in his enumeration of the various formulas of oaths, he omits the direct appeal to God, he could do so without incurring the risk of being misunderstood, partly because his condemnation of all the usual indirect formulas involves a still severer condemnation of the direct one; partly because the latter was very little used among his hearers, the Jews, on account of their shyness for mentioning the name of God. If, however, the passage is thus interpreted as a definite prohibition of swearing, it comes into conflict with other passages of the New Testament. The words of Paul in Rom. i. 9, Phil. i. 8, Gal. i. 20, 1 Thess. ii. 5, and 2 Cor. i. 23, have certainly the character of the oath. And when Jesus condescends to answer the question of the high priest (Matt. xxvi. 63), though it is couched in the very formulas which were employed when oaths were taken in the courts, he allows his own words to assume the same character; not to mention that the passage Heb. vi. 16 could never have been written if swearing had been absolutely prohibited among the first Christians. But how is this contradiction to be solved? In exactly the same way as the contradictions between the other prohibitions of the Sermon on the Mount, — not to be angry, not to scold, — and the very actions of Jesus himself when in holy wrath he rebukes the Pharisees. Only when issuing from the lower egotistical affections and impulses of human nature, anger and reproach, etc., are forbidden; that is, under circumstances, which, for instance, would make an oath simple profane swearing. Quite otherwise when the same act is performed for the sake of the highest ethical interests; as, for instance, when the civil authorities demand an oath in order to reach the truth, and make justice safe.

In this way the doctrine of the New Testament concerning oaths was conceived by the Reformers of the sixteenth century. In many recent Protestant systems of ethics (Wuttke, Palmer, Schmid) the oath is considered as a necessary evil, — necessary on account of the moral state of the human race. When the Waldenses, the Bohemian Brethren, the Mennonites, and the Quakers absolutely reject the oath, it is not so much on account of a too literal conception of Holy Writ, as because of a shyness of conscience with respect to the awful responsibility of the act.

J. KÖSTLIN.

III. In Canon Law. — The oath is not an invention of the State, but sprung spontaneously from the religious relation between man and God. Learning, however, as it does in so many respects, upon religion, the State adopted the custom as a means of ascertaining the truth (assertory oaths), and as a means of securing the fulfilment of duty (promissory oaths). But, on account of the religious origin and character of the institution, it was quite natural that the Church should exercise a considerable influence on its organization, and even wish to exercise a kind of control over its proceedings. Thus the mediæval Church not only developed her theological doctrines of oath into juridical propositions, which from the canon law were transferred to the civil law, but she also demanded that this whole sphere should be placed under her jurisdiction. The subject is principally treated in Decretum Gratiani, Causa XXII., the collection of decretals of Gregory IX., 2, 24, the Liber Sextus, and the Clementines. Of special interest is the decretal of Innocent III. (c. 26, X. de jurejur.), which, following Jerome, defines the proper use of the oath and its misuse under the three heads, — veritas in mente, judicium in jurante, and justitia in objecto.

The veritas in mente (the truthfulness of the will) excludes the so-called mental reservation, which gives to the oath a double meaning, — one in accordance with the words spoken; and another, perhaps directly opposite, in accordance with some interpretation put on them, for God is a dupliciter aspernator, and recognizes as valid only that meaning of the oath which is directly represented by the words spoken. It also follows that a forced oath, or an oath based on some palpable error or misunderstanding, is invalid. The judicium in jurante (the proper understanding of what the oath means) excludes children, insane persons, drunkards, and such persons as have been convicted of perjury, from taking an oath. It also follows with logical necessity that a person who has no faith in God, and stands in no religious relation to God, cannot take an oath. The justitia in objecto, finally, demands that the object of the oath must not be sinful, encroaching upon other men's rights, or compelling to acts otherwise forbidden, in which cases the oath becomes a perjurium, to be punished with ecclesiastical penalties. But as, in most cases, the Church is the only competent judge of the justitia in objecto, she alone has the power of cancelling an oath (relaxatio juramenti). OBADIAH (עֲבַדְיָהּ, "servant of Jehovah"), the smallest book of the Old-Testament canon. Nothing whatever is known about the prophet's life. Tradition, however, was busy in filling up the gap, and represented him as a converted Idumæan (Carpzov: Introd., iii. 338), or as born in Shechem, a pupil of Elijah, "the third captain of fifty" (2 Kings i. 13), whom Elijah spared, and husband of the woman whose cruse Elisha blessed. (See Delitzsch: De Habacuci proph. vita atque ætate, p. 60.) The prophecy is directed against Edom, and declares it to be God's intention to destroy it (Obad. 1–9), announces as the reason Edom's act of violence upon Jacob (10–16), and portrays the future triumph of Judah over all his enemies, and especially Edom (17–21). This vision into the future includes a reference to the Messianic kingdom, as is especially evident from the last words, "the kingdom shall be the Lord's." The main question concerns the date of the prophecy, and has given rise to much difference of opinion. Passing by the view of Augusti, Krahmer, Ewald, and others, that Obadiah is a reproduction of an older prophecy, some, as Hofmann (Weissag. u. Erfüll., i. 201), Delitzsch, and Keil, regard it as the oldest of the prophetic books, and written before Joel, under Joram, between 889 and 884 B.C.; others, as Jäger, Caspari, and Hengstenberg, refer it to the reign of Jeroboam II. or Uzziah; and others still, as Aben Ezra, Luther, Schnurrer, Rosenmüller, De Wette, Maurer, etc., hold the prophet to have been a contemporary of Jeremiah. Hitzig held the view that he was an Egyptian Jew, who wrote, 312 B.C., in view of a campaign Antigonus was reported to have undertaken against Petra. The settlement of the question depends upon whether the prophet looks upon the occupation of Jerusalem (ver. 11) as a thing of the past or the future. If he regarded it as a thing of the future, he may have had the occupation by Nebuchadnezzar in view; but it is difficult, on this supposition, to explain verse 21. On the general supposition that he regarded the occupation of the city as a thing of the past, the reference can hardly be to (1) the occupation of Nebuchadnezzar, for the prophet speaks in a tone of warning (ver. 12 sqq.), and was evidently used by Jeremiah (xlix. 7–22); nor (2) the occupation under Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 5 sq.), for it was Syrians and Ephraimites who overran Judah on this occasion; nor (3) the occupation under Amaziah by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 Kings xiv. 13 sq.), for Obadiah speaks of foreigners as the invaders; but (4) the occupation in Jehoram's reign (2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17). Joel could only have had this event in mind when he charged the Philistines and Syrians with selling the Jewish captives to Edom, and Obadiah's language resembles Joel's (comp. Joel iii. 19, Obad. 10; Joel iii. 3, Obad. 18; Joel iii. 7, 14, Obad. 15; Joel ii. 32, Obad. 17). Joel seems to have prophesied under Jehoash (877–838 B.C.); and it is probable that Obadiah prophesied before him, but not more than twenty years earlier. Obadiah's language also favors this early date; for, as Umbreit has said, "It comes as from the clefts of the rocks. It is hard and rude. There is no refinement of expression, no ornament and figurative description. It is as if the prophet had hewn his prophecy into the rock of Selah."

OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST, The, to the will of the Father, is represented as obedientia activa et passiva,—active in his doing, and passive in his suffering. To each has been ascribed a separate value in relation to his redemptive work. But the distinction, although scriptural in idea, is somewhat artificial. As Van Oosterzee says, "The very doing of the Lord was also, to a certain extent, a suffering; his suffering, on the other hand, in some respects, his highest form of action. His obedience is as the coat without seam, which may not be rent, and either avails wholly, or not at all, for him upon whom it is conferred." Hence, as Charles Hodge says, "This distinction is not so presented in Scripture as though the obedience of Christ answered one purpose, and his sufferings another and a distinct purpose. The same effect is ascribed to the death or sufferings of Christ and to his obedience, because both are forms or parts of his obedience or righteousness, by which we are justified. In other words, the obedience of Christ includes all he did in satisfying the demands of the law." See VAN OOSTERZEE: Christian Dogmatics, p. 552; HODGE: Systematic Theology, vol. iii. p. 143.

OBER-AMMERGAU, a village of twelve hundred inhabitants in Upper Bavaria, forty-six miles south-west of Munich, and in the valley of the Ammer. The principal industry is wood-carving. The fame of the village is due entirely to the Passion Play, which is given there every ten years, in discharge of a vow made under these circumstances:—

"In the year 1633 there raged in the neighborhood of Ammerthal ('valley of the Ammer') a deadly plague, which threatened to depopulate the districts infected. The Ammerthalers took every precaution to protect their valley from the dread contagion, but without avail. A native of Ammerthal, who worked during the summer in Escheleho [an infected place] as a day-laborer, evaded the quarantine, and entered the valley by a secret path, in order to celebrate among his family an annual church festival. He carried the infection with him, and on the second day after his arrival he was a corpse. In three weeks eighty-four of the small community were carried off; and the mourning and terrified survivors, despairing of human succor, made their supplication to God, and registered a solemn vow, that if he heard their cry, and removed the plague, they would represent every ten years, 'for thankful remembrance and edifying contemplation, and by the help of the Almighty, the sufferings of Jesus, the Saviour of the world.' The prayer was heard; 'for not a single person died of the plague after the vow was made, though many were infected with it.' In the following year the first fulfilment of the vow was made, and the second in 1644, and so on decennially until 1674. It was then thought better to divide the representations decennially. Accordingly, the next representation was in 1680; and it has been acted regularly every ten years from that date downwards" (MacColl, pp. 42, 43, and viii.).

But the present Passion Play is very different from the rude performance once given. Down to 1830 it was always acted in the churchyard. It is now given upon a stage, in a building built especially for it, and which seats forty-five hundred. The performance is introduced, and accompanied at intervals, by music, and is, on the whole, one of the most elaborate theatrical representations in existence. Every dweller in Ober-Ammergau is liable to be called upon to play; and the preparatory drilling consumes much time in the years next preceding the decennial performance. The credit of the present play is due to Ottmar Weis (d. 1843), a monk of the Ettal monastery in the neighborhood, and subsequently pastor, to his pupil Anton A. Daisenberg, and to Rochus Dedler (b. 1779, d. 1822), who for the last twenty years of his life was the schoolmaster at Ober-Ammergau. The present play is modelled upon the Greek drama, and therefore the chorus is an integral part of it. It comprehends the events of our Lord's life from Palm Sunday to Easter. The text is mainly scriptural; every word attributed to our Lord or to his disciples, friends, and foes, during the week referred to, being interwoven in the text. The principal players are persons of local consequence and of high character; and there is no doubt that the villagers themselves and the peasants around regard the Passion Play as a solemn religious rite. It is therefore fitly introduced by the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which is administered to the players and to the majority of the intending spectators very early on the day of the play. The acting, considering the limited education of the players, is marvellously realistic. Of late years much money has been spent upon costumes, sceneries, and stage properties. The number of players is said to be about six hundred, but this includes many children. The tableaux vivants, which are illustrations of the historical allusions in the chorus, are particularly fine, being revelations respecting the possibilities in tableaux. The interest of the play centres, of course, in the character of Christ. Shocking as the bare thought of such a representation is to the reverent mind, the dignified bearing of Joseph Maier, who played the part in 1870-71 and 1880, goes far to reconcile the spectator to the possibility of its being given without conscious blasphemy. The play was given more than thirty times from May 17 to Sept. 26, for many weeks three times. The performances last from eight to five, with an intermission of an hour and a half.

The Ober-Ammergau Passion Play has been suffered to pursue a nearly untroubled course. Permission to give it has to be obtained from the King of Bavaria, who has always readily given it. In 1780 it was the only passion play allowed in Bavaria, and in 1810 it triumphed over even ecclesiastical opposition. The profits, which are of course very large, since the throng of visitors numbers thousands, are religiously devoted to charitable purposes after the payment of a small sum to the players. The charges of admission are very moderate, ranging from one to eight marken (twenty-five cents to two dollars). Altogether the Passion Play is a curious, and in its way a unique, relic of the piety of the middle ages. Its days are probably numbered, for a secular spirit among the players would be fatal to it, and destroy the simple piety out of which it sprang. Those who have seen it once would not care to see it in any other place.

In New-York City two attempts have been made (1881 and 1882) to perform a passion play, in imitation of that given in Ober-Ammergau; but such a proceeding was severely criticised by the reputable press, and vigorously opposed by prominent citizens, and finally prohibited by the mayor of the city, on the ground that it was prejudicial to good morals and obnoxious to the religious community.

LIT.—The text of the Passion Play in an English translation was published (in London, 1871) as part of a volume containing numerous photographs of the place, the players, and the play. A good description of the play is given by Rev. M. MacColl: The Ober-Ammergau Passion Play, London, 1880.

OBERLIN, Jean Frédéric, the pastor and Reformer of the Steinthal, a "saint of the Protestant Church" (Hase); was b. at Strassburg, Aug. 31, 1740; d. at Fonday in the Steinthal, after a pastorate of sixty years, June 1, 1826. After studying at the gymnasium and university of Strassburg, he gave private instruction for several years, and was appointed pastor of the Steinthal in 1767. The Steinthal (Ban-de-la-Roche) is a barren tract on the borders of Alsace and Lorraine, whose population early accepted the Reformation. Oberlin entered with enthusiasm upon his work among this poor and ignorant people, and gave himself up to elevating their condition with an unselfishness worthy of all admiration. He was a man of imposing and military bearing, iron health, much will-power, and a religious devotion bordering sometimes on fanaticism. He soon married Fraülein Witter, a daughter of one of the Strassburg professors, who died in 1783.

Oberlin was active in promoting both the spiritual and temporal welfare of the people. He built schoolhouses; introduced improved methods of agriculture; went at the head of the people with spade and hoe to build roads, and erect bridges; established stores, savings-banks, and agricultural associations for the distribution of prizes; induced the heads of factories to remove to the Steinthal, etc. Liberal himself, he was very successful in exciting the liberality of others for his enterprises, even beyond the limits of his parish. In the pulpit and as a pastor his influence was patriarchal. His sermons were distinguished by unbounded sympathy for the needs of his hearers, and simplicity. Three sabbaths he preached in French, the fourth in German. Three-tenths of his income he devoted to benevolent objects; and sold his silver, and donated it to the missionary committee, as soon as he heard of the interest in missions at Basel. He was tolerant in spirit, and admitted Catholics to the Lord's Table. He shared the views of Lavater and Jung-Stilling about eternity, hung up a map of heaven in his church, had much confidence in the lot, and denied the doctrine of everlasting punishment.

Oberlin welcomed the French Revolution, and saw in it the little stone destined to break the power of antichrist; that is, the aristocracy and the clergy. The national festivals he celebrated with his congregation with great pomp. He declared himself an enemy of royalty, and recognized, without any limitations, the sovereignty of the people. Oberlin's church was closed for a time; but he preached in the open air, and cared generously for all who fled to the Steinthal for refuge. His merit was recognized. On the 16th Fructidor, year 2, the National Assembly passed a vote of thanks. When the allied armies invaded Alsace, his name secured immunity for the Steinthal from military oppression; and in 1819 he received the medal of the Legion of Honor. Celebrated men visited him, and Lavater maintained a correspondence with him. He lies buried under the shadow of the church at Fonday, but will continue to be remembered in the Protestant Church as a man who combined humanitarian activity with mystical piety, and bore witness to the omnipotence of Christ's love at a time when that love had grown cold in many hearts. He was the first foreign member of the London Bible Society, and took a deep interest in its work. See LUTTEROTH: Notice sur Oberlin, Paris, 1826; SCHUBERT: *Züge aus. d. OBERLIN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is a department of Oberlin College, supported partly from the general fund, and partly by special endowment. In the First Annual Report of the college, issued in 1831, a theological department is spoken of as a hope to be realized ultimately. During that year a large number of students in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, became dissatisfied, because the trustees of that institution refused them liberty to discuss the subject of slavery, and withdrew in a body. At this time Rev. Charles G. Finney was at the height of his influence in New-York City, and had just withdrawn from the presbytery to be installed pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church. Arthur Tappan proposed to Mr. Finney that he go to some point in Ohio, and take charge of the education of these students. Rev. Asa Mahan, a Presbyterian pastor of Cincinnati, and one of the trustees of Lane, was elected president of Oberlin, and Professor John Morgan of Lane was elected to the chair of New-Testament literature. These students agreed to go to Oberlin if President Finney would accept the chair of theology there. He accepted, and they went. The Catalogue of 1835 reports 35 theological students on the ground; in 1840 the number was 64; in 1883, 44. The number of alumni in 1882 was 370.

The seminary is provided with a commodious and elegant building, containing chapel, lecture-rooms, reference-library, and private rooms for seventy students. Members of every denomination are welcome. Applicants for admission are expected to furnish satisfactory evidence of Christian character, and of such scholarship as will enable them successfully to pursue the course. The majority of the students have always been college graduates. The Bible is studied in the original languages.

The professors are not compelled to sign a creed, but are elected by the trustees from such as are known to be in sympathy with evangelical faith, and with the traditional interest of the founders of the institution in the active promotion of religion and of moral reforms. So far the professors have all been Congregationalists, and the theology taught has been New-School Calvinism of the Edwardean type. (See NEW-ENGLAND THEOLOGY.) For details of this theology, see Oberlin Quarterly Review, 1815-50; Oberlin Evangelist, 1839-63; FINNEY'S Systematic Theology, London, 1851, abridged, Oberlin, 1878; Memoirs, written by himself, Revised Lectures, and several volumes of sermons; MAHAN on The Will; FAIRCHILD'S Moral Philosophy; COWLES'S Commentaries on the Bible; WRIGHT'S Logic of Christian Evidences, Studies in Science and Religion, Relation of Death to Probation; MORGAN'S Holiness Acceptable to God, and Gift of the Holy Spirit, with articles in Bibliotheca Sacra by WRIGHT on Infant Baptism (vol. xxxi. pp. 265 sq., 545 sq.) and on Finney's Theology (vol. xxxiii. pp. 381 sq., xxxiv. pp. 708 sq.), by MORGAN on The Atonement (vol. xxxiv. pp. 632 sq., vol. xxxv. pp. 114 sq.), by FAIRCHILD on The Nature of Sin (vol. xxv. pp. 30 sq.), also on the Doctrine of Sanctification, in Congregational Quarterly, April, 1876.

OCCAM, William (Guilielmus Occamus, or Ochamus), b. about 1280, in the village of Occam (Ockham, or Oksham), in the county of Surrey, Eng.; d. in Munich, April 10, 1317 (or 1319). As the principal source to his life (the pars iii. tract. 8. of his Dialogus in tres partes distinctus) has perished, many details, especially of his earlier life, are very uncertain. He is said to have studied at Merton College, Oxford, and to have obtained in 1300 the archdeanery of Stowe in Lincolnshire, besides other ecclesiastical benefices, which, however, he resigned on entering the order of the Franciscans. Shortly after, he went to Paris, where he studied under Duns Scotus, began to teach philosophy and theology himself, and acquired the surnames of Venerabilis inceptor, Doctor singularis et invincibilis, Princeps et caput nominalium. As the reviver of nominalism, and breaking completely with the opposite doctrine of realism, which had been sole ruler in philosophy since the days of Anselm and the Victorines, he encountered much resistance. In 1339 his views were even forbidden to be taught in the university of Paris. But he also found many enthusiastic friends, such as Marsilius of Padua, Jean of Jandun, John Buridan, and others. At what time he returned to England is not known; but in 1322 he was provincial of his order there, and as such he became implicated in controversies much more dangerous than those his philosophy had caused. It is not probable that he took any part in the quarrel between Philip the Fair and Boniface VIII. The Disputatio inter clericum et militem is, at all events, not by him. But at the general Franciscan convention at Perugia, in 1322, he, together with the general, Michael of Cesena, and the brother, Bonagrata of Bergamo, vindicated, against the decision of the Pope, the strict view of the order, that Christ and the apostles had never held property. They were all three summoned to Avignon; and, as they would not yield, they were kept in prison there for four years (1321-28). Finally, a formal process was instituted against them; but in the night of May 25, 1328, they succeeded in escaping, and fled to Italy, where they were well received by the emperor, Lewis the Bavarian, and his antipope, Nicholas V. When the emperor, in 1330, was compelled to leave Italy, and retired to Bavaria, Occam and his fellow-sufferers followed him, and settled in Munich. There he spent the rest of his life, developing a most astonishing literary activity, directly attacking the Pope and the Papacy. As time went on, however, he became more and more lonesome (some of his friends died, others made their peace with the Pope), and lonesomeness finally made him more pliant. He made overtures for reconciliation, and they were eagerly accepted; but it is uncertain whether he ever signed the formula of recantation demanded by the Pope. See WADDING: Ann. Ord. Min., Rome, 1650, viii. 2; and JACOBUS DE MARCHIA, Dialogus contra Fraticellos, in BALUZE, Miscell., who denies it.

Occam was a critic by nature. From a criticism of the reigning realism in philosophy, he went on to a criticism of the dogmatical tradition of the church, and thence to the criticism of the ecclesiastico-political views of his age; always free, sharp, consistent, and yet pious, orthodox to stiffness, ascetic even to fanaticism; always clear and precise in his fundamental conceptions, but lengthy and heavy in his dialectical exposition; sometimes flashing like lightning, but often obscure on account of abstruseness and subtlety. Of his philosophical works, which have great interest for the history of mediæval philosophy, but are only imperfectly known, the principal are, Expositio aurea, Bologna, 1496, a series of commentaries on Porphyry and Aristotle, and containing a full representation of his logic and dialectics; Summa logices, Paris, 1448, Bologna, 1498, Venice, 1508, Oxford, 1675; Major summa logices, Venice, 1521, etc. From his philosophy followed his theology as a natural consequence. The reality of the universalia he denied (ante rem, in re, post rem); but, when the thing and the idea are not equally real, that absolute congruity of reason and faith, of science and religion, always presupposed by realism, must be an illusion. From this premise Occam subjected the dogmas of the church to a most scorching criticism; not, by any means, for the purpose of overthrowing them, or weakening their influence, but simply in order to show that the two spheres—that of experience and that of authority—are so absolutely different, that the principles by which the one is ruled are entirely inapplicable to the other. His principal theological works are, Questiones earumque decisiones, Lyons, 1483, and often; Quodlibeta septem, Paris, 1487, Strassburg, 1491; Centilogium, Lyons, 1494, a collection of piquant examples rather than abstract problems; De sacramento altaris, Strassburg, 1491, Venice, 1516, etc. But by far the most numerous, and, in historical respect, also the most important, group of his writings is the ecclesiastico-political, called forth by the controversy between the Franciscan order and the Papacy, and the contest between the emperor, Lewis the Bavarian, and the popes John XXII., Benedict XII., and Clement VI. The maxim resulting from his theological criticism, that, in the Christian Church, the highest, the absolute authority is vested in the Bible, led him to a crushing criticism of the manifold pretensions, dogmatical and political, made by the Pope. As above mentioned, the Disputatio inter clericum et militem is not by him. Of undoubted genuineness are, Opus nonaginta dierum, written in ninety days, between 1330 and 1332, against the decision of John XXII. in the property question, afterwards incorporated with the third part of his Dialogus, first printed at Lyons, 1495; Tractatus de dogmatibus Johannis XXII., written in 1333-34, against a sermon of the Pope on the state of the departed souls before the resurrection, afterwards incorporated with the second part of his Dialogus. Compendium errorum Joannis XXII., Paris, 1476, Lyons, 1495, written between 1335 and 1338, after the death of the Pope; Epistola defensoria, Venice, 1513; Decisiones octo questionum, written after 1339, first printed at Lyons, 1496, and answering the questions, whether the highest spiritual and the highest secular power can be united in one person, whether the secular power has its origin directly from God, whether the Pope has the power of jurisdiction also in secular matters, etc.; Dialogus in tres partes distinctus, his chief work in this line, written probably in 1342-43, first printed in Paris, 1476, 2 vols. fol., but not complete; De jurisdictione imperatoris in causis matrimonialibus. De electione Caroli, etc. A collected critical edition of Occam's works does not exist (several of them are still in manuscript); nor has there been written any satisfactory monograph on his life and doctrines, though the latter exercised so decisive an influence in the period of the Reformation, especially on Luther.

OCCUM, Sampson, converted Indian, and Presbyterian missionary among the Indians; b. at Mohegan, New-London County, Conn., about 1723; d. at New Stockbridge, N.Y., July 14, 1792. He was converted in 1739-40; ordained Aug. 29, 1759, by the Suffolk Presbytery, Long Island, having previously for many years taught school among the Indians. He was the first Indian minister to visit in England, which he did in 1766 to raise money for Dr. Wheelock's Indian charity school. His labors as missionary were principally in New-York State. His account of the Montauk Indians is in the Massachusetts Historical Society's Collections, 1st ser. x. 106.

OCHINO, Bernardino, one of the Italian Reformers; b. in Siena, 1487; d. at Schlackau, Mahren, 1565. His classical education was very imperfect, so that he knew no Hebrew and little Greek. He entered the strictest order of the Franciscans, and in 1531 joined the still stricter order of the Capuchins. He became an earnest preacher, and his eloquence won for him a very extensive reputation. In 1536 he preached the Lenten sermons at Naples; and Charles V., who heard them, said, "This man could move the stones themselves." In this city he came in contact with the Spanish mystic, Juan Valdez, and formed the friendship of Peter Martyr. His preaching in Venice and other cities was attended by such large crowds, that the churches could not hold the people. Honors were heaped upon him. Paul III. chose him for his confessor, and in 1538 the Capuchins at Florence elected him general of their order. He was accused of heresy in Naples, where he preached in 1540,—laying emphasis upon justification, and ignoring indulgences, purgatory, etc.,—but was, notwithstanding, chosen a second time general of the Capuchins in 1541. Venice now became the scene of his labors; and it was probably here that he wrote his Dialogi III. sacri, dove si contiene, nel primo dell' innamorarsi di dio, etc. (1542). He was cited to appear in Rome, and started on the journey to obey the summons, but at Florence was induced by Peter Martyr, who was himself about to leave Italy, to flee the country. Hurrying to Ferrara, he received letters from the Duchess Renata, and speedily left the country, arriving at Geneva in October, 1542. He here preached to the Italian fugitives. His life was severe and pure, and won from Calvin (letter to Farel, October, 1543) the praise that Ochino was a "great man in every respect." Not forgetting Italy, he published in this city six volumes of Italian sermons (Prediche, 1542-44, 2d ed., Basel, 1562). Twenty-five of these were published in an English translation at Ipswich, 1548. These sermons are simple, pungent, and evangelical.

In 1545 Ochino went to Augsburg, where he ministered to the Italian congregation. In 1547 the emperor demanded that he should be delivered up; but, with the connivance of the authorities, he escaped to Strassburg, where he met Peter Martyr, and started with him for England. He became the pastor of the congregation of Italian refugees in London. A work appeared under his name in London, 1549, with the title, A tragedy or dialogue of the unjust usurped primacy of the Bishop of Rome. At the accession of Mary, he fled to Geneva, which he was obliged to leave on account of public utterances in which he expressed disapproval of the execution of Servetus. He went to Zürich. About this time he published two volumes on the Lord's Supper,—Sincere doctrina de cena Domini defensio contra libros tres J. Westphali, Zürich, 1556, and Disputa intorno alla presenza del corpo di Giesu Cristo nel Sacramento della cena, Basel, 1561. He advocated the Calvinistic view, but his views were beginning to assume a Socinian tinge. His catechism (Il Catechismo, ovvero institutione christiana, Basel, 1561) contains many speculations ill fitting a book of its character; but in his 30 Dialogi in duos libros divisi, quorum primus est de Messia, secundus est, cum de rebus variis, tum potissimum de Trinitate (Basel, 1563) different doctrines about Christ's person and work, and the Trinity, were treated in the style of a dialogue, and many doubts thrown out in regard to Christ's satisfaction and the Trinity. He also treated the subject of marriage in such a way as to incur the charge of favoring polygamy. It cannot be said that he denied any of the truths of Christian theology or ethics, but he had evidently fallen into a doubting condition of mind. This work was the occasion of Ochino's banishment from Zürich. Long before, Calvin had conceived suspicions of his orthodoxy. He went to Nüruberg, then to Cracow, but fell under the decree (Aug. 6, 1564) banishing all foreigners who were not Catholics from Poland, and died on his return to Germany. He was a man of splendid gifts, but died a victim of the intolerance of the day and his own brooding. Later writers, Zanchi (De tribus Elohim, Neustadt, 1589) and Sandius (Bibl. Antitrinitar.), regarded him as one of the chief founders of the antitrinitarian school. Beza refuted his discussion of polygamy in his Tractatus de polygamia appended to his De repudiis (Geneva, 1567).

Among Ochino's works not already mentioned are Apologi nelli quali si scuorpano gli abusi, etc., Geneva, 1544; an Italian exposition of Romans (Geneva, 1545) and Galatians (Augsburg, 1546). For his life, see BAYLE: Dictionnaire; STRUVE: De vita . . . B. Ochini, in the Observat. select. Italens., iv. 409 sqq., v. 1 sqq.; BÜCHSENSCHÜTZ: *Vie et écrits d. OCTAVE, a term belonging to the Liturgy of the Roman-Catholic Church, denotes the celebration of the great Christian festivals—Easter, Pentecost, Christmas, and Epiphany—during eight consecutive days, with a special emphasis on the first and the last. The missal prescribes a special prayer for each day, and for the last a special service. The arrangement was evidently borrowed from the Jewish celebration of Easter and the Feast of Tabernacles. The English Church has retained the arrangement so far as to prescribe the "preface" proper to Christmas Day, Easter Day, Ascension Day, and Whitsunday, for the seven days immediately following them.

ODENHEIMER, William Henry, D.D., b. at Philadelphia, Aug. 11, 1817; d. at Burlington, N.J., Aug. 14, 1879. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, 1835; took holy orders; was rector of St. Peter's, Philadelphia, 1840; and consecrated bishop of Northern New Jersey, Oct. 13, 1859. He wrote, among other works, The Origin and Compilation of the Prayer-Book, New York, 1841; Essay on Canon Law, 1847; Jerusalem and its Vicinity, Philadelphia, 1855. See Sermons, with an Introductory Memoir edited by his Wife, New York, 1881.

ODILO, St., fifth abbot of Clugny; b. in Auvergne, 962; d. at Louvigny, Jan. 1, 1049; ruled his monastery with such a success that even bishops are said to have resigned their sees in order to become monks at Clugny. He wrote a life of his predecessor, St. Moieul, and also one of St. Adelheid, the wife of Otho I., found in Bibliotheca Cluniensis. His own life was written by JOTSALD, in Act. Sanct. Jan. 2.

ODO, St., second abbot of Clugny; b. in Maine, 879; d. at Tours, 943; carried through the severest rules in all the monasteries connected with Clugny, but contributed thereby immensely to the prosperity of the institutions. He wrote, besides some sermons, Tractatus de reversione B. Martini, and Collationes on the sacrament of the Eucharist, found in Biblioth. Cluniensis and Bibl. Max. Patr. (Lyons), xvii., together with his own life, written by JEAN LE MOINE. His works were published also by MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., tom. 133, reprinted, Paris, 1881.

ÆCOLAMPADIUS, John, the distinguished

Reformer of Basel, whose real name was Hussgen (Heussgen); was b. 1482, in Weinsberg, a town in the present kingdom of Würtemberg; d. Nov. 24, 1531, at Basel. There are several illustrations in the period of the Reformation, that the Lord delights to send out his disciples in pairs when he has a great work to accomplish. Luther stood side by side with Melancthon, Calvin with Beza, and Æcolampadius with Zwingli; and, although the last two belonged to different churches, they were intimately associated together as friends, and participants in a common work. The life of Æcolampadius falls into two periods,—his development into the Reformer (1482–1522), his reformatory activity (1523–31).

His parents were people of means; his mother, a pious and benevolent woman. After studying at Heilbromm, he followed his father's wishes, and went to Bologna to study law. The merchant to whom his money was confided misappropriated it; and, for this and other reasons, he returned home, determining to exchange the law for theology. In 1499 he entered the university of Heidelberg; and, although he rather avoided the Scholastic theology, he studied Thomas Aquinas, and especially Gerson and Richard of St. Victor. In 1503 he received the bachelor's degree, and was appointed by the elector Philip tutor to his younger sons. Discontented at the electoral court, he returned to Weinsberg, where his parents, following a prevalent custom, established an ecclesiastical position for him out of their own means. It was while occupying this place that he delivered his sermons on the seven words of the cross, which were published in 1512 at Freiburg. An eager desire to become more familiar with the ancient languages induced him in 1512 to go to Tübingen, where he formed the friendship of Melancthon, and from there to Stuttgart, where he continued the study of Greek with Reuchlin. He was in Heidelberg again in 1514 or 1515, engaged in the study of Hebrew with a baptized Spanish Jew, Matthew Adriani. Enriched with knowledge, he returned to Weinsberg, but was soon, at Capito's suggestion, called to Basel as cathedral preacher. Erasmus, to whom he carried a letter of introduction, received him cordially, and employed him to distinguish the quotations from the LXX., and those from the Hebrew in the New Testament in his edition of the Greek New Testament. (See preface to the third edition, 1521.) He returned again in the mean time to Weinsberg, where he employed some of his solitude in comparing Jerome's version with the Hebrew, and in correspondence with Luther, Melancthon, and especially Erasmus. In a work published in 1518 (De risu paschali) he condemned the custom, then prevalent, of amusing the hearers from the pulpit on Easter with all kinds of jokes. Urged by Erasmus, he went back to Basel. Reuchlin mentions this fact in a letter to the elector of Saxony (May 7, 1518), and says he had intended to recommend him for the Hebrew professorship at Wittenberg. In 1520 his Greek grammar (Græcæ litteraturæ dragmata) appeared. In the mean time he had received the doctor's degree (1518), and accepted a call as preacher in the principal church of Augsburg. It was well that he was to be separated from Erasmus for a time. He arrived in Augsburg soon after Luther's appearance there before the cardinal legate, Cajetan; and he at once took sides with the bold monk whose career he had been following with deep interest. In his work Canonici indocti, which appeared anonymously in 1519, he espoused the doctrine of justification by faith alone, emphasized the good work Luther had done, and rebuked Eck's presumption and pride.

On April 23, 1520, Æcolampadius surprised all his friends by entering the convent of Altenmünster, near Augsburg. He gave his reasons for this course in a letter to Erasmus, which unfortunately has been lost. But he was not contented in the convent. In 1520, shortly after Dr. Eck's return from Rome with the bull excommunicating Luther, he passed a very favorable judgment upon Luther, in the course of which occur the words, "Luther stands nearer the truth of the gospel than his adversaries," etc. This judgment, which Capito published, appeared first in Latin, then in German. Other favorable judgments of Luther appeared in the Latin edition, as that of Erasmus. Of more importance were two sermons published by Kratander in Basel (1521); the one denouncing the doctrine that divine honors are to be paid to Mary, the other denying the doctrine of transubstantiation. It was, however, his work on the confessional which excited most attention (Luther to Melancthon, July 13, 1521). He does not give it up entirely, but points out its abuses, and denies that Christ meant all special sins to be confessed to a priest. Luther, in a letter to Spalatin (June 10, 1521), thus expresses his esteem for Æcolampadius: "I am surprised at his spirit, not because he fell upon the same theme that I did, but because he has shown himself so liberal, prudent, and Christian. God grant him growth!"

Æcolampadius left the convent in February, 1522, and went to Heidelberg, and from there to Ebernburg, near Crenznach, the refuge of several men of the new opinions, having refused in the mean time a professorship in the university of Ingolstadt, which was offered on the condition of his renouncing his Lutheran opinions, and receiving a dispensation from the Pope. At Ebernburg he acted as chaplain. On Nov. 16, 1522, he arrived in Basel, where he was probably invited by the printer Kratander, in the name of the friends of the gospel. Here the second period of his life begins.

The first and principal thing for us to notice at this point is the activity which Æcolampadius developed in Basel. This city was at this time the most important intellectual centre in Switzerland, the seat of its only university (founded 1160), and the residence of its most extensive printers. Here Erasmus lived, surrounded by a circle of learned men, to which Bishop von Uttenheim belonged. This all, however, shows that the Roman-Catholic cause was nowhere so well represented in Switzerland as here, and the university was the defender of the traditional faith and church fabric. The Reformation had made some progress among the citizens, and it was a thing of great importance that such a man as Æcolampadius was called to the city at this juncture. In 1522 he opened a correspondence and his friendship with Zwingli. He began preaching as vicar at St. Martin's, and in 1523 was appointed by the city council reader of the Holy Scriptures at the university; the university authorities, however, refusing to recognize the appointment. Æcolampadius took up Isaiah, and found occasion in his lectures to condemn the prevalent ecclesiastical abuses. These lectures excited a great deal of attention, and greatly displeased Erasmus. Aroused by his Catholic opponents, he went further, and appointed a public disputation for Aug. 30, 1523, which took place in spite of the protest of the university, and in which Æcolampadius was so successful, that Erasmus wrote to Zürich, "Æcolampadius has the upper hand among us." In 1524 Farel arrived at Basel; and, by appointment of the city council, a public disputation was held at the close of February, Æcolampadius translating into German Farel's address. Æcolampadius continued to preach. Some of his sermons were published, the principal of which are those on 1 John (Latin, 1524, 2d ed., 1525). In 1525 he was appointed pastor at St. Martin's, with the permission of introducing changes, on condition of their first being approved by the council. The cause of the Reformation was progressing, but it had by no means won the victory. A publication criticising Karlstadt's writings was condemned by the city council (October, 1525), and Kratander forbidden to publish any more of the Reformer's works. He became entangled with the Anabaptists, but strove to distinguish his opinions from theirs. In the disputation at Baden, although Æcolampadius showed his superiority to Eck, Zwingli and all his followers were declared heretics. But the Reformation in Basel had gone too far to be crushed by such measures. In 1527 the city council summoned Marius, a cathedral preacher, and Æcolampadius, to present the opposite views concerning the mass. The former's defence was considered weak, even by the Catholic party. The Reformer's tract is a model of good arrangement, clear, pungent, and scholarly treatment. The council did not dare to decide between them. Both appeared in print. At this time (January, 1528), Æcolampadius and Zwingli were invited to take the principal part in the disputation at Bern, which resulted in the adoption of the Reformation by that canton. This example had an influence upon Basel, which became more definitely divided into two camps. It was determined to decide the fate of the mass by a public disputation in the spring of 1529, and in the mean time the rite was to be celebrated in only three churches. Æcolampadius was satisfied with this compromise; but an imprudent disregard of it on the part of the Catholic party so aroused the citizens, that they called upon the Catholic members of the city council to resign. The council was finally forced to grant the demand. Æcolampadius was made superintendent (antistes) of the Reformed churches of the city and canton, and appointed chief pastor at the cathedral. The Anabaptists, who had a following in the city, claimed the Reformer for their views. In order to disabuse their minds of the fallacy, he held a disputation with some of them, in the pastoral residence of St. Martin's (1525). Æcolampadius undoubtedly went too far on this occasion in his utterances about infant baptism, but he wrote against the Anabaptists. He also devoted himself to the perfection of a system of church government, differing from his friend Zwingli herein, that he advocated the principle of keeping the Church and State separate. He was opposed to confiding the interests of the former wholly to the hands of the latter, and he secured the passage of a measure creating a synod which held two meetings annually.

The views of Æcolampadius on the Lord's Supper cannot be commended in every respect. In his work on the interpretation of the words, "This is my body," among the Fathers (De genuina verborum Domini: hoc est corpus meum, juxta vetustissimos auctores expositione liber), he urges with a great deal of force the arguments against the literal interpretation, and in favor of the metaphor contained in the word "body" (corpus). But, in the attempt to remove the errors of the Roman-Catholic interpretation, he unfortunately went so far as to state that believers partook of the Lord's Supper more for the sake of others than for their own; so that the sacrament was turned into an object-lesson. Still, he was not able to deny the great importance of the Lord's Supper as a sacrament, and, at the close, says that God accomplishes through the sacraments nearly all that he otherwise accomplishes through the Word. He saw to it, that in Basel the Lord's Supper was administered much more frequently than in any of the other Reformed churches, or alternately every Sunday, in four churches. When the unionistic measures of Bucer were being discussed, he emphatically declared that Christ's body and blood were received and participated in in a spiritual way; and, although it must be confessed that this aspect was not sufficiently emphasized in the debate with Luther, it was nevertheless represented.

In an answer to the Syngramma, subscribed (Oct. 21, 1525) by fourteen Suabian theologians, Æcolampadius made some imprudent statements concerning the inner Word, but did not depreciate the written Word. Against Luther's Preface to the Syngramma he wrote an answer, Billige Antwort auf Dr. M. Luther's Bericht d. Sacraments halben. Luther replied; and Æcolampadius wrote another answer, Das der Missverstand Dr. M. Luther's auf d. ewig beständigen Worte, etc., 1527. In the first of these two works, he opposes to Luther's doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's body the presence and activity of the Holy Spirit in the Church. He also wrote a reply to Luther's first confession of the Lord's Supper (1528), and it is well known that his demeanor in this discussion was far more dignified than Luther's. He also took part in the conference at Marburg. (See MARBURG.) About the same time he was called upon to take part in the introduction of the Reformation into some towns of Southern Germany, as Ulm. It was due largely to him that the Waldenses finally broke with the Catholic Church. His opinion was likewise solicited by Henry VIII., on his divorce, and was given, with some hesitation, in its favor. At Zwingli's death he defended and praised his friend. The clergy called him to Zürich to take Zwingli's place, but he declined. He married in 1528, and left three children. His widow married Capito (1532), and, later, Bucer (1542), and died, 1561.

Æcolampadius was not as original and able a theologian as Zwingli and others; but he held an independent position over against Zwingli, as is clear from his views on predestination. He did not enter into Zwingli's, Luther's, and Calvin's minute analysis of this doctrine. His views were well expressed in his reply to the Waldensian, Morel (1530), "Our salvation is of God; our perdition, of ourselves" (salus nostra ex Deo, perditio nostra ex nobis). He was moderate and irenic in his spirit. His earlier views on the Lord's Supper gave way to sounder views, which regarded it as a means of grace for the Christian life. If some accused him of depreciating the written Word, the best answer will be found in his extensive works on the exposition of the Scriptures. It is to be regretted that no collected edition of his works has ever appeared. My biography gives a list of his writings. See HESS: Lebensgesch. Dr. J. Oekolampads, Zürich, 1791; HERZOG: *D.
